TALBOT HARLAND.

A TALE OF THE DAYS OF CHARLES THE SECOND.

BOOK THE FIRST.

THE COURT AT TUNBRIDGE WELLS.

I.

SOMERHILL.

No mansion in Kent is more charmingly situated, or commands fairer prospects, than stately Somerhill. From its terrace, the views are enchanting, comprising gentle hills clothed with timber, lovely valleys, broad meads, housesteads innumerable, orchards, hop-gardens, and, at no great distance, the picturesque old town of Tunbridge, with its ruinous castle, and the Medway flowing past it. Beyond, rise the heights of Sevenoaks, and the long line of the Surrey hills. Tunbridge Wells, which lies in a hollow on the left, is hidden; but its position is marked by the heathy common beyond it, and by the villas crowning the hills. At the rear of the mansion, the prospect is far more extensive, and ranges over a vast and fertile plain, in the midst of which may be descried Canterbury, with the chalk downs near Dover in the extreme distance.

In the days of the Merry Monarch, in which our story is laid, the views from the terrace of Somerhill were even finer than at present, because there was nothing to mar the beauty of the landscape. A delightful air of seclusion pervaded the whole scene. There were more heaths, more woods, and fewer hedges. The prospect was wilder, but more pleasing.

In 1670, the precise date of our story, Somerhill could not boast of antiquity. It is old now; but still in excellent preservation. Built in the reign of James I. on the site of an older mansion, which had belonged to the mirror of knighthood, Sir Philip Sidney, and afterwards to Dudley, Earl of Leicester, Queen Elizabeth's favourite, at the period of which we treat, it was the country residence of Lady Muskerrey, the famous "Babylonian Princess" of De Grammont, and had been bequeathed to her by her husband, the brave Lord Muskerrey, who was killed by the side of the Duke of York, in the great naval conflict with the Dutch in 1665.

The widowed lady of Somerhill was not a beauty—far from it. Very plain, very vain, she dressed outrageously; and being crazed on the subject of dancing, rendered herself an object of ridicule to the whole Court. Nevertheless, she was very good-humoured, and too even ridicule in good part—perhaps she did not perceive it; and being very rich and hospitable, her absurdities, though laughed at, were tolerated. Indeed, they afforded endless amusement to the Duke of Buckingham, Killigrew, Etherege, Sedley, and the other Court wits.

Lady Muskerrey was of an uncertain age, neither young nor old; short of stature, not particularly well made, but remarkably active; and she believed—and she had the King's word for it—that she danced and danced better than any other dame at Court—not excepting even the Duchess of Cleveland. Naturally, her wealth attracted many suitors, who were not deterred by her eccentricity; but as yet she had continued faithful to the memory of her valiant husband. Whenever Charles visited Tunbridge Wells with his Court, Somerhill was the scene of constant festivities, and nothing could be more sumptuous or agreeable than these entertainments.

Lady Muskerrey had latterly greatly increased her popularity at Court by providing the Queen with the loveliest maid of honour that had been seen at Whitehall since the time of the belle Stewart, now Duchess of Richmond.

Dorinda Neville, Lady Muskerrey's niece and ward, was just nineteen when she was preferred to the enviable place by her Majesty Queen Catherine; and it was universally allowed that for grace, symmetry of person, and regularity of feature, she eclipsed all her predecessors. The Queen was delighted with her; for she had as much discretion as beauty, and her head was not turned by the adulations of even the highest personages. The wittiest of the courtiers wrote sonnets in her praise; and those who were less witty, but quite as eager to win her favour, paid her a thousand compliments; but neither wits nor empty compliments touched her heart, though they afforded her amusement.

We must endeavour to give her portrait, though only Lely could do justice to her charms. Dorinda Neville, then, was a blonde, with a delicately fair complexion, eyes of a tender blue, arched over by exquisitely pencilled eyebrows, and shaded by long eyelashes, lovely features, marked by a charming expression, a profusion of light tresses, and a slender but faultless figure. All her movements were full of grace, and she danced to admiration. Lady Muskerrey told the King, confidentially, that she had been her niece's sole instructress in dancing, and had taken a vast deal of pains with her.

"Oddsfish! I thought so," replied Charles, smiling. "She does your ladyship a vast deal of credit."

The lovely Dorinda Neville had not been long at Court—though quite long enough to cause innumerable heart-burnings and jealousies—when his Majesty's youngest sister, Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans, arrived on a visit to her royal brother. Henrietta, it may be proper to state, was married to Philip, Duke of Orleans, sole brother to Louis XIV., and at this time was not more than twenty-five, and possessed of great personal attractions. Poor princess! she could not foresee her fate, which was to die by poison, administered by her husband, not many weeks afterwards. The Duchess's visit, though apparently unexpected by Charles, had been preconcerted between them; in fact, she came on a secret mission from the French monarch. The Duchess of Orleans embarked at Dunquerque in the beginning of May, 1670, and was received by the King, in person, at Dover, and conducted by him to Whitehall, where a series of magnificent fêtes were given in her honour. These fêtes derived additional attraction from the many French gentlemen and dames whom the Duchess had brought in her train. Foremost among the latter, for beauty and grace, was the dazzling Louise de Quéroualle; and if Louis had sent over the ambitious syren for the purpose of subjugating the amorous English monarch, he perfectly succeeded in his design. Charles at once fell into the snare. But Louise, though young, was an experienced coquette, and heightened the King's passion by feigned indifference to his suit.

II.

THE COUNT DE BELLEGARDE.

THE gayest and handsomest of the gallants in attendance upon the Duchess of Orleans was Count Achille de Bellegarde. This was not the Count's first visit to England. About three years previously, he was banished from the French Court for a scandalous intrigue, followed by a duel, in which the injured husband was killed; and he thereupon sought refuge at the English Court, where, notwithstanding his reputation, he was extremely well received. His agreeable manners and dissipated habits recommended him to the Duke of Buckingham, with whom, for some time, he was on the most intimate terms. But a quarrel occurred between them, of which the Duchess of Cleveland was the cause, and they met in Hyde Park, where the Count was wounded, though not dangerously.

Bellegarde's successes among the Court dames were almost as great as those of the irresistible Jermyn; and he had the credit of making both the King and the Duke of York jealous. But he was volatile as enterprising, and the loveliest woman could not retain him long in her fetters. His addiction to pleasure led him into great extravagances; and play being his usual resource, he was sometimes reduced to rather desperate straits. When driven to extremity, he resorted to the gaming-houses, and, associating himself with the rooks and sharpers, who seemed to regard him as one of their fraternity, soon managed to refill his purse. But these practices rather sullied his character, and made men of honour shy of playing with him. Luckily for himself, however, he was never detected in any trickery, though more than once charged by the exasperated losers with carrying loaded dice. But the rooks always sided with him—probably because they shared in his spoils. Bellegarde's admirable manners and address sur-tained him at many a critical juncture. No man had greater self-possession; no man had greater powers of fascination. The Duchess of Cleveland openly avowed her partiality for him, and would have pensioned him, but for his inconstancy.

During his visits to the gaming-houses and the cock-pit, at Westminster, Bellegarde made acquaintance with the noted Colonel Blood, of Sarney, in the county of Meath—a desperado who had been exiled by the Duke of Ormond from Ireland for a rebellious attempt to surprise the Castle of Dublin. Several of the conspirators were hanged by Ormond, and their fierce leader vowed to avenge them by hanging the Duke at Tyburn. Hitherto, he had not found an opportunity of executing his threat. A man of great resolution, crafty as audacious, Blood not only possessed extraordinary effrontery, but great powers of persuasion, when he chose to exercise them. All his Irish property being confiscated, he was driven to the gaming-tables, where he encountered Bellegarde, to whom he took an amazing fancy; and having saved the Count's life, when the latter was set upon in Lincoln's Inn Fields, a strong friendship was cemented between them.

Colonel Blood was a widower, but he had a daughter, Sabine, who was then seventeen. After the adventure just referred to, he took the Count to his lodgings in a small street near Covent Garden, and the gay Frenchman then, for the first time, beheld the charming Irish girl. She was a sweet, unsophisticated creature, and being quite unaccustomed to compliments, blushed deeply at those paid her by the Count. Clearly he was smitten; for he called next day, and again saw Sabine.

Blood did not discourage his visits (though he had hitherto kept a careful watch over his daughter, and had suffered no gallants to approach her); for he had secretly resolved that she should become Countess de Bellegarde. At length, thinking the affair had gone quite far enough, perceiving that the fascinating Frenchman had gained her heart, he put on his most determined air, and told the Count that he expected him to marry his daughter. Bellegarde laughed, and replied that he had no idea of marriage. Blood looked as if he would have stabbed him on the spot; but said that if he did not make up his mind within three days to marry Sabine, he was a dead man.

Bellegarde easily extricated himself from this dilemma. When Blood galled for his decision, he found he had gone to Paris.

Luckily for the volatile Frenchman, his cousin, Louise de Quéroualle, had obtained his pardon from Louis XIV; and being now at liberty to return to the Court of Versailles, he took leave of his friends at Whitehall, kissed the King's hand, and departed for Paris. He did not trouble himself much about Blood, but he could not banish Sabine's image. Now that he had lost her, he discovered that the fair Irish girl had a hold upon his heart that no other had ever obtained. However, his regrets, though bitter, did not prevent him from engaging in froth affairs of gallantry, and he continued to play as deeply as ever; hoping, perhaps, to purchase forgetfulness by constant dissipation. In this he was mistaken, for Sabine's image never ceased to haunt him.

Two years passed by, when an opportunity of revisiting the scene of his former conquests and gaieties presented itself, and he eagerly embraced it. He hoped to see Sabine again, and felt sure she had remained constant to him. His cousin, Louise de Quéroualle, who was in great favour both with Louis XIV and the Duchess of Orleans, had procured him the post of gentleman-usher at the Palace of Saint Cloud; and when the Duchess was sent by the French King on the secret mission to Charles, Bellegarde accompanied her.

On the journey, he thought of nothing but Sabine, and pictured the raptures of a meeting with her; but sometimes a painful idea would intrude. What if she had died of grief at his desertion? On his arrival at Whitehall, his misgivings, if any remained, were quickly dispelled. In the courtyard, to his infinite surprise, he perceived Colonel Blood, apparently waiting for him. Mustering up all his assurance, he hurried up to the Colonel, who greeted him as if nothing untoward had happened. Blood looked in better case than formerly, and accounted for the improvement by saying he had lately gained a prize in the Royal Oak Lottery. Bellegarde congratulated him heartily, and then ventured to inquire after Sabine.

"She is looking better than ever," replied Blood.

"That I can easily believe," replied the Count. "But I trust she has not forgotten me?"

"Do you think my daughter would break an engagement?" rejoined Blood. "No. But you have taken two years, instead of three days, for consideration. Have you made up your mind?"

"I have come back expressly to marry her," replied Bollégarde.

It would take up too much time just now to describe the rapturous meeting between the gay fugitive and the deserted damsel. Suffice it, then, to say, that grief had not impaired Sabine's beauty. On the contrary, her charms had ripened during her lover's long absence.

Transported with delight, the Count threw himself at her feet; and after a few tears and gentle reproaches, was forgiven.

At the end of a week, the Duchess of Orleans was completely wearied with the pleasures and diversions offered her at Whitehall; but not having accomplished the object of her mission, even with the aid of her confidant, Louise de Quéroutalle, she could not return to St. Cloud, and so proposed a visit to Tunbridge Wells, of which she had heard such enchanting descriptions; and her wishes being seconded by Louise, Charles readily assented, and, on the very next day, the whole Court proceeded to the Wells.

The Duchess of Orleans and Mademoiselle de Quéroutalle were lodged at Somerhill. Lady Muskerrey had not much time to prepare for her distinguished guests; but she exerted herself to the utmost to give them a suitable reception. Magnificent rooms were assigned them, and accommodation was found in the large mansion for all the Duchess's ladies. The King was charmed with an arrangement that suited him exactly, and thanked her ladyship most heartily for her attentions to his sister.

III.

THE COURT BALL AT SOMERHILL.

On the evening after the Duchess's arrival at Somerhill, a grand ball took place, at which Charles and the whole Court assisted. Mademoiselle de Quéroutalle had never appeared so charming as at this entertainment; but though she dazzled all eyes by her sparkling attractions, there was one fair nymph who surpassed her in grace and beauty. Need we say that this was Dorinda Neville?

A Court ball in the days of the Merry Monarch was a splendid and picturesque sight. We will not institute invidious comparisons; we will not say that lords and ladies danced better then than now—but they did dance, with spirit as well as with grace. Their souls were in the performance; languor and listlessness were unknown, and there was no such thing as walking through a figure.

A prettier picture than that presented by the ball at Somerhill cannot be conceived. Dancing took place in a large old-fashioned room—old-fashioned, even then. The costumes of the company, all of which were distinguished for richness, as well as variety of colour, materially added to the effect. Velvets and silks of all hues were blended together, and formed one harmonious whole. Never, sure, were described costumes more becoming, either for man or woman. Never was seen such a galaxy of beauty. To say nothing of the charming Dorinda Neville—of the bewitching Louise de Quéroutalle—of the sprightly, dark-eyed, dark-complexioned Duchess of Orleans,—there was the superb Duchess of Cleveland—the lovely Duchess of Richmond, who had proved so obdurate to Charles—Lady Bellasyse, Lady Denham, and fifty other beauties. The neglected Queen cannot be placed on this list—for, alas! she had few personal attractions; but she chatted good-humouredly with the lively Duchess of Orleans, and manifested no jealousy of the King's new favourite. In this self-command, her Majesty offered a marked contrast to the Duchess of Cleveland, who could not hide her rage, but glanced daggers at her rival.

Among the crowd of gallants congregated at the ball, the most conspicuous was the Duke of Buckingham. As usual, the Duke, who was the finest gentleman at Court, was distinguished by the magnificence of his apparel. His noble figure could be everywhere discerned, for he was taller almost by the head than any one in the room; and though he did not dance, he was perpetually moving about; now talking in a strain of refined gallantry to the Duchess of Orleans, anon inflaming the angry Cleveland's jealousy; now jesting with Rochester, Sedley, and Etherege, not even sparing Old Rowley himself in his sarcasms; then infuriating Sir John Denham by making love to his wife; now narrating some piquant Court scandal to the Earl of Falmouth, and Killegrew, who acted as master of the revels; now discussing a point of etiquette with Lords Breunker and Bath, and lastly addressing himself in the courtliest and most friendly manner to the Duke of Ormond, whom he hated, and whose removal from the government of Ireland he had caused by his intrigues.

Devoting himself exclusively to Louise de Quéroutalle, the King had eyes for no other beauty. He danced the bransle with her. His good-humoured Majesty had a real enjoyment in a brisk and animated dance; and though he went through a minuet and a cou-ranto with inimitable grace, he greatly preferred the bransle, the passey, or a country-dance. So nimbly did he foot it on the present occasion, and so long did the bransle last—for Killegrew ordered the musicians to go on—that he fairly tired out his charming partner.

Of course, the Count de Bellegarde was present at the ball, though we have not hitherto mentioned him. Even in that brilliant assemblage, he was noticeable. His light and graceful figure was displayed to the greatest advantage by rich habiliments of the latest French mode. Until this evening, he had not seen the new maid of honour, and he wondered how so charming a creature could have escaped his observation. He begged Lady Muskerrey to present him to her charming niece, and he was presented accordingly. To his great mortification, Derinda received him very haughtily, and declined to give him her hand for the bransle. The thing might have passed off, for the Count could have easily concealed his chagrin; but Lady Muskerrey made matters worse by sharply reprimanding her niece, in tones loud enough to be heard by all around, telling her she ought to esteem it an honour to be selected as a partner by the Count de Bellegarde, the best dancer in Europe. To make him amends for the affront, she offered him her own hand, and the Count, amidst the titters of the bystanders, was forced to accept it.

Scarcely were they gone, when the handsome Talbot Harland, who was dying with love for Dorinda, though he had not ventured to breathe a word of his passion to her, came up and said, "I am very glad you refused to dance with that vain French coxcomb, Miss Neville; but may I ask your reason? No one else in the ball-room, I believe, would have refused him."

"Since you ask me, I will tell you," replied Dorinda, smiling. "I have conceived a positive aversion to him. He seems to think himself irresistible, and I was determined to mortify him."

"You have succeeded," said Talbot, laughing. "But mortify him still further by dancing with me."

"That may cause a quarrel," she objected.

"Never mind. I will cur his presumption."

Dorinda hesitated; but she gave him her hand, and they joined the couples that were whisking round the room.

Already sufficiently annoyed, by being made ridiculous by Lady Muskerrey, Bellegarde was exasperated beyond measure by Talbot's mocking glances, as he swept past with Dorinda. But the Count promised himself speedy revenge.

Mademoiselle de Quéroualle had noticed the little incident just related, and she also saw the glances exchanged between her cousin and Talbot: and fearing a quarrel might ensue, she begged the King to interfere.

When the brawl was over, Charles called the Count to him, and, in a significant tone, forbade him to leave the ball-room. Bellegarde bowed profoundly, and retired from the presence.

Charles was still conversing with Louise, when the Duchess of Orleans approached them. As she drew near, all the surrounding company moved away to a respectful distance, except Louise, who was detained by the King. The discourse that ensued was conducted in French.

"I have news for your Majesty," observed the Duchess. "A courier has arrived this evening from St. Cloud."

"I hope the Duke, your husband, is in good health," remarked Charles, with a smile.

"The letter I have received is not from the Duke, but from his most Christian Majesty," replied the Duchess. "He peremptorily enjoins my immediate return, unless you consent to sign the treaty."

"We will talk about that to-morrow," replied the King, carelessly.

"To-morrow will be too late. The courier must depart at midnight. Instead of three millions of livres, Louis now offers you five millions a-year, if you will join him in the war he is about to declare against the Dutch States."

"Surely, your Majesty will not hesitate?" observed Louise.

"If that was the only article in the treaty, I should not hesitate for a moment," replied Charles. "But there are other conditions, that would render me little better than a vassal of France. I might as well sell myself to the Prince of Darkness."

"His most Christian Majesty would feel highly flattered, if he knew that you compared him to the Prince of Darkness," said the Duchess. "You do him wrong. He only desires a cordial alliance with England, and to unite inseparably the interests of the two crowns. Knowing that Parliament will not grant you fresh subsidies, he is disposed to make an immense sacrifice to help you."

"Would you have me become a pensioner of France?" cried Charles, impatiently.

"I would have you independent of Parliament," replied the Duchess. "Recollect this is a secret treaty."

"Oddsfish! the secret will come out, when I cease to ask for money," laughed the King.

"Then I am to understand that you decline?" said the Duchess. "Louise, you will prepare for departure to-morrow."

"I cannot allow you to take her with you," said Charles.

"Pardon me, your Majesty," said Louise; "I must return with her Highness."

"Rather than lose you, I will sign twenty treaties!" exclaimed Charles, passionately.

The Duchess glanced at her favourite, as much as to say, "Our point is gained." And she added, to the King, "I now know what to write to Louis."

The Duchess then inquired for the Count de Bellegarde, and Louise looked around for him. He was nowhere to be seen, and Talbot Harland had likewise disappeared. She mentioned the circumstance to the King, and his Majesty immediately signed to the Earl of Faversham, Captain of the Guard, and the Duke of Buckingham, who formed part of the circle around, and bade them go in search of the truants, and prevent mischief.

The Duchess then quitted the King, with the intention of sending off her despatch; and Charles proceeded with Louise to an adjoining room, where tables were set for ombre and basset.

Here a large company was assembled. The Duchess of Cleveland, who was immoderately fond of play, was seated at the basset-table, and the presence of her rival seemed to bring her ill-luck, for she lost a large sum of money. Charles counselled her to stop, but she persisted.

At last, her Grace got up in a rage, and asked the King to lend her two thousand pistoles. Charles shook his head, and the Duchess flung away from him with a look of disdain, and addressed herself to Lady Muskerrey, who chanced to come into the card-room at the moment, accompanied by Dorinda.

An interruption, however, was offered by the entrance of the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Faversham, followed by Bellegarde.

Dorinda turned very pale on beholding the latter.

"Where is Talbot Harland?" demanded Charles.

"We have been obliged to leave him behind," replied Buckingham.

"What has happened?—he is not hurt?"

cried Dorinda, unable to repress her emotion.

"You are the cause of the rencontre, Miss Neville," said Buckingham, regardless of her feelings.

"Methought I forbade you to leave the ball-room, Count?" said Charles to Bellegarde. "Is it thus that you obey me?"

"Let me intercede for him with your Majesty?" whispered Louise.

"I crave your Majesty's forgiveness," replied the Count; "but the doors being open, and the night magnificent, I could not resist strolling forth into the garden. I never supposed I should be missed."

"Did you stroll forth alone?" demanded the King.

"No, sire; Talbot Harland went with me!"

"By your invitation?"

"By my invitation, sire. I will not attempt to deny it."

"We were too late to prevent the conflict," interposed the Duke of Buckingham. "They were at it when we went out into the garden. We hurried to the spot; but before we could get up, the affair was ended. Talbot had dropped his sword."

"Then he is hurt?" cried Dorinda.

"Not much," replied Lord Faversham. "A slight wound—a mere scratch."

"Out of consideration for Miss Neville, I touched him as slightly as possible," said the Count.

A half-stifled cry was heard. Dorinda had fainted.

Lord Faversham caught her before she fell, and bore her out of the room, assisted by Lady Muskerrey, who was lavish in her attentions to her niece.

"Oddsfish! the secret's out!" exclaimed Charles. "Talbot is a lucky fellow. You have done him a great service, Count."

"I hope he will duly appreciate it," replied Bellegarde.

Shortly afterwards, Lady Muskerrey reappeared, with the satisfactory intelligence that her niece was better, but had withdrawn to her own room.

"I am amazed at what has happened," said her ladyship. "I had no idea she took so much interest in young Harland."

She then went to the Duchess of Cleveland, who had resumed her seat at the basset-table, and was still losing heavily to Lord Buckhurst.

"Your Grace shall have the two thousand pistoles," she said, in a low tone.

"I want four thousand now," replied the Duchess.

Lady Muskerrey was rather disconcerted; but she replied, "Anything to oblige your Grace."

"You are the best and kindest creature on earth," cried the Duchess; "and will lay me under eternal obligations. I shall be at home at six o'clock to-morrow. You know my little farm on Rusthall Common?"

"Perfectly. I will call on you about five o'clock, and bring the money with me."

This colloquy, though conducted in a low tone, did not escape the quick ears of the Count de Bellegarde.

Just then, an usher with a white wand presented himself, and announced to his Majesty that supper was served.

IV.

INTRODUCES CAPTAIN CLOTWORTHY AND MONSIEUR CLAUDE DUVAL, WITH THEIR COMPANIONS, MONTALT, MANDEVILLE, AND FLODOARD.

In a deep hollow at the northern extremity of Rusthall Common is a large group of rocks, several of which rise to a great height, and are so fantastic in shape, that it would seem that Dame Nature must have fashioned them in her wildest and most capricious mood.

The strangest of these huge stony masses, from its extraordinary form and position, placed as it is upon the apex of another rock, has been likened to an enormous toad, and certainly a resemblance to the reptile in question may be discovered. Indeed, it requires no great stretch of imagination to convert the whole group into a collection of antediluvian monsters.

In this rocky glen, which at that time had some of the savage features that Salvator Rosa loved to paint, on the afternoon of the day succeeding the Court-ball at Somerhill, four well-mounted horsemen were concealed. Two of them, who were evidently the leaders of the little troop, wore loupes, or black velvet masks, barred with silk, which completely disguised their features.

Both were equally well dressed, and wore scarlet riding-breeches embroidered with gold, boots fringed with lace, flowing perukes, and large low-crowned hats, surrounded with white feathers.

But they differed materially in personal appearance. One of them was square-built and athletic, and looked double the age of his companion, who was slender and gracefully proportioned. He was reclining indolently in his saddle, and beguiled the tedium of waiting by some snatches of a French romance, which he sang with infinite taste, to the accompaniment of a mandolin, with which one of the troop was provided. His accent and manner left no doubt that the language in which he sang was his own. No Englishman could have so pronounced the words, or given them such charming effect.

On the high ground above the rugged sides of the hollow, and half-hidden by the furze and briars which grew there thickly, was a fifth horseman, who evidently acted as sentinel to those below.

What was the object of this ambuscade? The place chosen by the troop was favourable to concealment; but they could scarcely issue forth without discovery, for it was still early in the evening, and many persons were moving about the common,—a portion of which, about half a mile off, resembled an encampment, being covered by tents, occupied by the nobles and gentlemen belonging to the Court, who could not find accommodation in the thinly-scattered houses near the Wells. Here the Duke of York had pitched his tent. Here, also, the great Duke of Buckingham and Lord Arlington slept under canvas. Close to the encampment was a bowling-green, much resorted to by the Merry Monarch and his courtiers, and a large structure that served as an assembly-room. The Duchess of Cleveland had hired a farm-house in a more secluded part of the common, on the road to Langton. The King himself had a house, with a bowling-green attached to it, on Mount Zion.

Such being the state of Rusthall Common, which was then the gayest and most frequented spot near the Wells, it seemed extremely unlikely that the horsemen could be robbers. Most probably they were Court gallants, engaged on a frolic. We shall see.

The gay-looking young Frenchman, who, it appears, bore the name of Claude Duval, had just finished his song, and received the plaudits of his stalwart companion.

"Bravo, Monsieur Claude!" cried this personage. "You have a charming voice, and sing as well as the Count de Bellegarde. I would cry encore to your maîtrigal, if I did not think we might be interrupted."

"You flatter me immensely," replied Claude Duval, who spoke with a slight—very slight—French accent. "I cannot pretend to sing like my master, the Count de Bellegarde; but I can personate him pretty fairly, with the help of his wardrobe, with which I own I have made free on the present occasion. I have often passed for him, even in the best society; and sometimes, I blush to say, have got him into scrapes. I hope I shall not do so now; but when he told me last night that the fair Dorinda Neville had refused to dance with him at Miladi Muskerrey's ball, I swore by my patron, Saint Barnabé, that the haughty beauty should dance with me. How to manage this was the question. My master had informed me that Miladi Muskerrey meant to call on the Duchess of Cleveland, at her farm on Rushhall Common, at a certain hour. I next ascertained that Miladi would take her lovely niece with her in the carriage. That was enough. I had my plan in an instant. Nothing more easy than to stop the carriage in a convenient spot. But I could not do this alone; so I applied to my staunch friend, Captain Clotworthy, who luckily chanced to be at Tunbridge Wells, with his honourable associates, Montalt—bowing to the galliard with the mandolin, who gracefully acknowledged the salute,—“Mandeville”—bowing to the other,—“and Floboard”—glancing at the horseman stationed on the heights above. “They readily promised me assistance, and here we are.”

“We are delighted to aid Monsieur Claude Duval,” observed Montalt. “Besides, the affair is one exactly after our own hearts. There is just hazard enough about it to render it agreeable.”

“And four thousand pistoles to be gained,” added Mandeville.

“My master informed me that Miladi Muskerrey will have that sum with her,” said Claude Duval. “She has promised to lend it to the Duchess of Cleveland, who was unlucky at basset last night, and has lost the amount to Lord Buckhurst. It is a debt of honour, gentlemen, and must be discharged without delay.”

“Then her Grace must apply to Old Rowley,” observed Clotworthy.

“Old Rowley's cassette is well-nigh empty; so my master says,” observed Claude Duval.

A laugh from all around followed this remark.

“Apropos of the Count—where is he at this moment?” asked Clotworthy.

“He ought to be in attendance on her Highness the Duchess of Orleans,” replied Claude.

“But heaven knows where he is. Hark! there is the signal!”

A whistle was heard, and the next instant Floboard shouted from above, “Get ready, gentlemen; the carriage is in sight.”

“Making its way across the common—on this side the tents,” rejoined Floboard.

“Allons, messieurs!” cried Claude Duval, gaily. “Take care not to frighten the ladies.”

The troop then quitted the rocky glen by an outlet at the rear; and after tracking a narrow road, between high banks, turned off on the left, and galloped along the skirts of a thicket that bordered the common on the west.

V.

LADY MUSKERREY.

NEVER, sure, save at the Lord Mayor's show in the olden time, was seen grander or more richly gilt chariot than that containing Lady Muskerrey and her lovely niece. The windows were so large, and the gorgeous vehicle was hung so low, that the ladies inside it could be distinctly seen. The horses were magnificently harnessed; a fat coachman occupied the box; and two tall footmen, powdered and bedizened with lace, hung on behind.

Lady Muskerrey was preposterously dressed in crimson satin, which, however, paled before the pink on her cheeks, and wore her hair, or rather peruke, en negligé. The collar, which fell over her shoulders, was of richest point, and her short sleeves were likewise adorned with deep falls of lace. Of course, she carried a fan—no lady of that day was ever without one—and her fan was prodigiously fine—the handle being of silver, with a small looking-glass set in it. On her lap rested a small spaniel—a present from the King—whose long silken ears, and large, soft eyes, proclaimed his perfect breeding. At her feet was deposited a heavy bag, the contents of which will be readily surmised.

Dorinda was just as becomingly dressed as her aunt was the reverse. Everything she wore seemed to suit her charming figure; and nothing could suit her better than the little coquettish hat, with a red plume in it, that crowned her luxuriant blonde tresses.

The lovely girl was in high spirits, and her blooming features bore no traces of fatigue. The afternoon was exquisite, and she had immensely enjoyed the drive from Somerhill to the Wells. The charming views had enraptured her.

At the Wells they had alighted, and walked along the parade, where a tolerably large company was assembled—some drinking the waters, but the majority promenading to and fro, and listening to the strains proceeding from an orchestra.

Very different, it is needless to say, was the appearance of the place from that which it now presents. A few sheds, temporarily converted into shops, ran along one side of the promenade. On the other side, benches were placed under the trees. Still, the scene was extremely gay and amusing—especially at morn, when the King, with all the gallants and ladies of the Court, resorted thither to drink the waters.

Scarcely had Lady Muskerrey and her niece set foot on the parade, than they were joined by Talbot Harland. The young man had his right arm in a sling, but did not otherwise seem much the worse for his rencontre overnight with Bellegarde. Dorinda blushed deeply on beholding him, and her confusion was heightened by Lady Muskerrey, who chided him for the anxiety he had caused her niece. Talbot expressed his concern, but his looks showed that he was far from sorry.

"My defeat has made me the subject of a hundred jests," he said; "and the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Feversham tell me I ought never to have provoked so expert a swordsman as the Count; but I rejoice that I did so, since it has procured me——"

He was proceeding in this strain, when Dorinda interrupted him by saying, "But the Count might have killed you."

"In that case, tears from your bright eyes would have been shed for me," said the young man.

"I am afraid some one's heart would have been broken," remarked Lady Muskerrey. "Well, I hope this absurd affair won't proceed further."

"Yes; if I have any influence with Mr. Talbot Harland, he won't provoke the Count again," said Dorinda, with a tender glance at her lover.

"You are of the same opinion, I find, as the Duke of Buckingham, and think that I should infallibly be worsted," laughed Talbot. "Rest easy. I met the Count not two hours ago, and he expressed so many regrets at having hurt me, and behaved altogether so handsomely, that—in a word, we became friends."

"The Count is a most charming man, and dances imitably," cried Lady Muskerrey.

"Perhaps so," said Dorinda; "but he shall never dance with me—on that I am fully resolved."

"I should think he will not presume to ask you again," remarked Talbot. "That, indeed, might furnish a new ground of quarrel."

"You silly child, you will cause more mischief!" cried Lady Muskerrey, tapping her niece playfully with her fan. "But we must not stay here longer. 'Tis time to go to the Duchess of Cleveland."

"Her Grace, I hear, lost a large sum last night to Lord Buckhurst, and made the King very angry," remarked Talbot, with a laugh. "Buckhurst, however, thinks he will never be paid."

"Yes, he will; I will promise him that," said Lady Muskerrey. "I mean to lend her Grace the money."

"Then your ladyship will be the loser, and not Buckhurst."

Talbot attended them to the carriage; and as he offered his uninjured arm to Dorinda, he whispered, "I shall ride up to Rusthall Common presently, and hope to catch a glimpse of you as you come back."

VI.

HOW CLAUDE DUVAL DANCED A GAILLARDE WITH DORINDA NEVILLE.

THE heath adjoining Tunbridge Wells, which is now traversed by numerous roads, was then very wild and picturesque—clothed with gorse, and with only two or three shepherds' huts upon it.

Lady Muskerrey's stout horses managed to drag the heavy carriage up the toilsome ascent, along a road that was little better than a sheep-track; and at last landed it safely on the brow of the hill, near Bishop's Down, at the back of which, among the woods, stood a large mansion, which the King had occupied during his former visits to the Wells, but he had now transferred himself to Mount Zion. Thence the road to Rusthall Common—which, in fact, was merely a continuation of the heath—was tolerably level, and offered no difficulties.

Dorinda was lost in admiration of the magnificent prospect that was here spread out before her; and was still contemplating it, when the wide common opened upon them. There was nothing dreary about the waste. On the contrary, it presented as charming a picture as can well be conceived.

About half a mile off was the encampment, and the flags of the numerous tents were fluttering in the soft evening breeze. On the left was Rusthall Church—an ancient structure, with a few cottages near it. On the green, in front of the church, rustic sports were going on; and the shouts and uproarious laughter of the crowd collected on the spot could be distinctly heard. Mingled with these shouts arose a confused hum of voices from the tents, and numbers of persons could be seen moving about in their vicinity.

Lady Muskerrey promised her niece that she would pass through the encampment on her way back. In the meantime, the coachman turned off on the right; and the road being execrable, he kept as much as he could on the turf.

Presently, the scene became solitary enough. The clumps of gorse grew thicker and more frequent. The tinkling of a sheep-bell was the only sound heard. The encampment was lost to view, and the square tower of Rusthall Church alone marked the site of the village.

However, the prospect improved as they went on; and shortly after they entered the wood, the prettiest sylvan scene imaginable greeted them.

It was a patch of greensward, smooth as velvet, and level as a bowling-green; in the midst grew a noble oak-tree, with wide arms flung abroad. An air of complete seclusion was given to this lovely spot by the thickets that surrounded it.

The picture was completed by a little troop of horsemen gathered beneath the patriarchal oak. The disposition of these figures was charming, and might have been studied for effect, so well did they harmonize with the scene.

The attention of the ladies was naturally attracted to the party, while sounds of music caught their ears. One of the horsemen had dismounted, and was playing a mandolin, while leaning against the gnarled trunk of the tree. Both ladies were enchanted with the picture thus unexpectedly presented to their view. Nor were they in the least surprised or alarmed, when two of the horsemen, whose attire seemed superior to that of the others, detached themselves from the group, and rode towards the carriage.

Both these personages were masked. Still, that circumstance did not cause uneasiness.

At a sign from the foremost horseman, who was the most stalwart of the two, the coachman stopped; and the next moment, this individual, presenting himself at the open window of the carriage, bowed most respectfully to its occupants, but did not remove his visard.

"You do not mean to molest us, I hope, gentlemen?" said Lady Muskerrey.

"Molest you! no! for worlds!" rejoined the stalwart personage. "I recognised your carriage the very instant it appeared, and could not neglect the opportunity of paying my respects to your ladyship and your lovely niece."

"Your voice does not seem familiar to me," replied Lady Muskerrey; "but perhaps if you unmasked——"

"Your ladyship would not know me, for I have not had the honour of being presented to you. You must have heard Lord Muskerrey speak of Captain Clotworthy. I am the Captain, and your ladyship's most humble servant. Without boasting, I may say that his lordship was extremely partial to me. In his good-natured, familiar way, he always called me Jack. 'Jack,' he said to me one day, when we were crushing a flask of Rhenish together in the Mulberry Garden,—'Jack, I am proud of my wife—excessively proud of her.' 'No wonder, my lord,' I replied. 'Her ladyship is the handsomest and best-dressed woman at Court.' 'So she is, Jack,' he said; 'but that's not the reason I'm proud of her. Her ladyship dances better than any other woman in England. You ought to see her dance the gavotte. You'd never forget it.'"

"Did the poor, dear fellow say that?" cried Lady Muskerrey, unable to conceal her delight.

"On my honour," replied the Captain. "But he said something more; and I hope I sha'n't offend your ladyship by repeating it. Just before he sailed in that glorious expedition against the Dutch in '65, he shook hands with me at parting, and made me this farewell promise, which I feel sure he would have kept, if he could. 'Jack,' said he, 'if I come back safe and sound, you shall dance a gavotte with my lady.'"

"I declare, Captain, you quite affect me," said her ladyship, taking out her handkerchief. "Since my husband made you this promise, I am bound to fulfil it. You shall dance the gavotte with me whenever you please."

"No time like the present," cried Clotworthy. "Here is a piece of turf that a fairy might trip on, and it will just suit your ladyship, who is as lightfooted as a fairy."

"A charming spot, indeed," said Lady Muskerrey, in a tone that implied assent.

"Surely, my dear aunt, you won't do anything so absurd?" remonstrated Dorinda, in a low voice.

"My love, I owe it to your uncle's memory," replied her ladyship.

"Take the carriage somewhat nearer to yonder oak, coachman," cried Clotworthy. "The ladies are about to alight."

The order was obeyed. Clotworthy and Claude Duval rode on either side of the carriage till it reached the spot indicated. They then dismounted, and gave their horses to Mandeville and Flodard.

"By your leave," said the Captain, pushing the footmen aside, and assisting her ladyship to alight.

"Allow me to present Monsieur Claude Duval," continued Clotworthy, as the young Frenchman, whose graceful deportment had already attracted the attention of both ladies, came towards them. "He does not speak our language very well; but he can make himself understood."

"Have you been long in England, Monsieur Duval?" said Lady Muskerrey, as the young Frenchman bowed to her.

"More than a year, milady," he replied; "and I mean to remain. I prefer London to Paris—les dames Anglaises sont si belles, si gracieuses, si aimables."

"You have found them so, eh, Monsieur Duval? But you have lovely women in France. There is a charming specimen now at Court—Mademoiselle de Quéronalle."

"She is not to be compared to your ladyship's lovely niece," replied Duval, gallantly. "Will not Mademoiselle Neville alight?"

"Pray do, my love!" cried Lady Muskerrey.

Duval flew to the carriage-door; and not wishing to disoblige her aunt, Dorinda alighted, though with evident reluctance. The little spaniel was confided to the care of one of the tall footmen.

Meanwhile, Clotworthy conducted her ladyship to a spot where the turf was smoothest, and called out to Montalt, who remained near the tree, to play a gavotte—"The quickest you can," added the Captain.

Lively notes from the mandolin were heard in immediate response to the order. Lady Muskerrey summoned up all her airs and graces, and determined to astonish her partner.

"May I have the honour of dancing with mademoiselle?" said Duval, bowing respectfully. "It is a mere frolic, in which she can join without the slightest impropriety."

Dorinda did not feel quite sure of that.

"Mademoiselle cannot hesitate to follow the example of her aunt, who is a model of discretion," continued Duval.

"Well, I don't think there can be any great harm in a dance," said Dorinda.

So she gave him her hand. With what secret triumph he took it!

Seeing that all was arranged to his comrade's satisfaction, Clotworthy clapped his hands, and the dance commenced.

Rarely has such a dance been witnessed. Lady Muskerrey surpassed all her previous performances in extravagance and absurdity. How she skipped and bounded!—displaying an agility perfectly marvellous in a person of her years and figure. The Captain found he had undertaken no light task; but he was obliged to go through with it.

Montalt, who entered into the fun of the scene, played as fast as he could. His companions were ready to split their sides with laughter. The two tall footmen had enough to do to contain their merriment, and the fat coachman chuckled internally.

Dorinda spread her fan before her face. Claude Duval's mask effectually concealed his laughter. Her ladyship would have gone on for ever, but the Captain gave in at last.

"Lord Muskerrey was right!" he cried, panting with the exertion. "I challenge all England to produce such another dancer as your ladyship."

"You may challenge all France as well, mon cher!" added Claude Duval. "But let us finish with a pavane and gaillarde."

Lady Muskerrey was quite ready—quite eager, indeed, to recommence; but the Captain did not feel equal to further effort.

The field was, therefore, left to Duval and his fair partner. Dorinda required little persuasion to go on: she excelled in the pavane.

Montalt changed the measure, and the slow and stately dance began. Laughter was now changed to admiration. Dorinda never looked so well—never danced so gracefully. How proudly she advanced towards her partner; and, with a courtly air, he received her. It was a charming sight to watch them. Lady Muskerrey was a little mortified at being left out, but she could not withhold her tribute of admiration.

Again the measure changed, and the movements of the dancers became brisk and rapid. The gaillarde was Duval's triumph. The spectators were in ecstasies as the lively dance proceeded.

No ballet even offered a prettier tableau than the scene now presented. What with the two graceful central figures, the groups around them, the richly-gilt coach, the horses of the troopers, and the old oak tree in the background, the picture was perfect.

Amid the applause of the beholders, the gaillarde came to an end.

Thanking her ladyship for the honour she had done him, Captain Clotworthy ceremoniously conducted her to her carriage.

Lady Muskerrey would fain have remained a little longer to dance a couranto with Monsieur Duval, with whom she was charmed; but the Captain, who had other business in hand, as the reader is aware, and feared interruption, gave her no encouragement.

Most assiduous was the Captain in seeing that her ladyship was comfortably seated; he arranged her dress, and placed the little spaniel on her lap. On Dorinda's approach, he made way for her, of course; and Duval noticed that his left arm was carefully covered by his mantle.

Dorinda's curiosity was aroused to know something more of her partner. There was a mystery about him that perplexed her. Throughout the dance he had kept on his mask, and even now he did not seem inclined to remove it.

"Do you always wear a mask, Monsieur Duval?" she inquired, gaily.

"Always, mademoiselle," he replied. "I have the misfortune to be very ugly, so I hide my countenance as much as possible."

"Perhaps you do yourself an injustice. At least, allow us to judge."

"Excuse me, mademoiselle; I would not shock you."

"Then I shall not know you, if we meet again."

"We are not likely to meet again," he rejoined, with a sigh. "I do not belong to the Court; but I never shall forget this occurrence. It is the most agreeable event of my life!"

He banded her to the carriage, bade her adieu, bowed gracefully to Lady Muskerrey, and hastened to rejoin his companions, who were all mounted and ready for departure.

Springing into his saddle, he again took off his feathered cap, and waved it to those within the carriage.

In another instant the whole troop had disappeared, as if by magic.

VII.

THE DUCHESS OF CLEVELAND'S FARM.

"WHAT an amusing incident—quite like a scene in a play!" exclaimed Lady Muskerrey. "It will divert his Majesty prodigiously, though he will think I have invented it, for it does seem highly improbable that we should have met with such a charming dancer as this Monsieur Duval. What spirit he threw into the gaillarde! Never did I see a piquette turned so prettily. He rivals, if he does not surpass, the Count de Bellegarde."

"Since you have mentioned him, aunt, I must tell you that a suspicion once crossed me that it might be the Count himself."

"Ridiculous! Had he been the Count de Bellegarde, I should have recognised him immediately."

"But the mask, aunt?"

"Bah! his voice would have betrayed him."

They had emerged from the wood, and were approaching the Duchess of Cleveland's farm, which was beautifully situated on the slope of a hill.

Suddenly, Lady Muskerrey made a discovery, and called out to the coachman to stop.

"What's the matter, aunt?" asked Dorinda.

"I have been robbed!" rejoined her ladyship, in distraction. "The bag of money is gone!"

"Heavens! I hope not," cried Dorinda.

Just then, one of the footmen appeared at the door, to learn her ladyship's commands.

"I have been robbed, Kynaston—robbed of four thousand pistoles."

"Is it possible, my lady?" cried Kynaston, aghast. "Who would have believed that such fine gentlemen could be robbers?"

"Bid the coachman turn back. I shall never be able to face the Duchess. She won't credit the story."

"Begging your ladyship's pardon, don't you think we had better go on to the farm, and send some of the Duchess's men in pursuit of the robbers?"

Lady Muskerrey agreed, and the carriage went on.

The Duchess of Cleveland was in the garden when they arrived, and on hearing what had occurred, gave instant orders that several of her servants should mount, as quickly as they could, and scour the country round. Though naturally much disappointed, her Grace was consoled by Lady Muskerrey's promise that she should have the money, whether the robbers were captured or not. She laughed heartily at the adventure, and said it was almost worth while to be robbed by such a gallant as Comte Duval.

"He had quite the air of a gentleman. I can assure your Grace," said Lady Muskerrey. "And his dancing of the gaillarde was inimitable."

"In my opinion, it will turn out a mere piece of pleasantry," remarked the Duchess.

CLAUDE DUYAL ROBS THE DUCHESS OF CLEVELAND. (See page 21.)

"We shall hear something more of the beau Duval, ere long."

Lady Muskerrey and Dorinda had been about half an hour with the Duchess, when Lord Buckhurst and Talbot Harland rode up to the gate. Who should be with them but the Count de Bellegarde!

The three gentlemen tied their horses to the rails, and joined the ladies in the garden.

Any suspicions that Dorinda might still entertain as to the Count's identity with Claude Duval were now dissipated.

They were both about the same height, certainly, and both slightly but gracefully proportioned, but Bellegarde's costume was totally different from that of the gallant robber. He wore a green velvet riding-dress, richly embroidered with silver lace, while Claude Duval was attired in scarlet. Duval's peruke was black—the Count's, on the contrary, light and powdered. Lastly, and most convincing of all, his voice, when he addressed the Duchess, who received him graciously, was totally unlike Duval's. The robber had a marked peculiarity of accent, that proclaimed him a Gascon.

"Your Grace will be surprised to see me," said Bellegarde, in his airy manner, to the Duchess; "but Lord Dorset would bring me on with him. He picked me up at the bowling-green on Rushall Common, where I had been playing for some time, with very bad luck. Je suis tres mauvais joueur à la boule. On our way to your Grace's farm—which I have never seen before, and which I find charming—une campagne délicieuse dans un pays ravissant—we overtook Mr. Talbot Harland, who, I rejoice to say, has quite forgotten our little quarrel of last night. We are now the best friends possible. Is it not so?"

Talbot bowed in assent.

"You could not have come more apropos, Count," rejoined the Duchess. "Possibly, you can give us some information respecting a countryman of yours—a certain Claude Duval."

"Claude Duval!" exclaimed the Count. "I regret that I cannot help your Grace. I never heard of him. What has he done?"

"Robbed Lady Muskerrey of four thousand pistoles in the wood, close to this place, not an hour ago."

"Is it possible, miladi?" cried Bellegarde, turning to Lady Muskerrey.

"Perfectly true, Count," she replied.

And she hastened to recount the adventure, describing it in a manner that provoked the merriment of all her hearers, except Talbot Harland, who felt excessively annoyed that Dorinda should have danced with a robber.

"Parbleu! a most extraordinary affair!" exclaimed the Count, when her ladyship had finished. "This Duval is a reproach to my country."

"The thing has been so cleverly executed, that I almost hope the rascal may escape," laughed Lord Buckhurst.

"He must not be allowed to escape!" cried Talbot. "Success will embolden him to attempt further audacious exploits of a like character."

"He will rob all the Court ladies," said the Duchess.

"And dance with them afterwards," added Lord Dorset.

"Diantre! s'il fait ça il doit payer bien les violons," said Bellegarde.

"One would almost think you are jealous of his success, Count," observed the Duchess.

"Can I be otherwise, after what has happened?" he rejoined. "Miss Neville refused to dance with me, but has honoured the drôle with her hand."

"It was monstrous presumption on the rascal's part to ask her!" cried Talbot. "And I almost wonder Miss Neville condescended——"

"My niece danced with him to oblige me," interrupted Lady Muskerrey, sharply.

"Well, it appears that he acquitted himself very satisfactorily," said Lord Buckhurst, laughing.

"He acquitted himself admirably," rejoined her ladyship. "He was politeness itself."

"Ma! ha! charming!" exclaimed Lord Buckhurst.

"As to taking him for a robber," pursued Lady Muskerrey, "I should as soon take the Count de Bellegarde for one."

"I appreciate the compliment," said the Count, bowing.

At this juncture, the Duchess's servants were seen returning from their ineffectual quest.

Presently, one of them came to inform the Duchess that they could discover no traces whatever of the robbers. Apparently, no one had seen them.

"This is very strange," remarked Lord Buckhurst. "How the deuce can they have got off?"

"That remains to be explained," said Talbot.

Lady Muskerrey now took leave of the Duchess, and observed in an undertone, "As I have said, your Grace shall be no loser by this occurrence. I will send you the money."

"Pray don't trouble yourself to do that," rejoined the Duchess. "I shall be at your second ball to-morrow night. If your ladyship will oblige me with it then, I can bring it away with me."

"It shall be ready for your Grace; but you may be robbed."

"No fear of that," laughed the Duchess. "No one will think I have so much money with me."

"That's what puzzles me!" said her ladyship. "How did Monsieur Claude Duval, or his associate, Captain Clotworthy, know that I had four thousand pistoles in the carriage?"

"Perhaps, one of your footmen is in league with them," replied the Duchess.

Was almost fancy that this brief colloquy—though conducted, as we have said, in a low tone—was overheard by Bellegarde.

Lady Muskerrey and her niece then re-entered the carriage, and the three gentlemen escorted them through the wood.

A short halt took place on the scene of the recent adventure, and her ladyship again described some of the principal incidents.

"I would give worlds to have seen it," laughed Lord Buckhurst.

"And I would give worlds for the chance of shooting the impudent rascal!" cried Talbot.

VIII.

THE KING TAKES AN EARLY WALK, AND MEETS WITH A PLEASANT ADVENTURE.

CHARLES THE SECOND was fond of all kinds of exercise, and all sorts of country sports. He did not hunt so much as his brother, the Duke of York; but he liked coursing, hawking, and angling. His favourite games were tennis and bowls. At Whitehall, he had a splendid bowling-green and a large tennis-court. His Majesty preferred walking to riding, because he thought foot exercise kept him in health; and he walked so fast that few of his courtiers could keep up with him. When he was staying at Tunbridge Wells, he always rose very early, and rambled for miles over the heaths and commons in that pleasant region, wholly unattended, returning to drink the waters at the salubrious spring.

On the second morning after his arrival at the Wells, he was sitting at his usual early hour, and awoke Chiffinch, his confidential valet, who slept in the ante-chamber. Having assisted his royal master to make his toilet, Chiffinch went to bed again.

According to his wont, Charles, who did not desire to be recognised in his walks, had put on very plain apparel, such as might become a plain country gentleman. Sometimes, he took with him three or four little spaniels; but on this occasion his long-eared favourites were left behind.

With no other protection than the gold-headed cane in his hand, he set off at a brisk pace from his mansion on Mount Sion. To look at him in his cloth doublet, trunk hose of the same material, and hat without feathers, as he strode vigorously along with anything but a regal deportment, no one would have taken him for England's King.

Remonstrances were often addressed to his Majesty on the danger he ran in taking these walks unattended; but he heeded them not. He had no fears, and liked, occasionally, to be alone.

Descending Mount Sion, on the brow of which stood the mansion he had just quitted, amidst a grove of rock-haunted trees, he passed the little collection of huts near the Wells, and climbed the heath in the direction of Mount Ephraim.

It was a delightful morning, and as the King inhaled the fresh breeze, he rejoiced that he had come forth. Already he had shaken off the fatigues of the night, which had been devoted to a concert given in the rooms near the encampment.

When he gained the summit of the hill, he met several cherry-cheeked country lasses with baskets of eggs, butter and poultry, proceeding to the tents on Rusthall Common; and none of these damsels passed without a good-humoured jest from his Majesty, which sent them laughing on their way. For every one he encountered in his walk he had a cheery greeting.

Still keeping on the top of the hill, he pursued the road leading to Southborough for some half-mile, when, being tempted by a pleasant-looking lane on the left, he turned into it.

He had not gone far when he descried two persons advancing along the lane, and the unexpected appearance of one of them in such a spot caused him to stop. The person he beheld was the Count de Bellegarde. With him was a maiden, whose beauty surprised the King. Her attire was simple and becoming, but gave no indication whatever of her rank. How could the Count have discovered this lovely creature? That he had won her regard, was evident from her manner towards him.

So engrossed were the pair with each other that they did not notice the King, who sprang up a bank, and concealed himself among the bushes. The pair came slowly on, and passed the spot where he was hidden, but he could not hear what they said. The accents of the damsel were indescribably sweet.

She did not accompany her lover much farther; but after bidding him a tender adieu, turned back, and repassed the King with quick footsteps.

Charles, whose curiosity as to this mysterious fair one was greatly excited, was determined to follow her, but when he came forth from his retreat, she had disappeared. However, he felt certain she could not be far off, and hurried on.

Presently he came in sight of a farmhouse, with a barn and hop-kiln attached to it, and at the porch of this habitation he perceived the fair object of his search.

She seemed surprised and almost alarmed by the appearance of a stranger, and would have retired if he had not addressed her. The blush that suffused her cheek made her look more charming than ever.

Charles had had some experience in beauty, but he confessed to himself that he had never beheld a lovelier creature. She had by no means a rustic air; her features were delicately moulded, and her figure slight and graceful; her complexion was clear, but embrowned by the sun. She had the largest black eyes imaginable, and raven tresses that threw those of Louise de Quénouille into the shade.

"Give you good-morrow, fair damsel," said the King, saluting her. "You look as if you would not refuse me a bowl of milk and a crust of bread wherewith to break my fast. I have walked thus far from the Wells, and feel somewhat exhausted.

"Step in, I pray you, sir," she rejoined, displaying a casket of pearls as she spoke. "You shall have what you desire."

On this invitation, Charles went in, and found himself in a large, plainly-furnished room, with a low roof and latticed windows. Doffing his hat, he sat down on a settle placed near a ponderous oak table on one side of the room.

Spreading a snow-white napkin on the board the damsel brought him the simple refreshments he had asked for, serving them with much grace.

"I seldom drink milk," said the King, raising the bowl to his lips; "but proffered by hands so fair, I prefer it to wine."

"You asked for milk, sir, or I would have brought you wine," she rejoined. "Will it please you to drink a cup of sack now? Or if a flagon of ale will suit you better, you can have it."

"Oddsfish! this is a hospitable house," exclaimed Charles. "One has only to ask and have. But neither ale nor sack for me, fair damsel. Surely, you do not dwell here alone?"

"No, sir," she replied with a smile. "My father lives with me."

"Then you are not yet married?"

"Married? Oh, no, sir."

"But you soon will be; for I met a handsome young gallant just now in the lane, and I'll swear he came from this house."

This remark threw her into such confusion, that Charles hastened to reassure her.

"Nay, be not alarmed," he said. "Your secret is safe with me. Where is your father, if I may venture to put the question?"

"He went to Maidstone last night," she replied.

"To Maidstone? Ha!" cried the King.

"Yes; but I expect him back early this morning."

"In time for breakfast?" remarked Charles, laughing. "But you have not yet told me your father's name."

"It is Reuben Oldacre."

"Reuben Oldacre—ha! And your own?"

"Violet."

"Violet! A charming name, and suits you exactly. And now, fair Mistress Violet, cannot you tell me something more about yourself? How do you pass your time? I warrant me you have been to the Wells since the Court arrived there, to see the fine ladies drink the waters? Have you seen the King?"

"I have no desire to see him," she replied.

"I am told he is as swarthy as a griffy. I crave your pardon, sir; I did not notice that you are so dark."

Charles laughed good-humouredly.

"Dark-complexioned men sometimes find favour with your sex," he remarked. "Swarthy as I am, I have no reason to complain. But if you don't admire the King, I'll stake my life that he would admire you."

"I don't want his admiration," she rejoined.

"They say he has fallen in love with the new French beauty, Louise de Quénouille."

"This comes from Bellegarde," thought Charles, as he heard of Mademoiselle.

selle de Quérroualle? Well, I have seen her, and can judge, and I affirm that she is not to be compared to you. Perhaps you have heard of Sir Peter Lely, the famous Court painter?"

"Yes; I have not only heard of him, but have seen his portraits of the Duchess of Cleveland and the beautiful Miss Stewart, and lovely pictures they are."

"You would make a lovelier picture than either of them, my sweet Violet. Sir Peter Lely is coming down to the Wells to paint Mademoiselle de Quérroualle for the King. He shall paint you."

Violet did not seem displeased by the proposition, extravagant as it sounded. Her vanity was roused.

"Ah, it would, indeed, be delightful to be painted by Sir Peter Lely!" she exclaimed, her dark eyes flashing as she spoke. "But you are only jesting with me, sir. It is easy to make fine promises, but difficult to keep them."

"Not difficult on my part, sweetheart," rejoined the King. "Lely shall paint you, just as you are now. I will send him here as soon as he arrives."

"Not for worlds, sir!" she exclaimed.

At this moment, sounds were heard without, as if horsemen were entering the farm-yard.

"Ah, there is my father!" she cried.

"Plague take him! why should he arrive just now?" muttered the King.

"He has brought some friends with him—hop-merchants, from Maidstone," cried Violet. "Do, please, go, sir! He is hot-tempered, and may not like to find you here."

"What, ho!" shouted a voice, without.

"He is calling for me, as you hear, sir. Pray go: indeed, you must."

The King put on his hat, but showed no symptoms of quitting his seat.

"We have not yet settled about Sir Peter Lely, and several other important matters," he remarked, quietly.

"There he is!—he sees you!" she cried, as a stout-built personage appeared at the lattice window, looking into the yard.

"Don't be alarmed, sweetheart," said the King. "Were he as rugged as the Hyrcanian bear, I'd soon tame him."

IX.

FARMER OLDACRE.

HEAVY footsteps were heard approaching the back-door, and in another moment the burly farmer came in; booted, spurred, and having a riding-whip in his hand. His flushed features showed he was angry.

"What's this?" he cried, to his daughter. "A stranger here?"

But before any explanation could be offered him by Violet, and without a word from the King, whose countenance was turned towards him, his manner instantly changed. Taking off his hat, he bowed respectfully to his guest.

"Proud that my humble abode should be so highly honoured," he stammered out.

"Tut, tut, man; there is nothing to be proud of," cried Charles, stopping him. "Your fair daughter, as you see, has taken good care of me in your absence."

"Sorry she has played the hostess so differently," rejoined the farmer.

"She has given me all I want," rejoined Charles. "But don't mind me. Look to your friends—the Maidstone hop-merchants."

Here Violet made a slight sign to her father, which did not escape the King.

"Time enough for them—they are busy with their horses," said Oldacre. "But my character for hospitality will suffer, if you—"

"Rather than that, I'll take a cup of sack," interrupted the King. "It will do me as much good as the Tunbridge waters."

"More, I'll be bound," rejoined the farmer, with a jovial air, that pleased the King. "I have little faith in the waters; though his most gracious Majesty (whom heaven preserve!) seems to benefit by them."

"Ay; he drinks them daily," observed Charles. "His physicians recommend them."

"Were I his physician, he should drink sack," said the farmer. "Tis more wholesome of a morning than cold water. Bring a bottle of sack," he added to Violet. "And see that we are not interrupted," he added, as he passed him.

"Sit down, Master Oldacre, sit down!" said the King. "Nearer, man, nearer," he added, as the farmer seated himself at the extremity of the bench. "You have a very fair daughter, Oldacre. More fit for a palace than a cottage. How have you brought her up? How comes she with such a manner?"

"Her mother was of better condition than myself," replied the farmer. "My wife was of gentle blood."

"Ah! that explains it. I have told your daughter I must have her portrait painted by Sir Peter Lely."

"To place it beside that of Madam Nelly? No; that won't do," rejoined the farmer.

"Pshaw! I must find a way to remove your foolish objections. You are standing in your own light, my honest friend." But here she comes."

As he spoke, Violet reappeared, with a flask of wine and drinking-cups. She filled one of the flagons for the King, and the other for her father.

"To your speedy appearance at Court, sweetheart!" cried Charles, as he emptied the cup.

"Put no such notions into her head, I pray you, sir," said Oldacre. "She is far better here."

"But does she think so herself—that is the question?" laughed the King. "Nay; let her answer."

"I confess I should like to see the Court," observed Violet.

"And you would like to be seen there, too," cried Charles. "With such beauty as yours, you might wed a noble. All the Court gallants would be at your feet."

"Why, as I live, there is one at the door even now!" cried Violet, who was standing near the window.

"A Court gallant!" exclaimed Oldacre, starting up. "Who is he?"

"Nay; how should I know, father?" she rejoined. "I have never seen him before."

"What is he like?" cried Charles. "Young and handsome—ha?"

"Yes," she replied. "But he has got his arm in a sling."

"Then it must be Talbot Harland," said Charles. "What brings him here?"

"He is tying his horse to a tree, father," cried Violet. "Shall I admit him? Have I your permission, sir?"

Charles nodded assent; and the next moment the door was opened, and Talbot came in.

Great was his surprise on beholding the King; and he would have made a befitting reverence, but a slight gesture from Charles checked him.

In the fair young damsel standing before him, Talbot fancied he discerned the motive of his Majesty's presence in the farm-house.

"What brings Mr. Talbot Harland out so early?" cried Charles.

"I am endeavouring to discover some traces of the villains who robbed Lady Muskerrey," replied Talbot; "and passing this farm-house, have stopped to make inquiries."

"I have heard of no robbery," said Oldacre. "When did it occur?"

"Last evening, in a wood near Rushall Common," said Talbot.

"Ah, I was at Maidstone at the time," replied the farmer. "I have only just returned. But you amaze me by what you say, sir. Robbers were never before heard of in this neighbourhood."

"It is a most incomprehensible affair," observed the King. "A very diverting description of the occurrence was given me by the Count de Bellegarde, not two hours after it happened. The robbers were six in number, and their leader appears to be a gay young Frenchman, who styles himself Claude Duval. The rascal seems to have a great taste for dancing. Not only did he rob Lady Muskerrey of four thousand pistoles, but he danced with her niece, Miss Neville, one of the Queen's maids of honour."

"I have sworn to capture him or shoot him!" cried Talbot.

"Shoot him!" exclaimed Violet, turning pale.

"Ay, shoot him!" repeated Talbot.

"Mr. Talbot Harland has constituted himself Miss Neville's champion," said the King. "That is why he means to slay Duval for his impertinence in dancing with her."

"I am sorry I cannot help you, sir," remarked Oldacre to Talbot. "But were I you, I would give up the chase. With your injured arm, you scarcely seem in a condition to engage with a desperate robber."

"Shall I tell you how Mr. Harland came by his hurt?" said the King to Violet. "Miss Neville is the heroine of this story, as of the other. The other night, at Lady Muskerrey's ball, the Count de Bellegarde was greatly struck by her beauty, and asked her to dance. She refused him. He was naturally vexed, but was further incensed by Mr. Harland's laughter. Who gave the provocation, I know not, but an immediate meeting took place in the garden, despite the King's express prohibition. Miss Neville's unlucky champion got run through the arm, as you perceive."

There was something so arch in the King's manner of telling this story, that neither Violet nor her father could help laughing. Talbot did not venture to manifest his annoyance.

"Ah, the Count de Bellegarde is a dangerous rival," cried Charles. "He boasts that he has never been unsuccessful. Have nothing to say to him, should you ever meet him," he added to Violet. "He is fascinating, but faithless, as fifty of your sex have discovered."

"You give him a dreadful character, sir," she cried.

"Not worse than he deserves," said Talbot.

"I am sorry he has returned to plague us, but we shall soon be rid of him. He must go back with the Duchess of Orleans to St. Cloud."

Thinking he had remained long enough, Charles now arose. While taking leave of Violet, he said, in a low tone, "You may soon expect a visit from Sir Peter Lely, sweetheart."

Talbot followed him, and, unfastening his horse, took the bridle in his hand, and walked by the King's side up the steep lane.

Charles had not gone far when he looked back, and perceiving Violet at the door watching him, kissed his hand gallantly to her.

X.

A HAWKING PARTY, AND WHAT HAPPENED AT IT. THE day was spent gaily, as were all the days while the Court was at the Wells, in a variety of out-door amusements.

After the waters had been duly quaffed by the crowd of fair dames and handsome gallants who flocked to the health-giving spring to flirt and chatter, as much as for any other purpose,—after a promenade on the pantiles, or a short stroll on the heath, the company dispersed—only to meet again a few hours afterwards, either at the bowling-green on Rushall Common, where the King, and the Duke of York, and the chief members of the Court, were sure to be found; or at some other general rendezvous.

On that day, a hawking-party was made up by the King for the Duchess of Orleans, and, of course, Mademoiselle de Quéroulle was present at it. Such a party, when composed chiefly of ladies, as on the present occasion, forms one of the most charming and picturesque sights possible. And as the day was everything that could be desired for the sport, and as everybody looked well and in good spirits, there was no drawback to the enjoyment.

His fickle Majesty, we fear, must have forgotten the fair girl whom he had seen early in the morning, for he now seemed engrossed by Louise. The graceful figure of the brilliant Frenchwoman was displayed to perfection in her blue velvet riding-dress, and she managed her horse extremely well. Two falconers were in attendance upon the Duchess of Orleans, but Louise was invited to fly the first hawk. The quarry was a wild dove, and was instantly killed. Shortly afterwards, a heron, which had been roused from a pool in the hollow, afforded far better sport, and, with its long, sharp bill, transfixed its antagonist in mid-air.

But, as both birds dropped to the ground together, they had well-nigh caused an accident to Miss Neville. They fell within a short distance of her horse, and the startled animal dashed off madly across the plain.

Dorinda was in some danger, for she could not check her horse, and there were deep pits in the common, into which he might plunge headlong.

Where was Talbot Harland all this while? Speeding after her, we may be sure. But the honour of rescuing her was reserved for another—for one whom Talbot hated. The young man was outstripped by the Count de Bellegarde, who was mounted on a far swifter horse than his own, and who fortunately came up with Dorinda when she was within a few yards of one of the abysses we have mentioned. The Count seized her bridle, and, by a powerful effort, succeeded in stopping the infuriated animal.

Next moment, Talbot joined them, and had the mortification of hearing the thanks she offered her preserver.

"You have saved my life, Count," she said, with a look of unspeakable gratitude.

Dorinda soon recovered from her fright, and looked more charming than ever as she rode back to the royal party, and received the warm congratulations of the Duchess and Louise on her narrow escape.

Seeing how much Talbot was chagrined, the King said to him, "Bellegarde has had the luck this time. But I promise you your revenge."

The young man had need of consolation, for Dorinda was now all smiles to the fortunate Count.

After they had had hawking enough, the royal party proceeded to the encampment, and sat down to a sumptuous collation, which was expressly prepared for them in the Duke of York's tent.

XI.

SIR PETER LEY.

THE repast over, the Duchess of Orleans and Louise returned to Somerhill.

The King and most of the courtiers adjourned to the bowling-green, which adjoined the Duke's tent. Charles, who was in a very merry humour, challenged the Count de Bellegarde to a game, and the Count could not do otherwise than accept.

His Majesty being an admirable bowler, everybody, except the Duke of Buckingham, betted on him. The Duke backed Bellegarde.

and won a large sum. Clearly the Count was in luck that day.

Charles was still on the bowling-green, when Sir Peter Lely, who had just arrived at the Wells, made his appearance, and was most graciously received.

The renowned painter, who has given us a gallery of such beauties as were never before portrayed, and who caught, as Horace Walpole truly said, the reigning character of the period, and

“—On the animated canvas stole
The sleepy eye, that spoke the melting soul,—”

this incomparable painter was then in the zenith of his fame. Lely was not handsome, but his features were mobile, and his eyes fine and observant. In person he was somewhat portly, easy and refined in manner, and as perfect a courtier as was ever bred.

Charles regretted that Sir Peter had come too late to see Mademoiselle de Quéroutalle; but promised to present him to her at Lady Muskerrey's ball in the evening.

The King went on talking for a few minutes, when noticing that both the Count de Bellegarde and Talbot Harland were standing near him, he said to the painter, “I have another commission for you, Sir Peter.”

“Your Majesty honours me,” rejoined Lely, bowing.

“During my ramble this morning,” pursued the King, taking care that Bellegarde should hear him, “I chanced upon the sweetest creature I ever beheld—a farmer's daughter; but no wood-nymph could be more exquisite. Luckily, I discovered her retreat,” he added, glancing at Bellegarde, and perceiving that he was listening, “and enjoyed an hour's converse with her.”

“Your Majesty appears enraptured with this rustic beauty,” observed Lely, smiling.

“Enraptured! Ay, and so will you be, when you see her. But there is no rusticity about her. She is simple, but charming. You shall paint her for me, Lely.”

“It will delight me to obey your Majesty,” replied Sir Peter.

“Talbot Harland shall take you to her dwelling to-morrow,” said Charles. “He has seen her, and will tell you that I have not exaggerated her charms.”

“She is, indeed, a most lovely creature,” said Talbot, “and well worthy of Sir Peter Lely's pencil.”

“I am curious to behold her,” said the painter.

“Again, I say, don't expect a rustic beauty!” cried Charles.

“I expect an Egeria,” replied Lely. “And I doubt not I shall find one.”

“Your Majesty has been fortunate, it appears,” remarked Bellegarde, endeavouring to maintain an unperturbed demeanour.

“Tolerably so,” replied Charles, carelessly. “But let us play another game at bowls. You owe me my revenge.”

The bets were now in Bellegarde's favour. All backed him but Talbot.

But the luck had turned. The Count's hand was not so steady as heretofore. His Majesty won the game.

XII.

THE SECOND BALL AT SOMERHILL.

LADY MUSKERREY's second ball was quite as magnificent as the first, and graced by the same brilliant company.

The Queen was present, with all her ladies. The Duchess of Orleans was there, with Mademoiselle de Quéroutalle, and the King was constantly by the side of the fascinating Frenchwoman. Naturally, therefore, this was the central point of attraction to all the courtiers.

According to his promise, Charles presented Sir Peter Lely to Louise, and the flattering painter professed to be quite dazzled by her beauty, and paid her a thousand extravagant compliments, all of which were echoed by the courtiers.

Talbot Harland was almost superseded by the Count de Bellegarde. After the service he had rendered her, Dorinda could not refuse to dance with the Count, and found him so agreeable, that she danced with him a second time.

Others and bustle went on as before in the smaller room, and the Duchess of Cleveland was again among the players.

Lady Muskerrey came in with the Count de Bellegarde, whom she had secured for the contralto, and hoped her Grace was winning. The Duchess shook her head.

Lady Muskerrey whispered a word in her ear, and the Duchess replied, “I have ordered my carriage at midnight.”

“It shall be ready for you then,” said her ladyship, with a significant look.

While the ball was at its height, a troop of five well-mounted horsemen, one of whom led a sixth horse, entered Somerhill Park, covertly, and proceeded with the utmost caution towards an eminence crowned by a couple of large trees, in the vicinity of the mansion.

The night was dark and cloudy, and the wide-spread branches completely screened them. From the hill on which the horsemen were stationed, the stately mansion could be discerned through the groves that surrounded it, with its windows brilliantly illuminated, while lively strains resounded from within.

The large quadrangular court was, of course, concealed from view, but the ruddy glow reflected on the darkling sky above it, and the shouts and other sounds continually arising from it, showed that it was filled with a host of servants, who were partaking of Lady Muskerrey's hospitality. Some few torch-bearers could be seen on the terrace in front of the mansion.

After taking up the commanding position we have described, the leader of the troop, who was no other than the redoubted Captain Clotworthy, gazed for some minutes at the illuminated mansion, and listened to the music proceeding from it. He then remarked to the trooper nearest him, who was humming the air that reached them, "You are longing to be among the dancers, Montalt."

"You are right, Captain," rejoined the other. "I should like to be at the ball prodigiously; but her ladyship has forgotten to invite us. Hark! they have changed the measure, and are playing a couranto."

And he again began to hum the tune. . .

"Not so loud," cried Clotworthy. "You will betray us."

Then turning to another trooper, he said, "Have you got all ready for Captain Duval, Mandeville?"

"Yes, Captain," replied the other. "Hat, cloak, black peruke and mask, are all here."

"And his pistols are in his holsters," added Flodard, who had charge of the led horse.

"Good!" cried Clotworthy. "Be prepared for instant action."

"The sooner the better!" cried the troopers.

"Look, Captain; there's a carriage on the terrace now!" exclaimed Montalt. . .

After a few minutes' breathless suspense, the carriage was seen moving along the road at the foot of the hill.

"It's not the Duchess, or Duval would have been with us ere this," cried Clotworthy.

"Why not attack it?" cried Montalt, unable to curb his impatience.

"Sdeath! would you spoil all? Let no man stir," cried the Captain, in an authoritative voice. "What's the hour?"

"Midnight," responded Mandeville, as a clock belonging to the mansion was heard striking.

"Another carriage on the terrace!" exclaimed Montalt.

"I see!" cried Clotworthy, waxing impatient in his turn. "We shall soon learn whether it is the Duchess's. Be on the alert."

XIII.

HOW THE DUCHESS OF CLEVELAND WAS ROBBED BY CLAUDE DUVAL.

WE shall now return to the ball-room.

It was crowded as ever, for supper had not yet been served, and only one guest had departed. The King had been dancing with Mademoiselle de Quérourille, and was making the tour of the room, accompanied by the Duchess of Orleans and her favourite.

Our business, however, is with the Count de Bellegarde, and we shall seek him in vain amid the dancers, or among the company around them.

After being dragged through the couranto by Lady Muskerrey, the Count proceeded to the room where play was going on; and while feigning to watch the punters at basset, kept his eye on the Duchess of Cleveland.

At last, a valet approached her Grace, who presently arose, smiled at the Count as she passed him, and went out.

Bellegarde did not offer to attend her, but followed almost immediately, and saw that she was joined by Lady Muskerrey. The two ladies then made their way through the brilliant throng towards the hall, and the Count took the same course.

On reaching the entrance-hall, which was crowded with servants, he saw that the Duchess was taking leave of her hostess, and that an usher was standing beside them. The Duchess's looks proclaimed the gratitude she was expressing to her ladyship.

This was enough for the Count. Mingling with the serving men, he passed out through a door at the rear, into the garden, without attracting observation.

Meanwhile, the Duchess proceeded to her carriage, attended by the usher. Shortly after she had entered it, a porter came forth, carrying two bags of money, which he placed, with his own hands, in the carriage beside her Grace. This done, the coachman was ordered to drive on.

No thought of danger disturbed the Duchess, who was more occupied by her renewed hopes at play than by any other reflection; and she was beginning to consider whether she would not altogether abjure cards and dice, when suddenly the carriage stopped.

This unlooked-for halt had been caused by an authoritative order from a masked horseman, who, with two others, likewise masked, and armed with pistols, barred the way.

The lamps showed these formidable figures distinctly. The coachman at once obeyed.

At the same instant, two other horsemen, similarly disguised, appeared from behind, and threatened to shoot the footmen if they attempted to stir, or give the slightest alarm.

As the Duchess, who was much terrified, looked out of the window, she perceived another horseman advancing towards her.

The light of the lamp falling upon him showed that he was masked, and enveloped in a cloak. But his feathered hat and flowing black peruke proved that he had some pretension to taste.

"I beg a thousand pardons for thus stopping your Grace," he said, with an unmistakable French accent.

"You are Monsieur Claude Duval, I presume?" cried the Duchess, whose fright was, in a great measure, removed by this address.

"Exactly," he replied. "And I hope I shall not discredit any good report your Grace may have received of me from Miladi Muskerry and her fair niece. It would enchant me to prolong the interview, which I have thus fortunately obtained, and to tell the loveliest woman in England how much the most devoted of her servants admires her. But time presses. Your Grace has a certain sum of money with you in the carriage."

"You must be a sorcerer to know that, Monsieur Duval," she cried. "Well, suppose I have?—you are too gallant to deprive me of it."

"Perhaps your Grace will make me a present of it," he rejoined. "That will be the most agreeable way of putting it. Descend!" he cried to one of the footmen. "Her Grace desires you to give the money to these gentlemen."

The Duchess did not contradict him, and the footman, not daring to disobey, got down, and opening the carriage door, delivered the bags of money to Clotworthy and Montalt, who pressed forward to take them, and then instantly drew back.

"Infinitely obliged," cried Claude Duval, bowing to the Duchess. "I am sorry I must detain your Grace a little longer."

"Detain me!" she exclaimed, uneasily.

"Only for ten minutes. You will then be at liberty to proceed, and I trust will meet with no further interruption. Adieu, attention!" he cried to the coachman and footman. "I caution you not to move from this spot until you are permitted. Three of these gentlemen will remain to see my orders obeyed. I have the honour to wish your Grace a good night."

He then took off his hat, and dashed up the hill-side, followed by Clotworthy and Montalt. The others remained in guard of the carriage.

XIV.

HOW HER GRACE OF CLEVELAND WENT BACK TO THE BALL.

THE Duchess of Cleveland found her detention rather tedious, but was obliged to submit. Though vexed by the loss of the money, she could not help laughing at the adventure.

It was a relief to her when a voice called out to the coachman that he might go on; and the three robbers disappeared in the gloom.

"What are we to do, your Grace?" inquired the footman.

"Drive back to the house," she rejoined.

Nothing could equal Lady Muskerry's astonishment when she saw the Duchess of Cleveland re-enter the ball-room. But she quite understood from the expression of her Grace's countenance that something strange had happened, and flew to meet her.

"So delighted to see you back!" she hurriedly exclaimed. "But I hope no accident has occurred?"

"More than an accident," rejoined the Duchess. "I have been robbed in the park—almost within a bowshot of the house—by Claude Duval and his band."

"Amusement!" cried Lady Muskerry. "Then you have lost the money?"

"Lost it! unless the robbers are captured. I have despatched a dozen men in pursuit of them."

Before the Duchess could enter into further details, the King was seen advancing, with the Duchess of Orleans and Louise. Close behind them were Talbot and Dorinda.

"His Majesty must hear what has happened," cried the Duchess of Cleveland, rushing towards him.

"Oddfish!" exclaimed Charles, after listening to the recital. "This is a droller occurrence than the first."

And he made Louise laugh by the diverting description he gave her of it.

"It must be a frolic," he continued. "Who can have played it? Where is the Count de Bellegarde?"

"He is there, among the entourage," rejoined Louise.

At a sign from the King, the Count stepped forward.

"Have you been absent from the ball-room just now, Count?" demanded Charles.

Bellegarde appeared surprised at the question.

"I have just had the honour of dancing the gavotte with Lady Muskerry," he replied. "And though your Majesty was not likely to notice me, I am surprised you did not remark her ladyship."

"I recollect," said the King, smiling. "Should you recognise this Claude Duval if you beheld him?" he added to the Duchess of Cleveland.

"How is that possible, when he was masked?" she rejoined. "But he speaks with a very peculiar accent. Miss Neville will confirm what I say. She has conversed with him."

Dorinda blushed when thus appealed to, but immediately replied, "Yes, his accent is most marked and peculiar."

"At all like mine?" asked the Count de Bellegarde, with consummate self-possession.

"Not in the least!" replied both ladies.

"I am glad to hear that," cried the King. "Still, I am convinced it is a wild prank."

"The trick may be practised on your Majesty, and then you won't laugh at it," cried the Duchess of Cleveland, enraged by Louise's merriment.

"Proper measures must be taken to capture the robbers, or jesters—which you please," said the King, whose good humour was not to be disturbed.

"I will engage that your Majesty shall have some tidings of them by to-morrow," said Talbot.

"Several of the serving-men have been already sent in pursuit," cried the Duchess.

"Go, and make all possible inquiries," said the King to Talbot, who bowed, and quitted the ball-room.

"And now let us to supper, with what appetite we may," continued the Merry Monarch, as a gentleman usher advanced towards him. "If your Grace will but remain an hour longer," he added to the Duchess of Cleveland, "you will have plenty of company to escort you to Rushall Common."

"Yes, I must now insist upon your Grace staying supper," said Lady Muskerry.

"I hope you have had nothing to do with this trick, Achille," remarked Louise, aside to the Count de Bellegarde.

"I! Can you entertain such a suspicion?"

"Well, I hope Claude Duval won't rob his Majesty," she said. "That would be carrying the jest too far."

The ball broke up about two hours later, but no further mischance befel any of the company on their return.

XV.

THE KING TAKES ANOTHER EARLY WALK.

NOTWITHSTANDING the late hour at which he retired to rest, Charles was astir as usual, and his valet, Chiffinch, ventured to observe that he thought his Majesty had better not go to bed at all.

Habited in his customary morning attire, the King sallied forth, and was soon shaping his rapid course across the heath, in the same direction as on the previous day, and with the full intention of paying another visit to the farm-house; when, on gaining the summit of the hill, he perceived a damsel, whom he felt certain could be no other than the fair object of his search. That she was looking out for him, seemed equally clear; for, on beholding him, she hastened to meet him.

How fresh and beautiful she looked on that bright morning! How sylph-like was her figure as she tripped along! And how charmingly her dark tresses sported in the breeze!

"Would Lely wait with me now," thought Charles, as he gazed at her rapturously. "He would be ravished by her appearance."

"May I flatter myself that you are looking out for me, sweetheart?" he said, as he bade her good-morrow. "I hope so; but you will guess that I was on my way to your dwelling. I bring you good news. I have seen Sir Peter Lely, and have easily prevailed on him to paint your picture. He will pay you a visit to-day."

"It must not be," she replied. "My father will not permit it."

"Your father is an obstinate churl," cried the King. "He knows not what he refuses. I will soon bring him to reason."

"You must not come to our cottage again, sir; indeed, you must not," she rejoined. "I have been on the watch since daybreak to tell you this. My father was very angry with me when you left, and will not allow me to see you again."

"How amiable of you to meet me thus?" he cried. "But I must have your picture painted, in spite of him. If Lely is not to be allowed to come to you, you must go to him. The description I have given him of you has made him all eagerness to place you in his gallery. He is lodged with the King at Mount Sion, and, of course, has his own painting-room, where he will be at work at his easel during the greater part of the day. You will have nothing to do but ask for his Majesty's valet, Chiffinch—you will remember the name, Chiffinch—and he will conduct you at once to Sir Peter Lely's room. Conceal your fair features with a hood, if you fear attracting too much notice. I will make all preparations for you. At what hour may Sir Peter expect your visit?"

"Much as I should like to have my portrait painted by him, I cannot, dare not come," she rejoined.

"Nay, I have promised Sir Peter that you will sit to him, and I should be grieved to disappoint him," said Charles, in his most persuasive accents.

"You tempt me strongly," she cried, "but I must resist."

"I will take no refusal," urged the King. "You are throwing away a chance that falls to the lot of few. Your beauty will bloom for ever on Lely's canvas."

Her cheek coloured, and her black eyes flashed with pride. Charles saw she was yielding, and again urged her.

"I will come at noon," she murmured.

"Chiffinch shall be in waiting for you. He is discretion itself. Make no change in your costume, I entreat—you cannot improve it."

"You think not?" she remarked, archly. "That is fortunate, for I could not make a change without exciting my father's suspicion. But I must not stay here a moment longer, or I shall be missed, and then it will be impossible for me to get out. Adieu!"

And she speeded away.

Charles gazed after her as long as she continued in sight, lost in admiration of her graceful movements, and then moved off in an opposite direction.

He had just reached Bishop's Down, and was about to proceed to the cold baths, then very much frequented, when he perceived Talbot Harland, mounting the side of the heath, and called to him. The young man immediately rode towards him.

"You promised me good news this evening," cried the King. "Have you been successful? Have you captured the robbers? I fear not, from your looks."

"I cannot discover any traces of them," rejoined Talbot. "I have been all round the country, as the jaded state of my horse will prove to your Majesty, but have learnt nothing. This Claude Duval must have dealings with the devil, I think, to disappear in this fashion. I am now on my way to Farmer Oldacre's cottage, to see whether he can aid me in my quest."

"Don't go near him!" cried the King. "The fellow is an impracticable savage, and will not allow his fair daughter to have her portrait painted by Lely. But it shall be done in spite of him. She is coming secretly to Mount Sion at noon."

"Then I have nothing further to do in the matter," observed Talbot.

"Nothing. Chiffinch will manage it all. Go to your tent, and get an hour's repose—you need it."

Talbot thanked his Majesty, and rode towards the encampment on Rasthall Common, while the King walked on to the baths, and thoroughly refreshed himself in the clearest and coldest water imaginable, collected in a rocky basin.

XVI.

SIR PETER LE LY'S STUDIO.

SIR PETER LE LY was in the room which had been hastily prepared for him as a studio. His canvas was upon the easel, and he was employed in mixing the colours on his palette. It was not yet noon, so he proceeded very deliberately with his task, laying in plenty of black, as he knew he should require a good deal of that colour.

Suddenly, the door opened, and Chiffinch, having ushered in a damsel, whose features were concealed by a lloo mask, immediately retired. Lely quickly arose, and received his fair visitor with a courtier-like bow.

But a slight misgiving crossed him as he regarded her. He had been led by the King to expect a simple costume, but the attire of the new comer was rich, and she wore a small black hat with a crimson plume, as was then the fashion with the Queen's Maids of Honour. Besides, her tresses were blonde.

When she took off her mask, he found it was Dorinda Neville.

"You do not seem to expect me, Sir Peter," she said, noticing his embarrassment. "I understood from Mr. Talbot Harland that it is his Majesty's wish that I should sit to you, and I have come accordingly."

"Nothing could gratify me more than to paint Miss Neville," replied Lely, bowing; "but I have not yet received his Majesty's instructions to that effect. And I fancy there must be some mistake in regard to the hour."

"It will be unpardonable in Mr. Harland if he has led me into an error," cried Dorinda. "I entreat you to say nothing about it, Sir Peter, or I shall be laughed at."

"You may entirely depend upon me, Miss Neville," replied Lely. "But I trust I shall still receive his Majesty's commands."

At this moment Chiffinch opened the door, and said, "Another lady is without, Sir Peter."

"Great heavens, if I am seen, there will be no end of ridicule!" cried Dorinda.

And she fled behind the screen.

Scarcely had she disappeared, when the second lady was ushered into the room, and was received by the painter with a low bow.

She, too, wore a lloo mask, and, in one or two particulars, answered the King's description better than the first comer. Clearly, she was a brunette. Her tresses were black, and the eyes that shone through the loopholes of her mask were of the same hue.

But her attire was even richer than that of Dorinda, and of the last French mode. The lounure could not be that of an English-woman, and Lely felt no surprise, though he experienced some uneasiness, when she disclosed the features of Louise de Quéroutelle.

"Do not let me interrupt you, Sir Peter," said Louise, addressing him in French. "Pray, proceed with your task. I know you have a charming model—she is behind that screen—pray, let her come forth."

Lely in vain protested that no one was there.

"You cannot deceive me, Sir Peter," continued Louise, whose accents and sparkling eyes betrayed her jealous rage. "I knew you are going to paint a jeune paysanne for the King. She is there; I want to see her;—I will see her!"

"Parole d'honneur, mademoiselle; there is no paysanne behind the screen," said Lely.

"Who is it, then? I insist on knowing," cried Louise.

"Without the lady's permission, I cannot satisfy you," rejoined the painter.

"'Tis I," cried Dorinda, stepping forth.

"Miss Neville!" exclaimed Louise, in astonishment.

"Yes. I have been brought here on a foolish errand, and am only anxious to make my escape."

Any attempt of the kind was, however, frustrated by Chiffinch, who came in, looking grave and importunate as ever, and said, "A third lady is without, Sir Peter."

"Ah! to tell!" said Louise.

"Diable! this no doubt is the right one!" muttered the painter.

Before the new-comer could be ushered in, both Lely's visitors had disappeared behind the screen.

Chiffinch immediately retired, but did not quite close the door after him.

Sir Peter bowed profoundly as before, though feeling certain it was the fair peasant. As she threw back her hood, he was electrified by her beauty; while Louise, who was stealing a glance at her from the corner of the screen, was equally amazed.

Anxious to remove the lovely girl's timidity, Sir Peter addressed a few encouraging words to her, and told her how delighted he was to have her for a model.

"I am afraid you can make nothing of me, Sir Peter," she remarked, with a smile.

"If I do you justice, his Majesty will have the best portrait I have yet painted," replied Lely, gallantly.

"Then the portrait is to be for the King?" she cried.

"Certainly. I only paint for his Majesty," said Lely, hoping he had not committed an indiscretion.

He then led her towards the easel, and begged her to assume a simple and unconstrained attitude.

"I want to take you just as you are," he said. "That will do admirably; if I can only catch that charming expression before it flits away, I shall have no further difficulty."

And, sitting down, he seized his palette and brush, and set to work with an ardour that showed how strongly he was excited.

So engrossed was he, that he entirely forgot there were other persons in the room except himself and his lovely model.

Louise remained quiet for a short time, hoping some observations would be made; but not a word being uttered, she did not like to move.

At last, she issued from her retreat, and Dorinda followed her. Violet was surprised, and not a little startled, by their sudden appearance.

"Upon my word, mademoiselle, you will make an extremely pretty picture!" cried Louise, regarding her with a very spiteful expression.

Quickly recovering herself, Violet looked at her, and said, "If I am not mistaken, you are Mademoiselle de Quéroutelle?"

"Ah, you know me!" cried Louise. "You are not so simple as you pretend."

"I have never seen you before, but I have heard of you," rejoined Violet. Then, turning to Dorinda, she added, "You, I am sure, are Miss Neville. I have likewise heard of you."

"Sir Peter must have whispered our names in your ear," remarked Dorinda, smiling.

"I was really not thinking of you," observed Lely, testily. "And you have robbed me of the most charming expression——"

"Oh! it will come again," cried Louise. "This artless creature has always a simple look at command."

Violet made no rejoinder, but her cheeks flushed with indignation, and Sir Peter called out to Louise, "Accept my thanks, mademoiselle. You have caused her to summon up the liveliest expression of scorn I ever beheld. Ah! if I could only paint you both as you are now! What a picture it would be! How it would enchant his Majesty!"

"I would not be associated with her for worlds," exclaimed Louise. "Come, Miss Neville. We will no longer interrupt Sir Peter in his pleasing task."

They were moving towards the door, when their departure was arrested by the King.

No doubt, his Majesty felt some little embarrassment at finding them in the room, but he was too much master of himself to show it.

"What means this invasion of Sir Peter's studio?" he cried.

"Mr. Talbot Harland must explain my presence here, sire," replied Dorinda.

"And mine can be explained by Bellegarde," added Louise.

"The explanations shall be given at once," cried the King. "Luckily, they are both in the antechamber. What ho! Chiffinch! Bid the Count de Bellegarde and Mr. Harland come in."

"It will be impossible for me to proceed with the portrait, if we are to have a scene," groaned Lely.

At this moment, the two persons who had been summoned were ushered in by Chiffinch. Talbot looked somewhat confused, but Bellegarde appeared wholly free from embarrassment.

On the entrance of the latter, Charles noted that Violet cast down her eyes and avoided the Count's regards.

"Harkye, gentlemen," cried the King. "Both of you must have known that Sir Peter Lely was particularly engaged at this hour, and yet each sends a lady to interrupt him. Is it a jest?"

"On my part, yes, sire," replied Talbot. "I avow the truth, and throw myself on your good-nature for forgiveness."

"But you will not readily obtain mine, even if his Majesty forgives you," said Dorinda.

"You have made me supremely ridiculous."

"What excuse have you to offer, Count?" demanded Charles. "Your offence is the worst of the two."

"My explanation might not appear satisfactory to your Majesty, so I will not venture to offer it—especially in the presence of Mademoiselle de Quéronville," rejoined Bellegarde.

Before the King could make any reply, Violet had approached him.

"I beseech your Majesty to let me go," she said. "I cannot endure the situation in which I am placed."

Charles might have detained her, but Louise approached on the other side, and whispered, "If her portrait is painted, I shall leave with the Duchess of Orleans."

Forced by this threat to yield, the King called the Count de Bellegarde to him.

"You are the contriver of this mischief, Count," he said. "Set it right as far as you can."

"What am I to do, in heaven's name! sire?" inquired Bellegarde.

"Take me hence!" cried Violet. "That is all I ask!"

Bellegarde consulted the King by a look; and, receiving permission, offered her his hand, and conducted her out of the room.

Talbot would have paid a similar attention to Dorinda, as she followed, but she turned disdainfully from him.

"So, my day is lost!" exclaimed Lely, in despair.

"No; you shall have a scene from me," rejoined Louise. "Use the same canvas. I would have every trace of that odious paysanne obliterated. You will not see her again? Promise me that!" she added, to the King.

Of course, Charles gave the promise.

XVII.

THE DEVOUEMENT TO THE DUCHESS OF CLEVELAND'S ADVENTURE.

NEXT day the King sent Chiffinch to the farmhouse to make inquiries, bidding him use the utmost caution. The discreet valet brought back the very satisfactory intelligence that the fair damsel had been taken away by her father—whether could not be ascertained, as the house was shut to the care of a deaf and stupid old countrywoman, who had evidently been instructed to answer no questions.

'This was vexatious; but Charles persuaded himself that he should easily discover Violet's retreat. Bellegarde, he felt sure, must be acquainted with it; but the difficulty was, how to extract the information from him.

The Count's movements were watched by Chiffinch; but nothing was gained by the proceeding. Bellegarde seemed devoted to play. He left off dancing, and sat all night at the basset-table. During the day he played at hazard. Fortune favoured him; and he won large sums from Sir Charles Lyttleton, the beau Sidney, Lord Tanfe, and others.

At her royal brother's earnest entreaty, the Duchess of Orleans postponed her departure for three days. Charles was really grieved to part with her; and a presentiment crossed him, which was unhappily realized, that they should meet no more.

The Count de Bellegarde attended her Highness to Dover, but did not embark with her. Mademoiselle de Quéroutelle was left behind, having been appointed Maid of Honour to the Queen.

It may now be necessary to inquire whether Claude Duval, or any of his band, had been captured? All search for them had been fruitless. The occurrences were treated as a jest, and formed the theme of some very diverting ballads, composed by the Duke of Buckingham and Sir Charles Sedley, which caused infinite amusement to the Merry Monarch and his Court.

The Duchess of Cleveland did not relish the jests made at her expense. A most unexpected incident, however, occurred, which restored her Grace to perfect good humour.

On the eve of the departure for France of the Duchess, a farewell entertainment of extraordinary splendour was given at Somerhill. Though pressed to dance by Lady Muskerrey, the Count de Bellegarde, who was in a famous run of good luck, would not quit the basset-table.

The Duchess of Cleveland envied his success; but not being able to participate in it, got up in disgust. When she entered her carriage, what was her surprise to find three bags of money on the seat!

None of her servants could tell who had placed them there. But to one of them was fastened a ticket, intimating that the eight thousand pistoles, which the bags contained, came from Monsieur Claude Duval.

Here was a charming discovery to the adventure!

Her Grace clapped her hands with delight; and having satisfied herself as to the contents of the bags, returned to the ball-room to proclaim what had happened.

Everybody laughed at the occurrence; but no one laughed more heartily than the Count de Bellegarde.

"Your Majesty was perfectly right," he observed to the King. "The robbery must have been a frolic. But who the deuce can have played it?"

Louise looked archly at her cousin, but made no remark.

"It is scarcely worth while to inquire now," cried the Duchess of Cleveland, laughing. "Whoever Monsieur Claude Duval may be, he is exceedingly polite."

"And dances the gallant better than any one I ever saw," cried Lady Muskerrey.

"You ought to have invited him to your ball," said Louise.

"Most likely he is here now," observed the King.

Nothing else was talked of during the remainder of the evening; and the Duke of Buckingham improvised a few more couplets to affirm that all the Court dames were dying to dance with the gallant robber, Claude Duval.

For the three following days, the Court was deprived of the agreeable society of the Count de Bellegarde, who, as we have mentioned, was called upon to attend the Duchess of Orleans to Dover.

XVIII.

KNOLE.

MEANWHILE, the King had accepted an invitation from the Earl of Dorset, father of Lord Buckhurst, to pass a few days at his residence, Knole. All the principal personages in the Court were included in the invitation. Preparations were made by the Earl and his son on a magnificent scale for the reception of their numerous guests.

It was a delicious morning in June. The sweet-toned bells of Sevenoaks Church were ringing merry peals. The inhabitants of the pleasant little town, in their holiday attire, were all out of doors, and ranged along the street to see the King and his Court pass by.

And a brave sight it was, braver than the sight of the spectators had ever witnessed, though that time-honoured individual had seen Bonnie King James ride through the village to Knole House.

"But there were no such lovely women in

SIR PETER JELLY'S STUDIO. (See page 22.)

King Jamie's days as now," he said. "It was a pleasure to gaze at them. How bewitching they looked in their velvet riding-dresses, and little plumed hats. How good-humoured his Majesty appeared. How he nodded to the men, and smiled at the ladies, and even went so far as to compliment some of them. Heaven bless his royal heart!

"Who could that be, who was riding beside his Majesty? Not the Queen. No, she was too young, and too sprightly. It must be the French beauty, of whom he had heard speak. She might be charming, but she was not half so much to his taste as the fair-haired, blue-eyed nymph who rode behind. Ah! there was a complexion—there was a winning smile!" Need we say that these encomiums were bestowed on Dorinda?

Charles and his attendants having ridden by, amid the acclamations of the beholders, a long line of richly-gilt carriages followed, each drawn by four horses. In the foremost sat the Queen, with three of her ladies; but though her Majesty was regarded with much curiosity, she was not half so vociferously cheered as her consort. Charles was extraordinarily popular with all classes of his subjects, except the Puritans, of whom there were none in the loyal town of Sevenoaks.

Porters and mounted attendants were stationed at the gates to keep out the crowd; but as soon as the royal cortege had passed through, the townsfolk were allowed to enter the park, where they conducted themselves most decorously.

Between the gates and the mansion lies a deep dell, the slopes of which are covered by splendid beech-trees; and it was while ascending this acclivity, and shaping its course through the grove, that the procession was seen to the greatest advantage. Nothing could be prettier or more picturesque than the sight of that troop of glittering gallants and fair dames.

From the moment of her entrance into the park, Louise had been in ecstasies with the scene presented to her. Never before had she beheld troops of such enormous size—not even at Fontenoy. And when at last the gray old monastic-looking pile, with its innumerable gables, its square turreted windows, and great gate-house, burst upon her, she was lost in admiration. The immense gateway in front of the gate-house charmed her as much as the same tree charmed Horace Walpole at a later period.

On the summit of the lofty embattled gatehouse floated a broad banner, embroidered with the royal arms. Smaller flags were hung out from the windows, and as the royal cortege approached, flourishes of trumpets were blown by a band of trumpeters stationed near the archway, while small pieces of ordnance were discharged from the embattled towers, making the woods resound with their roar, and startling the deer in their coverts.

Amid this joyous bruit the King alighted, and was received by the Earl of Dorset and his son, who were stationed in the outer court. But no one entered the mansion until the arrival of the Queen, and by that time the inner quadrangle was almost filled. Never had such a brilliant company been assembled within that court before—not even in the days of good Queen Bess or King Jamie. The old walls resounded with light talk and laughter.

At last, the Queen's carriage came up, and while the Earl of Dorset was bending before her Majesty, assisting her to alight, and ceremoniously conducting her into the house, Lord Buckhurst, like a true courtier, was paying assiduous attentions to Mademoiselle de Quéroualle, and telling her how much enchanted and honoured he felt by her visit to Knole.

Ere long, the courts were emptied, and the brilliant company was wandering about those long corridors and galleries that form the charm of the ancient mansion.

Almost immediately after the arrival of the royal party, a splendid collation was served in the great banquetting-hall; and after partaking of it, the King, who was in high good-humour, repaired to the bowling-green, where he remained at play with the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Buckhurst, Sedley, Etherage, and several others, during the whole of that summer afternoon.

That bowling-green, with the gay groups upon it, and the antique mansion near it, formed a lovely picture. What jests were uttered by the merry crew! Misquette was banished for the time. The King was merely a boon companion.

Some of the dames and gallants remained within the gardens, where plenty of belittles were to be found, but others strayed forth into the park and sat down beneath the trees. Amongst the latter were Talbot and Dorinda. The young man had recovered the use of his arm, though his wound was not quite healed. He had not yet obtained Dorinda's entire forgiveness for the unlucky jest he had practised upon her; but his penitence being sincere, there seemed little doubt of his speedy restoration to favour. Indeed, it may be fairly assumed that she would not have strolled forth with him into the park if her displeasure had been very great.

"Am I forgiven?" he asked, as they sat down on the roots of an enormous oak.

"Not yet," she replied. "Unless you are severely punished, you may repeat the offence."

"Will no expression of regret satisfy you?"

"No; I still feel very angry. Sir Charles Sedley has made me the subject of some satirical verses. But I will not have you quarrel with him on that account. You made me ridiculous enough by your duel with Bellegarde. Do you know that I begin to like the Count, and find him very amusing. I am quite sorry he is not here now. I hope we shall soon have him back."

"I shall be obliged to fight another duel with him if you praise him so much."

"Then you will for ever forfeit my regard. Apropos of the Count, I have been longing to ask you a few questions about that lovely country damsel, whose portrait Sir Peter Lely ought to have painted."

"The only information I can give you respecting her is that she has disappeared altogether."

"You had seen her before that morning?"

"Certainly; at her father's house. His Majesty was there at the time."

"The Count de Bellegarde seemed to be acquainted with her. I noticed a look that passed between them. I cannot divest myself of the idea that she is something better than a farmer's daughter. Surely, you must have remarked the refinement of her manner? Have you ever spoken to the Count about her?"

"I feel no interest in her, and am surprised you should take so much."

"If you wish to oblige me—if you desire to regain my favour—you will find out who she is."

"There is really no mystery in the matter," rejoined Talbot. "You have endowed her with gifts she does not possess. Believe me, she is not a princess in disguise."

"She is not a peasant—of that I am certain. Ah, what do I see? Look at those two persons coming towards us."

Talbot sprang to his feet.

"One of them is Farmer Oldacre, undoubtedly," he exclaimed; "and the other must be his daughter."

"He she!" cried Dorinda, rising in her turn.

We have said that a great number of the townspeople of Sevenoaks had been admitted to the park. They were now scattered about in groups under the trees, and some of the more curious amongst them had ventured to approach the house, in order to stare at the great folks in the gardens and on the bowling-green.

There was nothing very surprising, therefore, in the appearance of Oldacre and his daughter. They were marching along rather quickly, and it was evident that their course would bring them near the tree beneath which the youthful pair had been sitting.

But when the farmer recognised Talbot, he stopped, and seemed about to turn back. But his daughter detained him, as she saw Dorinda tripping towards her.

"I am so glad to see you again," cried the latter, as she came up. "Perhaps you have forgotten me?"

"Oh, no! I have not," replied Violet, smiling. "I could not easily forget Miss Neville."

"I have just been speaking of you to Mr. Talbot Harland," said Dorinda. "Do not suppose that I am influenced by any idle curiosity if I inquire whether you are staying in Sevenoaks?"

Oldacre plucked his daughter's sleeve, to prevent her from answering.

"You need have no concealment from me," observed Dorinda, noticing the gesture.

"I am sure not," replied the other, disregarding her father's looks. "I have been here for a few days."

"But she won't remain here many hours longer," remarked Oldacre, gruffly.

"Wherefore not?" cried Dorinda. "I have just said that she has nothing to fear from me."

"Or from me," added Talbot, who had now come up. "But if your object is concealment," he observed to Violet, "is it prudent to walk abroad thus? Others may see you, and mention the circumstance. It happens that his Majesty is on the bowling-green; but he might have been in the park."

"You hear what he says, Violet," remarked Oldacre. "I thank you for your good counsel," he added, to the young man.

"Stay; I have something more to say to you," cried Dorinda, taking Violet aside.

As soon as they were out of hearing, she continued, "If you remain here, as I think you will, I hope you will find some means of communicating with me. I will not ask you to come to the house; but here, in the park, we might meet."

"As you appear to take an interest in me, I will trust you with a secret. After what my father has just said, it will surprise you to learn that I shall be at the revel to-night."

"Pray do nothing so rash," cried Dorinda. "You are certain to be discovered."

"Have no fear for me," rejoined the other. "I have friends in the house. There is to be a character dance, and I shall figure in it. My disguise will protect me, and I know I can confide in you. Perhaps I may find an opportunity of speaking to you then. But I must now go. Adieu. My father is growing impatient. Besides, two Court ladies are coming this way. To-night!"

"To-night!" echoed Dorinda. "Rely on me."

Violet then rejoined her father, who had kept sullenly aloof from Talbot. Scarcely troubling himself to salute Dorinda, the cross-grained farmer hurried his daughter away in the direction of the park gates.

It was time he was gone; for the two Court dames alluded to by Violet, proved to be the Duchess of Cleveland and Lady Muskerrey.

XIX.

THE SPANISH DANCER.

A LOUD blowing of horns, that roused all the echoes of the ancient mansion, summoned the guests to a magnificent banquet, which was served in the great hall. Minstrels, placed in the music-gallery, enlivened the company with their strains.

With its richly-carved screen; its long tables, covered with massive plate and glittering crystal; its dais, at which sat their Majesties and the most important of the guests; with the crowd of attendants in gorgeous liveries, ministering to the wants of the dames and gallants seated at the board,—the banquetting-hall presented a splendid sight.

The male portion of the guests sat long at table, and continued their carouse till it was almost time for the evening revelry to commence.

The company re-assembled in the Brown Gallery, which, from its great length, was admirably adapted for a country-dance. Here they danced the brawl, and the cushion-dance, and a fig, and we know not how many merry dances besides; and the gallants being excited by the wine they had quaffed, footed it with unusual animation.

Somewhat fatigued by his exertions, the King sat down with Louise, when the majordomo approached, and informed him that a Spanish dance was about to be performed.

Charles expressed his satisfaction, and a space was immediately cleared in front of his Majesty for the dancers.

The Queen was in a large room opening out of the gallery, with the Earl of Dorset and the graver portion of the courtiers in attendance upon her. Lord Buckhurst devoted himself to Mademoiselle de Quiroualle.

Presently the inspiring rattle of castanets was heard, and three dancers in Spanish costume broke through the circle formed in front of the King, and made a reverence to his Majesty. Two of them were handsome young men, of slight and graceful figure; but it was evident that their dark hue was the result of art.

All eyes, however, were fixed upon the donzella by whom they were accompanied. Her picturesque dress suited her admirably, and her short basquina displayed her finely turned limbs and small feet to perfection. Her features were concealed by an envious mask, but her throat was exquisitely moulded, and her tresses black as jet.

With what wonderful spirit she danced the bolero! How rapid were her movements! how charming her postures! With what captivating coquetry she managed her fan! Charles was enraptured.

The fandango followed; and this vivacious and characteristic dance was better calculated than the first to call forth all the remarkable graces of her figure. Irrepressible murmurs of delight burst from the admiring assemblage. Sir Peter Lely, who was standing behind the King's chair, asked his Majesty if he had ever seen her before.

"Never!" cried Charles, rapturously. "But I hope to see her often again. She is charming."

"Look at her closely, sire," said Sir Peter. "I am very much mistaken if it is not——"

Here a glance from Louise checked him. The King's curiosity was aroused.

"Who is she?" he said, to Lord Buckhurst.

"She was engaged by my major-domo; that is all I know about her, sire," was the reply.

"A ballet-dancer, no doubt," observed Louise, contemptuously.

"We'll have a glimpse of her face anon," said Charles.

"Sorry to disappoint your Majesty," replied Lord Buckhurst. "But she expressly stipulated that she should not be obliged to unmask."

"Oddfish! that's strange," exclaimed the King.

In another moment the fandango ended, and amidst the plaudits of the assemblage, the dancers advanced to make their reverences to the King.

In spite of what had been said to him, Charles was on the point of bidding the donzella unmask, when Lady Muskerrey stepped forward, and volunteered to dance the saraband with one of the Spaniards.

The absurd request could not be refused; and the donzella took advantage of her ladyship's interposition to retire.

As she passed the spot where Dorinda was standing, she inadvertently touched her white agitating her fan, and then apologized for her carelessness.

Dorinda smiled.

"I wish you would give me your fan in exchange for mine," she said.

"De buena gana, senorita," replied the Spanish damsel, complying.

And with a graceful courtesy, she went on.

The King was forced to witness Lady Muskerrey's performance, which appeared doubly absurd from its contrast with the charming dances that had preceded it. However, her ladyship swallowed all the ironical compliments paid her by his Majesty.

Nothing more was seen of the fascinating Spanish dancer. She could not be prevailed upon to appear again—so the major-domo declared.

XX.

A MYSTERIOUS NOCTURNAL VISITOR.

AFTER supper, the Queen retired; but it was not until a later hour that Charles was conducted to his chamber by his noble host. Thanking the Earl for his hospitality, the King graciously dismissed him, and placed himself in the hands of Chiffinch.

The bed-chamber assigned to his Majesty had been fitted up for his grandsire, James the First. The superb state bed, with its hangings of gold and silver tissue, its fringed borders of the same material, and splendidly decorated canopy, surmounted with great plumes, cost an incredible sum. The walls were hung with priceless tapestry, representing the story of Nebuchadnezzar.

On the silver toilet-table was a magnificent Venetian mirror, with an appropriate service in silver. A velvet table, richly embroidered with gold, a few high-backed chairs, and a large arm-chair, placed near the bed, completed the furniture of the room.

While Chiffinch was disrobing the King, he informed his Majesty that the room was said to be haunted by the ghost of the first monarch who had slept within it. Charles laughed, and said he didn't think his grandsire would trouble his repose.

A couch had been prepared for Chiffinch in the ante-chamber, and when he retired the King bade him close the door of communication between the rooms.

Charles soon fell fast asleep, but was awakened by an oppressive sensation like that caused by nightmare.

On opening his eyes, he became aware of a dark figure seated in the arm-chair, and looking towards the bed.

The figure was perfectly motionless, and its presence at first inspired the King with superstitious terror; but he soon became aware that a living being was beside him.

A light set upon a stand near the bed, and placed behind the mysterious intruder, threw his countenance into shade, and his features were further concealed by a flowing black peruke; but the King remarked that he was broad-shouldered and strongly built.

Charles was in the act of springing from his couch to summon Chiffinch, when a gesture from the unknown restrained him.

"I am armed, sire," said the audacious personage, in a low, deep voice. "Twere best your Majesty should remain quiet and listen to me."

There was something so determined in the man's manner and tone, that it enforced compliance.

"Who are you?" demanded the King. "And with what design have you come hither?"

"Your Majesty asks who I am," replied the intruder. "I will tell you without disguise. I am the leader of a secret society, numbering several hundreds, which has been formed for the express purpose of putting you to death."

"I have to deal with an assassin, then?" cried Charles.

"Be silent on your life, sire," rejoined the other. "The slightest indiscretion will be fatal to you. It must be evident, if I designed to injure you, that I possess the power. I have found means of penetrating to your chamber. I have stolen upon you during your slumber, and could have slain you, as the numerous Thane show the royal Danes."

"And what didst thou?" demanded the King, very ill at his ease, though manifesting no fear.

"I was overpowered by the sacred majesty of your person," replied the other. "You were completely at my mercy—but I could not strike."

"I suppose I am bound to thank you for your extraordinary forbearance," said Charles, beginning to feel reassured. "But why not depart, since you had so judiciously changed your mind?"

"Had I done so your Majesty would have been unaware of the service I have rendered you," observed the unknown.

"That is quite true," rejoined the King. "I suppose you expect to be rewarded?"

"I am entitled to a reward, sire—a great reward. Not only have I saved your life, but I will deliver you from a hundred secret enemies, by whom you are beset."

"Why not denounce your accomplices?" said the King.

"Were I base enough to do so," rejoined the unknown, disdainfully, "I should ensure your destruction and my own. Any treachery would be promptly and terribly avenged. The rack would extort no confession from me. Trust to me, sire, and I will protect you. Hereafter I will ask for my reward. And now a word of caution at parting. Your safety depends upon your silence. Speak not of our interview. Make no inquiries concerning me. You will learn nothing. My precautions are too well taken. You may sleep soundly, for I promise that you shall not be again so unnecessarily disturbed."

As the words were uttered, he extinguished the light, and the chamber was instantly buried in gloom.

Charles listened intently, but could hear no sound of his departure.

After a while he summoned Chiffinch, but had to call twice before the sleepy valet-de-chambre responded.

"How's this!—the light gone out!" cried Chiffinch, as he opened the door.

He quickly relighted the taper, and Charles then perceived that the mysterious intruder had disappeared.

The King addressed no questions to the valet, nor did he explain why he had summoned him; but Chiffinch ventured to inquire if his Majesty had seen the ghost.

"I have had an unpleasant dream," replied the King. "Go to bed again, but leave the door ajar."

"He has seen his grandpapa?" muttered Chiffinch, as he returned to his couch; "but he doesn't like to own it."

As may naturally be expected, Charles could not easily compose himself to sleep again. But he determined, after much reflection, to maintain silence respecting the strange incident.

When he awoke next morn at his accustomed early hour, he tried to ascertain in what manner the mysterious intruder had entered the room.

Raising the tapestry, he carefully examined the wainscot, but failed to detect any sliding panel or secret door.

XXI.

HOW THE KING WAS ROBBED BY CLAUDE DUVAL.

In the course of his adventurous career, Charles had escaped too many perils not to have become a prodestinarian; and, being firmly persuaded that he was not destined to perish by the hand of an assassin, he soon shook off the fears inspired by his nocturnal visitor.

That the person was well acquainted with the mansion, or had been aided by some one possessing such knowledge, was certain. Besides the guests, there were innumerable lacqueys and servants in the house, and possibly the mysterious individual might be among them. But how was the King to recognise him, since he had not been able to obtain a full view of his features?

However, the careless monarch made no such attempt. He instituted no inquiries, and took no precautions for his safety. He went forth that morning wholly unattended, as usual, walked for two or three hours in the park, and even visited Sevenoaks.

After a copious breakfast, which he had earned by his vigorous exercise, he was too much engrossed by the amusements prepared for him by his noble host to think more of the strange occurrence.

One of the diversions of the day was a rustic filé, which took place in the park, among the trees, at no great distance from the mansion.

The weather being most propitious, the filé was delightful. A maypole, hung with garlands and ropes of flowers, was reared in the midst of a broad patch of soft green sward, and round it danced the prettiest Phillis and the gayest Corydons of Sevenoaks.

Though both their Majesties were present, no comment was placed upon the assemblage. On the contrary, the Merry Monarch promoted the festivity by announcing a general dance, and set the example to his courtiers by selecting a blooming damsel for his partner.

How the rosy-cheeked girl blushed at the honour conferred upon her, and how she boasted of it afterwards!

That dance, in which Court gallants were mingled with country maidens, and Court dames with young rustics, was a pleasant sight—pleasanter far to witness than the grand revel of the night before.

Carpets were spread upon the sward, on which those who listed could sit down; and a tent was pitched close at hand, where refreshments were served to the country folk. Besides dancing, there were various rustic sports that caused infinite amusement.

While these were going on, the Court dames and gallants exhibited their skill in archery. Turgots, and what were called "rovers," had been placed in the beautiful dell to which we have alluded, and here they shot for prizes given by Lord Buckhurst. The chief prize—a silver bugle—was won by Louise, who was enchanted by her success. She was still more pleased when Charles promised to add a chain garnished with pearls to the bugle.

As she was surveying the scene with the King, from the bank of the dell, she exclaimed, "Would Achilles were here. How much he would have enjoyed these sports!"

"I wish he were here, with all my heart!" cried Charles. "Have you heard from him?"

"Yes. The messenger who arrived this morning with a letter from the Princess to your Majesty, brought me a few lines from him. Her Highness, as you know, embarked yesterday from Dover, but rather late in the day. Achilles did not care to travel by night, so we shall not see him till to-morrow."

"I hope he will have some diverting adventure to relate on his return," said the King. Then, with a change of manner, he added, "Poor Henrietta! she writes as if she were bidding me an eternal adieu! She seems to dread returning to Saint-Cloud."

"This Duke, her husband, is a jealous tyrant, capable of any atrocious act," cried Louise. "I sometimes tremble for her Highness. I have warned her, and I hope she will not neglect my counsel."

"You seem to have frightened her," said Charles.

"Sire, you do not know the Duke of Orleans as well as I do. He is as perfidious as a Borgia, and capable of poisoning her."

The King made no remark, but a dark shade came over his countenance.

Presently, however, he recovered his gaiety, and proceeded to the mansion, where all the guests partook of a sumptuous collation.

After the repast, Charles, who liked nothing so well as a game at bowls, and who had never found a bowling-green more to his mind than that of Knole, was about to devote the afternoon to his favourite recreation; but he was turned from his purpose by Louise, who proposed a ride in the park, declaring that she had not seen half its beauties.

The expression of her wishes was sufficient for Charles, and shortly afterwards a joyous troop sallied forth on horseback.

But the King and Louise soon separated from the others, and rode on by themselves towards the further side of the park, halting, ever and anon, to admire the lovely pictures offered to their gaze. Knolls crowned by magnificent oaks, clumps of beech, long, sweeping glades, deep dells, coverts, amidst which herds of deer might be seen tossing their branching antlers, and here and there a solitary tree of enormous size. Some of the oldest trees in the country are to be seen in Knole Park.

They were passing through a copse, when a horseman, whose approach they had not noticed, suddenly presented himself before them. There was nothing very startling in the circumstance, except that this personage was masked.

He was extremely well mounted, and gaily attired in a scarlet riding-dress, embroidered with gold. As he had pistols in his holsters, it struck both those who beheld him that he must be the much-talked-about Claude Duval.

The King, however, manifested neither surprise nor uneasiness, as the horseman removed his feathered hat, and bowed profoundly, but courteously returned the salutation.

"Tis Claude Duval, sire; I am sure of it!" cried Louise.

"You are right, mademoiselle. I am the person you suppose," said the masked horseman, addressing her in French, and speaking with a marked and peculiar accent.

"Are you aware that you are in the presence of his Majesty?" pursued Louise.

"I am quite aware of it, mademoiselle," replied Duval, with profound deference.

"Then I presume that you do not design to rob me?" cried the King, with a half laugh.

"Pardon me, sire; I have that intention," rejoined Duval. "I should be wanting to myself, if I allowed the opportunity of crowning my reputation to escape me."

The assurance with which this was uttered made the King laugh heartily.

"Oddfish!" he exclaimed; "this is a novel adventure."

"Let me give him my purse, sire," said Louise, detaching an embroidered velvet escarcelle from her girdle.

"Mademoiselle, I must have something from the King himself," observed Claude Duval. "The diamond buckle from his Majesty's hat, or a ring, will perfectly content me."

"Parbleu! you are excessively moderate in your demand," cried Charles, still laughing. "But before I give you aught, you must unmask."

"Your Majesty must be pleased to excuse me," rejoined Duval. "Out of consideration for Mademoiselle de Quérouralle, I cannot remove my mask. My aspect would horrify her. Besides, I have a vow that hinders me."

"Let him have the ring, I entreat you, sire," cried Louise. "I begin to feel afraid."

"Fear no maladresse on my part, mademoiselle," said Duval. "It is true that I have companions in this wood, but I should never dream of summoning them."

"'Twould be a pity to disappoint so polite a gentleman," observed Charles. "Give him the ring if you will," he added, presenting it to Louise.

Opening her escarcelle, she dropped the ring into it, and gave the little bag to Duval, who received it with a graceful bow.

"Grammery, sire!" he cried. "I would rather have this than a thousand pounds."

"I challenge you to wear it in my presence," said the King.

"I accept the challenge, sire," replied Duval. "You shall behold it on my finger."

"I know not if this is meant as a frolic, sir," said Charles, amazed at the other's audacity. "If so, it may cost you dear. I shall order instant pursuit; and if captured, you will assuredly be hanged."

"I must take my chance, sire!" rejoined Duval. "But I do not think I shall be captured. I have the honour to salute your Majesty."

Bowing profoundly, he galloped off.

He had not disappeared, when another horseman entered the copse from behind.

It proved to be Talbot Harland, and the King hallooted to him to come on.

"What think you has happened?" cried Charles. "Nay, you will never guess. I have been robbed."

"Robbed, give?" echoed Talbot, in astonishment.

"Robbed of a ruby ring by Claude Duval."

"Tis he who has just ridden off. Pursue him!"

"I will follow him to the death," cried Talbot.

And clapping spurs to his steed, he dashed off in the direction taken by Duval.

"If Bellegarde had not been at Dover, I should have thought that this was he," cried Charles.

XXII.

THE PURSUIT.

THE oak copse in which the incident just described took place, was situated at the outskirts of Knole Park.

As Talbot burst from the wood, he descried Duval, who was not more than a couple of hundred yards off, evidently making towards the park pales, and he shouted to him to stop, though with little expectation of his compliance.

Duval neither looked back, nor quickened his pace; but in another moment jumped the palings, and disappeared.

Talbot followed without hesitation, being luckily mounted on one of Lord Buckhurst's best hunters; but on landing on the other side of the pales, he could see nothing of the flying robber.

However, a countryman, whom he espied, called out that "t'other gentleman" had ridden down the hill, and Talbot instantly took the course pointed out.

The gentle slope which he was descending was covered with fern, with hollies and broom scattered about, but at the bottom there was a thicket, in which he felt sure the robber had taken shelter.

In this he was mistaken. Duval had merely passed through the wood, and could be discerned mounting the opposite side of the glen. Apparently, he gave himself little concern about his pursuer, for he rode slowly up the ascent, and on gaining the summit, halted, and looked round, as if considering in what direction he should next shape his course.

Tunbridge was but seven miles distant, and he may have thought of proceeding thither; but, perhaps, some difficulties occurred to him, and he rode off towards Sandridge.

Meantime, Talbot had drawn nearer to him, and kept him full in view.

After reaching a narrow lane with high banks, in which, fortunately for the fugitive, no cart or other vehicle was encountered, they came upon an extensive heath; and here Talbot did his best to overtake the robber. But he soon found that his steed was no match, in point of swiftness, for that of Duval.

Hitherto, the robber had made no effort to escape; but he now careered across the common at a pace that would have soon carried him out of sight if he had maintained it; but he evidently enjoyed the chase, and had no wish to put an end to it.

He allowed his pursuer to come within bow-shot of him, and then started off again as swiftly as before.

Avoiding the little village of Sundridge, which lay towards the left, he rode on past River Haul, and soon reached the foot of Madam's Court Hill.

As yet, he had experienced no hindrance of any kind. The roads he had taken were unfrequented; and none of the few pedestrians he met ventured to stop him, though urged to do so by Talbot's vociferations. The sight of the pistols in Duval's holsters kept them at a respectful distance.

He now rode leisurely up Madam's Court Hill, from the summit of which a magnificent view over the wold of Kent is commanded, and was surveying the country, as if still undecided in which direction to shape his course, when three or four horsemen, apparently coming from Farnborough, were seen mounting the hill.

Not caring to meet them, he turned about, when he found that Talbot was nearer than he supposed—so near, indeed, that an encounter with him was inevitable.

Drawing his sword, Talbot spurred his horse towards the robber, shouting out to him to surrender himself a prisoner.

Duval quietly awaited the charge; and when his antagonist was within three or four yards of him, fired, and horse and rider rolled to the ground. A bullet had pierced the poor animal's brain.

"Suivez moi, si vous pouvez, à Londres," cried Duval.

With these words, he dashed down the hill.

The horsemen who were mounting the ascent witnessed the encounter, and fancied that Talbot was shot; but ere they got up, the young man was on his legs.

Very little explanation was needed. The new-comers quite understood that it must be a highwayman who had fled, but they were all refused to go in pursuit of him. They thought the attempt too hazardous. The next shot might be for the rider—not for the horse.

"I call upon you in the King's name to assist me!" cried Talbot, authoritatively. "Refuse at your peril. I belong to his Majesty's household. I must have a horse from one of you."

"Take mine," cried a stout man, dismounting. "I am a butcher of Farnborough; Gideon Ewisket by name. I'll walk on to Sevenoaks. If my horse gets shot, like this poor beast, you'll have to pay twenty pounds for him."

Without more ado, Talbot sprang into the saddle which Gideon had just quitted, and bidding the others follow, rode down the hill.

If, with the best hunter in the Knole stables, he had failed to catch Duval, it did not seem very likely he would be able to overtake him now with the sorry steed he had acquired; but he determined to do his best.

Much time had been lost, and Duval had disappeared. But, from the brow of the hill, Talbot had seen him strike off towards Otford, and he and his companions were about to take the same course, when they heard the trampling of horses in the distance, and soon afterwards perceived a little troop galloping along the road from Sevenoaks.

Overjoyed at the sight, Talbot immediately halted.

The troop consisted of half-a-dozen grooms, headed by the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Feversham, who had been sent by the King in pursuit of the robber. They had ascertained that he had taken the London road.

Talbot was now furnished with an excellent horse by one of the grooms, and dispensed with the further services of the Farnborough men.

More time had been lost; but the troop galloped on to Otford, keeping a sharp lookout on the way.

At Otford, they learnt that Duval had crossed the downs; and as they mounted the lofty chalk ridge, a shepherd told them he had seen him pass, and that he could not be more than a mile ahead.

They heard of him again at Halstead and High Elms, and hoped soon to come up with him. At Farnborough, however, they missed him, and after some consultation, a division took place in the troop; Talbot, with two of the grooms, proceeding along a lane to Spington, while the others kept on the high road to Bromley.

Talbot had the best luck. As he and his attendants were proceeding along the beautiful valley of the Cray, they discovered the fugitive about a quarter of a mile off.

Whether he had strained his horse, or was resting him, Talbot could not tell; but he was proceeding very leisurely, and though apparently aware of the approach of his foe, did not attempt to accelerate his speed till they were within a hundred yards of him.

He then started off; and while they were making every effort to come up with him, wheeled round with such suddenness, that they could not check their headlong career, but flew past him. Before they could recover themselves and turn about, he had got to a considerable distance.

While he executed this clever manœuvre, the robber was unmasked, and Talbot obtained a distinct view of his features, which were decidedly English in expression. Moreover, his derisive laughter had a peculiarly English ring about it.

Any notions about the Count de Bellegarde, which the young man might have conceived, were effectually dissipated. The mysterious robber bore no resemblance whatever to the Count.

After galloping for nearly half a mile along the banks of the Cray, Duval cleared the little stream, and crossed the broad mead on the further side.

Talbot and his attendants followed; but they soon lost sight of him, and though they continued the chase for more than an hour, they never again got on the right track.

The two nobles were equally unsuccessful. They went on to Bromley, and then turning back, encountered Talbot. The Duke of Buckingham laughed heartily on hearing of Duval's escape.

"After all, I am glad the rascal got off," he said. "Since you have seen him without his mask, and affirm that he is not Bellegarde, my interest in the chase is over. Let us get back to Knols as fast as we can, and relieve Old Bowley's mind."

"Old Bowley would be more relieved in mind if we could have restored his ring," laughed Lord Feverham.

"And what will Buckhurst say, when he learns that his favourite hunter has been shot?" cried Talbot. "I shall not dare to face him."

"Poor Old Bowley must give him another horse," said Buckingham. "I'll add a few more couplets to my song, and put him in good humour."

The banquet was over when they got back to Knols.

"You have managed badly, to let this con-founder Claude Duval escape you," observed the King to Talbot; "and it is venacious that Buckhurst's horse should have been shot. But I am glad you have seen the robber without his mask."

"Do tell me what he is like?" cried Louise.

"That would be difficult," cried Talbot. "But he is not like the Count de Bellegarde."

XXIII.

THE COUNT DE BELLEGARDE RESTORES THE RING TO HIS MAJESTY.

NEXT morning, the Count de Bellegarde arrived from Dover, and immediately presented himself to the King, who was on the bowling-green, surrounded by his courtiers.

The Count did not seem at all fatigued by his journey; and, indeed, looked much better than the courtiers who had been spending the night in dancing and revelry. He gave his Majesty full particulars of the embarkation of the Duchess of Orleans, and delivered a message with which she had charged him.

"Have you no message for me?" asked Louise, who, hearing of the Count's arrival, had followed him to the bowling-green.

"Her Highness has sent you a little token, which I will deliver presently," replied Bellegarde. "But I have something more to relate to his Majesty."

"An adventure, I hope," observed Charles.

"Yes, sire; a very singular adventure. I have been stopped on the highway by a robber—by no other, in short, than Claude Duval."

At this announcement, the King expressed great surprise, and all the courtiers gathered round, to listen to the narration.

"I had dined at Canterbury, sire," commenced Bellegarde, with his customary vivacity,— "dined very well, I may remark, at the 'Fleur-de-Lys'—and was riding slowly across a wide common, about midway between the ancient city and Maidstone, when I perceived a dwarf-like man coming towards me. He was dressed in a scarlet riding-coat, and I might not have suspected him of any ill design, had I not observed that he was masked. I had sent on my servant to Maidstone, where I meant to sleep, so that I was unattended. However, this did not discompose me. I fancy myself a match for any robber."

"During this interruption, Count," said the Duke of Buckingham, who was among the auditors, "but about what time did this singular encounter take place?"

"About half-past eight, I imagine," replied

Bellegarde. "It was just beginning to get dusk. Having found an excellent bottle of Bordeaux at the 'Fleur-de-Lys,' I had stopped to finish it, and was, therefore, in excellent cue for an adventure.

"My friend in the scarlet coat did not leave me long in doubt respecting his intentions. As he came up, pistol in hand, he shouted out, 'La bourse, ou la vie!' 'Aha, my friend!' I exclaimed; 'I thought I could not be mistaken! You are Monsieur Claude Duval.' 'At your service, Monsieur le Comte,' he replied, with perfect politeness. 'I have had a rare piece of luck to-day. I have had the honour of robbing his Majesty.' 'Sarpedieu! that will not pass with me, friend,' I cried, sceptically. 'I have heard of your exploits with certain Court dames, but you will permit me to doubt this assertion.' 'If I show you the ring that I took from his Majesty, it will perhaps convince you,' he rejoined. 'Let me see it,' I said.

"On this, he exhibited a ring, which I immediately recognised. My mind was made up in an instant. I am tolerably quick; and while he was thus occupied, I wrested the pistol from him, and held it to his head. 'You shall be robbed in your turn, coquin,' I cried. 'Give me the ring, or I will blow out your brains.' And he surrendered it with the best grace he could. 'You have another pistol in your holster,' I said. 'I must have it.' He seemed inclined to resist, but at last yielded up the weapon.

"Now, begone, rascal,' I cried; 'and thank your stars that you are allowed to escape with life.' 'A word before I go, Monsieur le Comte,' he cried. 'Is it your intention to restore the ring to his Majesty?' 'Parbleu! such is my design, rascal,' I exclaimed, affronted by the question. 'Then be pleased to make his Majesty understand my inability to wear it in his presence, as I had engaged to do.' And he ran off, leaving me to pursue my journey."

The King and all the listeners laughed heartily at the recital.

"But where is the ring, Count?" inquired Charles.

Bellegarde took off his glove; and drawing the ring from his finger, presented it, with a low bow, to the King.

"Oddfish! an excellent conclusion to the story," cried Charles. "You have done better than those who went in pursuit of the robber."

"Far better!" cried Talbot. "The glory is the Count's—the trouble has been ours."

"And the loss mine," observed Lord Buckhurst, thinking of his hunter.

"Well, this Duval is an amusing rascal," cried the King. "But I hope we shall hear no more of him. And now for a game at bowls."

XXIV.

LOUISE GIVES THE COUNT ADVICE.

THE festivities at Knole were continued for two days longer; and, during this interval, Talbot's jealousy was excited by the attentions paid by Bellegarde to Dorinda.

As we have already remarked, the Count had a fascination of manner that few women could resist, and Dorinda began now to experience its influence. He made himself so exceedingly agreeable, told her so many droll stories, and amused her in so many ways, that the minutes seemed tedious without him. He was ever in attendance upon her, when she rode out in the park; took part in any pastime in which she engaged, and danced with her at the evening revels.

Whether he was really as much smitten as he appeared, we will not pretend to say; but Talbot began to look upon him as a very dangerous rival, and determined to pick another quarrel with him on the slightest pretext, and on the earliest possible occasion that presented itself.

Meantime, the foolish young fellow had become sullen in his deportment towards Dorinda, and, by such absurd conduct, naturally incurred her displeasure.

To punish him for his folly, she would not dance with him; and when he saw Bellegarde carry her off in triumph to the cushion-dance, which was danced every night in the Brown Gallery, he was ready to explode with jealous rage.

As may readily be supposed, his anger did not cause the Count to discontinue his attentions to the fair one. However, Louise thought proper to give her cousin some advice.

"I must take you to task, Achille," she said. "You are persuading this charming girl that you are very much in love with her, while I know you are only amusing yourself at her expense. And you are tormenting that poor Talbot out of his life, because he is foolish enough to show that he is jealous. Now he is really attached to the girl, and is far more deserving of her than you are, even if your intentions were serious, which I am sure they are not, and I therefore insist upon your ceasing to interfere with him. If you were to cause a capture between them, I should never forgive you. There are many Court dames to whom your attentions would be agreeable, and whose husbands would not quarrel with you; and I would recommend you to confine yourself to them."

"This lecture comes very well from you, fair cousin," replied Bellegarde, laughing; "and I should endeavour to profit by it, if I thought it in the least called for. But you seem to be far better acquainted with my sentiments than I am myself. Till this moment, I imagined I was really enamoured of Dorinda Neville; and though my merits may be inferior to those of Talbot Harland, yet if she prefers me to him, I shall be content. I do not feel bound to make any sacrifice to a rival."

"I hope you will reflect upon what I have said, Achille," observed Louise, gravely. "You are wholly unfitted for marriage, and I could not wish Dorinda a greater misfortune than to be united to you!"

"I am obliged by your good opinion of me, fair cousin," rejoined Bellegarde; "and I have no doubt you have formed a correct estimate of my qualifications for matrimony. Before taking such a decided step, I shall make a point of consulting you."

"Can you be serious for a moment, Achille?"

"I am perfectly serious, now."

"Then, be advised by me, and desist from this pursuit, or you will infallibly incur the King's displeasure."

"I never was in greater favour with his Majesty than at the present moment," said Bellegarde.

"You are deceived," rejoined Louise, "Any further indiscretion on your part will be visited by banishment from Court. You have gone too far with your jests; and though the King is the easiest person living, there are limits even to his good nature."

"I will not affect to misunderstand your meaning, fair cousin, because I am aware you have got some absurd notions respecting me into your head; but since I have really done nothing to offend his Majesty, I am not in the least uneasy."

"You calculate on my protection in case of need, do you not?"

"Most certainly."

"Then do something to deserve it."

"You have only to command me, fair cousin. What am I to do?"

"Help me to get rid of an odious creature who troubles me. You recollect that fausse paysanne whose portrait was to have been painted by Lely? I suspect she is an actress. She has been here at Knole during your absence. She danced one night at the revel, in a Spanish costume; and though she was masked, I recognised her, and so did Sir Peter. I have some reason to believe she is here still."

"Here! in the house? I do not think that likely," rejoined Bellegarde.

"Here, or in the neighbourhood. She has been seen."

"By whom?" asked the Count, quickly.

"No matter by whom. You must have her removed."

"But I must first discover her," replied Bellegarde, laughing.

"That will not be a very difficult task to you," said Louise; "and I beg you will set about it without delay."

"Well, I will do my best," he replied.

"Do not play me false in the matter, Achille, or—but I won't threaten. This girl must not cross my path."

"She shall not, if I can prevent it," said Bellegarde.

"And I know you have the power," she rejoined.

The foregoing conversation took place in the garden, and at its close they separated.

XXV.

BELLEGARDE AND TALBOT HARLAND ARE BANISHED FROM COURT.

IN spite of the counsel given him by Louise, the Count continued his attentions to Dorinda.

There was hawking that morning in the park, and most of the Court dames rode out to witness the sport. Amongst them was Dorinda. Bellegarde was constantly by her side; but Talbot never once came near her.

If the fickle dandel secretly pitied her wretched lover, her looks did not betray the state of her feelings, for she seemed in high spirits, and laughed immoderately at the Count's lively sallies.

On their return to the mansion, Bellegarde assisted her to alight, and was lingering within the inner quadrangle, when Talbot approached, and with forced politeness begged the favour of his company for a moment on the terrace.

"Willingly," replied Bellegarde, attending him. "I am afraid you did not enjoy the sport, yet it was excellent. Miss Neville was delighted."

"Enough, sir," interrupted Talbot, sternly.

"I did not bring you here to talk about hawking, but to tell you that your attentions to the young lady, whose name you have just mentioned, are disagreeable to me, and that I cannot permit them."

"On my faith, this is excessively amusing!" cried Bellegarde, laughing derisively. "I should really be very happy to oblige you, but as my attentions, though disagreeable to you, appear to be agreeable to the young lady, I propose to continue them, even at the hazard of giving you offence. I presume you have nothing further to say to me?"

"Yes, there must be another meeting between us."

"I should have thought that the first might have satisfied you," rejoined Bellegarde. "Wait till your arm is quite cured, and then we will talk about a second meeting."

"My arm is strong enough to chastise you, as you will find," cried Talbot, exasperated by the sneer. "I will force you to meet me, and that without delay. I gave you credit for more courage than you seem to possess."

"You have no right to call my courage in question, sir," said Bellegarde, with provoking calmness. "And I might fairly refuse your challenge. But since you are in the mood for fighting, I will not baulk you. We will settle the affair to-morrow morning, as early as you please, in a retired part of the park."

"Bo it so," cried Talbot. "I will come forth at six o'clock, with Lord Feversham. If you will take the trouble to follow, I will lead you to a convenient spot."

"I will not fail; and will bring the Duke of Buckingham with me," rejoined Bellegarde.

They formally saluted each other, and separated.

Bellegarde proceeded to the bowling-green, where he found Buckingham, and told him what had happened.

"I am not surprised," said the Duke, laughing; "for I remarked that Talbot was highly offended by your attentions to the charmer. I hope you don't mean to kill him."

"Kill him—no! But since he is resolved to make himself troublesome, I must keep him quiet."

"Well, you may count upon me," said the Duke. "But six o'clock is an early hour; I shall be roused out of my first sleep."

"Better not go to bed till we come back," observed the Count. "We will sit up at piquette, if your Grace thinks proper."

Whether Bellegarde's proposition was actually carried into effect we know not, but as the turret clock struck six next morn, he and the Duke issued forth from the gate-house.

Talbot and Lord Feversham were standing beneath the great yew-tree, and, on seeing them, bowed, and set off across the park. Bellegarde and Buckingham followed more slowly in the same direction.

Their proceedings were noticed by another person, who was out before them, and taking exercise in the park. Suspecting their object, this individual watched whither they were going.

It was a most lovely morning, and all nature seemed rejoicing in the sunshine. The rooks were clamouring amid the topmost branches of the trees; the smaller choristers were carolling blithely in the groves; the deer tripped across the wide lawns; and there was a freshness in the air that produced a most exhilarating effect on the spirits.

Even Buckingham, though rarely alive to the beauties of nature, was charmed by the lovely scene, and paused for a moment to gaze around.

"After all, there is some enjoyment in early rising, as Old Rowley has discovered," he exclaimed. "Methinks, I shall adopt his plan in future."

"Adopt mine, and sit up all night," said Bellegarde. "It comes to the same thing."

"You are the most extraordinary person I ever met with, Count!" cried Buckingham. "You never seem wearied, and your spirits never flag."

"Not often," rejoined Bellegarde. "But I have my moments of depression, like the rest. My gaiety is constitutional, and seldom deserts me. Things generally present themselves to me under an amusing aspect. As to bodily fatigue, I never feel it. But we must not loiter here. They are waiting for us."

They then pressed on towards a giant tree, beside which Talbot and the Earl had taken their stand.

Between this patriarch of the grove and the adjacent wood a clear space of green sward was left. No better spot could have been selected for the purpose.

Courteous salutations were exchanged between the principals in the affair.

They then took their places, drew their swords, and saluted each other for the second time.

The assault had just commenced—furiously on the part of Talbot, cautiously on that of the Count—when a loud, authoritative voice commanded them to hold.

But as, in spite of the order, they continued to exchange passes, Buckingham rushed between them with his drawn rapier, exclaiming, "Are you mad? It is the King!"

On this, they immediately sheathed their swords, and bowed deferentially to Charles, who was standing beside the old tree, looking very angry.

"Soh, gentlemen," he cried, furiously, "you dare to continue the combat when I command you to stop! I will teach you the respect you owe me."

"Down on your knees," whispered Buckingham to the combatants. "You have greatly offended him."

Acting on the hint, they flung themselves at the King's feet.

Charles, however, was not to be appeased.

Regarding them sternly, he said, "I am determined to put a stop to these perpetual duels about trifles among those belonging to the Court. Every day some foolish quarrel is settled with the sword. An example must be made. You are both banished from my presence."

"Banished!" cried Talbot, starting to his feet. "I had as lief your Majesty doomed me to death, as banish me from Court."

"You are thinking of Dorinda Neville," observed Charles.

"The punishment is too severe for so light an offence, sire," said Bellegarde.

"The offence is not light," rejoined the King. "The sentence is pronounced. I am inflexible."

And he strode away.

BOOK THE SECOND.

THE COURT AT WHITEHALL.

I.

TYBURN

A profoundly dark night, some months after the events previously narrated, a little troop of well-mounted horsemen, headed by a powerfully-built individual, who was no other than the redoubted Colonel Blood, rode across Hyde Park, and shaping their course towards the bare, howl field, which then, and for more than a century afterwards, was set apart as the place of public execution, drew up beside the Tyburn Tree.

This fatal tree, which, with grim jocularity, was said to bear fruit all the year round, was a huge triangular frame of wood, having strong cross-beams, supported by tall posts.

To those beams the carcasses of Cromwell, Bradshaw, and Ireton had been attached. Nine years before, on the anniversary of the execution of Charles I, the bodies of the chief regicides were exhumed, dragged on common hurdles to Tyburn, and, with every mark of indignity, hung to three corners of the gallows.

The night, as we have said, was pitch dark, and the ill-omened tree could scarcely be distinguished by the horsemen gathered around it.

Nevertheless, one of them, at the command of Blood, leapt from his steed, and with great agility climbed the gallows, and seated himself astride a cross-beam. He then called out that he was ready; whereupon Blood handed him a halter, which he fastened to the beam, testing its security by his own weight as he descended.

For some time, thunder had been growling in the distance; and at this moment a flash of lightning illuminated the strange scene, giving those assembled round the gallows a weird and fantastic appearance.

"A storm is at hand," cried Blood. "But I hope it will not burst before our work is done."

The hour of vengeance is at hand. Before midnight, my long-deferred project will be executed.

"Look down upon me, murdered brethren, and approve my act! When you were iniquitously put to death by the relentless Ormond I vowed that he should perish in like manner. Now I am about to keep my oath. To this tree, which from its dismal branches has borne the corpses of three Englishmen nobler by far than himself, I will hang the proud Duke—hang him till he is dead, and then your cries for vengeance shall cease.

"This night," he continued, "the proud Duke shall be sought for far and wide—sought for vainly; for none will seek him here, at Tyburn. But at dawn, to-morrow, those who pass by shall behold him hanging from this tree; with a scroll upon his breast, proclaiming that his death has been an act of retributive justice."

Again the lightning flashed, and showed that the speaker's hand was extended towards heaven, while his features were agitated by half-frenzied enthusiasm.

But he soon became calm, and addressed his companions in his usual deep, earnest tones.

"The deed we have sworn to accomplish is one of the most daring ever planned, and might well appal the stoutest heart; but the very boldness of the project will ensure its success, provided it be executed with vigour and despatch."

"Have no fear of us, Colonel," said Montalt,—it was he who had tied the halter to the gallows. "We have stood by you on many an occasion, and we shall not flinch now."

"You are all brave fellows, and as true as steel; that I know full well," said Blood. "But this is an enterprise of a different character from any you have yet undertaken, and demands activity as well as courage. We must pounce upon our prey like eagles."

THE ATTACK ON THE DUKE OF ORFOND. (See page 42.)

"We all know what we have got to do, Colonel," observed Mandeville. "But it may be well to repeat your orders."

"You are aware that the Duke of Ormond, whose destination I have sworn, is feasting this day in the City. After the banquet, which is the last he will partake of, it is certain that his Grace will drive back to Clarendon House, in Piccadilly; but it is equally certain he will never arrive there, for before he reaches his princely mansion, we will force him from his gilded coach, in which he may be dreaming of fresh triumphs, and bear him hither to his fate. I myself will be his executioner; and he shall find that I can play the part as skilfully as his Dublin hangman."

And he laughed fiercely at the thought.

"You have told us how we are to capture the Duke, Colonel; but not how we are to bring him hither!" said Floodard.

"He shall ride behind me," rejoined Blood; "bound to me by this broad belt. My horse is strong enough to carry double."

"And now, let us about it. A deed shall be done this night that shall fill all London with consternation on the morrow, and make the King himself tremble in his palace!"

A roll of thunder formed a fitting accompaniment to their departure on their fearful errand.

II.

THE ATTACK ON THE DUKE OF ORMOND.

They galloped down Park Lane, which then answered to its name; but slackened their pace as they approached Piccadilly. Few were in the street at that hour; and the night suited their fell purpose.

When close to Clarendon House, which occupied a splendid position, almost facing the upper end of St. James's Street, Blood posted his men at various points, and stationed himself at the corner of the street, ready to give the signal of the Duke of Ormond's approach.

Clarendon House, which, at the period of our story, was in possession of the Duke of Ormond, was built by the great Lord Chancellor Clarendon in his palmy days of power, and was accounted one of the most magnificent structures in London.

The dear old gossip, Peggys, who surveyed it when near its completion, described it as "the finest pile I ever did see in my life, and will be a glorious home." A glorious home it was, though Evelyn says "it had many defects as to the architecture;" but he adds "it was planned most gracefully."

The situation, indeed, was splendid, and the proud, palatial pile overlooked all the meaner edifices around it. Its internal arrangements and decorations corresponded with the magnificent exterior. No palace could be more sumptuous. It had vast suites of apartments, richly furnished, and boasted a picture-gallery filled with portraits. Extensive gardens surrounded it. But the splendour of his mansion contributed to Clarendon's downfall. Its enormous cost was so far beyond his resources, that it was said he must have taken bribes from France to enable him to erect it. Another circumstance, regarded with general displeasure, was that the mansion was built with the ruins of St. Paul's Cathedral, after the destruction of the ancient fabric by the great fire of London. Clarendon did not long enjoy his splendid residence. His swelling pride was reduced.

After his disgrace and exile, it was purchased by Monk, Duke of Albemarle, and on the death of the latter, by the Duke of Ormond, of whom we must now say a few words.

No one had been a more faithful adherent of Charles—no one had made greater sacrifices for his Sovereign, than James Butler, Duke of Ormond. Refusing all Cromwell's conditions, he followed the fugitive Prince to France, and remained with him till the Restoration. He was appointed Grand Steward of the Household, and First Lord of the Bedchamber. As Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, he discharged the important office with seal and ability; but his incorruptible honesty made him many enemies, chief among whom was Buckingham; and they eventually succeeded in procuring his recall.

It was during Ormond's government in Ireland that the events occurred that led to Blood's atrocious design against the Duke's life. A formidable plot had been hatched in Dublin by a few hundreds of desperate individuals, at whose head was Blood, to surprise the Castle, plunder the magazines of arms, put the Lord-Lieutenant to death, assume the government of the country, and proclaim war against England.

The plot was discovered in time to prevent an outbreak. The ringleaders, with the exception of Blood, were taken and hanged. Vindictive and resolute, Blood solemnly vowed to avenge his friends upon Ormond, and we have seen that he meant to keep his oath.

Born in 1610, the Duke of Ormond was now just sixty; but he bore his years extremely well. He was graceful in appearance, and dignified in manner. His morals were irreproachable; and this drew upon him the sneers of the profligate courtiers. The Duke kept a noble table, and maintained a princely establishment at Clarendon House.

On the night in question, Ormond was returning from the City, where he had assisted at a splendid banquet given to the young Prince of Orange by the Goldsmiths' Company. Little did he dream of the ambuscade that was laid for him. Pleasant thoughts occupied his mind.

He had driven slowly along Pall Mall, and still more slowly up St. James's Street. Two footmen, in gorgeous liveries, walked beside the carriage. Before he had reached the top of the street he had fallen into a doze; but he was rudely awakened by strange and alarming sounds.

Just as the carriage turned the corner of Piccadilly, it was beset by several men on horseback, who appeared, to the terrified attendants, to rush upon them from all quarters.

The leader of the attack ordered the coachman to stop; but as the unfortunate man, though much frightened, tried to whip on his horses, he was instantly shot through the head, and dropped from the box. The panic-stricken footmen offered no resistance.

By this time, Blood had sprung from his horse, and forcing open the door of the carriage, ordered the Duke, in a peremptory voice, to alight.

Ormond, however, refused, and endeavoured to defend himself; but Blood seized him by the throat, and dragged him forth.

"Would you assassinate me, villain?" cried the Duke, who was half-strangled.

"Your Grace's sole chance of safety lies in keeping quiet," said Blood. "Attempt to give the alarm, and I will shoot you, as I have just shot your coachman."

Undeterred, however, by the menace, Ormond struggled to get free, and shouted out lustily for help, but none came. Nor did the footmen even attempt to assist him.

But moments were precious to Blood. As he had explained to his accomplices, the success of the daring exploit depended on despatch.

Committing the Duke to Montalt and Flood, who tied a handkerchief over his mouth to stifle his cries, the active ruffian again mounted his steed.

Despite his struggles, Ormond was then placed by main force behind his captor, and fastened to him by the belt.

In another moment, Blood was dashing off exultingly with his prey, while his companions followed as quickly as they could.

"Make for the place of rendezvous by different routes," he shouted to them.

While Blood, with the captive Duke, en croupe, was galloping along towards the corner of Hyde Park, shouts were heard in the rear, and he looked back to ascertain if pursuit had commenced; but, owing to the gloom, he could perceive nothing.

The movement he had made, however, enabled the Duke, whose hands were free, to pluck the handkerchief from his mouth, and being now able to speak, he asked his captor whither he was taking him.

"Your Grace will learn soon enough," rejoined Blood, gruffly. "But since you desire to know, I will tell you. I am taking you to Tyburn."

At these sinister words, a shiver ran through the Duke's frame.

Blood perceived it, and, with savage satisfaction hastened to add, "I am taking you to Tyburn, to hang you on the common gallows, as you hanged my brethren at Dublin."

"Ha! you were one of the traitors!" cried Ormond.

Blood took no notice of the remark, but said presently,—

"If you have any preparations to make, make them quickly. We have not far to go."

By this time, the other horsemen had disappeared, and finding they were alone, the Duke essayed to move his captor.

"Set me free, and I will make you wealthy," he said; "I swear it."

"If you would give me Clarendon House and all within it, I would not spare your life," rejoined Blood in an inexorable tone.

Thereupon the Duke remained silent.

While he was considering what he could do to effect his escape, the shouts behind them grew louder, and awakened hopes of deliverance in his breast.

"Hark!" he exclaimed; "help is at hand. I shall be rescued. You had better accept my offer. I will not break my word."

"Nor I mine," rejoined Blood sternly. "I have sworn to hang you."

So saying, he urged on his horse.

But he did not go far. The Duke put in practice the plan that he had conceived. Having got his right foot under the heel of his captor, he suddenly raised himself's leg, and exerting all his force, hurled him out of the saddle.

They both fell heavily to the ground.

Ormond was so shaken by the fall, that he could not move; but Blood, though by far the heavier man, was less hurt, and unfastening the belt, quickly scrambled to his feet.

Through the gloom, he could discern several persons hurrying to the spot, and scarce a moment was allowed to provide for his safety.

His well-trained horse had stopped a few yards off, and running towards him, he contrived to gain the saddle once more.

He then discharged a pistol—but luckily without effect—at the prostrate Duke, and, with a deep imprecation, rode off and eluded pursuit.

None of his accomplices were captured.

III.

THE EARL OF OSSORY.

THE daring outrage we have described filled the whole community with alarm and indignation.

The mysterious circumstances attending the attempt intensified the excitement occasioned by it. The halter was found attached to the gallows at Tyburn, proving beyond all doubt the real object of the Duke's assailants.

A proclamation was immediately issued, offering a reward of a thousand pounds for the discovery of the assassins; but it did not lead to their capture. It was thought they must be screened by some important personage; otherwise they must have fallen into the hands of justice. Suspicion fell on Buckingham, who was known to be Ormond's chief enemy.

The Duke of Ormond had received no serious injury, but he was confined to his room for a few days, and being unable to present himself at Whitehall, sent his eldest son, the Earl of Ossory—a gallant, but hot-tempered young noble—to thank his Majesty for his inquiries after him.

Ossory was admitted to the King's private cabinet, and having delivered his father's message, declared his conviction that Buckingham was the author of the attack. Charles endeavoured, but in vain, to convince him that his suspicions were groundless.

Unluckily, before the fiery young Earl had departed, Buckingham himself appeared. He could not help noticing Ossory's fierce looks, but with as much nonchalance as he could assume, he said to him, "How is the good Duke your father, my lord?"

"It will be small satisfaction, I apprehend, to your Grace, to learn that he has well-nigh recovered from the murderous attack made upon him by your bravos," rejoined Ossory, sternly.

"My bravos?" exclaimed the Duke.

"Your hired assassins, if you prefer the term," cried Ossory. "What I say to you, I have just said to his Majesty. I believe you to be the author of this detestable attack on my father's life. I believe you, also, to be capable of making another attempt, since the first has failed; and I therefore warn you that if any harm shall henceforth befall him—if, by open violence, or secret, subtle means, by poison or by steel, my father shall be done to death—I will hold you responsible. I will treat you as the assassin. I will take the law into my own hands. I will shoot you, even if you should take refuge behind his Majesty's chair."

And he clutched the handle of his sword, as he uttered the menacing words.

"Must I endure the ravings of this madman, sire?" demanded Buckingham.

"My lord," said the King, gravely, to Ossory, "I can make every allowance for your excited feelings, but language such as this must not be held in my presence. You have no proof whatever of the charges you prefer against his Grace of Buckingham."

"Proof will be forthcoming, sire," replied the young man.

"Till then, be silent," said the King, with dignity.

"My accusations are made to his Grace's face, not behind his back!" cried Ossory.

"I wish to heaven the villains had hanged your father!" said Buckingham, losing all control of himself. "It would have been a good riddance—you may tell him so."

"I will not fail to convey to him your Grace's approval of the infamous deed. He will know what to think of it," rejoined Ossory. "Meantime, I retract nothing, and repeat my warning."

And, with a profound reverence to the King, and a scornful and defiant look at Buckingham, he withdrew.

"I will wash out these insults in his blood!" cried the Duke.

"I forbid you to follow him!" said Charles, authoritatively. "I will send you to the Tower, rather than you shall fight him. A duel with Ossory would not clear you from suspicion. Were he to fall by your hand, people would say you had positively murdered him."

"Does your Majesty really believe I have had any hand in this untoward affair?" said the Duke, suppressing his rage by a great effort.

"I don't know what to think," rejoined Charles. "Rightly or wrongly, you have got all the opprobrium of the deed. They say you shelter the assassins, and keep them out of the way, lest they should betray you. Have you any idea who was the leader of the attack?"

"How should I, sire?"

"I am sure I have seen him," said Charles.

And he proceeded to relate to the Duke the mysterious incident that had occurred at Knole.

"I believe my nocturnal visitor to be the man," he added, in conclusion.

"Your Majesty is right," cried Buckingham.

"Tis he, beyond a doubt. He has not paid you a second visit, I presume?"

"No; but I feel certain I shall see him again ere long. He has been here."

"At night, sire?"

"No; in broad daylight. One morning, about three weeks ago, I heard his voice in the ante-chamber. He was conversing with you."

"With me, sire?" exclaimed the Duke, in some confusion.

"The door happened to be partly open; you were speaking to some one within; and the voice of your interlocutor was that of my mysterious visitant. I knew it at once."

"You say this occurred about three weeks ago, sire. I am surprised you did not mention the circumstance to me at the time."

"I should have mentioned it, had you come in. But you left with the person in question."

"This is strange!" cried the Duke. "Who could it be?"

"He had a deep voice," observed the King.

"That does not help me, sire; deep voices are not uncommon. Did you hear aught that was said?"

"I only remarked that you spoke impatiently to him."

"That's not singular. I am always impatient when troubled, and I am constantly troubled in the ante-chamber. But your Majesty says I left with him?"

"I thought so," replied the King. "Come, come! you know more about this mysterious individual than you care to confess. If a secret society really exists—as would appear from what has just happened to Ormond—and if this man is the leader, we ought to be able to lay hands upon him. I myself am not safe."

He can as easily penetrate to my chamber at Whitehall, as to that at Knole."

"I will answer for your Majesty's safety," replied the Duke. "This man shall be found; but I cannot deliver him up to justice. If we crush him, we shall bring the whole harnet's nest upon us. Better make terms with him; he may prove useful."

"You have found him so," observed the King, drily.

"And so may your Majesty," rejoined Buckingham. "But let us change the theme. I have just seen the Duchess of Cleveland. Her Grace is furious at the honours your Majesty has just conferred on Mademoiselle de Quérionalle. At first she refused to believe me, but I told her it was perfectly true, and that her rival had been created by letters patent Baroness of Petersfield, Countess of Farnham, and Duchess of Portsmouth."

"You might have added, that equal honours have been conferred upon her by Louis XIV, who has just created her Duchess of Aubigné," observed Charles, laughing.

"I did not neglect to mention that fact, sire; and I was malicious enough to add that the Duchess of Portsmouth's pension will exceed her own. When I told her this, I thought she would have gone mad with rage. There was nothing spiteful that she did not say of your Majesty. She vowed she would never see you again, but would leave Whitehall for ever."

"Would to heaven she would keep her word!" exclaimed the King.

"I applauded her resolution," said the Duke. "But she then changed her note, and declared she would stay to plague you and her rival."

"I thought she would not be got rid of so easily," observed the King. "Well, let her stay: her malice is impotent."

"Not so impotent as your Majesty imagines. A woman can always make mischief."

"Oddfash! that's true enough," said the King. "I have had some experience of the dear Duchess's talent in that line. But there is no State Council to-day. Come with me to the Duchess of Portsmouth's apartments. You shall see how she bears her new honours."

"I was about to solicit permission to attend your Majesty," rejoined the Duke. "I am eager to pay my devoirs to her Grace."

With this, they quitted the cabinet by a private door, and proceeded along a narrow passage, used only by the King, to the Stone Gallery.

IV.

WHITEHALL.

THE Palace of Whitehall, in the time of Charles the Second, though not very magnificent, was of immense extent. Having no pretensions to uniformity of design, it looked like a collection of buildings of various sizes, rather than a single edifice; and such, indeed, would be the most correct description that could be given of it.

Portions had been rebuilt, and constant additions made, without reference to any particular plan. In spite of all this, it was one of those old, rambling, extraordinary piles, that are infinitely more agreeable to inhabit than a palace designed according to the strictest rule of art, and reared on the grandest scale, like Versailles.

Vast as it was, and containing endless apartments, Whitehall in the days of the Merry Monarch, whose aim was to have the gayest Court in Europe, was very much overcrowded.

Everybody connected with the Court, from the highest officers to those of the most inferior grade, had lodgings in the palace. The Lord Chamberlain, the Vice-Chamberlain, the Master of the Horse, the Gentlemen Ushers, the Grooms of the Privy Chamber, pages, purveyors, clerks, yeomen of the guard, the watermen belonging to the royal barges, footmen that might be counted by the hundred,—all were housed there.

Her Majesty the Queen had separate rooms, and a separate establishment of her own, religious as well as civil—the former comprising a grand almoner, three almoners, her confessor, two Portuguese preachers, six Benedictines, eleven Franciscan friars, and the musicians belonging to her chapel. All these, as well as her numerous household, inhabited the palace. The ladies of the bedchamber and the maids of honour likewise had rooms there.

Separated from the main body of the palace by a large court, though connected with it by a line of buildings, was the great banqueting-house, built by Inigo Jones, from a window of which the ill-fated Charles the First went forth to die. Hereabouts, was the Privy Garden, which was charmingly laid out in trim parterres in the French taste, and adorned with numerous statues in bronze and marble. In the midst was a curious dial.

Divided from the garden by a shady walk was the bowling green, where Charles recreated himself daily. A private passage, contained within one of the gateways, built by Holbein in the time of Henry VIII, communicated with the tennis court and royal cock-pit.

In our hasty survey of the palace, we have said nothing of the domestic offices. As will easily be imagined, with such an enormous establishment to provide for, these were immense.

Where feasting was going on continually, many kitchens and many cooks were needed. There were flesh larders and fish larders, a great buttery, a confectionary, wine cellars and beer cellars, coach houses, and stables that held five score horses. Imagine the din and confusion occasioned by such a host of servants.

Many of the saloons and halls within the palace were sumptuously furnished; but the King's apartments were less splendid than those of his favourites. A great patron of the arts, as is well known, Charles the First had made an admirable collection of pictures; and though some of these were lost, the chief part had been recovered, and now adorned the walls of the great gallery.

Viewed from the river, whence it was seen to the greatest advantage, Whitehall, from its irregularity of outline, presented a very picturesque appearance. Though wanting in elevation, and having many architectural defects, unquestionably it was the pleasantest of royal residences, as its master, who knew better than any other monarch how to enjoy himself, perfectly understood.

The Stone Gallery, which the King and Buckingham had just entered, was of great length and ran along the whole north side of the palace. It overlooked the Privy Gardens, the two splendid Holbein Gates, and the Horse Guards.

This magnificent gallery, as we have incidentally remarked, was hung with fine pictures, and embellished with bronzes and statues.

On the left were several doors, communicating with various apartments; and on this side, also, was a smaller gallery, leading to the rooms appropriated to the Maids of Honour. At the entrance to the lesser gallery, two grooms of the chamber and an usher were stationed.

The grand gallery was thronged at the time with gaily attired courtiers, all of whom were amusing themselves in different ways: some were collected round a banquet-table, on which a great heap of gold was piled; others were playing at cards; some were recounting their amorous adventures; while others were confiding billets-doux to the pages to deliver to their mistresses.

Jests and laughter resounded on all sides; nor did the merry groups become silent, or the gamblers disturb themselves from their play, on the appearance of the King and Buckingham. They knew the easy nature of the monarch too well, and presumed upon it.

Those, however, near whom the King passed, or whom his eye alighted upon, bowed reverently.

While the King was glancing around, his attention was attracted to a young gallant, who was talking to a page, and giving him a billet. This gallant turned away quickly, but not so quickly as to prevent Charles from discovering that it was Talbot Harland, whose sentence of banishment from Court he had not yet remitted.

His Majesty did not appear to notice the offender, but calling the page to him, took the note, and, finding it addressed to Miss Neville, went on.

Arrived at the corridor leading, as we have said, to the apartments of the Maids of Honour, Charles and the Duke entered it, and had not gone far when the King stopped, and tapped at a door, which was instantly opened by a chambermaid.

"Tell Miss Neville that Old Rowley has brought a note for her," said Charles.

On hearing his Majesty's voice, Dorinda, who was in an inner room, immediately came forth. Her confusion was very great, when she received the note, and saw from whom it came.

"Read it!" cried the King, feigning displeasure; "and tell me what it contains."

Dorinda was so agitated that she could not make out a word.

"Give it me," said Charles.

"Oh, no, no, sire!" she cried, with increased alarm. "Mr. Harland entreats me to obtain for him your Majesty's forgiveness, that is all. Pray pardon him, sire. The fault was mine, not his."

"I cannot pardon him, without pardoning Bellegarde," said the King.

"Then pardon both, sire," she cried.

"Hum!" exclaimed Charles; "you know how to communicate with your lover, I am sure. I left him in the Stone Gallery. Send him presently to the Duchess of Portsmouth's apartments, whither I am going. I will then hear what he has to say, and decide."

"I thank your Majesty in advance," cried Dorinda, with a look of profound gratitude.

V.

THE DUCHESS OF PORTSMOUTH'S BOUDOIR.

THE Duchess of Portsmouth's apartments were situated at the end of the gallery, and the windows looked upon the Thames.

They were the most charming rooms in the palace, and had been recently fitted up in a superb manner by the King. In the ante-chamber were Chiffinch and three or four pages.

As Charles and Buckingham entered, the tinkling of a guitar from within caught their ears while a very agreeable voice began to sing a French love ditty.

"Who is with the Duchess?" inquired the King, of Chiffinch.

"A French minstrel, sire," was the discreet valet's reply.

"'Tis Bellegarde, I'll be sworn," cried Buckingham.

"Oddsfish! it sounds like his voice," observed the King. "We will see."

And preventing Chiffinch from announcing him, he softly opened the door, and, raising the tapestry that masked it, looked in, while Buckingham peered over his shoulder.

A very charming picture was offered to their gaze.

The boudoir was most exquisitely furnished, and in the French style. Everything within it came from Paris, and many of the choicest articles, such as the massive silver sconces and braseros, the superb pendules, and the rich ornaments upon the chimney-piece, were presents from Louis XIV.

The walls were hung with Gobelin tapestry of marvellous beauty, representing hunting-scenes and views of Versailles and St. Germain. This tapestry was likewise the gift of the Grand Monarque.

Besides these, there were exquisite groups of figures, dainty baskets of the rarest porcelain, caskets encrusted with pearls, paintings by famous French artists, Japan cabinets, and screens.

Rose-coloured curtains subdued the light, while the atmosphere was redolent of perfume. The furniture consisted of small tables, canes, and fauteuils of the most graceful shape. Nothing, in short, was wanting that could add to the luxury of the room.

The beautiful Duchess, it appeared, had not quite completed her toilet.

Enveloped in a loose robe of sky-blue satin, embroidered with lace, which, while it concealed her figure, displayed the loveliest neck in the world, she was reclining in a fauteuil, with her feet—and what charming little feet they were!—upon a velvet tabouret.

Two French tirewomen, both young, pretty, and coquettish-looking, were employed in combing out her magnificent black tresses. Ever and anon she cast a glance at a small mirror, encircled by feathers, to see that they performed their task satisfactorily.

Two persons, besides her attendants, were with the Duchess at the time. One of these was Sir Peter Lely, who was seated near a little table, with a portfolio before him, in which he was sketching the charming group.

The other was rather a singular figure, and seemed fresh from a masquerade, for he was wrapped in a black domino, and his features were concealed by a mask. This masquerader it was who was playing upon the guitar, and singing the French love-song to the Duchess; and so captivating were his strains, that the susceptible tirewomen almost neglected their task to listen to him.

The spectators of this charming scene might have remained undiscovered for a few minutes, if two little long-eared spaniels had not leaped up from a cushion, and betrayed them by their bark.

As the King and Buckingham appeared, the masquerader immediately ceased his song, and rising from the sofa on which he was seated, retired behind one of the screens.

Charles took no notice of the movement; but addressing the Duchess, said, "I have brought the Duke of Buckingham to pay his devoirs to you."

"Charmed to see your Grace," she replied, extending her fair hand to the Duke, who pressed it very gallantly to his lips, and proceeded to congratulate her in the warmest terms on her newly-acquired dignity.

"His Majesty will tell you how delighted I am," he said. "You are now on a par with the envious Duchess of Cleveland, if you cannot take precedence of her."

The Duchess tossed her head with so much disdain, that she pulled the comb from the hands of one of the tirewomen.

"I will take precedence of her!" she exclaimed. "She has tried to humiliate me; now I will humiliate her."

This explosion called back the King, who was talking to Lely, and admiring his sketch.

"I must tell you how I am obeyed," he said, anxious to turn the conversation. "While passing through the Stone Gallery just now, I perceived Talbot Harland. Yes, he was there in defiance of my orders. How ought I to punish his disobedience?"

"I think he has been punished quite sufficiently," replied the Duchess. "Let me make his peace. I want to have poor Bellegarde back at Court. He is in despair at his long banishment, and will certainly return to France unless your Majesty relents. He is very much missed."

"By whom?" observed the King. "I have heard no one regret his absence. Have you?" he added, to Buckingham.

"Not I, sire," replied the Duke, taking the hint. "No one wants Bellegarde back. He was always winning our money, and not always winning it fairly; always getting into scrapes, and never getting creditably out of them; always boasting of his amours, though rarely successful; always relating tiresome stories, and never perceiving they were tiresome. I cannot deny that the fellow has some agreeable qualities; but, on the whole, we are better without him. I cannot vote for his recall."

"I should like to know what he has been doing during his exile?" remarked Charles.

"He has been following Rochester's example—amusing himself among the citizens, eating their dinners, and making love to their wives," replied the Duke. "Moreover, I hear he has been acting at the fairs as a saltimbanque and a charlatan, and I think it likely enough, for he has plenty of buffoonery."

"If I have not been misinformed, your Grace excelled in both characters, and made a vast deal of money by acting as a Jack-Pudding, and vending quack medicines," observed the Duchess of Portsmouth, rather sharply.

"Very true," rejoined Buckingham. "But, then, I sold my mithridate and galbanum to the Roundheads. Bellegarde, I fear, will only make money at the gaming-tables."

"I won't allow you to calumniate him any longer," said the Duchess. "Come forward, Achille, and confront your accuser."

On this, the masquerader threw off his domino and wizard, and prostrated himself before the King.

Charles bade him rise, in a good-humoured tone.

"Like Talbot Harland, you have not waited for my forgiveness before coming back, Count," he said. "Luckily, you have each a good friend at Court."

"I do not owe many thanks to the Duke of Buckingham, sire," said Bellegarde. "I did not think his Grace capable of such perfidy."

"Bah!" cried the King. "Buckingham was only jesting. We both knew you were present."

"To be sure we did," cried the Duke, laughing. "I will now make amends, and retract all I have just uttered. You are the most honourable player I know—lose your money without losing your temper, and win without being elated. No one gets out of a scrape more adroitly; no one boasts less of his galantries; no one tells a story more agreeably. Will this satisfy you?"

"Perfectly," replied Bellegarde.

"Let me add that all the courtiers will be enchanted to have you back."

At this juncture, Chiffinch entered, and ushered in Dorinda, who was followed by Talbot Harland.

The latter, however, did not venture beyond a step into the room, until encouraged by a gracious look from his Majesty. He then threw himself at the King's feet.

"Mr. Harland did not dare to present himself without me, sire," said Dorinda, in an impressive tone.

"You did quite right to accompany him," observed Charles. "It is entirely to your intercession that he owes my forgiveness. You must take care he does not offend in like manner again."

"He shall not fight another duel on my account, if I can help it, sire," said Dorinda.

VI.

ARCHIGÈNE, THE FORTUNE-TELLER.

WHILE this was passing, the Duchess of Portsmouth had retired into an inner room to finish her toilette; and when she reappeared, it was in the most charming costume imaginable, which had just arrived from Paris.

Lely was in raptures, and began a fresh sketch.

During her Grace's absence, chocolate was served by two valets in the royal livery.

It was quite evident, from the King's manner to Bellegarde, that the Count was completely restored to the royal favour. While sipping his chocolate, Charles questioned him about his recent adventures.

"There is some little truth in what the Duke of Buckingham has been saying about me, I must own," said the Count. "Since I have been banished from your Majesty's presence, I have been obliged to amuse myself in the best way I could, and have played several strange parts; among others, that of a fortune-teller.

"I took some lodgings near Spring Gardens; and announcing myself as the renowned Archigène de Luxembourg, Disseur de bonnes Aventures à Madame de Montespan, acquired immediate celebrity.

"Visits were paid me by most of the Court ladies. And as I was acquainted with many curious circumstances connected with them, I was able to tell their fortunes in a manner that convinced them that Archigène must be a veritable wizard.

"They all came to me in disguise; but I soon found them out, while not one of them recognised me in my flowing robe—adorned with mystical characters, tall, steeple-crowned hat, and huge green spectacles.

"I will betray no confidences; but I told a very distinguished lady, who visited me, that the highest honours would soon be bestowed upon her; and methinks my prediction has come to pass."

"Impossible you could have been the fortune-teller, Achille!" cried the Duchess of Portsmouth, laughing. "Why, he looked as old as Nostradamus."

"He was your Grace's humble servant, nevertheless," replied the Count.

"I may as well confess that I paid Archigène a visit," said Dorinda.

"You?" exclaimed Talbot.

"Yes. I went with my aunt, Lady Muskerrey. We were both completely disguised—"

"I defy Lady Muskerrey to disguise herself," cried Buckingham.

"Well, we were both dressed in close hoods and bands, like Puritan dames," replied Dorinda, "and were received by a pretty, dark-eyed page, who looked very much like a damsel in male attire, and were ushered into an inner room, where we found Archigène. His bent figure and his accents seemed to proclaim great age. My aunt first consulted him, and, after looking at her hand for a few minutes, he said, 'Your ladyship, I can see, is a widow; but you will have two more husbands, and will be married again before the year is out.'

"Her ladyship ought to have paid well for that prediction," observed the King, laughing. "A great silk purse full of gold was Archigène's reward, sire," said Bellegarde.

"Your fortune was told, of course?" cried Talbot.

"Certainly," rejoined Dorinda, "and a very nice fortune it will be, if it only comes true; but I am not going to reveal it, especially to you."

"And my lips are sealed," observed Bellegarde.

"Enough of this fortune-telling," said the Duchess. "Are you aware, Mr. Harland, that we are going to Newmarket? I am looking forward to it with delight. I have never seen an English horse-race."

"Tis the finest sight in the world, and Newmarket is the best race-course in England," cried Talbot.

"I promise your Grace excellent sport," said the King. "I mean to win some of my own horses, and so does the Duke of York."

"Let us make a match, sire," cried Buckingham. "Talbot Harland is fond of racing, and rides well. Bellegarde is a first-rate jockey, as you know. I will back my Barbary mare, Mab, against your famous black horse, Bosco. The race to be for a gold cup, to be given between us, and to belong to the rider of the winning horse. Bellegarde shall ride Bosco, and Talbot Harland shall ride Mab. Is it a match?"

"Tis a match," replied Charles. "How say you, messieurs? Will you ride the race?"

Both expressed their readiness.

"What shall be the value of the cup, sire?" said Buckingham.

"It must be worth a struggle," rejoined the King. "I will give three hundred guineas, if you will add the like sum."

"Agreed!" cried the Duke.

"Bravo!" exclaimed Bellegarde, enchanted. "A six-hundred-guinea cup will be well worth a struggle!"

"Oh, how I should like to see the race!" cried Dorinda.

"You will see it," replied the King. "Her Majesty is going to Newmarket."

"I am delighted to hear it, sire," she rejoined.

"And this will be a race worth seeing, for the horses are well matched," observed Buckingham.

The discourse was proceeding very merrily, when a noise was heard in the ante-chamber, and the last person expected, and the least desired, the Duchess of Cleveland, burst into the room.

Chiffinch vainly attempted to oppose her entrance.

VII.

THE RIVAL DUCHESS.

DUMAY was painted on every countenance except that of the Duchess of Portsmouth, who didn't seem at all embarrassed by the unlooked-for appearance of her rival.

Anticipating a scene, at which she did not choose to assist, Dorinda made her escape as quickly as she could, and flew to her own apartments.

Though disliking nothing so much as these scenes, to which he was not unfrequently subjected by the violence of the Duchess of Cleveland's temper, the King was powerless to prevent them.

He uttered an exclamation of annoyance, and shrugged his shoulders, but did not attempt to interfere. Bellegarde made a droll grimace, and exchanged a glance with Buckingham. Both were secretly amused by the incident.

The Duchess of Cleveland stood still, and after scornfully surveying the beautiful objects in the boudoir, exclaimed, in a sarcastic tone, 'Mighty fine, upon my word! I have no room to compare to it.'"

"I am glad your Grace admires my boudoir," rejoined the Duchess of Portsmouth, who had advanced to meet her. "It is his Majesty's taste—not mine."

"The French King's taste, you mean," rejoined the other, rudely. "His English Majesty has wretched taste in furniture—as in everything else."

"Not in everything," said the Duchess of Portsmouth. "Surely, in one particular instance, he may be complimented on his taste."

"If he ever possessed any, he has lost it," rejoined the Duchess of Cleveland.

How handsome they looked, those two imperious women, as they gazed at each other with flashing eyes and flushed cheeks.

But the Duchess of Portsmouth, though highly incensed, possessed most command over herself.

"I will not for a moment suppose that your Grace has come here to insult me," she said, with dignity, "though your manner might lead to such a construction."

"Insult you! no! I have come to offer you my congratulations, as in duty bound."

"You do me too much honour," rejoined the other, haughtily.

"Your Grace seems to forget that I am present," said the King, stepping forward, and addressing the Duchess of Cleveland.

"No wonder I should have overlooked your Majesty," she rejoined, without making him any reverence. "You are lost amid so many objects of attraction. I do not envy the Duchess of Portsmouth her charming boudoir, because I know she cannot enjoy it, since she has to tolerate the society of a royal master whom she dislikes—and deceives."

And she broke into a mocking laugh.

"Your Grace imagines that all women are made upon your own model," observed the Duchess of Portsmouth.

Her rival was about to make a sharp rejoinder, but the King interposed, exclaiming authoritatively to the Duchess of Cleveland—

"No more of this, madam. Comport yourself properly, or retire. You owe an apology to the Duchess of Portsmouth for this unwarrantable intrusion."

"I will make her none," cried the enraged dame, stamping her foot upon the floor. "And she may think herself fortunate that I do not dash in pieces some of her costly trinkets. Artful wretch! I should like to tear her eyes out."

"Protect me from this fury, sire," cried the Duchess of Portsmouth, with affected terror.

"Will you go, madam?" cried Charles.

"No!" replied the angry dame. "I have a great deal more to say to her; and may not have another opportunity. Not only has she rendered your Majesty supremely ridiculous to all your Court, but to your subjects. That a monarch who piques himself on his wit and cleverness, should become the dupe of a French intriguante, without any personal charms to recommend her, shows how well her plans have been laid."

"Oddfish" one would think I had never been duped before," remarked Charles. "At least, I have thrown off your fetters."

"To put on others far heavier," retorted the Duchess. "I daresay your new favourite will obtain you plenary indulgence from Rome for your numerous peccadilloes. She can do it, if she will."

"My Lord of Buckingham," said Charles, "be pleased to conduct the Duchess of Cleveland to her room. And let a guard be placed at the door."

"Am I to be made a prisoner in the palace?" she cried.

"Ay, till you come to your senses, and can handle your tongue," rejoined the King.

"I am the most injured woman in the kingdom, and all the world shall know it," she cried.

"All the world knows it already," said Buckingham, advancing to take her hand.

But she motioned him off with a proud gesture.

"I will put an end to this scene, if your Majesty will permit me," whispered Bellegarde to the King.

"For heaven's sake, do so!" replied Charles.

"You will earn my eternal gratitude."

Upon this, the Count stepped towards the impracticable Duchess, and said to her, in a significant tone, "Your Grace will remember paying a visit to Archigène, the French fortune-teller—"

"I remember nothing about it," she interrupted, haughtily.

"On that occasion," pursued the Count, calmly, "you dropped a letter, which came into my possession. Behold it. 'Tis from Jacob Hall, the rope-dancer. Shall I read it to his Majesty? It cannot fail to divert him. The rope-dancer writes a charming letter."

"Read it—read it!" cried Charles.

"Shall I, or will you go?" said Bellegarde, to the Duchess, who was thrown into great confusion.

With an exclamation of rage, she snatched the letter from him, and rushed out of the boudoir.

"It was not from Jacob Hall," said Bellegarde to the King; "but it answered the purpose."

"A capital ruse!" cried Charles, laughing.

VIII.

NEWMARKET IN CHARLES THE SECOND'S TIME.

BOTH Charles the Second and the Duke of York delighted in racing, and gave great encouragement to the sport. Charles built a palace at Newmarket, to which he repaired, with a portion of his Court, whenever a meeting took place, and there were several during the year.

The architect of the palace at Newmarket was the famous Sir Christopher Wren; but the edifice was never entirely completed during the monarch's life-time—probably, from want of funds.

Sir Christopher Wren, though so great a man, and so lofty in his designs, was short in stature. The King liked the palace very much but found the rooms too low, and complained of the fault to the architect. "The rooms are high enough for me, sire," said Wren.

"Possibly, Sir Christopher," replied the King. "But they are too low for me."

We are apt to imagine that we have attained the perfection of racing now-a-days, and that the sport was very imperfectly understood two centuries ago. No mistake could be greater. The racing then was excellent. The disreputable tricks that have brought the Turf into deserved disgrace were unknown. There was no systematic betting. No "books" were made. Blacklegs there might be, though not such a fraternity as now exists; and there was no noisy "ring." The jockeys rode to win; and owners did not bet against their horses. Racing, though in its infancy, was conducted as it ought to be, and was consequently a noble sport.

Nor has the breed of horses improved. In Charles's days, there were Arabs of unmixed blood, of wonderful swiftness and endurance, and incomparable jennets.

The Duke of York had a splendid stud, even better than the King.

His Majesty had arrived at his palace at Newmarket, with the Queen, her ladies, and a portion of his Court, and was favoured, as royal persons generally seem to be, with magnificent weather. Nothing could be in better order than the turf, and nowhere is there such turf as on the Newmarket race-course.

The first day's racing was excellent, and the Duchess of Portsmouth was delighted. The sight more than realized her warmest expectations.

After the racing, which occupied the whole of the afternoon, there were the usual festivities at the palace.

The match between the King and the Duke of Buckingham formed the great event of the second day, and as it had been much talked about, a considerable concourse was gathered together to witness it.

Country gentlemen rode over from their seats in the neighbouring counties of Suffolk and Norfolk. Others had come from Cambridge, Huntingdon, and Ely, and twenty other places.

The farmers and hinds flocked to Newmarket from the surrounding districts, with their wives and daughters, quite as much to stare at the King and the Court ladies as to see the race for the gold cup.

With most of the assemblage, high or low, the Duchess of Portsmouth was the chief object of attention; and when she appeared by the side of Charles, mounted on a sprightly jennet, and attired in a superb blue velvet riding-dress, laced with silver, she was generally admired, though she did not escape censure.

But here, as elsewhere, Dorinda Neville eclipsed all others.

The splendid train of Court dames and gallants, by which the King was attended, formed a charming picture—such as can never be seen again at Newmarket. The magnificent heath is still the same, but where are the lovely equestrians that graced it then? Where is the throng of handsome gallants, rustling in silk and velvet, that rode beside those fair dames, and diverted them with their jests? Where is the good-humoured monarch who headed them?

But hark! the bell rings. The race is about to be run.

No occasion to clear the course, for the crowd is not so great, after all. Many usages, now deemed indispensable, have not as yet been introduced, and when the horses make their appearance, their riders are on their backs.

Do not imagine for a moment that the riders are habited like jockeys of our own day. They wear Montero caps, and are attired in light and graceful riding-coats of velvet, differing, of course, in hue; Bellegarde's colour being green, and Talbot's blue.

Both horsemen look remarkably well, and ride up together to salute the King, and bow to the Queen, who is seated in a splendid calèche.

During this interval, the eyes of all the spectators are fixed upon them, and the capabilities of their horses eagerly canvassed.

Bosco, for many reasons, is the favourite, and, indeed, he deserves to be, for he is a splendid animal, in superb condition, with a coat shining like satin; but there are some who think the Barbary mare, who looks full of fire, has not a bad chance.

Badges are next bestowed on the riders. A green silk scarf, edged with gold, is placed over Bellegarde's shoulder by the Duchess of Portsmouth; while a scarf of white silk is bestowed on Talbot by Dorinda, who tells him to win.

Great is the excitement of the crowd during this performance.

Accompanied by the King and the Duke of York, Bellegarde now rides slowly along the course towards the starting-place, which is four miles off, while Talbot follows, accompanied by Buckingham.

Bosco maintains his prestige with the multitude; his action is magnificent. Very few fancy Mab. Yet she has her backers; notwithstanding.

After riding with Bellegarde for about a mile, Charles and the Duke of York return amid the acclamations of the spectators.

A tedious interval now occurs, though enlivened by many droll incidents; but at last the exhilarating shout is heard, "They are off!" And this is echoed by a thousand voices.

For some time they seem to move but slowly, and appear close together; but when they get within a mile or so of the goal, they begin to try the powers of their horses.

Bosco is now clearly ahead, and the shouting spectators declare that he has already won the race. His Majesty is of the same opinion, and smiles at the Duchess of Portland. Dorinda's beautiful lip quivers with excitement, her cheeks flush, and her heart throbs violently.

The horses came on at a tremendous pace—Bosco still ahead, but not increasing his distance. The mare keeps well up, and does not seem in the least distressed.

The King begins to feel a little nervous, for he notices a peculiar smile on Buckingham's countenance.

The spectators have now become half frantic with excitement. The air rings with their shouts. "Bosco! Bosco!" resounds on all sides.

Bellegarde feels perfectly secure, and casts a backward glance of triumph at Talbot.

But, at the moment, he perceives his danger, and for the first time begins to use whip and spur.

The mare is gaining upon him—is close at hand! They are neck and neck together!

The frenzy of the crowd increases! Already they have become hoarse with shouting!

"Mab wins!" is now heard; and the cry stimulates Talbot, while it slightly disheartens Bellegarde.

'Tis a capital race, and almost promises to be a dead heat.

They are now within a hundred yards of the goal, and the maddened crowd closes behind them, as they dash on with lightning-swiftness.

Nearer and nearer they come, and still they are neck and neck.

Excitement is now at its highest pitch, and pervades all the beholders—Court dames, Court gentlemen, all.

"The King wins!" cry a thousand voices. "No—the Duke!" respond a thousand others.

To the last moment, the issue of the race is uncertain. Even the Duke of York and Lord Buckhurst, who are stationed at the winning-post as judges, are puzzled.

But there is no doubt at the last. With a bound, the mare springs forward, and wins by a head.

A tremendous shout rends the air, and for a few minutes the most tumultuous excitement prevails.

"Odds-fish!" exclaimed the King, looking rather blank. "I did not think Bosco would have been beaten. I have lost a thousand pounds on the race."

"And I have won two thousand," cried Buckingham, exultingly. "I knew what Mab could do. Talbot Harland has ridden her splendidly. He richly deserves the cup."

Shortly afterwards, the two riders, who had just been contending together so gallantly, forced their way through the dense crowd to the royal party.

Talbot looked flushed with triumph; but Bellegarde, though pale, bore his defeat with perfect composure. Everybody congratulated Talbot on his achievement. But the congratulations he cared for most were those of Dorinda Neville.

The magnificent gold cup, which had been displayed on a stand to the admiring assemblage, was then formally delivered to the winner by the Duke of Buckingham, in his Majesty's name and his own: and this little ceremony concluded the business of the race.

IX.

• AFTER THE RACE.

Among the spectators were four well-mounted individuals, who had watched the race with the keenest interest, and had strenuously backed Bosco.

There was nothing particular in their attire to distinguish them from the crowd with whom they were mingled, but to judge from the appearance of their horses, they had come from a distance—possibly, from Peterborough, for they said something about that ancient city, whether with the design of misleading those who overheard them, we will not pretend to say. Their riding coats were of a russet hue, and had evidently seen some service. The leader of the party was strongly built, and rather better dressed than his associates, and appeared to lay some authority over them.

A look had passed between this person and Bellegarde, as the latter rode towards the starting-place, and that betokened the student horseman that all was right, and that Boco was sure to win. On this, he and his friends confidently backed the King's horse, and lost, amongst them, a considerable sum, that well-nigh emptied their pockets.

The voice of the stalwart horseman could be heard above the din of the crowd cheering on Boco, as the struggling racers rushed by; but how his countenance fell, and what a deep imprecation he uttered, when Bellegarde was beaten!

However, he soon recovered, and paid his losses with an air of unconcern. All four pushed forward amid the crowd to have a look at the cup, when it was delivered by Buckingham to Talbot, and its splendour increased their mortification.

"That cup ought to have been ours," whispered Montalt to his leader.

"It shall be ours yet," replied Colonel Blood, in the same tone.

And his greedy eyes followed the glittering prize as it was borne off to a place of safety by one of the royal servants.

Shortly afterwards, he contrived to get sufficiently near Bellegarde to exchange a word with him, and was told by the Count, in an undertone, that he would see him at night.

"I shall have something to say to you then," added Bellegarde, with a significant look.

"Relative to the cup?" asked Blood.

"Ay, ay," replied the Count, moving away.

Both riders of the race dined with his Majesty that day, and perhaps the gayest of the two was Bellegarde. Though rallied a good deal on his ill-luck by the Duchess of Portsmouth, next to whom he sat at table, he bore her raillery with the utmost good humour.

Naturally, Talbot was elated by his victory, and his satisfaction was heightened by the praises bestowed on his jockeyship by Dorinda. Had he dared do so, he would have offered her the rich prize he had won, and his hand along with it; but though the words were on his lips, they were never uttered.

After dinner, the Merry Monarch, as if to show that his defeat gave him little concern, tossed the winner of the cup, which was set upon the buffet with the other plates; and in reply, Talbot told his Majesty that, if he had not won a certain white coat, he should not have gained the prize. That caused him the victory. Dorinda blushed very much at this speech, but did not seem to be displeased by it.

However, being now even, this was the last evening at Newmarket for the royal party was about to return to Whitehall on the morrow. Indeed, the Duke of York, Buckingham, and several others had already taken their departure. Bellegarde had ascertained that Talbot Harland did not mean to sleep at Newmarket that night, but to proceed to Cambridge. On hearing of Talbot's intention, the King asked him what he meant to do with the cup.

"Take it with me, sire, of course," replied the young man. "I shall put it in a bag, and the postboy will carry it for me."

"But are you not afraid of being robbed?" observed the King. "There are some strange characters at Newmarket. I have not heard that Claude Duval has been seen in these parts—indeed, the rascal seems to have disappeared altogether—but there are others just as dangerous, and not so polite. I will have it packed up with the rest of the plate."

"I thank your Majesty; but I wish to show it to my uncle, Dr. Harland, the Master of Trinity."

"A la bonne heure!" cried Charles. "But I fancy Dr. Harland will not approve of your turning jockey."

"The cup will propitiate him, sire. If he is pleased with it, I shall present it to him. I am his favourite nephew."

"I understand," replied the King.

This conversation was overheard by Bellegarde, who was talking to the Duchess of Portsmouth at the time, but he did not appear to notice it.

"I have a long ride before me to-night," he said. "I have promised to meet the Duke of Buckingham to-morrow morning, at Whitehall."

"Graud dieu!" she exclaimed. "You are not going to ride to London to-night?"

"'Tis only sixty miles," he rejoined, with a laugh. "True, the roads are not very good; but that does not matter. I shall do it in less than six hours, even if I fall asleep in the saddle."

"What are you saying about falling asleep in the saddle?" inquired the King, turning towards them.

"The Count is about to ride to London to-night, sire," replied the Duchess.

"Oddish!" exclaimed Charles. "Then I should advise him to start without delay."

"I understand," said the Duchess to make no mention to your Majesty."

"But why should he start?" asked Charles.

"He has promised to meet the Duke of Buckingham to-morrow morning."

"There will be dancing presently—ombre and basset," said the Duchess "Great temptations; but I am not in luck to-day."

"Nay, follow your own inclinations," said the King. "Bon soir, et bon voyage!"

And with a profound reverence, Bellegarde departed.

X.

A RACE BY MOONLIGHT.

THE Count de Bellegarde must have been several miles on his way to London before Talbot Harland set out from Newmarket to Cambridge. A postboy accompanied him, carrying the gold cup, which had been carefully placed in a bag, slung from his shoulders.

It was a fine moonlight night, almost as bright as day, and Talbot promised himself a pleasant ride. He had no apprehension of danger, though he had pistols in his holsters.

The road to Cambridge lay along the wide heath, and followed the four-mile course over which he had ridden in the morning. How different were his present emotions from those which he had then experienced! He had then a desperate struggle before him, in which he might be defeated, and though full of ardour, and resolved, if possible, to win, fortune might not befriend him. Now his triumph was assured. Moreover, he had distinguished himself in the eyes of one whom it was his chief desire to please.

Full of these pleasant thoughts, he cantered along the elastic turf, closely followed by the postboy, who cracked his whip merrily, as if proud of the burden he bore. He, too, was in good spirits, for he had betted upon the mare, and had been promised a cup of strong Trinity ale when he arrived at Cambridge. We fancy he had emptied a horn of the like potent beverage before starting from Newmarket.

The wide heath, which had been covered in the morning with persons scampering over it in all directions, was now completely deserted. Only a solitary horseman could be descried, and he appeared to be travelling in the same direction as themselves, though he was more than half a mile ahead.

Very beautiful looked the broad expanse, bathed as it was in the moonbeams—more beautiful than when seen by the garish light of day. A moonlit heath is always a charming sight, but there was an inexpressible charm about Newmarket Heath on that lovely night. At least, Talbot Harland thought so.

Perfect stillness reigned around. A distant hum from the little town they had quitted alone reached the ear. But this sound soon ceased. Black shadows were thrown upon the turf, as the horsemen speeded over it. The air was cold, but its freshness calmed Talbot's excitement.

They were now about five miles from Newmarket, and within a mile of Bottisham, but had not yet reached the limits of the heath, when the cry of a screech-owl caught Talbot's ear, and startled him as well as the postboy.

They both looked round, expecting to see the ill-omened bird fly past, but could distinguish nothing. The cry, however, seemed to have alarmed the traveller, whom they had now nearly overtaken, for he halted, as if wishing to join them.

Next minute, the screech-owl's harsh voice was heard again; but this time the cry came from a different quarter. The invisible bird must have flown on.

All at once, the idea flashed upon Talbot that these cries were signals, and the correctness of the supposition was confirmed by the sudden appearance of three well-mounted horsemen, who emerged from a hollow near the road, where they had lain concealed.

Talbot instantly comprehended the peril in which he stood, and his alarm was shared by the postboy, who called out, "Robbers, sir, robbers! Turn back, and ride for your life!"

"Ride back to Newmarket, and leave me to deal with them," rejoined Talbot. "Ride as if the fiend were at your heels."

The postboy, who was thoroughly scared, needed no second bidding, but started off at once. He had not proceeded many yards, however, when he was stopped by two other horsemen, who burst upon him from behind some tall furze-bushes.

"Halt a minute, my lad," cried one of these men, in a jeering tone. "We have a few words to say to you. You appear to have something valuable in that bag slung from your shoulder. What is it?"

"Nothing but an old leather bottle, an' please your honour, not worth taking," rejoined the trembling postboy.

"We shall see that anon," said the other horseman, who was much more strongly-built than his companion, and wore a mask. "Deliver it up, sirrah, without delay!"

But, though greatly terrified, the postboy did not like to surrender the treasure. Retreating towards Talbot, who was now parlaying with the others, he called out lustily for help.

• EDITH EDWARDS SLAUGHTERED BY THE DUCHESSE. (See page 100.)

The traveller, who had preceded the young man across the heath, turned out to be the captain of the band.

He was masked, but, before he uttered a word, Talbot had recognised him. That slight, graceful figure, those gay habiliments, the black flowing peruke, the hat surrounded by white feathers, could belong to no other than the gallant Claude Duval.

Duval had lost none of his courtesy, and it was with marked politeness that he addressed the luckless young gentleman who had fallen into his hands. His accent, when he spoke, was as marked and peculiar as ever.

"Permit me to offer you my congratulations on your success to-day, Mr. Talbot Harland," he said. "I saw the race run, and can affirm that you rode admirably—far better than your opponent. Though the Count is my compatriot, and I would fain uphold him, truth compels me to declare that he is a very bad jockey. I think I could have beaten you, if I had been in his place."

"You think so?" cried Talbot, amused by this address.

"I flatter myself I could," rejoined Duval. "You may remember that I have beaten you on a former occasion."

"That was not exactly a race," observed Talbot. "You were riding, then, you know, for your life."

"Granted," said Duval. "Now give me a moment's attention. I have a proposition to make. Perhaps it may be agreeable to you to accept it. It is this. I know you have with you the gold cup which you won so cleverly this morning. I need not say that I could take it from you, if I chose. But I would rather win it fairly. We will have a race for it, if you please."

"A race!" exclaimed Talbot. "Faith! that is a novel idea."

"Novelty has always a charm," observed Duval. "If I am the winner, the cup will be mine, of course. If you are lucky for the second time, 'twill be yours absolutely. No one shall deprive you of it. I will answer for my comrades."

"We will answer for ourselves," interposed Blood. "Had I been consulted, I would not have recommended such a proposal; but, since it has been made by Captain Duval, we will all abide by it."

"We will," cried the others.

"How say you, sir?" cried Duval. "Is it to be a race? I hope you will not place me under the disagreeable necessity of—"

"I agree," said Talbot hastily. "Where is the trial to take place?"

"On the race-course," rejoined Duval. "We will ride thither at once. The distance to be one mile."

"A mile be it," said Talbot. "I am content."

A few words, in an undertone, then passed between Duval and Blood; and when their brief colloquy was over, the latter said to Talbot, "You are armed, sir; to prevent mischief, I must require you to deliver up your pistols to me."

The young man hesitated.

"Will you give me your word that you will not use them?" said Duval.

"I promise not to use them unless I am assailed," replied Talbot.

"Enough!" cried Duval. "Allons donc, messieurs!"

He then rode off in the direction of the race-course, and the whole troop followed, Talbot being so completely surrounded that escape would have been impossible even if he had meditated the attempt. Close behind him came the postboy, with a guard on either side.

Affairs having taken a very different turn from what he expected, this youth had long since ceased his clamour, and, indeed, was secretly delighted at the prospect of witnessing a very singular race. He would fain have conversed with his captors, but they returned no answer to his questions, and at last bade him hold his tongue.

Duval kept upon the turf, at some distance from the road. No travellers, however, were to be seen; nothing, in short, except a waggon from Bury St. Edmunds, toiling on its way to Cambridge. The waggoner stared at the troop as it went by, but did not stop.

Ere long, they reached the race-course, and entered it at the point from which Bellegarde and Talbot had started in the morning. But this was now destined to be the winning-post, and Blood stationed himself near it, with the postboy and his two guardians, while Duval and Talbot rode on, accompanied by Montalt and Flodoard.

As they proceeded, each rider for the cup carefully examined his adversary's horse, and the result of the scrutiny, on either side, was that they were fairly matched.

Montalt and Flodoard were of the same opinion, and thought it would be a good race. Both chargers were powerful, and well bred. Of their relative swiftness it was not easy to judge; that would be tested anon. In colour, the horses were scarcely distinguishable by that light; though Duval's was bright bay, and Talbot's sorrel.

When they had ridden a mile, as they judged, they came to a halt, and Duval proposed that Montalt should start them, to which the other agreed.

They then placed themselves without loss of time, and, the word being given, they dashed off together like arrows from a bow, making it evident from the outset that this would be no lingering race. Montalt and Flodour followed as they might; and though both spurred on their steeds, they were speedily left behind.

It was a strange sight to witness such a contest at such an hour. Seen by that witching light, the two adversaries, as they flew along, side by side, and in silence, might have been taken for phantom horsemen.

Talbot was scarcely less eager to win this race, than he had been to win that of the morning. His blood was now up. Duval was even more excited. He felt as if he had a defeat to efface. He made every effort to leave his adversary behind, but Talbot stuck closely to him.

On—on they went, without change of position. To those who watched them from afar, they looked as if blent together. Colonel Blood chafed with impatience at the strange spectacle; and, at length, unable to restrain himself, he rode towards them.

He had not gone far, when one of the figures detached itself from the other, but in that doubtful light he could not make out who was leading. He feared it was Talbot Harland, and under this impression, he cursed Duval for his folly in giving him this chance for the cup.

But his doubts were speedily removed, and his rage gave way to transports of delight. He now clearly perceived that Duval was in front, and expressed his satisfaction at the discovery by a loud shout, which was echoed by the troopers in charge of the postboy, and even by the postboy himself, though the latter scarcely knew why he shouted.

Though the result of the contest was no longer doubtful—at least, to Blood,—Talbot maintained a gallant struggle to the last. He would not give in. To the last, he plied whip and spur. But all his efforts were fruitless—the race was Duval's.

Amid the cheers of his comrades, with which those of the reverent postboy were mingled, the robber captain came in triumphantly.

It must be borne in mind that Duval never for a moment removed his mask during the race—nor did he remove it now—so that the effect of his victory could not be discerned upon his features. But his manner did not betray the slightest excitement, nor did the exertion of the contest seem to have disturbed him much.

Talbot, on the contrary, appeared quite overcome, and his accents were hoarse. Noticing his condition, Blood produced a pocket-flask, and, filling a small silver cup with brandy, offered it to him. The young man did not decline the attention.

"You have fairly won the race, and the prize is yours," he observed to Duval.

"I almost grieve to deprive you of it," replied the other. "But I must keep it as a trophy. Pray tell the Count De Bellegarde that I esteem him an indifferent jockey."

By this time, Montalt and Flodour had come up, and offered their congratulations to the winner. At the same time, they good-naturedly essayed to console Talbot Harland for his defeat.

The gold cup was next taken from the bag, and the postboy was compelled to offer it to Duval—an order which he obeyed with a very bad grace. The magnificent vessel sparkled brilliantly in the moonlight, and the whole scene at this moment was exceedingly striking and picturesque.

The sight of the splendid cup roused fierce feelings in Talbot's breast, and, for a single moment, the desire of snatching it from the robbers, possessed him. But he was deterred from the insane attempt, by the pledge he had given.

Blood, who was near him, perceived what was passing in his breast, and kept his hand upon a pistol.

Meanwhile, the flask of brandy was rapidly passed from hand to hand, and the little silver cup as quickly filled and emptied. The last to empty it was the postboy. Duval having sufficiently admired his prize, it was restored to the receptacle from which it had been taken, and committed to the care of Mandeville.

"Am I at liberty to depart?" said Talbot, to Duval.

"As soon as you please," rejoined the other. "Accept my thanks for the sport you have afforded me. If you return to Newmarket, pray describe our race to his Majesty. I am sorry he did not witness it."

"The race is not yet over," rejoined Talbot, sternly. "As soon as I can procure assistance, I will be on your track."

With this, he struck spurs into his horse's flanks, and dashed off, followed by the postboy, who had been set free at the same moment.

Almost immediately afterwards, Duval and his band were scouring across the heath in the opposite direction, all laughing heartily at the adventure.

TALBOT HARLAND PRESENTS THE GOLD CUP TO THE DUCHESS OF PORTSMOUTH.

The King and the Court had returned from Newmarket to Whitehall.

On the morning after his arrival, Charles was in the Duchess of Portsmouth's boudoir, and her Grace was complaining of the fatigue of her journey, when the Duke of Buckingham was announced.

After the Duke had made his reverence, and paid some well-merited compliments to the Duchess on her looks, the King said to him, "Did you see Bellegarde yester-morning? He told me he had an appointment with you."

"Yes, sire. He came to me before I was up, looking as fresh almost as her Grace, though he had ridden from Newmarket during the night."

"Can you tell us at what hour he reached Whitehall?" observed the Duchess. "His Majesty is curious on the point."

"I can give you precise information," replied Buckingham. "He arrived here at four o'clock in the morning, and as the palace gates were closed, he had to knock up the porter."

The Duchess glanced at the King.

"He performed the distance under six hours," pursued Buckingham; "and all things considered, I regard it as a wonderful feat."

"It would be a wonderful feat, indeed, if he rode that second race with Talbot Harland," observed Charles.

"What second race, sire?" cried Buckingham. "I have not heard of it."

The King then related the extraordinary adventure that had befallen Talbot; and the Duke laughed heartily at the recital.

"This Claude Duval is a ducedly clever fellow," he exclaimed. "His exploits have all the air of practical jokes."

"I have always said so," observed Charles.

"This may turn out the best of them. Talbot Harland started from Newmarket in pursuit of the robbers, but I doubt his success."

"I have heard nothing of him," replied Buckingham.

At this moment the person in question was announced.

"What news of Claude Duval?" cried the King, as Talbot came in. "Have you captured him?"

"I am deeply mortified to be obliged to answer no, sire," replied the young man. "He and his band seem to have dispersed on quitting the heath. I could discover no traces of them."

"So you have lost the cup, after all, I find," cried Buckingham, in a jeering tone. "I thought you would have taken better care of it."

"I deserve all the ridicule your Grace can heap upon me," rejoined Talbot. "But I hope you will be generous, and spare me."

"If I spare you, Sedley and Etherego won't. I will treat you as tenderly as I can, but I must add, however, a few more couplets to my ballad."

"That ballad will never end," remarked the Duchess, laughing.

"Not as long as Claude Duval remains at large," said the King. "But here comes Bellegarde," he added, as the Count was ushered into the room by Chiffinch.

Bellegarde's countenance was radiant with satisfaction.

"Judging from your looks, Count, you have something pleasant to tell us," observed Charles.

"Your Majesty is not mistaken," rejoined Bellegarde, with a low bow. "I am very glad to find Mr. Talbot Harland here, as what I have to say concerns him."

"Let us hear it," said the King. "I'll warrant your story relates to the cup."

"Your Majesty has a remarkable power of guessing," replied Bellegarde, again bowing deeply. "This morning, while I was dressing, my valet brought a letter, accompanied by a very strange-looking bag, apparently containing a piece of plate. Without pausing to examine the contents of the bag, I opened the letter, and you will judge of my surprise when I found that it came from Claude Duval. With your Majesty's permission, I will read it to you."

"MONSIEUR LE COMTE,—

"I have redeemed the honour of our country, which you had endangered.

"In the race which you ran at Newmarket, in the presence of his Majesty and the Court."

you proved yourself a vastly inferior horse-man to Mr. Talbot Harland.

"Unable to bear this national reproach, I provoked Mr. Harland to another contest. I came off victorious. The glory of France is untarnished.

"But, for reasons which I need not particularize, the prize I have won cannot remain in my hands. I therefore send it to you, Monsieur le Comte—to you, who, as an accomplished écuyer, ought to have won it; leaving you to dispose of it as you may deem fit. Vive la France!"

"Votre dévoué,
"CLAUDE DUVAL."

When the merriment caused by this letter had subsided, Bellegarde clapped his hands slightly, and at the signal the door opened, and Chiffinch entered, followed by a couple of pages, bearing the splendid racing-cup on a large silver tray.

At this sight, everybody expressed the greatest surprise.

"Oddfish!" exclaimed the King. "This is a real coup de maître!"

"I brought the cup with me, to show it to your Majesty," said Bellegarde. "And I am charmed to have the opportunity of restoring it, in your presence, to Mr. Talbot Harland, to whom it rightfully belongs. I know nothing about the contest to which Monsieur Claude Duval refers, nor is it anything to me; but I know that I was fairly beaten, and that I have no claim whatever to the prize."

The cup was then presented to Talbot by the pages, who bade them to lay it down on a table. This done, they withdrew with Chiffinch.

"I am inexpressibly indebted to you, Count," said Talbot to Bellegarde.

"Not in the least, mon cher," replied the other. "Whatever Monsieur Claude Duval may think, I am not a receiver of stolen goods."

"A capital joke! and capital! played!" exclaimed the King, who was ready to die with laughter.

"The thing looks like a jest, sire," observed Bellegarde. "But if it is one, I have had no part in it. I hope Mr. Talbot Harland does not think so."

"No one knows better than I do, Count, that you could not possibly have been concerned in it," cried Talbot, earnestly.

"Oddfish! this is delicious," exclaimed the King. "Now you have got back the cup," he added to Talbot, "you can carry out your design, and propitiate your venerable uncle, Dr. Harland."

But the young man had observed that the Duchess of Portsmouth had already set her eyes on the treasure.

He therefore said, "Excuse me, sire; I have another destination for it. The cup suits this room so well, that I trust her Grace will allow it to remain here."

"Grand dieu! do you mean to present it to me?" exclaimed the Duchess, delighted.

"I entreat that honour," replied Talbot.

"You are a model of gallantry," she cried, with one of her sweetest smiles. "Is he not, sire? The cup is exquisite; but it is doubly valuable from the little history attached to it."

"Ay, marry," observed the King; "you must not forget that, but for Monsieur Claude Duval, this gem would not have found its way to your collection."

While chocolate was being served, Charles took Bellegarde into the embrasure of a window overlooking the river, and said to him, "There is a little matter which you must execute for me, Count."

"Ever proud to obey your Majesty's behests," replied Bellegarde.

"To you, the affair will present no difficulty," pursued the King: "I want to discover the leader of the murderous attack upon the Duke of Ormond."

"Permit me to observe, sire, that you impose upon me a very arduous task, and one to which I am quite unequal. A very large reward has been offered by your Majesty for the capture of that person, and if the officers of justice have failed to arrest him, it is not likely I shall be more successful."

"I will give you a hint that may help you—I am certain he is known to Buckingham. Commence your search in that quarter."

"Possibly, your Majesty may be right," rejoined Bellegarde. "I do not like to play the spy; but, in the present instance, I must contrive to overcome my scruples."

"Tis to serve me," said Charles. "If you make any discovery, communicate with me at once. I want to see the man."

"To see him arrested, I presume, sire?"

"To confer with him," rejoined Charles, with a singular smile.

"It must occur to your Majesty that such a man is scarcely likely to trust himself——"

"He may do so," interrupted the King. "Give him that assurance from me. 'Twill be enough for him."

"It ought to be enough," said Bellegarde.
 "Still, he may fancy it a snare."

"If he hesitates, say that I have not forgotten what passed at Knole. One thing more, and I have done. The man I seek was at Newmarket."

"At Newmarket, sire!" exclaimed the Count, surprised.

"I heard his voice amid the crowd; but could not distinguish the speaker. He would not be hovering about me thus, if he had not some sinister design—perhaps, against my life."

"Sire!"

"Nay, I have no fear," rejoined the King; "but it is important that I should see him without delay. Buckingham will not serve me—you must."

And they quitted the embrasure.

Meanwhile, the company had been increased by Lady Muskerry and Dorinda, Lord Buckhurst, Sedley, Etherege, and others, all of whom were amazed to see the gold cup, and highly amused to hear by what strange means it had got there.

To show that she was not devoid of gratitude, the Duchess of Portsmouth was lavish in Talbot's praises, and she contrived to do him a slight favour.

It appeared that their Majesties were going that morning, in the royal barge, to the Tower, to inspect the Crown jewels, which the Duchess had not yet seen; and as Dorinda must necessarily be in attendance on the Queen, Talbot, to his great delight, was invited by the Duchess of Portsmouth to join the party.

This was what he gained by the gold cup; and, being desperately in love, he considered himself amply repaid.

BOOK THE THIRD.

THE CROWN JEWELS.

I.

A ROYAL PROMENADE ON THE THAMES.

ABOUT an hour later, attended by a throng of Court dames and gallants, among whom were all those who had been assembled in the Duchess of Portsmouth's apartments, their Majesties entered the royal barge, which was moored off the privy stairs of the palace.

Very gorgeous was the barge, almost as grand as the Venetian Bucentaur, in which, in old times, the Doge of Venice went forth to wed the sea; magnificently sculptured, and so richly gilt that its reflection seemed to turn the water to flame. Internally, this grand barge was nothing more than a splendid saloon, fitted up with luxurious couches, and having large windows that commanded a view of all around.

Four-and-twenty remarkably good-looking young watermen—wearing scarlet jerkins, with the royal badge on their sleeves, and directed by the barge master, who was naturally more grandly arrayed than his men, and bore the royal cognizance, embroidered in gold on his breast—were required to row the barge; but so heavy was it, that they made but slow way, if the tide chanced to be against them, as was the case on the present occasion.

Trumpeters, whose silver clarions were decked with crimson flags woven with the royal arms, made the walls of the palace ring with joyous fanfares, as their Majesties set forth on their promenade on the river.

When filled with the brilliant company we have described, the long saloon presented a splendid sight.

The day was delightful; and the surface of the Thames smooth as a mirror, and sparkling with sunshine. The Thames was then a noble river; its waters, if not positively transparent, were clear and bright, and constantly covered with a multitude of craft of all shapes and sizes; while its banks were rendered picturesque by quaint old structures.

A water-party was then a favourite diversion with the citizens, and nothing could be more agreeable. The Merry Monarch was as fond of the amusement as any of his subjects. Lolling out of an open window of the barge, and gazing at the occupants of the numerous boats and wherries that passed by, he saw a hundred objects that entertained him, while the remarks—not unfrequently about himself—that reached his ear, provoked his laughter. Old Rowley could bear a jest at his own expense better than any man.

Near him, as he now looked out at the lively scene, were the Duchess of Portsmouth and Bellegarde, both of whom were quite as much diverted as his Majesty.

At the next window were Talbot and Dorinda, but the young man was more engrossed by his lovely companion than by the spectacle before him. He gazed at her, and not at the river.

How the fest of the brilliant company amused themselves we need not inquire. Lively smiles, and light laughter were heard on all sides.

They had now passed gloomy Bridewell, which cast a black shade on the shining stream, and the great dungeon-like pile known as Baynard's Castle, and had just come in sight of London Bridge, when a wherry, partly covered by an awning, and manned by two vigorous oarsmen, who might possibly be prentices, but were certainly not common watermen, passed by.

The boat was sufficiently near to allow the King to distinguish its occupants. Beneath the awning sat a damsel, whose lovely features instantly caught his attention. Could he forget those magnificent black eyes, and the superb raven tresses? He knew her at once. It was Violet Oldacre. And the strongly-built man who was steering the boat, must be her father.

With the instinct of jealousy, the Duchess of Portsmouth had made the same discovery at the same moment, but she said nothing. Charles, however, was so excited that he called out to Bellegarde—

"Look, Count! whom do you see in that boat?"

"A very charming creature, sire," rejoined Bellegarde, with affected indifference.

"Do not affect ignorance," rejoined the King. "You know her as well as I do."

"Do you call that creature beautiful?" cried the Duchess, with a mocking laugh. "I think her frightful."

"Why don't you stand up in defence of your mistress, Count?" said the King, laughing.

"My mistress, sire! I don't even know her."

"Fi donc!" cried Charles, laughing incredulously. "You ought to be proud of her. She does credit to your taste."

"Sire, I accept your compliments, though I do not deserve them," said Bellegarde, shrugging his shoulders.

At this juncture, the stalwart individual, who acted as coxswain, sang out lustily to the oarsmen. The words were nothing, but they struck the King forcibly, and almost made him start.

"That is the voice I heard at Newmarket!" he said, in a significant tone, to Bellegarde.

"Indeed, sire!" exclaimed the Count, scarcely able to disguise his confusion.

"I am certain of it," rejoined the King. "Now you know what to do."

The oarsmen had been ordered by the coxswain to pull away rapidly, and they obeyed with such alacrity that the wherry had already shot off to some distance.

In her flight past the royal barge, Violet had not only been recognised by the King, but by Talbot and Dorinda; and, yielding to the impulse of the moment, the latter made a sign with her fan to the fair occupant of the wherry. It was this sign that made her father order the oarsmen to pull off.

II.

THE JEWEL TOWER.

The royal barge passed safely through the centre arch of London Bridge, and was subsequently moored off Tower Wharf, where a double line of warders, armed with their halberds, was drawn up.

The Duchess of Portsmouth, to whom this scene was new, was much struck with the appearance of the ancient fortress, especially with the dark and low-browed arches of Traitors' Gate, and with the stern and massive White Tower; but she could not discern any resemblance between the vast and sombre pile and the Bastille, to which her thoughts naturally recurred.

Loud flourishes from the trumpeters had announced the arrival of the King, and had summoned forth all the principal officers of the fortress.

On disembarking, their Majesties were received with much ceremony by the Lieutenant of the Tower, and Sir Gilbert Talbot, master and treasurer of the Jewel Tower.

Sir Gilbert Talbot, we may mention, had been appointed to the post by Charles, on the Restoration, and though some of the privileges and emoluments of the office had been abolished by Lord Chancellor Clarendon, it was still valuable and important, the perquisites amounting to 1,500*l.* yearly—a large sum in those days. Sir Gilbert was uncle, on the mother's side, to Talbot Hurland.

The royal party next crossed the drawbridge that spans the moat near the By-ward Tower, and proceeding along the outer ward, passed through the dismal arch of the Bloody Tower, and so gained the inner ward, in the midst of which is reared the majestic White Tower.

The King's visit being perfectly private, no preparations had been made, and only the ordinary officials and warders were in attendance, but a company of musketeers was being exercised on the parade, and drums were beaten as their Majesties appeared.

Charles having signified his intention of inspecting the regalia, Sir Gilbert Talbot hastened on to the Jewel Tower; and while he was gone, the royal party remained on the green.

This brief detention allowed the Duchess of Portsmouth an opportunity of surveying the White Tower and the chain of smaller towers surrounding the inner ward, in both of which State prisoners were then confined; but she turned aside with horror when a bare spot, marked by white stones, was pointed out to her, and the King added, in a low tone, that it was the place of execution, where Catherine Howard and Anne Boleyn had fallen by the headsmen's axe.

Shortly afterwards the royal party were conducted to the Jewel Tower, which is situated at the north-east angle of the inner ward. Originally, this structure was known as the Martin Tower, and had been used as a prison lodging until it became the depositary of the regalia.

The history of the Crown jewels is extremely curious, but it would occupy too much time to narrate it in full. Repeatedly pledged by successive monarchs, and conveyed away to Paris and Flanders, pawned almost in detail by the unhappy Henry the Sixth, they were again gathered together by the Tudors, and considerably augmented in number. A careful inventory was made of them by James the First, who frequently gloated over his treasures.

At last, they came into possession of Charles the Second, and, if he could have ventured to do so, no doubt the Merry Monarch would have pawned them, as his predecessors had done. It was in his reign that the regalia were first exhibited to the public. Hitherto they had been kept in strong iron chests, in a secret chamber in the White Tower, and only inspected with the utmost caution; but they were now removed to the Martin Tower, which, thenceforward, changed its name to the Jewel Tower.

The chamber in which the Crown jewels were deposited was on the first story of the tower in question. Built of stone, with walls of enormous thickness, an arched and groined roof, deep embrasures, terminated by narrow loopholes, a ponderous door, studded with nails, and having a huge lock, the room seemed perfectly secure.

The greater part of the treasures were placed on open shelves, covered with crimson velvet, and ranged on one side of the chamber.

Conspicuous among these was the imperial crown, which had been made for Charles's own coronation, and which glittered with diamonds of the first water, rubies, pearls, emeralds, and sapphires. Next to it was the crown of state, likewise made for Charles, garnished with an emerald that might have come from Aladdin's palace, a price-less ruby, and the finest pearl in the world.

Beside these, there were three crowns assigned to the Queen, each adorned with diamonds and pearls; the orb, which, we need scarcely say, is a large ball of gold, embellished with roses of diamonds and other precious stones; the ampulla, destined to contain the holy oil employed at the coronation; St. Edward's staff; the King's two sceptres, each of gold, and garnished with diamonds of inestimable value, and the Queen's sceptre, with the cross.

These treasures, and a hundred others, which we have not time to describe, were only protected by a thick crimson curtain, which, of course, was drawn aside when they were exhibited.

III.

TALBOT EDWARDS.

THE custodian of the Crown jewels at the time of our story was an old man named Talbot Edwards. He was a kinsman of Sir Gilbert Talbot, and being, in reduced circumstances, was appointed by the Master-Treasurer to the post as a provision for his old age. A better guardian could not have been chosen. The brave old gentleman—for a gentleman he was by birth as well as in bearing—would have sold his life rather than part with the treasures confided to him. He was a Welshman, and, though poor, excessively proud, and somewhat quick-tempered, but much liked.

Old Edwards led a very agreeable life in the Jewel Tower, though he was sometimes rather troubled by the tremendous responsibility imposed upon him. Many strangers came to see the treasures, and from these he received small gratuities, that eked out his modest salary. The worthy old gentleman was married, his wife being much younger than himself, and having still some pretensions to good looks. Moreover, he had a daughter, Edith, who was accounted the prettiest girl in the Tower, and whom he was very anxious to see married.

Such was the personage who had the honour of attending upon the royal party during their inspection of the regalia. Sir Gilbert Talbot was likewise in attendance; but the treasures were lifted from the shelves and displayed by Edwards. His extreme formality was almost ludicrous. However, he was courtier enough to feel that he ought to pay special attention to the Duchess of Portsmouth, and he had no difficulty in doing so, as she was now near the King.

"What think you of those baubles?" said Charles, to the Duchess, who, was in perfect ecstasies at the sight.

"Magnificent!" she replied. "I long to carry off the whole collection."

"Will it please your Grace to look at the imperial crown?" said Edwards, exhibiting it to her. "I pray you to notice that it is formed of four crosses, and four fleurs-de-lis of gold, rising from a golden circle."

"What lovely oval pearls!" she exclaimed. "Any one of them would content me."

"Your Grace must see the pearl on the crown of state. "Tis the finest in the world!" said the custodian.

And he held up the other crown to her view.

"Ah, mon Dieu! what a pearl! what an emerald! what a ruby!" exclaimed the Duchess.

The enamoured monarch looked up, as if he could have presented them to her.

"I can show your Grace plenty of other gems, but none like these," said Edwards. "Here is her Majesty's crown, set with diamonds and pearls."

But the Duchess could think of nothing but the splendid emerald and the inestimable ruby which she had just seen. Collars of enamelled gold containing table diamonds were next exhibited; rings set with topazes, sapphires, and rubies; brocade of enamelled gold, diamond flowers and diamond feathers; caranets, crosses, and tablets,—all set with precious stones of immense value.

Never had the Duchess's cupidity been so strongly excited. But she was not the only person excited. Strange thoughts passed through Bellegarde's breast as he examined the jewels.

IV.

EDITH EDWARDS.

THE old custodian had now enough to do to attend to the many fair dames that thronged around him, curious to examine the collars, chains, and smaller ornaments; and as he was unwilling to trust any of the jewels out of his own hands, he was obliged to call in the aid of his wife and daughter, who were standing near the door, probably awaiting a summons.

Mrs. Edwards, whom we have already described as a comely woman, was composed enough but Edith was suffused with blushes, as she stood before the courtly throng, and heard the many remarks passed upon her by the gallants. As their remarks, however, were highly complimentary, they could not have been altogether disagreeable, as the fair damsel had some coquetry in her nature.

This was not the first time that her charms had been praised, though by a very different class of admirers. Now she was exposed to the gaze of some of the boldest rakes in town, and Buckingham, Etherege, and others ogled her most unmercifully. Rather a formidable ordeal, it must be owned, but she stood it tolerably well.

Edith resembled her mother, rather than her father, who was tall and gaunt, and with strongly pronounced features. Her figure was charmingly proportioned, but rather full; her eyes blue, and tender in expression; her complexion exquisitely fair, and her golden tresses as beautiful as those of Queen Elizabeth in her younger days.

Moreover, she had very white and very daintily-formed hands, that could not fail to be observed as she held up the jewels for inspection.

Many a Court dame envied her those taper fingers. Many an inflammable Court gallant was scorched by her superb golden locks. Edith was Talbot Harland's second or third cousin, we scarcely know which; but the foolish fellow did not care to avow the fact once to Dorinda, even when the latter noticed the smile of recognition that passed between them.

The appearance of the custodian's fair daughter gave a new turn to the Count de Bellegarde's meditations. Perhaps he thought she might assist the scheme he was forming in his breast. Perhaps he was merely struck by her beauty.

As he was the handsomest man in the room, he soon contrived to attract her attention; and when he got near enough to exchange a few words with her, he felt sure that he had produced the impression he desired.

We have said that the Count was irresistible. And he found it so in the present instance. The foolish little coquette felt sure she should see him again. Nor was she wrong.

Very little time, however, was allowed him to achieve this conquest. Almost immediately after Edith's appearance, the Duchess of Portsmouth lost her interest in the jewels. Her Grace had been delighted with old Edwards, but she could not endure his daughter, especially when Edith's golden tresses were admired by his Majesty.

She turned aside haughtily and contemptuously when the lovely lily-white hands proffered her a collar of gold with eighteen knots, set with seven fair diamonds and thirteen rubies, with thirteen pearl pendants, and would not look at it. She declared she had seen quite enough, and became impatient to depart. However, she had to await the Queen's pleasure; and her Majesty, who was attended by Sir Gilbert Talbot, had not quite finished her inspection. At last, the royal party quitted the jewel-room.

Talbot Harland lingered for a moment behind the others, and so did Bellegarde.

"How is my pretty cousin Edith?" asked Talbot.

"Your cousin!" exclaimed Bellegarde, surprised. "Faith! you have a most charming cousin!"

"I thought Mr. Talbot Harland had disclaimed our relationship," observed Edith. "He has never paid us a visit since we have been at the Tower. But we have heard that he makes a gay figure at Court."

"And you have heard the truth," said Bellegarde. "No one is in higher favour with the King than your cousin."

"But we have heard you were banished from Court," cried old Edwards. "I'm heartily glad to find the rumour incorrect."

"It was correct enough," observed Talbot. "I was banished for fighting a duel with this gentleman—the Count de Bellegarde. Happily, we have both been pardoned by his Majesty, and are now in as great favour as ever."

"Delighted to hear it," cried Edwards. "I am the Count's very humble servant."

"And I yours, sir," replied Bellegarde, bowing. "Pray present me to your fair daughter."

This was done, and the Count saluted her very respectfully. Talbot then interposed, and begged his kinsfolk to excuse them, as they must perforce follow their Majesties. Of course, Bellegarde was obliged to tear himself away, but he told Edith, in a whisper, that he hoped soon to behold her again.

While the inspection of the Crown jewels was going on, a collation had been prepared in the Lieutenant's lodgings, and to this the royal party now sat down.

After the repast, their Majesties returned by water to Whitehall.

V.

COLONEL BLOOD'S RETREAT IN WHITEFRIARS.

Ever since the attack upon the Duke of Ormond, Colonel Blood and his comrades had taken up their quarters in Whitefriars, in which sanctuary they could set the officers of justice at defiance.

Here we must seek them; and we shall find the Colonel and his trusty associates in a large, badly-furnished and gloomy-looking room on the ground-floor of an old crazy house that had served as a place of refuge to a succession of lawless characters.

This habitation chanced to be empty at the time, and so Blood took it, and it answered his present purpose well enough. We know not how many strange hiding-places and contrivances for escape it contained. There were trapdoors in the floor, sliding panels in the wainscots, secret staircases, and vaults communicating with other vaults, so that the river could be reached. But the officers of justice were never allowed to set foot within the liberties of Whitefriars. The room, as we have said, in which Blood and his comrades sat, was large and gloomy. A wood-fire was burning on the hearth, and cast its light on the harsh features of the Colonel, which wore a very moody expression. He was thinking over the attack upon Ormond, and blaming himself for its ill-success. When he was in one of these sullen fits, his followers did not dare to disturb him, for his temper, at such times, was very savage. The flasks of wine on the table showed that the party had had a carouse. Mandeville was still drinking, while Montalt and Flooard were playing at piquette. Suddenly, Blood looked up, and called, in a gruff voice, for a cup of sack, which was given him.

"Newer was plan better contrived, nor more boldly executed," he muttered; "and yet it failed—failed utterly, through my own gross neglect! Curses upon the villain Ormond! To think that I had him in my power—that he was on the road to Tyburn, and that he should at last manage to escape! But I will hang him yet!"

"Think no more of him, Colonel," said Mandeville. "You know that our leader, Claude Duval, never approved of the scheme, and would take no part in it. He told us it would lead to mischievous consequences, and so it has."

"I should have been well content if I had avenged my friends," said Blood. "But I must wipe out my failure by some other daring exploit."

"Ay, that's the way to look at it, Colonel," cried Mandeville. "No use lamenting the past. Think of the present. Have you any fresh scheme to propose to us?"

"I have none," rejoined Blood, moodily.

"But I have," cried a well-known voice. "I have a magnificent scheme to propose to you."

Claude Duval stood before them.

He had come through a secret door, contrived in the wainscot near the chimney-piece. He was wrapped in a long black cloak, and carried a dark lantern in his hand. His appearance was hailed with the greatest satisfaction, all rising to welcome him except Blood.

Montalt assiduously helped him to take off his cloak, while Flooard relieved him of the dark lantern. He then flung himself into a chair, and said,—

"Give me a cup of wine. I have been half-stifled in those confounded vaults. Pah! Now, then, you shall hear what I have to propose. Listen to me, I beg of you, Colonel. What I have to say will interest you. I have just parted with the Count de Bellegarde. He has been with their Majesties to the Tower."

"We passed the royal barge on its way thither," remarked Blood.

"You did wrong to venture so near it," said Duval; "you were noticed. But let me proceed. The Crown jewels, as you know, are deposited at the Tower, and the motive of his Majesty's visit was to show these treasures to the Duchess of Portsmouth. The Count saw them for the first time, and his description of them was enough to make one's mouth water. There are two crowns, and the precious stones with which they are garnished are beyond imagination and beyond all price. You will scarcely credit me, I daresay, when I tell you there is an emerald seven inches in circumference."

"A prodigious pebble!" exclaimed Blood, who was now all attention. "How I should like to handle it!"

"To pocket it, you mean, Colonel," remarked Montalt.

"To say nothing of rubies, pearls, and sapphires, any one of which would make a man wealthy," continued Duval. "The Count was quite bewildered by the sight."

"And well he might be," cried Blood. "I am bewildered by the mere idea. What more did he behold?"

"The two sceptres," replied Duval, "each of solid gold, and garnished with diamonds. The sceptre, with the dove, is three feet seven inches long, and three inches round; so you may guess its value."

"Magnificent! Don't you long to grasp it, Colonel?" remarked Montalt to Blood.

"I would grasp it like a monarch," rejoined the other.

"Then there was the orb!" pursued Duval. "A ball of solid gold, encircled by a golden fillet, embellished with roses of diamonds!"

"Hold!—hold!" exclaimed Blood, starting up. "I can bear no more! The description of these treasures excites me so strangely. For heaven! it were an enterprise worthy of us to seize upon them!"

"That were an enterprise, indeed!" cried Flodard.

"I was about to propose it to you," observed

Claude Duval. "The project is hazardous, and can only be accomplished by stratagem."

"By stratagem! Ha, that suits me!" cried Blood.

"The treasures are deposited in the Jewel Tower," pursued Duval; "and are entrusted to the sole care of an old Welshman, Talbot Edwards, who inhabits the tower with his wife and daughter. The latter is a pretty coquette, and the Count de Bellegarde has already made acquaintance with her."

"I see!" observed Blood. "Is there no guard outside the tower?"

"Yes; a sentinel is placed at the door. Old Edwards might easily be overpowered, of course, and the jewels secured, but the sentinel offers the first difficulty. Then there are the three gates of the fortress, each with its sentinel, besides the warders in the guard-chamber. All these have to be passed."

"Were the sentinels doubled, we would pass them!" cried Blood. "Even while you have been speaking, my teeming brain has produced a scheme that cannot fail. You will all have parts in it," he added, to his followers; "but the chief part will be enacted by myself. I shall go as a Welsh parson."

Shouts of laughter followed the announcement.

"As a Welsh parson!" exclaimed Duval. "Did I hear aright?"

"Laugh as much as you list," said Blood, maintaining a grave countenance amid the general merriment. "I shall put on canonicals. A cassock is as convenient as a domino. Clothed in a clerical garb, I shall be able to pass all the sentinels of the Tower without exciting suspicion. As a Welshman, old Edwards will hail, with delight the Reverend Llewellyn Price, and take him to his bosom. Besides, Parson Price will have his daughter Winefred with him. I'll speak to her at once." And striding towards a broad oaken staircase at the back, communicating with the upper rooms, he shouted out, with lusty lungs, "What ho, Sabine!"

"Coming, father," rejoined a musical voice from above.

VI.

SABINE DISAPPROVES OF HER FATHER'S PROJECT. PRESENTLY, a light appeared, and a graceful figure was seen descending the staircase.

Need we say it was the same fair creature who has appeared in sundry portions of our story as Violet Oldacre?

She set down her taper, and, with a cry of delight, flew towards Duval; but he checked her by a slight gesture.

"You mistake me for the Count de Bellegarde," he said.

"Yes; I now see it is Captain Duval," she rejoined. "You called me, father."

"Ay; I have a great project to break to you," observed Blood.

"Always some new project, father."

"But this is greater than all the others. 'Twill make us rich beyond all computation. 'Twill enable you to live like a princess in France or Flanders. All your dreams of splendour will be realized."

"I fear these are but dreams in which you are indulging, father," observed Sabine, with a smile.

"You are an incredulous little fool," said Blood. "Ask Captain Duval if I have in the slightest degree exaggerated."

"Your father has not said a word too much," replied Duval. "'Tis a splendid scheme; and if crowned with success, will yield us millions."

"Millions!" exclaimed Sabine, surprised. "What can it be? Have you discovered the philosopher's stone?"

"Bah! All the disciples of Hermes could not produce such a heap of gold and precious stones as we have found out."

"And, pray, where is this wonderful treasure hidden?"

"In an enchanted castle," replied Duval; "defended by gates and drawbridges innumerable; surrounded by a double line of fortifications; locked up in a donjon; and watched by a jealous old dragon, whom it will be your business to put to sleep."

"Ah! you mean the Crown jewels," cried Sabine.

"You have guessed aright," said Blood. "Those jewels shall be ours ere many weeks are past. Now, was I wrong in styling the project a great one?"

"'Tis a dreadful project, father. I tremble to think of it."

"Pshaw!" returned the Colonel; "there is no more danger in it than in many a matter of trifling import."

"'Tis not the danger I think of, father, but the magnitude of the crime."

"Hard words, girl. But you need have no scruples. His Majesty will be able to replace his jewels; if not, it matters little. They are mere useless gewgaws where they now are kept. We will turn them to good account."

"But you do not expect me to take part in such a scheme, father?" said Sabine. "I cannot do it."

Before Blood, who was getting angry, could reply, Duval arose, and approaching her, observed,—

"Did I not say, mignonne, that it would be your business to put to sleep the watchful dragon?"

"Do not impose such a hateful task upon me," she rejoined.

"Hateful, or not, you must perform it," cried her father, in a tone calculated to enforce obedience. "I require your assistance. To-morrow we shall go to the Tower together. In the interim, I will instruct you in the part you will have to play. It will not be difficult, I promise you."

While she remained silent and sad, Duval took Blood aside.

"His Majesty desires to see his nocturnal visitor again," he said.

"Ha!" exclaimed Blood.

"You may go to him without fear," pursued Duval.

"I will not go to him till this affair is over," said Blood. "Then I can act as circumstances may dictate. An interview with him at this juncture would interfere with the progress of our scheme—perhaps, thwart it altogether."

"Well, I will protest to him that I cannot find you. Have you heard aught from Buckingham?"

"Nothing; nor do I expect to hear from him. He will not trouble me."

"Be not too sure of that," returned Claude. "However, if you succeed in your design, you must take instant leave of England, and embark for France."

"I will neglect no precaution, rest assured," rejoined Blood.

"My mission is ended," said Duval. "Perchance I may meet Parson Price and his fair daughter at the Tower to-morrow; but if I do, we shall be strangers, of course."

He then turned to Sabine, who still looked downcast, and pressed her hand to his lips, as he bade her adieu.

"Excuse my hasty departure, sweetheart," he whispered. "There is a ball to-night at Whitehall, at which the Count de Bellegarde must be present."

She looked at him with tearful eyes, but made no remonstrance.

"Bon soir, messieurs!" he exclaimed. "Empeignez le trésor, & voguez la galère!"

Montalt helped him to put off his mantle, Flodard gave him the dark lantern, and both bowed respectfully as he disappeared through the secret door.

VII.

PARSON PRICE AND HIS DAUGHTER.

NEXT morning, a wherry, which had come down the river from Whitefriars, and was rowed by four lusty young oarsmen, stopped at Tower Wharf, and landed a very stout ecclesiastic and his daughter.

Clergymen, we may state, in those days, always appeared in public in full canonicals—gown, cassock, and bands. Consequently, they were never taken for laymen.

Our stout parson had a jewal visage, and did not seem to have mortified the flesh with over severity. His loose robe gave additional width to shoulders already too broad. His gown was well kept, and his hands spotless. Though his features were harsh, his looks were not unprepossessing, and his manner was decorous and benign; so very benign, indeed, that when a warder approached, he seemed to pronounce an internal blessing upon the man.

Our parson's daughter was remarkably pretty, with magnificent black eyes, and rich black tresses. A graceful figure does not require the aid of dress to set it off; and her blue petticoat and red gown, of very plain material, suited her perfectly.

The pair we have described were gazing with wonder, not unmingled with awe, at the ancient fortress, when a big warder, with a bluff countenance, and a great C.R. embroidered in gold on his scarlet jerkin, who was lounging on the wharf, accosted them, and asked if he should show his reverence, and the young lady, the lions.

"You shall show me the way to the Jewel Tower, if it please you, my good friend," said the parson, bestowing the benediction upon him we have already recorded. "We are entire strangers here, as you may very well perceive."

"Ay, I can easily see that your reverence is from the country," returned the bluff-looking warder. "Many strangers visit the Tower. 'Tis the finest sight in all London."

"I should think so," cried the parson's daughter. "Dear! dear! what a wonderful place it is."

"Oh, you've seen nothing yet," cried the bluff warder. "Wait till you've seen the lions, and the bears. They'll astonish you, I'll warrant. You can hear 'em roaring now. The big white bear goes a-fishing every afternoon in the Thames."

"Does he, indeed?" said the parson's daughter, looking surprised.

"We do not desire to see lions and bears, my good friend," said the parson, blandly. "Our object is to proceed at once to the Jewel Tower, which is kept by our estimable relative, Mr. Talbot Edwards. You know him, perhaps?"

"Oh, yes, I know him, and a very worthy old gentleman he is,—a Welshman, and remarkably fond of toasted cheese," replied the warder.

"Toasted cheese is a very good thing, my friend, let me tell you. Perhaps you may have heard Mr. Edwards speak of the Reverend Llewellyn Price, of Caermarthon. I am Parson Price, and this is my daughter Winefred."

"I don't remember hearing Mr. Edwards mention your reverence," replied the bluff warder, somewhat abating his surliness. "But I am sure it will afford him pleasure to see you and your daughter, as it will me to conduct you to him."

"You are very obliging," said the assumed Parson Price. "May I ask your name, my good friend?"

"Dunstan—Kenelm Dunstan; known among my brother warders as Burly Dunstan," was the answer.

"A brave name! I shall not forget it. I am glad to know you, honest Kenelm—very glad indeed; and if it would not affront you, I would ask you to drink my health in a cup of mulled sack."

The burly warder, now entirely relaxed his previous bluntness, and smilingly accepted the piece of silver that Parson Price placed in his hand.

"I will drink your reverence's and the young lady's health in a cup of the best sack to be had at the Stone Kitchen," he said.

"I hope to find my cousin Edward in good health, Kenelm," pursued Parson Price; "I have not seen him for these many years. Can you tell me if he was in London when he obtained his appointment?"

"No, your reverence. He was residing at Llandaff, and very badly off, as I've heard. Sir Gilbert Talbot sent for him, and gave him the post."

"Ah! I knew the worthy gentleman had had misfortunes," remarked Parson Price, with a sigh; "but I thought he had left Llandaff long ago."

"You'll find him hale and hearty, sir," observed the warder; "and as to his daughter Edith, she will stand a comparison with your own fair young lady."

"You hear that, Winefred," said Parson Price, smiling. "Now, honest Kenelm, will you kindly show us the way?"

"That I will, your reverence."

The warder took them across the drawbridge, and then through the gateway of the By-ward Tower, near which several other burly individuals, like himself, in scarlet jerkins, embroidered with the royal badge, were assembled. All of them respectfully saluted the parson, who stopped to pronounce a benediction upon them.

"Be pleased to mention my name to your brother warders, Kenelm," said Parson Price. "As I shall often visit my cousin Edwards, it may be well they should know me."

"I will not fail," replied the warder.

As they went on, their conductor pointed out to them many objects of interest, and showed them the towers in which several prisoners of state were confined.

The sight of the sombre buildings and grated windows made Winefred turn pale. Her father did not seem so much impressed, but kept constantly asking questions about his cousin Edwards.

At length, they reached the Jewel Tower.

"Can I be of any further service to your reverence?" inquired the warder, about to take leave.

"Yes, my dear Kenelm; you will do me a particular favour if you will announce me to my cousin Edwards. I do not wish to take the old gentleman by surprise."

VIII.

PARSON PRICE AND HIS DAUGHTER ARE WELCOMED AT THE JEWEL TOWER.

THE warder went in, as requested, and presently returned, accompanied by old Mr. Edwards, who seemed scarcely to have recovered from the surprise into which he had been thrown.

Parson Price, however, stopped the old gentleman's mouth by pronouncing a blessing upon him and his family; and then, with a warmth of manner which there was no resisting, cried out,—

"Ah, my dear cousin, how glad I am to see you! I dare say you have quite forgotten Llewellyn Price of Cuermarthen; but, you see, he has not forgotten you."

Truth to say, Mr. Edwards did not recollect him in the least. Completely mystified, he knew not what reply to make.

After all, Welshmen have so many cousins, that the worthy man might have had one at Cuermarthen without remembering the circumstance.

"No wonder you don't recollect me," continued Price. "I was but a boy when you saw me at Llandaff. This is my daughter Winefred. Her poor mother is buried at St. David's. She was a Griffith of Llandovery; but I can't trust myself to speak of her," he added with well-feigned emotion.

No need of more. Old Edwards was completely imposed upon by the respectable appearance of his new relations, and gave them a cordial welcome.

After saluting Winefred affectionately, he took them both into the tower, and presented them in due form to his wife and daughter.

Another scene had to be gone through, but it ended in all the cousins becoming mutually delighted with each other.

Parson Price soon established himself in Mrs. Edwards's good graces, and Edith was charmed with Winefred.

Cakes and metheglin were set before the visitors, and after they had partaken of the refreshments, old Edwards volunteered to show his cousins the Crown jewels.

He could not have made an offer more agreeable to Parson Price, who was enchanted to find himself in the treasure chamber.

How the parson's eyes glistened and his breast dilated as he gazed at the splendid show.

But while examining the various objects, he stole many a furtive glance round the chamber, noted every object within it, and saw where the old custodian's pistols and arquebuss were hung, secretly laughing at the precautions.

"Mine eyes never had such a feast before," he exclaimed as he relinquished the imperial crown to its guardian. "Lord! lord! how princes do bedeck themselves. Solomon in all his glory had not a crown like this. You must allow me another opportunity of inspecting these wondrous treasures, my dear cousin, for though I have seen much, I am not yet satisfied."

"You shall inspect them whenever you please," replied Edwards.

"I should like to come and see them every day during our stay in London," cried Winefred. "I never beheld anything so lovely. I wish I were a princess, to wear some of them."

"One gets tired of jewels as of everything else," remarked Edith. "I think nothing of them."

"Jewels, indeed, are but vanities!" exclaimed Parson Price.

"Don't say that, father," cried Winefred.

"You might as well say that all earthly treasures are but dross."

"And so they are, my dear," rejoined the parson. "Mere dross."

"I wish I had a little more of the dross," observed Edwards.

"Jewels would be very well, if one could wear them," remarked Edith. "But merely to gaze at them in this way becomes tiresome. How well you would look in this collar, my pretty cousin," she added, fastening a necklace set with diamonds and pearls round Winefred's fair throat.

"And in this regal ornament," said Mrs. Edwards, placing a circlet adorned with balass rubies, table diamonds, and emeralds on her brows.

"There! doesn't she look charming?" cried Edith, clapping her hands with delight.

"Charming, indeed!" echoed Mr. Edwards.

"Take them off, my child," said Parson Price. "Your foolish head will be turned."

"Let her keep them on for a few minutes," interposed Edwards. "They suit her remarkably well."

"Ay, but they fill her mind with pride."

"Nonsense, father. You are always preaching to me. I like the sensation of wearing them immensely."

"Is it thousand pities there is no one to see you in them besides ourselves, cousin," cried Edith.

Scarcely was utterance given to the wish, than the door opened, and the Count de Bellegarde stood before them.

IX.

WINEFRED BECOMES JEALOUS OF EDITH.

He seemed charmed by the picture presented to his gaze.

"Trying the effect of the jewels, eh?" he exclaimed. "May I be permitted to assist at the experiment?"

"Certainly," replied Edith, laughing. "'Tis the Comte de Bellegarde, father," she added, in a whisper.

Then, turning to the Count, she explained that they were exhibiting the treasures to their Welsh cousins.

Bellegarde begged to be presented to the cousins, and quite captivated Parson Price by his politeness and affability.

"What a charming man!" whispered the parson to Edwards.

"Belongs to the Court; came here yesterday with their Majesties," replied the other, in a low tone.

"Seems to be struck with your daughter," remarked the parson. "No wonder. She is a great beauty."

A further essay was now made at the Count's request, and this time a gold collar set with three sapphires, and having ten knots of round pearls, was linked round Edith's snowy neck, while her golden tresses were crowned by another jewelled circlet.

Thus adorned, she looked surpassingly beautiful, and the Count's admiration was so ardently expressed, that it excited a pang of jealousy in Winefred's bosom.

The feeling was heightened by the undisguised delight with which his praises were received by Edith.

The vain little coquette was so much flattered, that she was quite willing to try on some other ornaments.

"What's the matter, my child?" cried Parson Price, noticing his daughter's agitation.

"I don't know, father," she replied; "but I feel rather faint. I think I had better leave the room."

In an instant all was confusion. Totally unsuspecting of the truth, Edith hastily laid down the jewels she was about to try on, and flew to her cousin, who looked excessively pale, and ready to drop, and, with Mrs. Edwards's assistance, helped her out of the room.

Both Bellegarde and the old custodian expressed their concern to Parson Price, but he treated the matter very lightly.

"A mere passing indisposition," he said. "She will be quite well anon."

However, the Count de Bellegarde, who quite understood what was the matter with her, and feared that the success of the scheme might be jeopardized by some contretemps, thought it prudent to take his departure. Accordingly, he made his bow to the old custodian, promising to pay him another visit ere long.

A glance from Parson Price showed that he entirely approved of this step.

Just as Bellegarde was leaving, he met Edith, coming out of the lower chamber.

"Are you going, Count?" she exclaimed, with a look of disappointment. "My poor cousin Winefred has frightened you away. She is better now. Am I ever to see you again?"

"You will certainly see me when I am next at the Tower."

"And when is that likely to be?"

"Not just yet. I should alarm your father if I appeared again too soon."

"You need not come to the Jewel Tower. I always take an evening walk on the ramparts."

"Then I may possibly find you there to-morrow evening. Adieu!"

Scarcely was he gone, when the old custodian and Parson Price issued from the jewel-chamber. Having carefully locked the door, Edwards thrust the key into his girdle.

"Are you never afraid of being robbed, my dear cousin?" asked the parson, innocently.

"No," replied Edwards. "He must be a bold man and a cunning, who would attempt to plunder the Jewel Tower."

Parson Price smiled to himself at the remark.

The parson and his daughter did not stay much longer, though pressed to do so by their hospitable relatives; but Price promised his cousin Edwards to come again next day, and bring with him two young gentlemen from Carmarthen.

"One of them," he added, in a whisper, "is engaged to Winefred, but the other would be eligible as a suitor to Edith."

Edith and her mother accompanied their newly-found relatives to the Tower Wharf, where the latter took a boat to the Temple Stairs, their belongings being in the Strand.

But the silly coquette made her cousin perfectly wretched by confining to her, as they proceeded to the place of embarkation, that she was about to meet the gallant Count de Bellegarde on the ramparts on the following evening.

Poor Winefred felt again ready to drop.

X.

JENKIN PUGH AND CADWALLADER GRIFFITH.

PARSON PRICE was not long in paying another visit to his dear cousins at the Jewel Tower.

Next afternoon, he appeared again, and brought with him, according to his promise, two good-looking young gallants, whom he introduced as Jenkin Pugh and Cadwallader Griffith—both of Carmarthen.

Jenkin, he privately informed the old couple, was engaged to Winefred; but Cadwallader was on his preferment, and being, as they saw, tall and proper, with two or three hundred a-year in land at Abergwilly, in Caermarthenshire, and owner, moreover, of Merlin's Cave, he would make a very suitable match, he thought, for Edith.

This information produced the desired effect on the old custodian and his wife, especially when they perceived that the inflammable young Welshman was struck at once by the charms of their golden-haired daughter, and did not attempt to disguise his feelings, but paid her most assiduous attention. He met with no discouragement from Edith, who had heard from her mother of the three hundred a-year in land and Merlin's Cave.

Cadwallader, we may mention, was no other than Montalt, while Jenkin bore a strong resemblance to a certain Flodoard. Both were very gaily attired.

Further to propitiate the ladies of the Jewel Tower, Parson Price had brought them some little presents—a few pairs of gloves, and some perfumes for Edith, with a partlet and hood for her mother.

Naturally, they both expressed great regret that Winefred had been left behind; but Parson Price explained that his daughter was not very strong, and needed repose. She would come on some early day.

Everything went on prosperously. Neither of the young gallants were in the slightest degree bashful, but rattled away gaily, and seemed to know a good deal about town life. Now and then a glance from the parson checked them, when they were displaying rather too intimate an acquaintance with the gaming tables.

As a matter of course, they were shown the Crown jewels, and while enjoying the exhibition, they cautiously examined the chamber, as their leader had done on the previous day.

It was here that Cadwallader seized the opportunity of describing Merlin's Cave.

"Merlin, as you are aware," he said, "was a great enchanter, and performed his incantations in that wonderful cave; which now belongs to me. In fact, I have reason to believe that I am a descendant of the renowned magician."

"We should never take you for a conjuror, my dear Cad," remarked Parson Price, good-humouredly. "What has Merlin's Cave got to do with these jewels?"

"A great deal, as you shall hear, sir," replied Cadwallader. "Tis said, and I devoutly believe the legend, that countless treasures were buried in that cave by Merlin—great chests of gold, blood-red rubies of enormous size, diamonds that would outshine the stars, and emeralds to which that in the Crown of State would be a tiny pebble. All these treasures, the legend says, are buried in the cave, and guarded by a potent spell, and unless that spell can be broken they will never be discovered. I have tried 'Abracadabra,' and all kinds of magical words, but have not succeeded. Still, I do not despair. They say the spell can only be dissolved by a virgin with a skin as white as snow, and looks glowing like gold—But then she must be a native of Wales."

"Bless me!" exclaimed Edith, "that seems to answer to my description. I won't say anything about my complexion, but my tresses——"

"Are as bright as gold," interrupted Cadwallader, gallantly. "You have all the requisite qualifications. Clearly, you are the virgin who could break the spell, and bring to light the treasure that has been hidden for centuries."

"I should like to try," she cried.

"You shall try," exclaimed Cadwallader, with a fervour that almost amounted to a declaration, and made Edith blush and cast down her eyes.

Parson Price chuckled internally, and old Edwards winked at his wife, who looked very well pleased.

From this moment, the young Welshman's suit made very rapid progress. In some cases, the first step is the only difficulty. Edith was so dazzled by the idea of Merlin's Cave, that she could think of nothing else.

No wonder, after such an auspicious commencement, that the old custodian would not hear of parting with his guests, but insisted on their staying supper. As an inducement he promised them a dish of toasted cheese, cooked in the true Welsh style, and this they could not resist.

Edith had not forgotten her appointment with the Count de Bellegarde, but she felt it would now be difficult to keep it. However, when evening came on, she contrived to escape from the company, and unlocking a small door at the back of the tower, communicating with the outer ward, speedily gained the ramparts. A sentinel was pacing to and fro. The Count was true to his appointment. Perceiving him at a little distance, she flew towards him, and told him hurriedly that their interview must be very brief.

"I would not seek to detain you, were you able to stay," replied the Count. "We are watched."

"Watched! by whom?" cried Edith. "My father and mother are in-doors with their guests. I have just left them."

"Look there!" replied the Count, drawing her attention to a female figure standing near the bastion at the north-east angle of the walls. "She is watching us."

"Can it be my cousin Winefred? I was foolish enough to tell her of my appointment with you this evening."

"'Tis she," replied Bellegarde.

"There is nothing to fear from her," said Edith.

"What is she doing here, unless she means mischief?"

"Very true," responded Edith. "We must not meet again, Count. I haven't time to explain, but circumstances have occurred——"

"You have found a new lover—that's it. What key is that?" he added, noticing that she had one in her hand.

"This key enabled me to get out of the Jewel Tower unperceived," she replied, with an arch smile.

"It would enable me to get in in the same way. Lend it me."

"Not for worlds," she replied. "My father would never forgive me if he knew I had taken it."

Bidding him a hasty adieu, Edith now tripped off; and almost at the same moment, the female figure that had remained stationary near the bastion disappeared.

No remark was made on Edith's brief absence, and soon afterwards a plentiful supper was served.

Before they sat down to it, Parson Price did not neglect to say grace. With the promised toasted cheese, which proved to be excellent, and was greatly enjoyed by all the guests, a black jack filled with potent Welsh ale was sent round. The parson took a hearty pull at it.

They were in the midst of their enjoyment—Parson Price was chatting merrily with Mrs. Edwards, and Cadwallader was whispering soft words to Edith,—when a female servant entered, and delivered a little note to her master.

"What can it mean?" cried the old custodian, glancing at the letter.

"Let me look at it, father," cried Edith, who was not without some uneasiness on her own account.

Snatching the letter from him, she opened it, and cast a hasty glance at its contents.

"What is it?" demanded Edwards.

"A warning to you, father," she replied.

"A warning! Let me hear it."

The parson and his associates exchanged covert looks.

They were not left long in suspense, for Edith read the letter aloud. It ran as follows:—

"A plot has been formed against you. Beware, or you will lose that which you value more than life."

"This, from a friend."

"Who could plot against me?" cried Edwards, with a look of consternation that was reflected on his wife's countenance.

"Who, indeed, my dear cousin?" cried Parson Price, scarcely able to conceal his uneasiness. "You don't suspect me?"

"No, no, no!" cried the old custodian. "I suspect nobody. I don't know what to think. What I value more than life must be——"

"Your daughter, of course, sir," interposed Cadwallader.

"No—my jewels," cried the old man. "I would die twenty deaths rather than lose them."

"Don't make yourself uneasy, father," said Edith. "I can explain the meaning of the letter. It refers to me. The writer fancies you love me better than your treasures, and that it would break your heart to lose me."

"I hope your worthy father does not mean to keep you for ever," cried Cadwallader. "If so, I unhesitatingly announce my intention of robbing him. All the locks and bolts he can place on the doors of this tower shall not deter me from making the attempt."

General laughter followed this speech, the boldness of which did not displease the old custodian, who had been reassured by his daughter's observations. He felt she had something to explain, but this was not the time to ask for further explanation.

Parson Price saw that the danger was past, and, though secretly enraged by the incident, maintained a semblance of good humour. Cadwallader continued his addresses to Edith.

Muddled sack was introduced by Mrs. Edwards, and the rest of the evening passed away merrily.

Good hours are kept at the Tower, and the tattoo of a drum informed the guests it was time to depart.

While Parson Price was taking leave of his host, he observed, in a whisper, "Take my advice, my dear cousin; strike while the iron is hot. If you are satisfied with the suitor I have found for your daughter, don't let him slip through your fingers."

Old Edwards incontinently acted on the hint, and the parson and his young friends were asked to come again on the morrow.

XI.

WHAT PASSED BETWEEN WINEFRED AND TALBOT HARLAND.

THE person who had delivered the letter of which mention has just been made, was the warder Kenelm. He was standing beneath the trees that skirted the parade, with some of his companions, when a young damsel, whom he at once recognised as Parson Price's lovely daughter Winefred, came up to him, and begged him to take a letter for her to the Jewel Tower, giving him a douceur at the same time.

Though rather surprised, the warder asked no questions, but went immediately on the errand.

Winefred was hastening towards the gateway of the Bloody Tower, when she heard quick footsteps behind her, and, turning at the sound, beheld Talbot Harland. The young man had been dining with his uncle, Sir Gilbert Talbot, who had lodgings in the Tower; and, having seen the young damsel give the letter to the warder, had followed her. He knew her only as Farmer Oldacre's daughter Violet, and there was a mystery about her and her proceedings that excited his curiosity.

"Give you good e'en, fair damsel," he cried. "I am glad to see you again—but I did not expect to find you here."

"Do not detain me, sir," she rejoined. "My business here is done, and I am anxious to get away."

"One moment, and you shall go. 'Tis strange I should meet you. Miss Neville caught sight of you the other day on the river, and has spoken of you frequently since. She was in the royal barge."

"I saw her."

"She takes much interest in you, and will be pleased to hear of you. Have you any message for her?"

"None," she replied, with a troubled look. "She had better think no more of me. I am unworthy of her regard."

"I will not tell her what you say, for I do not believe it. Sit down for a moment on this bench. You seem agitated."

The young damsel felt so faint, that she was forced to comply. Talbot sat down beside her. For a brief space, not a word was said.

"I should like to see Miss Neville once more," said the young dame, breaking the silence. "I am in a most difficult position, and know not how to act for the best. She might advise me. I have no other friend on earth."

"Not your father?" cried Talbot.

"I cannot consult him," she rejoined. "I have something to reveal to Miss Neville—something strange—something terrible. But I must see her without delay, or it will be too late to prevent the mischief."

"Come, then, to Whitehall to-morrow morning. You will easily find her apartments. They are in the gallery assigned to the Queen's Maids of Honour. I will prepare her for the interview."

"I will come, if I can. Should I be prevented, and ought happen, entreat her to judge me as kindly as she can."

"Why not impart the secret to me? I swear to you I will keep it."

"It concerns others besides myself—others whom I will never betray. I will confide it only to Dorinda Neville."

Suddenly she started to her feet.

She had descried the Count de Bellegarde coming towards them along the parade, and without another word, hurried down to the gloomy archway, and disappeared.

"I hope I have not interrupted a tête-à-tête," exclaimed the Count, as he came up.

"You have prevented me from learning a secret, Count, that is all," replied Talbot.

"A secret!—that's a pity! One comes to the Tower to learn State secrets."

"That was your own errand, I suppose, Count?"

"Yes; and I have learnt two or three important secrets since I have been here—secrets worth knowing, I can promise you. Are you for Whitehall? or do you mean to sleep at the Tower?"

"I am with you," replied Talbot.

And they quitted the fortress together.

An hour later, Parson Price and his companions took boat at the Tower Wharf, and proceeded to Whitefriars. As they passed the guard-chamber, the parson perceived Kenelm, and stopping for a moment to chat with him, learnt that his daughter had been at the Tower that evening.

Concealing his anger, the parson merely observed, "She was too unwell to join the party at the Jewel Tower, so she wrote an excuse to my cousin Edwards."

"Yes; I took the letter," replied the warder; "and I remarked that the young lady looked unwell."

"She has endeavoured to betray us," mentally ejaculated the parson, as he walked on. "Luckily, the design has failed. I will take good care she shall make no more mischief."

XII.

SABINE THREATENS TO REVEAL THE SCHEME.

SABINE was alone in the large, gloomy room of the old house at Whitefriars.

She was seated near the table, on which a lamp was placed, and her looks betokened the greatest mental distress. Rousing herself, at last, she took up the light, and was about to proceed to her own chamber, when her father and his companions entered from the outer door. Mandeville also was with them.

Blood had already disencumbered himself of his gown and cassoct; he flung them down on a chair as he came in. His infuriated looks terrified Sabine, and she would have escaped; but he roughly seized her arm, and dragged her back.

"Traitor!" he exclaimed, fiercely. "What fiend prompted you, to this insane act? 'Tis not your fault that I and my comrades are not now laden with fetters in the dungeons of the Tower. What led you to betray us? Speak!"

"I only wished to put the good old man on his guard, father."

"And, by so doing, jeopardize my life. Unnatural girl! Had you succeeded in rousing the old man's suspicions, all had been over with me and my comrades, and the grandest scheme ever planned would have been unmasked. I hoped it had been some wild impulse to which you had yielded, without thought of the consequences; but I find it was a deliberate act. Truly, I have nourished a serpent in my bosom, to sting me."

"Never, till now, have I been disobedient to you, father. I have taken part—reluctantly enough, as you know—in numberless schemes in which you have engaged; but this is a crime so monstrous, that my soul revolts against it. When I saw that good old man, my heart was suddenly changed. He will die, if you deprive him of his treasures."

"What are the treasures to him?" cried Blood, contemptuously. "I will make him richer than he has ever yet been in his life."

"And I intend to wed his daughter Edith," observed Mandeville. "She is a wonderfully fine girl, and will just suit me. The old gentleman and his wife shall live with us at the Hague."

"You judge him by yourselves," cried the time. "He will never survive the blow you are about to inflict upon him. May heaven avert it!"

At this moment the secret door near the chimney-piece flew open, and Claude Duval stepped forth.

A glance at the group told him what was passing.

Quitting Sabine, Blood took him aside, and they conferred together for a few minutes, in a low tone. During this interval Sabine watched them anxiously. At last Duval stepped towards her.

"I see you are angry with me," she said, in a deprecatory tone. "But I could not help what I have done. I would save my father from a great crime."

"You have been suddenly conscience-stricken, it appears," observed Duval, coldly. "But why make Talbot Harland your father-confessor?"

"I have told him nothing, as yet; but I will disclose all, unless the scheme is abandoned."

A peculiar smile played upon Duval's features.

"Your candour is charming," he cried. "You shall tell him whatever you please, if you can find an opportunity of conversing with him again."

"Then you mean to keep me a prisoner here?" she exclaimed.

"Your father will take such steps as he may deem consistent with his safety," observed Duval.

"Well, I will do my best to elude his vigilance."

"Then you are resolved to betray us? Say so frankly. You will not greatly alarm me."

"I will not betray you. But take care you do not betray yourself. Do not go to the Tower again."

"Hum!" muttered Duval, as if struck by the counsel. "That may not be bad advice, after all."

He then rejoined Blood, who was standing at a little distance, watching them, and said, in a low tone, "She is determined to thwart our project. Nothing I can say will turn her from her purpose. Keep her a close prisoner till the affair is accomplished."

"It shall be done," replied Blood. "I would send her on board the schooner I have hired, but the skipper won't be ready till to-morrow."

"She will be far safer here," said Duval.

"But let her be carefully watched. She has told me she will escape if she can."

"What the plague can have taken possession of her?" muttered Blood. "She has never before turned rebellious, and now she falls from me at the most important crisis of my life."

"'Tis well she has not done more mischief," said Duval. "But Talbot Harland's suspicions may be aroused by what she has said to him, and some slight circumstance may lead to the discovery of the design. Are your preparations sufficiently made to enable you to strike the blow at once?"

"I would rather delay it for a few days."

"The delay will be fraught with danger. You cannot improve your position with the old custodian and his family. You have gained their confidence, and may lose it by some inadvertence. You have had a narrow escape to-day. Who knows what may happen to-morrow?"

"Ay, who knows?" echoed Blood. "But by to-morrow night, I trust, I shall have got possession of the jewels, for I will strike the blow, prepared or not prepared."

"Well resolved," cried Duval. "You do not require further aid from me. I do not wish to be mixed up with the enterprise."

"You have done quite enough," said Blood. "Leave all the rest to me. I am not sorry you have forced me to take immediate action, for this important affair has been weighing heavily on my mind."

"One last word of advice. Take good care of Sabine. She is your chief danger."

"Have no fear of her. She shall not leave this place of refuge till the affair is over, and I can take her with me, on board the schooner. Then ho! for Holland!"

"For Holland ho! where we shall next meet," rejoined Duval.

All this time Sabine had been watching him, and seeing he was departing, without bidding her adieu, she rushed towards him, and flung herself into his arms.

"Have you no longer any love for me?" she cried, passionately.

"I love you better than life."

"Prove it, by abandoning this scheme."

"You must talk to your father, sweetheart. All rests now with him. I have nothing more to do with it. Take her, sir."

And disengaging himself gently from her embrace, he consigned her to Blood, and passed through the secret door.

XIII.

SABINE ATTEMPTS TO ESCAPE.

"Now, father, I must have a word with you," said Sabine.

"I will have no further conversation with you to-night," he rejoined, sternly. "You

RIFFING THE JEWEL CHAMBER. (See page 73)

"have displeased me greatly. Take your supper instantly, and get to your chamber."

"I do not require supper."

"As you please. But mark what I say!" he cried, with increasing sternness. "You will not leave your chamber till to-morrow night!"

"Not till to-morrow night?"

"Perhaps, not then! So take with you all you need."

"I want nothing!" she rejoined.

"Nonsense! I shall not allow you to starve yourself. Put up some catables and a flask of wine in a basket," he said to Flodoard.

The order was promptly obeyed by the young man, who placed a cold fowl, bread, and some other matters in a basket, which he gave to his leader.

"Anything more?" asked Flodoard.

"Have you enough?" demanded Blood.

"More than enough," she rejoined.

"Come, then, to your chamber," he cried, mounting the staircase, which creaked beneath his heavy footsteps.

Sabine's bed-chamber was the best in the house, but little could be said in its praise. It was large, low-roofed, sombre, and scantily furnished. Setting down the basket of provisions on the table, her father said,—

"You have to thank yourself that you will be kept a prisoner here. Good night."

Casting a hasty glance round the room, he then went out, locked the door carefully, and took away the key.

Sabine smiled at this precaution, knowing that she could easily defeat it.

The house, as we have said, was full of strange contrivances, and this room had a secret outlet, which she had discovered.

Her father had not been gone more than half an hour when she ventured forth, and crept stealthily to the head of the staircase.

But it was impossible to descend it unperceived. Blood and his comrades were carousing, and it would seem from their talk that they had no immediate intention of retiring to rest. She therefore returned to her own room.

An hour later she made a second attempt. The sounds of revelry were not so loud as they had previously been, but she heard her father's deep voice as he gave instructions to the others.

"Besides the other articles I have specified," he said, "we shall need a pallet and a file and a couple of large bags, such as lawyers are wont to carry."

"A pallet is an awkward implement to hide," remarked Montalt, "and not the sort of thing that a gentleman usually carries about with him. Cannot we dispense with it?"

"Impossible! You will find out its use to-morrow."

"I am to remain with the horses at the foot of Tower Hill. Is it not so, Colonel?" demanded Mandeville.

"Ay," replied Blood. "I hope we may be able to embark quietly with the booty at the Tower Wharf, and go on board the schooner; but, in the event of alarm, we must ride off in different directions."

Sabine heard no more. Returning to her room, she remained there for another hour, when she ventured forth again.

Finding all still below, she took a few cautious steps down the staircase.

The lamp wanted trimming, but dim as it was, it showed plainly enough that the whole party were fast asleep. Her father was slumbering in the arm-chair, and breathing deeply.

She continued to descend slowly; but, in spite of her care, the stairs creaked, and Blood, who was easily aroused started up.

"Who's that?" he vociferated, fancying he saw some one dart up-stairs.

"What's the matter, Colonel?" cried Montalt, wakening up, and rubbing his eyes.

"Methought I saw Sabine on the stairs," rejoined Blood; "but that's impossible. I have the key of her door in my pocket. However, I'll satisfy myself at once."

Snatching up the lamp, he hurried up-stairs. Sabine's door was fastened preciously as he had left it. He listened for a moment, but could hear no sound within.

He did not unlock the door, but rapped sharply against it with his knuckles. His daughter immediately called out, and on hearing her voice, he felt sure all was right, and went back tranquilly.

Sabine made no further attempt to escape, but waited patiently till morning.

XIV.

SABINE HAS AN AUDIENCE OF THE KING.

WHEN morn came, Sabine thought she should have a visit from her father, nor was she mistaken. He brought her some breakfast; but observing that she had not touched the viands that he had laid on the table overnight, he said, with a sneer,—

"Soh, you are resolved to fast, I perceive. I did not enjoin the penance; but since you are practising it, I may remark that a little mortification of the body will do you good, and

"make you more obedient. I am sorry to deal harshly with you, Sabine," he added, somewhat softening his tone; "but you compel me to do so. You will remain here a prisoner during the day; but at night I will send Mandeville for you, or come myself. Have you aught to say to me?"

"Only to implore you to abandon this wicked design, father."

"No more of this," he cried, impatiently; "or you will rekindle my anger against you."

"Perhaps we may never meet again, father," pleaded Sabine.

"Tut! tut! we shall meet again ere many hours, and then you will talk to me in a very different strain. Farewell!"

"Farewell for ever, father!"

Blood looked at her for a moment, as if struggling with conflicting feelings. But his heart was hardened. Dashing out of the room, he locked the door outside, and took the key with him as before.

Sabine ventured forth every now and then, but her patience was most severely tried; for it was not till near eleven o'clock that she became convinced that the whole party were gone.

She had already made such changes in her attire as would enable her to present herself fittingly to Dorinda. Consequently there was nothing now to detain her; but the outer door having been locked by Blood, she was obliged to make her exit through the sliding panel near the chimney-piece, and thread the vaulted labyrinth so frequently tracked by Duval.

This brought her eventually to the river-side, where she quickly hired a wherry, and was conveyed in it to Whitehall stairs. Her features being concealed by a hood, she did not fear recognition or molestation.

She found her way without difficulty, though not without some delay, to Dorinda's apartments in the palace. A page, who was in attendance in the gallery appropriated to the Maids of Honour, conducted her to them. She was admitted at once, for Dorinda was expecting her.

Though she had resolved to make a full disclosure of the scheme, Sabine was at first so much agitated that she could scarcely speak; but when she had in some degree recovered her composure, the details she entered into filled her hearer with astonishment and alarm.

Dorinda saw at once the imminence of the peril. But what was to be done? After a moment's reflection, she summoned the page, and dispatched him at once with a message to the King, beseeching his Majesty to grant her an immediate audience on a matter of the utmost import.

"You must accompany me to the King, and tell him all," she said to Sabine.

The unhappy damsel had now become so much terrified, that she would have retreated had it been possible; but Dorinda strove to reassure her by representing that she had a paramount duty to perform, before which every other consideration must give way. She was still employing these arguments, though with indifferent success, when Talbot Harland presented himself.

On seeing him, Sabine immediately sprang to her feet, and with an energy that startled both him and Dorinda, cried, "Go to the Tower at once. You may yet be in time. Go to the Jewel Tower, and remain there. Do not ask for any explanation. Go at once."

"Is this madness?" demanded Talbot, gazing at Dorinda.

"No," she replied, with an earnestness that carried conviction with it. "Do her bidding. She has good reason for giving you the order. A daring attempt is about to be made to carry off the Crown jewels."

"There is yet time to prevent it," cried Sabine.

"Heaven grant I may not be too late!" cried Talbot, appalled by the magnitude of the danger.

Scarcely knowing how he got there, he found himself in another minute at the palace stairs; and springing into a four-wheeled wherry, ordered the watermen to row to the Tower.

"Row for our lives!" he repeated. "'Tis his Majesty's business."

The oars were instantly plunged into the stream, and the boat shot off like an arrow from a bow. Luckily, the tide was running swiftly down.

Shortly after Talbot's departure, the page returned, accompanied by Chiffinch, who brought a very gracious response from his Majesty.

The two damsels were then conducted by the confidential valet through a private passage to the King's apartments.

Charles was in his cabinet, seated in an easy chair, and ruminating upon various matters—his sole companions being some half-dozen long-eared spaniels. He was just setting out to the tennis-court, when Dorinda's message stopped him, for he was too good-natured to refuse her the audience she requested.

Nothing could equal his surprise when she was ushered into his presence, accompanied by Sabine. He immediately rose to receive them, and prevented them from making the profound reverence they contemplated.

Chiffinch, the discreet, having performed his office, immediately retired.

"I fancy you have some favour to ask of me in behalf of this fair damsel," he said, glancing at Sabine, who remained timidly in the background. "Do not hesitate to prefer it. 'Tis granted ere asked."

"'Tis not a favour she solicits, sire," replied Dorinda. "She has a most important disclosure to make to your Majesty."

"Ah, sire," exclaimed Sabine, rushing forward, and throwing herself at the King's feet; "your Majesty has seen through my heart. I have—indeed, indeed, a great boon to ask of you."

"In return for the revelation you are about to make? Ha!" cried Charles. "Well, name the boon?"

"I ask my father's life, which he has most justly forfeited to your Majesty," she cried. "I have betrayed him, and if he is put to death, I shall die, too. I would give my life to purchase his pardon."

"What has your father done?" demanded Charles, gravely. "Before I can hold out any hope of pardon, I must learn the crime he has committed."

"My liege, I tremble to inform you that he has conceived the design of carrying off the Crown jewels from the Tower; but I trust his scheme will prove abortive."

"Talbot Harland is already gone to the Tower, sire, and will take such steps as may be needful," interposed Dorinda.

"Oddsfish!" exclaimed the King. "This is, indeed, a formidable design, and the contriver of it can scarce pass unpunished."

"The scheme would infallibly have succeeded, sire, had I not felt bound to reveal it," said Sabine.

"But why defer the disclosure to the latest moment, so as to give the project a chance of success?" demanded the King.

"I have been kept a close prisoner till within these two hours, my liege, and prevented from holding communication with any one. On making my escape, I flew to Miss Neville, and gave her information of the plot."

"Arise!" exclaimed Charles.

"I will not rise, sire, till you promise me my father's life. I care not what punishment you inflict on me, but spare him."

"You shall be rewarded rather than punished, fair damsel," said the King, raising her gently.

"Reward me by the boon I have asked, sire," she rejoined. "I will accept no other recompense."

Charles made no reply, but stepping towards a table, struck a small silver bell.

At the summons, Chiffinch instantly appeared.

"Bid Lord Feversham repair, with the utmost despatch, to the Tower," he said.

"Any further orders, sire?"

"None. His lordship will learn what he has to do when he arrives there. Stay! Is the Count de Bellegarde in the palace?"

"He is, sire—playing ombre in the Stone Gallery."

"Bid him come to me at once."

Charles watched the effect of this injunction upon Sabine, and perceived that she looked troubled.

"I shall learn something by confronting them together," he thought.

"You have not told me your father's real name?" he added to Sabine. "Disguise nothing, if you would serve him."

"My father is Colonel Blood, of Sarney, in the county of Meath," she replied.

"An arch rebel, and contriver of a plot to seize on Dublin Castle—I remember," observed the King. "When I first saw you, you were called Violet Oldacre."

"My real name is Sabine Blood, sire," she rejoined.

"I do not wish to put many interrogations to you now. But has your father many accomplices?"

"Three, my liege. They are all with him."

"All three?"

"All three, sire."

At this juncture, Bellegarde was ushered in. Whatever might be his secret emotions on beholding Sabine, the Count betrayed no discomposure.

"Your Majesty has sent for me," he said, bowing profoundly.

"I have some questions to ask you. Are you acquainted with Colonel Blood?"

"I have seen him occasionally at the gaming-houses, sire; but I have no particular acquaintance with him."

"You know his daughter Sabine?"

"Is this the young lady, sire? I fancy I have seen her before, but I fail to recall the precise circumstances under which the meeting occurred."

"Will you allow your lover to disown you thus?" observed the King.

"The Count de Bellegarde is not my lover, sire," cried Sabine, with well-feigned indignation. "I know nothing of him."

"Pray mark that, my liege!" cried the Count. "The fair damsel disclaims all knowledge of me. May I venture to ask the object of these questions?"

"You will learn anon. I have not yet finished. Have you seen Colonel Blood of late?"

"Not for several months, sire."

"Think again. He was at Newmarket."

"He might be, and yet escape my notice."

"Will it surprise you to learn that he has formed a daring plan to carry off the Crown jewels?"

"It surprises me beyond measure," cried the Count, affecting extreme astonishment. "But I rejoice that your Majesty has discovered and defeated his design."

"I trust it has been defeated," said the King. "But I am still in uncertainty."

"Ere this, Talbot Harland must have reached the Tower," said Dorinda. "And your Majesty may be sure he will send you instant intelligence."

"But some little time must needs elapse—Ha!"

The exclamation was caused by the sound of a cannon, that shook the room.

"'Tis one of the heavy Tower guns!" cried the King. "Why is it fired?"

"Can your Majesty ask?" exclaimed Dorinda, unable to repress her exultation. "'Tis a signal from Talbot Harland—a signal of success!"

"Heaven preserve my father in this dire extremity!—and pardon me!" murmured Sabine.

Bellegarde became very pale, but gave no other evidence of emotion. Sabine did not dare to look at him.

The King had been listening for another discharge, but none was heard.

"I trust that cannon announced the capture of the daring villain and his associates," he exclaimed. "At any rate, the alarm has been given."

Sabine could not repress a slight cry, and seemed ready to sink.

Touched by her condition, the King said to Dorinda, "Give this unhappy damsel an asylum till I receive further intelligence. I shall then know what to do."

"I will take every care of her, my liege," replied Dorinda, quitting the cabinet with Sabine.

"Hark ye, Count," said the King, drily, as the others were alone. "I believe all you have told me respecting Colonel Blood; but if you have any apprehension of being implicated in his scheme, you had better decamp."

"Decamp, sire! I should be the last man to decamp. Your Majesty wrongs me by these suspicions. If Colonel Blood has been captured—as I trust will prove to be the case—interrogate him; and if he charges me with aiding him in his audacious project, inflict upon me the severest punishment you can devise. With your Majesty's permission, I shall not quit Whitehall."

Bowing profoundly, he withdrew.

XV.

HOW BLOOD'S SCHEME PROSPERED.

WE must now return to Parson Price and his young friends, Cadwallader Griffith and Jenkin Pugh.

On quitting their retreat at Whitefriars, they took boat to the Tower. All three were armed with loaded pistols, and carried with them the bags designed to hold their booty, as well as the various implements which the parson thought would be required.

Mandeville did not accompany the others, his business being to wait with the horses at the foot of Tower Hill, near St. Catherine's Gate.

While passing the guard-chamber, Parson Price stopped to exchange a few friendly words with Knelm, the warden; and that individual afterwards remarked, that he looked as cheerful and unconcerned as usual, and no one would have supposed that he had a criminal design on hand.

On arriving at the Jewel Tower, the party were very warmly welcomed by the old custodian and his wife and daughter.

Regrets were, of course, expressed at Winefred's absence, but Edith was secretly not sorry that she had stayed away. The warning letter made her distrust the young damsel.

Bent upon executing his design without delay, Parson Price took old Edwards aside, and said to him, in a low, confidential tone, "Ever since we left yesterday, Cadwallader has done nothing but talk about your daughter. You are a fortunate man, cousin, in getting such a son-in-law. I don't think much of Merlin's Cave, and its hidden treasures; but I think a great deal of broad acres and substantial farm-houses, and the rents they produce. Cadwallader has three hundred a-year, if he has a penny!"

"And he likes the girl, you say, cousin?"

"Likes her? He adores her! Observe him now!"

"He does regard her very tenderly, I must own, cousin."

"Contrive to leave them together, and I'll warrant you they'll soon come to an understanding."

"Truly, I shall be glad to have it settled. I have no objections to the young man, and my daughter seems to have none. You are certain he has three hundred a-year, cousin?"

"I would I were as certain of my own tithes as he is of his rents. Better land there cannot be than Cadwallader's."

"I'll do it at once," cried old Edwards. "We'll go to the jewel-room, and I'll send my wife down stairs."

With this, he winked at Mrs. Edwards, who at once took the hint and left the room, declaring she was coming back immediately, though she had no such intention.

Parson Price at the same time winked at Jenkin Pugh, and they both followed the old custodian to the jewel chamber.

The loving pair were thus left alone together, and Cadwallader seemed disposed to improve the opportunity.

The moment had now arrived for action. No sooner had they entered the jewel chamber, than Flodoard—for we must now give him his proper designation—contrived to place himself between Edwards and the door, so as to cut off the old custodian's retreat.

This precaution was not unnecessary, for Edwards became alarmed at a sudden change in the parson's demeanour, as well as by the altered expression of his countenance.

"Anything the matter with you, cousin?" he asked.

"'Tis time you knew our real business here," rejoined Blood, in a stern voice, and with a menacing look. "Not to waste time, you will be pleased to understand that we mean to help ourselves to these jewels."

"Ah! have I been deceived by you all this time?" cried Edwards, transported with rage and terror. "You are robbers in disguise! Fool that I was to trust you!"

"Ay, our stratagem has succeeded perfectly!" rejoined Blood, in a mocking tone; "and now, my worthy friend, listen to what I have to say. For your own sake, I advise you to take the matter quietly and philosophically. You shall be no loser by the transaction. I swear to you, by all that is sacred, that we will give you a share in the plunder—a share large enough to make you rich. I do not ask you to help us, but keep quiet."

"Avarice, tempting fiend!" cried Edwards, furiously. "Do you think me capable of betraying my trust?"

"I think you a sensible man, and alive to your interests," observed Blood, with a sneer.

"Oh, that my pistols were within reach!" cried Edwards; "I would soon show you—Help!—treason!—murder!"

A cloak thrown over his head by Flodoard stifled his cries, and while he was in this state the two ruffians bore him to the ground, gagged him, and bound him hand and foot with cords. They then left him in this helpless condition, to watch their proceedings.

Violent hands were first laid by Blood on the imperial crown.

With what eagerness he clutched it! The diamonds seemed to glitter more brightly than ever as he gazed at them.

His intention had been to beat the crown flat with the mallet, in order that he might carry it off with greater ease; but he was now seized with compunction, and stayed his impious hand. The magnificent diadem was, therefore, fortunately preserved from destruction.

While he was thus deliberating, the poor old custodian made desperate but unavailing efforts to free himself, and groaned so dismally, that Blood, with a deep imprecation, threatened to brain him if he did not remain quiet.

Meantime, Flodoard had pounced upon the King's sceptre, and having broken off the cross at the top, which was covered with precious stones, with a large table diamond in the centre, had begun to file the thick, golden rod, which was nearly three feet in length, in order to break it in twain.

Hitherto, nothing had occurred to disturb the villains in their task. Blood had secured the orb, and was unscrewing the head of the ampulla, when some alarming sounds reached him. He cautiously opened the door, and then became assured that a fierce struggle was going on below, between Montalt and some other person.

"Thousand devils!" he exclaimed, as he came back. "We are discovered! We must fly!"

On hearing this, Edwards made another desperate effort to raise himself and utter a cry. The attempt nearly cost the old man his life. Blood dealt him a blow on the head with the mallet that stretched him senseless on the floor.

What a pang it cost the desperate to lose the treasures that he had so nearly made his!

own! He miserably roared with rage and vexation as he gazed his last at them, and, for a moment, thought of sweeping off all he could carry.

But prudence checked his rapacity; and contenting himself, perforce, with the orb and crown—the latter of which he concealed under his gown—he quitted the jewel-chamber.

He was followed by Flodoard, who had broken off the pommel of the sceptre, and secured the rubies and emeralds with which it was adorned, but was obliged to leave the golden rod behind.

XVI.

A STRUGGLE FOR THE CROWN.

LET us now see what had befallen Montalt. Considering the circumstances, he had played his part remarkably well. Indeed, he was really smitten by the charms of the golden-haired damsel. Throwing himself at her feet, he declared his passion, and soon found that he need not despair.

Carried away by the ardour of his feelings, he confessed to the soft-hearted maiden that he had practised a deception upon her; and, having got over this difficulty far better than he expected, he told her all, essaying to inflame her imagination by dilating upon the splendid manner in which they would live abroad; but she was so bewildered, that she scarcely listened to him.

While he was in the midst of these glowing descriptions, the door burst open, and Talbot Harland came in. His manner betokened great excitement.

"Where is your father?" he demanded of Edith.

"In the jewel-chamber, with my cousin Price and a friend," she replied.

"They are robbers who are with him," cried Talbot—"come to steal the Crown jewels, and this is one of them."

"Hold your peace, sir," cried Montalt, drawing a pistol and levelling it at Talbot's head, "or you are a dead man."

But he hesitated to fire, from the fear of giving the alarm; and, seeing this, Talbot sprang upon him, and a desperate struggle took place between them. Edith was so frightened at the sight of the pistol, that she fell back in a half-fainting state.

Meanwhile, the struggle continued, and both being vigorous and extremely active young men, the issue seemed doubtful. The pistol, having dropped from Montalt's grasp, and lay upon the ground.

The combatants were thus engaged, when Blood and Flodoard passed the door, which was left ajar. Blood, being encumbered by the crown, did not attempt to offer any assistance, but Flodoard dashed in at once, and soon liberated his comrade.

By their combined efforts Talbot was thrown to the ground, and with such force that he was stunned for the moment, giving them time to effect their escape.

Picking up the pistol, they went out, locked the door, but did not take away the key, and joined Blood, who was anxiously waiting for them at the entrance. All three then went forth so quietly that they did not attract the attention of the sentry, who was pacing to and fro in front of the tower. As soon, however, as they got to a little distance, they quickened their pace.

The robbers had not been gone more than a minute, when Mrs. Edwards, who had heard some noises for which she could not account, came to the room where she had left her daughter and her suitor, and finding the door locked, instantly unfurnished it, and released Talbot, who by this time had recovered from the fall.

Without entering into any explanation to the astounded dame, who could not imagine how he came there, the young man started in pursuit of the robbers.

As he issued forth, he descried them near the north-west angle of the White Tower, and dashed after them as quickly as he could, shouting lustily as he ran.

His shouts were heard by some warders and musketeers who happened to be on the parade at the time, and these persons seeing the robbers hurry down the descent, to the Bloody Tower, instantly gave chase.

The fugitives had passed through the archway, and were speeding along the outer ward to the Byward Tower, when their pursuers burst from the archway of the Bloody Tower, and gave the alarm.

A sentry was on the bridge, near the Middle Tower, but there was only one warder at the time at the first gate.

This was Kenelm. Hearing the alarm, he instantly put himself in a position to stop the fugitives, though he could scarcely believe his eyes when he perceived that the foremost of them was Parson Price. Blood had got a pistol in his right hand, but he kept it concealed under his cassock. Beneath his other arm he tightly grasped the crown.

"What's the matter, sir?" cried Kenelm, herring the way with his halbert, as the fugitives came up.

"Heaven knows! I don't!" rejoined Blood.

"But let us pass."

"No, sir; I can't do that," said the warder.

"You must stop and give an account of yourselves. I fear I have been greatly mistaken in you, sir."

"No mistake in that!" cried Blood, discharging the pistol at his head.

The bullet brushed the warder's cheek, but did him no harm. Kenelm, however, fell back, and the conspirators rushed on. The sentry on the bridge, startled by the report of the pistol, ordered them to stand; but as they took no heed, he fired at them, and wounding Flodoard in the leg, prevented his further flight. Blood dashed past; but Montalt was seized and detained.

Among the first who came up was Talbot Harland, and finding that Blood had escaped, he hurried after him.

The fugitive flung his useless pistol into the Tower moat, but held another in readiness. He had passed the Lion's Tower without hindrance; but being opposed by another sentry at the Bulwark Gate, he discharged his second pistol at him, and the man, though not hit, dropped.

Once out of the fortress, Blood deemed himself safe. He saw Mandeville, with the horses, near Saint Catherine's Gate, and shouted to him. His vigilant follower, who was on the look-out, at once hastened to meet him.

Loud shouts now told the fugitive that he was hotly pursued; and, looking back, he perceived that Talbot was close behind him. Still he was safe if he could only reach his horse, and Mandeville was pressing on.

Next moment he came up. Blood's hand was upon the saddle, but he could not mount without abandoning the crown, the object of his especial solicitude. While he hesitated, he was seized by Talbot Harland.

"Yield, villain!" cried the young man, almost breathless with exertion. "You are my prisoner!"

Blood offered no resistance, for a dozen musketeers came up at the instant.

No sooner did Mandeville find that his leader was captured, and that he himself must be captured if he stayed, than he galloped off; and though two or three shots were fired at him by the musketeers, he effected his

"What have you got beneath your gown, villain?" demanded Talbot Harland of the captive.

"'Tis the crown," replied Blood, whose ~~eyes~~ ^{face} astonished all those around him. "Own that I have made a gallant struggle for it. Our gracious Sovereign never fought better for his crown. Had I not been loth to part with the diadem, you would not have captured me."

"The treasonable attempt will cost you your head, villain!" said Talbot, as he took the crown from him. "Is this all you have laid hands on? You may as well confess; you will be closely searched anon."

The astonishment of the beholders was increased as Blood coolly produced the orb, and delivered it to his captor.

"Search me as closely as you please, you will find nothing more," he said.

"Bring him to the Tower at once," said Talbot to the musketeers, who had surrounded the prisoner. "He will there be interrogated by Sir Gilbert Talbot."

"Hie on, quickly," he added to Kenelm, the warder, who had followed in the pursuit, "and let a cannon be fired to apprize his Majesty that this desperate attempt has failed."

Kenelm hurried off instantly on the errand.

As this order was issued, a cloud gathered on the prisoner's brow.

"Has the King received information of the attempt?" he asked.

"Ay," replied Talbot, "or I should not have been here to prevent it."

Blood's brow grew darker, and he uttered a deep malediction.

He was then conducted by the guard to the fortress.

Just as he passed through the yawning archway of the By-ward Tower, the thunder of the cannon resounding from the summit of Traitors' Gate, proclaimed his capture.

XVII.

BLOOD IS INTERROGATED BY THE KING.

We must now inquire after the poor old custodian, whom we left bound hand and foot, gagged, and in a state of insensibility on the floor of the jewel-chamber.

In this state he was found by his wife and daughter, who did their best to succour him, but it is certain he would have died of grief if the crown and orb had not been recovered.

When they were brought back to the Jewel Tower, and once more consigned to his custody, his joy was extravagant.

The table diamond, with the rubies, emeralds, and other precious stones, that had broken from the sceptre, were found upon Floard, and restored to the custodian. Nothing, indeed, was lost.

While Blood and his associates underwent an examination by Sir Gilbert Talbot and Lord Faversham, who by this time had arrived at the Tower, Talbot Harland hastened to Whitehall to acquaint the King with the capture of the conspirators.

Charles thanked him warmly for his zeal, and sent for Dorinda and Sabine, that they might hear the details.

Sabine listened to them with the deepest interest; and when Talbot concluded his recital, she again threw herself at the King's feet, and besought her father's life.

Charles raised her kindly, and said, "I am going to the Tower at once, and will interrogate him in person. If mercy can be shown it shall not be withheld. That is all the promise I can make."

Attended only by Talbot Harland, the King then proceeded to the Tower, and on arriving there, repaired at once to the Lieutenant's lodgings, where he found Sir Gilbert Talbot and Lord Faversham, both of whom appeared well pleased to see his Majesty.

"Blood is obstinacy personified," said Sir Gilbert. "We have threatened to put him to the rack, but he derides the threat, and declares he will confess nothing save to your Majesty. His accomplices are just as obstinate."

"Where is the arch-traitor?" demanded Charles.

"He is now in the Devilin Tower," replied Sir Gilbert. "His comrades are in separate cells of the lower dungeon. One of them has been slightly wounded. Your Majesty will be pleased to learn that all the jewels have been recovered."

"That is well," replied Charles. "Let Blood be brought before me. I will interrogate him myself."

Orders were immediately given to that effect; and Charles proceeded to the council-chamber, a large room in which state prisoners were usually examined.

Here the conspirators engaged in the Gunpowder Treason were examined by the Commissioners; and a monument was subsequently placed within it to commemorate the event. The body of King James the First occupied a chamber near this monument. Portraits of the King of Salisbury, of the Duke of Northampton, Nottingham, and Suffolk, of Sir Edward Dacre and Sir William Waade, Lieutenant of the Tower in King James's time, adorned the panels. A long oak table stood in the midst of the room, and on either side of this table were ranged carved oak chairs, with a raised seat at the head, on which the King seated himself.

After the lapse of a few minutes, a door at the lower end of the room was opened by Sir Gilbert Talbot, and the prisoner was brought in by two musketeers.

Having placed him at a certain distance from the royal chair, the guards, at a sign from the King, retired. Sir Gilbert Talbot also withdrew.

The King and Blood were then left alone. There was a brief silence, during which Charles fixed a searching glance upon the prisoner, who bore the scrutiny unmoved.

Blood was now free from the canonicals in which he had disguised himself, and appeared in his ordinary apparel. His demeanour was bold, but respectful; and when brought before the King, he made a profound reverence. As Charles did not address him, he at last broke silence.

"As yet, I have refused to speak," he said, in a firm voice; "and the torture with which I have been threatened by Sir Gilbert Talbot would not have forced a word from me. But I am ready to answer any question put to me by your Majesty."

"I recognise in you my nocturnal visitor at Knole," observed Charles, still regarding him steadfastly.

"Yes, my liege, I am he," replied Blood. "Since that night I have been the happy instrument of saving your Majesty from many a secret peril. I have been untiring in my zeal to serve you."

"The desperate act you have just committed is scarcely consistent with your professions of zeal in my service," said the King, coldly.

"Is it possible your Majesty does not discern my motive for the act?" rejoined Blood, with an almost incredible effrontery. "I fancied it would be palpable to you, if to me and else. Looked upon as they now are, these jewels are a mine of wealth entirely lost to your Majesty. The idea occurred to me that I could enable you to turn them to account. Had my scheme succeeded, your Majesty would have been a gainer by some millions. I knew that your private purse is not too well-stocked."

In spite of himself, the King could not help laughing.

"Then you meant first to rob me, and next bring me the proceeds of the robbery, eh?" he said.

"Precisely, my liege, and I think you will own it was an admirably devised plan. For obvious reasons, I could not consult your Majesty beforehand; but I felt sure you would prefer money to diamonds. Though the scheme has failed, I deserve my reward, since I have endangered my life in your Majesty's service."

"I can scarcely credit your representations," said the King, upon whom the prisoner's extraordinary assurance had produced an impression.

"I can convince you of their truth, my liege," said Blood. "You have no one near you, not even Chiffinch, on whom you may so confidently rely as on me. When I had last the honour of conversing with your Majesty, I explained that I am the head of a secret society, the members of which are bound by a terrible oath to avenge each other. Were you to put me to death, the poniards of my comrades would inevitably reach you; but I have to such apprehension. So far from punishing me, I am persuaded you will adequately reward my zeal and devotion. Employ me, sire, and you will find me faithful and ready to obey your slightest behest, be it what it may. If I am unscrupulous, I am loyal and staunch to the backbone."

Blood's manner has been described by Evelyn as dangerously insinuating. On the present occasion, his rough plausibility captivated the King.

"You are already engaged to the Duke of Buckingham," observed Charles.

"Not to speak it profanely, sire, I do not serve two masters. If I devote myself to you, I shall serve you only. With me at your elbow, you will have nothing to fear. You will learn all the secrets of your enemies."

"Answer me one question, and answer it truly," said the King. "Has the Count de Bellegarde had aught to do with this scheme?"

"I am the sole contriver of it, my liege. The plan, as I have explained, was for your Majesty's benefit, and was only confided to those over whom I have perfect control."

For some moments Charles appeared lost in reflection.

Blood watched him narrowly, and felt sure he had gained his point. Nor was he mistaken.

"I think you may prove useful to me," said the King, at length. "I will therefore retain you. You shall have a post at Court."

"Your Majesty will never regret your generosity," cried Blood, scarcely able to repress his exultation.

"Stay!" exclaimed Charles; "there is a difficulty that I have overlooked. You are the author of the attack on the Duke of Ormond?"

"I will not attempt to deny it, my liege," returned Blood.

"You must have his pardon as well as mine."

"His Grace will refuse nothing to your Majesty. He will forgive me far more readily than he will forgive the Duke of Buckingham."

Charles made no remark on the latter observation, but struck a small bell that was placed on the table near him.

The summons immediately brought in the guard; while Sir Gilbert Talbot, with Lord Feversham and Talbot Harland, issued from a side door.

Blood folded his arms on his broad chest, and regarded them haughtily. They were all amazed at his audacity.

"I trust your Majesty has found the prisoner less contumacious than I found him," observed Gilbert.

"He has answered all my questions frankly and satisfactorily," replied Charles.

"Then, I presume, the interrogation is ended. Let him be removed, and taken back to the Devilin Tower."

Upon this, the guards advanced, but were checked by a gesture from the King.

"The prisoner is free!" cried Charles. "I have pardoned him!"

"Pardoned him, sire?" exclaimed Sir Gilbert, scarcely able to credit what he heard. "It is not for me to question the wisdom of your Majesty's decision, but——"

"His offence is personal to myself."

"True, my liege."

"I have, therefore, a right to forgive it. I have pardoned him and his associates."

"But he has been guilty of other crimes, sire. He is suspected of being the leader of the attack on his Grace of Ormond."

"He has confessed his guilt," said the King. "But there are mitigating circumstances."

"Mitigating circumstances!" exclaimed Lord Feversham, astounded.

"Ay, my lord," replied the King. "You will go at once to Clarendon House; tell the Duke of Ormond what I have said, and use your best endeavours with his Grace to obtain from him Colonel Blood's pardon."

"I will do your Majesty's bidding," rejoined

Lord Feversham; "but I confess that I do not like the errand."

So saying, he withdrew.

"What is to be done with Blood and his associates, sire?" asked Sir Gilbert Talbot.

"Let them be detained till the Duke of Ormond's answer is received," replied the King. "If favourable, as I anticipate it will be, they are immediately to be discharged."

With this, he quitted the council-chamber, and immediately afterwards returned to Whitehall, attended by Talbot Harland.

Before his Majesty's departure, Sir Gilbert Talbot besought him to gratify the poor old custodian of the Jewel Tower by a visit; but, though ordinarily good-natured, Charles refused. Perhaps he did not like to see the old man, after pardoning his assailants.

He had not long returned to Whitehall, when Lord Feversham made his appearance.

"Well, what says the Duke?" demanded Charles.

"These are his exact words, my liege: 'If his Majesty can forgive Blood for stealing the crown, I can easily forgive him the attempt on my life. 'Tis enough for me to learn his Majesty's pleasure.' That was all he said."

"A noble answer, and worthy of him," cried Charles. "Now go back to the Tower, and let the prisoners be liberated."

BOOK THE FOURTH:

THE MULBERRY GARDEN.

I.

FLORIO.

Nor many days after Colonel Blood's liberation from the Tower, he was established at Whitehall, with a secret pension of five hundred a-year.

He now gave himself an air of great importance, dressed richly, and was constantly to be seen amid the throng of courtiers assembled in the Stone Gallery. Though hated by the young gallants, and shunned by the graver members of the Court, he escaped insult, owing to his formidable character.

The familiarity with which he was treated by the King could not fail to give him weight, and suitors began to apply to him to use his influence in their behalf with his Majesty. But his influence, such as it was, was never exercised—save for a consideration. This he made the applicants clearly understand.

He had the privilege of the back-stairs, and was always privately admitted to the cabinet. He was the terror of ushers, pages, and lackeys, but was on very good terms with Chiffinch, who was secretly rather afraid of him.

With the Count de Bellegarde, Blood was rather distant, and there did not appear to be any intimacy between them.

The conduct of Charles towards a desperado whose offences were so enormous and so notorious, has always appeared incomprehensible to historians—and it remains a mystery to this day, unless we have succeeded in throwing a light upon it.

Blood's apartments were in the wing of the Palace that stood between the privy garden and the inner court. The rooms were pleasant enough, and tolerably well furnished. His three followers, who had been liberated from the Tower at the same time, as himself, were constantly with him, and proved very useful in various ways. Perhaps he meditated some other extraordinary coup—who knows? If he did so, he was prevented from accomplishing it, as will be seen.

Sabine had disappeared. She had incurred his displeasure, and he made no inquiries about her.

Just before Blood entered upon his post at Whitehall, a very good-looking, dark-eyed youth, named Florio, was appointed one of the Queen's pages. Placed in attendance on the maids of honour by Chiffinch, Florio soon became an especial favourite with Dorinda Neville, and was constantly in her ante-chamber.

Talbot Harland could not fail to hear of the pretty page, but, strange to say, he never caught sight of him.

To be jealous of a page was absurd, but Talbot could not repress the feeling; and when paying a visit one morning to Dorinda, he took occasion to mention the matter to her. She laughed at him very heartily, and said,—

"Some time ago you chose to be jealous of the Count de Bellegarde. Now you are still more unreasonable, and trouble your silly head about my poor little Florio. I own I am fond of the boy. He is by far the prettiest of her Majesty's pages; and so amiable and obliging, that I have chosen him for my own particular attendant, and he devotes himself exclusively to me."

"So I hear," replied Talbot, very much piqued by her manner.

"I find him very agreeable," she pursued. "He sings like a nightingale, and plays the guitar better than the Count de Bellegarde."

"No end of accomplishments," observed Talbot, with a sneer.

"My aunt, Lady Muskerrey, will tell you that he dances delightfully. Indeed, he cannot help dancing well, for he has the lightest and most graceful figure imaginable."

It was evident that she wished to heighten her lover's jealousy; and she succeeded.

Talbot could not conceal his annoyance.

"Is he here?" he cried, quickly. "If so, pray call him. I should like to see whether he is as charming as represented."

"I dare say you will find him in the ante-chamber when you go forth," she rejoined.

"I shall certainly not summon him."

"Then I will!" he cried, clapping his hands.

"What ho, Florio!"

The door was partially opened, and the symmetrical figure of a page was visible for an instant.

Only for an instant, for Dorinda called out to him not to come in, and the page vanished.

Talbot had sense enough left to perceive that he was making himself ridiculous, and that by any further exhibition of ill-temper, he might forfeit Dorinda's regard.

He, therefore, deemed it expedient to alter his tone; and had begun to assume a penitent air, when Lady Muskerrey came in.

Her ladyship was as fantastically dressed as usual, and her cheeks were covered with fard and patches.

After kissing Dorinda, and saluting Talbot, she said, "I am come to propose a walk in St. James's Park. The morning is enchanting. His Majesty and the Duchess of Portsmouth are gone to feed the ducks in the long canal. All the world is out and taking an airing. Shall we go?"

"By all means, aunt," replied Dorinda. "Let us go to Rosamond's Pond and the Bird-cage Walk."

"Agreed!" cried her ladyship. "The Bird-cage Walk will lead us to the Lime Walk, and the Lime Walk will bring us to the Mulberry Gardens, where there is a concert. We can go in and hear it."

"And while listening to the music, we can eat cheese-cakes, aunt. I detest the cheese-cakes at the Mulberry Gardens."

"They are excellent," cried her ladyship. "You shall eat as many as you please."

"I hope I may be permitted to snake one of the party?" said Talbot.

"I counted upon you," replied Lady Muskerrey. "Apropos, Dorinda, we must have your pretty page, Florio, with us. You have seen Florio, of course, Mr. Harland? Is he not charming?"

"Mr. Harland saw him for a moment just now, aunt," interposed Dorinda. "But it is impossible I can bring him."

"Why not, my love?"

"He never leaves the palace, aunt," he did, if you think Mr. Harland would care for his attendance," she added, smiling.

"Oh, you're quite mistaken!" he cried.

But finding he was again getting on dangerous ground, he made his bow, promising to meet them in half an hour at Rosamond's Pond.

As he passed through the ante-chamber, he looked about for Florio, but the page was not to be seen.

There were several pages in the gallery, and Florio might be among them; but how was he to distinguish him?

II.

ST. JAMES'S PARK.

NEVER was St. James's Park more agreeable as a place of promenade than in Charles the Second's time.

Properly speaking, it belonged to the palace; but the good-natured monarch liked to be surrounded by his subjects, and so threw it open to them.

During the Protectorate, the park had been much neglected; but on the Restoration, Charles laid it out according to his own taste, improving it in many ways by opening a variety of charming walks among the trees, and embellishing them with a multitude of ornamental objects.

Besides enlarging Rosamond's Pond, he formed a long canal, which he stocked with wild-fowl. Narrow as it was, this canal boasted an island, and the island possessed a governor, who was no other than the famous St. Evremont.

Connected with the canal was a large decoy for wild-ducks. A ring fence for deer added greatly to the attractions of this part of the park.

Lady Muskerrey had correctly informed her niece that the King and the Duchess of Portsmouth had walked forth to the long canal. They were attended by the Duke of Buckingham and the Countess of Bellaguard.

His Majesty was strolling slowly along the banks of the canal, feeding the ducks, which swam after him by dozens. Nothing pleased the King more than to witness their content as they browsed on the food which he threw among them. But at last his supply was exhausted, and he walked on with the Duchess, who, notwithstanding, was not quite so much amused as he was by the spectacle.

The day was delightful, the flowers were in full bloom, and the Lime Walk, which was at the end of Rosamond's Pond, was crowded with a brilliant company of gallants in velvet doublets of every hue, all eyes being directed perukes, and with fair dames in exquisite morning costumes.

Though Charles, as we have said, placed no restraint upon those who chose to take exercise within the park, he was rarely intruded upon, and all who now passed him bowed respectfully, and went on.

He was followed, however, at a certain distance, by four individuals, who remained stationary when he halted, and moved on when he resumed his promenade.

These persons were well dressed, and wore long rapiers; and one of them, whose habiliments were somewhat richer, and his rapier even longer, than those of his companions, had a haughty, defiant look, which could belong to no other than Colonel Blood.

Blood it was, who, with his comrades, acted as a guard to the King. Hitherto, Charles had dispensed with such attendance, but Blood persuaded him that the precaution was necessary.

After chatting for some minutes with the Duchess of Portsmouth, Charles allowed her to walk on with Buckingham, and as soon as she was out of hearing, addressed himself to Bellegarde.

"I want some information from you, Count," he said. "What has become of Blood's daughter? The ungrateful girl left Whitehall without even staying to thank me for the pardon which, at her solicitation, I had granted her father."

"Perhaps she was afraid of seeing your Majesty, thinking you might ask some favour in return, that she might not be disposed to grant."

"Her flight annoyed me greatly," said Charles. "Her image haunts me, and I must see her again. I have questioned Blood about her, but he professes to be entirely ignorant of her retreat; and, in this instance, I think he speaks the truth. Dorinda Nevill, I am sure, knows whither she has fled, but I can elicit nothing from her. As a last resource, I address myself to you."

"Your Majesty could not apply to any one less able to assist you."

"Say no more, Count, and then I may credit the wisdom. I am certain you know where she is."

"Since your Majesty entertains that conviction, it becomes incumbent on me to affirm the contrary. Nevertheless—"

"That is far more than I desire, please," said Charles, without waiting for a reply, he quitted his post, and rejoined the Duchess.

"The Duke of Buckingham has just been relating to me a strange circumstance connected with Claude Duval, sire," observed the Duchess, as the King came up.

"With Claude Duval?" exclaimed Charles. "Has the rascal reappeared?"

"He threatens to do so," rejoined Buckingham, laughing. "I have just received a cartel from him."

"Oddsfish! that's excellent!" cried the King, laughing. "How was the challenge delivered?"

"Your Majesty shall hear," replied the Duke. "Pray listen to the story, Count," he added, to Bellegarde. "It will amuse you. The other night, while I was chatting with Wycherley and Sedley in the blue saloon, Lady Muskerrey and a bevy of fair dames came out of the ball-room, where dancing was going on, and pressed me to sing my ballad about Claude Duval.

"Not being in the humour to oblige them, I excused myself by saying that Duval's achievements had been completely thrown into the shade by Blood's late exploit at the Tower, and that I believed the gallant robber had retired from his profession in disgust. At all events, until he performed some fresh action more daring and surprising than any that had gone before, I should cease to chant his praises. They tried hard to persuade me to sing a few couplets, but I continued inexorable.

"Well, I thought no more of the circumstance until this morning, when, as I was passing along the Stone Gallery, a page slipped a letter into my hand. Fancying it might be a billet-doux, though I had no idea who could send me one, I did not read it at the moment. Guess my surprise when I found that it came from Claude Duval!"

"Have you the letter with you?" inquired the King.

"Yes, my liege," replied the Duke. "And I think the rascal's impertinence will amuse you. It is addressed, as you perceive, 'To his Grace the Duke of Buckingham.'"

"Mr. John Dury—"

"I have felt highly flattered by being made the hono^r of one of those inimitable ballads which your Grace alone can compose, and which afford so much amusement to the wisest monarch in Europe.

"I am obliged to leave the ballad merely your Grace, and I trust you will not refuse me that extraordinary gratification."

"Apropos of this ballad! Your Grace was pleased to state the other night, to a party of Court dames at Whitehall, that I have retired from my profession in disgust, because I have been superseded by Colonel Blood."

"Your Grace has been misinformed. I do not recognise Colonel Blood, and I shall not retire till the list of achievements I have marked out for myself is complete."

"The most important feat of all remains to be accomplished."

"My catalogue, as I need scarcely remark to your Grace, who is as well acquainted with it as myself, comprises the names of many illustrious persons—His Majesty and the Duchess of Portsmouth, Lady Muskerry and the Duchess of Cleveland, Count de Bellegarde and Mr. Talbot Harland."

"But it wants the great name of the Duke of Buckingham."

"I trust to have the honour of an early meeting with your Grace, when I will satisfy you that I have not abandoned my old pursuit, and at the same time furnish you with material for the finishing couplet of your incomparable ballad."

"A notre prochaine rencontre!"

"CLAUDE DUVAL."

All his hearers laughed most heartily as the Duke concluded the letter.

"What think you of it, my liege?" cried the Duke.

"Think of it!" exclaimed Charles, laughing. "Oddsfish! 'tis the most delicious piece ofrodomontade I ever heard!"

"What puzzles me, is how Duval can have heard of the remarks made by your Grace to Lady Muskerry and the other ladies," observed the Duchess, to Buckingham.

"Bah!" cried Charles. "Lady Muskerry is the greatest gossip on earth, and repeats all the tittle-tattle she hears."

"Your Grace says the letter was delivered to you by a page," observed Bellegarde. "Did you notice him?"

"I had not time," replied the Duke. "Almost at the instant the note was slipped into my hand, the bearer disappeared."

"Your Grace's name will figure in Monsieur Duval's catalogue—on that you may rely," cried the Duchess of Portsmouth, laughing. "I hope you will oblige him by adding your famous ballad," she added, with a slightly mocking tone.

"Impossible to foretell what may happen," replied the Duke. "But I rather think not."

"If you are caught, I will bet a hundred guineas that you do sing it," cried Bellegarde.

"Done!" rejoined Buckingham. "I will go further; I will give you a hundred guineas for every couplet I sing."

"And two hundred for the finale," laughed Bellegarde.

"The bet will come to nothing," remarked Charles. "The whole thing is a jest, got up at your Grace's expense by the ladies whom you disappointed of the ballad. Ridiculous to suppose that the note in question came from Claude Duval. They are trying to frighten you."

"I venture to differ in opinion from your Majesty," replied Buckingham. "I believe the note does come from Duval. But if the rascal attempts to stop me, he shall pay for his temerity with his life."

"Come, let us go to the Mulberry Garden, and eat cheeseques," observed Charles, to the Duchess of Portsmouth.

And they walked on in that direction.

III.

CHEESECAKES AND CHAMPAGNE.

THE Mulberry Garden has long since disappeared, and Buckingham Palace occupies its site.

Dr. King's lines seem almost prophetic. He thus wrote about the spot in 1709:—

"The fate of things lies always in the dark:
What Cavalier would know St. James's Park?
A princely palace on that space does rise,
Where Sedley's noble mausoleum mulberries."

The place derived its name from a grove of mulberry trees planted by James I, who was anxious to naturalise the silkworm; and although the experiment failed, the trees flourished, and eventually became the chief ornament of the extensive pleasure-gardens laid out on the spot.

Arbours, in which collations and suppers could be served; smooth-shaven grass-plots, on which dancing sometimes took place; long, shady alleys, or "lovers' walks" as they were styled; and a wilderness, so thick and tangled, that those who ventured within it were not unfrequently lost; these constituted the attractions of the Mulberry Garden.

In the midst stood a tavern, renowned for its wines and its cuisine, and noted also for the extravagance of its charges. To this tavern was attached a large room, in which concerts, balls, and other entertainments were given.

No place of public amusement was more in vogue than the Mulberry Garden in the time of the Merry Monarch. It is often referred to by the dramatists and satirical writers of the period, and has given the title to one of Sedley's best comedies. Amongst other things, the place was celebrated for its cheesecakes. Everybody resorted there to eat them.

His Majesty's appearance in the Mulberry Garden did not create any extraordinary sensation—it being understood that at such times he entirely dispensed with form and etiquette. Of course, a certain deference was paid him, and his movements and those of his attendants were watched with interest, but no one intruded upon the royal party.

Though the hour was early, there was a good deal of well-dressed company in the garden, and a peculiar character was given to the scene, since many of the ladies wore too masks.

The pleasant game of pall-mall, which, after a long discontinuance, has been revived in our days under the appellation of croquet, was being played with great spirit by a number of fair dames and gaily attired gallants on the lawn.

A band placed in an orchestra near the tavern enlivened the company with its strains. Mirth and good humour seemed generally to prevail, for a great deal of jesting and laughter was heard among the assemblage. To make the most of the passing hour, and banish reflection, was the main object in those halcyon days.

No one went to the Mulberry Garden save for amusement; and everybody found it there, except, perhaps, those who were jealous of their spouses. But these were in the minority, since, happily, jealousy was then out of fashion.

We shall not follow the couples that sought the seclusion of the shady alley, or lost themselves amid the groves of mulberry trees, but confine ourselves to the lively picture offered to our view in the centre of the garden. There we shall find plenty to look at.

On the lawn, as we have said, or on the broad gravel-walks around it, all the best part of the company was assembled. A concert was going on in the music-hall within the tavern, but few were disposed to listen to it. The day being very fine, they preferred the open air amusements.

Little parties were collected round rustic tables placed beneath the mulberry trees, devouring cheesecakes and drinking ale; while others, who preferred retirement, had similar refreshments served to them in the arbours.

Altogether, it was a very gay scene, and he must have been a cynic indeed who could not be amused by it.

On entering the Mulberry Garden, the first persons whom his Majesty, and those with him, encountered, were Lady Muskerrey and her companions.

Notwithstanding her absurdities, her ladyship was a great favourite with the Duchess of Portsmouth, and she was, consequently, permitted to join the royal party. Dorinda, who was very fond of pall-mall, and played the game to admiration, was invited to join the party on the lawn, and readily assented.

Talbot likewise excelled in the game, and took care not to be left out; and the Count de Bellegarde, who played at everything, and played everything well, followed suit.

Lady Muskerrey would have followed suit, but her niece would not allow her to make herself publicly ridiculous.

While engaged in this pleasant pastime, Dorinda looked charming. Nothing could be better calculated to display the singular graces of her figure than this game; and her bloom was heightened by the exercise.

Talbot was more in love than ever; and having eyes only for her, played very badly, and got laughed at, while Bellegarde performed wonders.

The King, who, as we know, liked all sorts of pastimes, watched the game with interest, and bestowed unqualified commendation on Dorinda's performance.

Colemeel Blood felt it incumbent upon himself to follow his royal master into the garden, but he kept at a respectful distance; and, seeing that the King was likely to remain, he sat down with his comrades at a table under a mulberry-tree, whence he could discern all that was going on.

"I thought we came here to eat cheesecakes, and not to look at that tiresome game of pall-mall," observed the Duchess.

Begging her a thousand pardons, Charles addressed himself to Buckingham, who undertook that all should be ready in a very few minutes; and he hurried off to his good as his word, for he presently returned, and conducted them to an arbour, where an excellent collation had been laid out.

They were waited upon by the master of the garden, and his principal attendants. No ceremony was observed. Lady Muskerrey and Buckingham sat down at the table, and, ere long, the party was reinforced by Dorinda and the two gallants, when they had finished their game at pall-mall.

The ladies greatly enjoyed the chesscakes, and did not object to the champagne that accompanied them.

The Count de Bellegarde, as usual, made himself extremely agreeable, and was diverting the company with a very amusing story, when his cloak was slightly pulled, and a billet slipped into his hand.

Seated, as he was, at the entrance of the harbour, his position favoured the delivery of the billet.

Covering it with his laced handkerchief, he went on with his story, as if nothing had happened.

Perhaps he thought the incident had escaped observation. If so, he was mistaken.

As soon as he finished, the King began to rally him unmercifully.

"What, Count!" he cried; "the ladies will not let you alone! You cannot pass an hour in the Mulberry Garden without making a conquest!"

"More conquests are made in the Mulberry Garden than anywhere else," observed Buckingham; "but the billet just received by the Count came from the palace."

"How know you that?" cried Charles.

"Because it was delivered by a page."

"Are you certain?"

"Ask Talbot Harland, sire. He is sitting opposite Bellegarde, and must have seen the bearer of the billet."

"He certainly appeared to be a page," said Talbot, when appealed to by his Majesty. "But he was masked."

"Oddsfish! that does not mend the matter," cried Charles.

Then, turning to Bellegarde, he added, "Your ignorance ought to be more prudent than to send a page here on such an errand."

"Have I your Majesty's permission to open the billet?"

"Oh! by all means. I feel for your impatience," cried the King, in a bantering tone.

"'Tis not from a lady," said the Count.

"Not from a lady!" exclaimed Buckingham. "Then I'll be sworn it comes from Claude Duval."

"A good guess," cried Bellegarde. "It is from Duval. What is more, it relates to your Grace."

"To me! Then pray let us hear it."

"Fortunately, it is not long," observed Bellegarde, proceeding to read the note.

"Monsieur le Comte,—

"You are a friend of the Duke of Buckingham, and may possibly learn from his Grace that I have a little affair to arrange with him.

"Our meeting is unavoidable, and cannot be long delayed.

"Should the Duke venture to ride forth alone, I would counsel him to carry plenty of cash. He will find it more serviceable than pistols.

"Pray tell him so from

"CLAUDE DUVAL."

"After this warning, your Grace is scarcely likely to ride out unattended," observed Bellegarde, in a slightly mocking tone. "But if you do, carry a well-lined purse in your pocket. 'Twill be the safest plan."

"I will carry something better," rejoined the Duke, rather sharply. "But how comes it that the rascal can get his notes delivered by one of the royal pages?"

"Pooh! the whole thing is a jest," cried the King. "I believe Lady Muskerry herself to be at the bottom of it."

"I, sire!" exclaimed her ladyship. "I have always maintained that Monsieur Claude Duval is the mirror of politeness, and dances the gaillarde better than any other man, but I don't bribe the pages to convey his letters."

"But haven't you and your niece been playing a trick upon the Duke? Come!—confess!"

"Your Majesty is quite wrong in your suspicions," observed Dorinda.

"'Tis all very well to deny it," whispered Talbot to Dorinda; "but you must have had some hand in the trick, I am quite sure. This mysterious page is no other than your favourite Florio."

"Hush!" she rejoined, imposing silence upon him. "Don't speak of Florio now."

MORE CHAMPAGNE AND CHEESECAKES.

The Colonel had ordered a flask of Rhenish, and they had nearly finished it, when, to their great surprise, they saw the old custodian of the Jewel Tower and his daughter approach them.

Old Edwards looked very feeble, but Edith was as charming and obsequious as ever. She was very tastefully attired, and her symmetrical figure and golden tresses excited general admiration. She had to sustain a good deal of ogling as she moved along the walk, and she sustained it well.

Blood was not in the slightest degree abashed by the sight of the man whose life he had well-nigh taken; on the contrary, he appeared delighted to see him.

Uttering a joyful exclamation, he sprang from his seat, and rushing towards Edwards, seized both his hands, and after shaking them cordially, saluted his daughter.

Scarcely giving the old man time to speak, Blood forced him into a chair, and then called out lustily to an attendant to bring a bottle of champagne, with a dish of cheesecakes for the young lady.

If Blood only feigned satisfaction at the old custodian's unexpected appearance, Montalt was really enchanted to see Edith again. His passion for the golden-tressed damsel had by no means abated.

With the utmost empressment he led her to a seat at the table, and recommenced the attentions he had paid her at the Jewel Tower. Nor were his attentions unfavourably received. Things had taken such an extraordinary turn, that she could not be angry with him.

Luckily, the champagne was not long in coming, and a glass of it raised the old man's spirits, and brought back all his daughter's vivacity.

"Another glass, my good friend," said Blood, pouring out a bumper. "You can now afford to laugh at that adventure at the Jewel Tower. Ho, ho! there's a mystery about that affair," he added, with a tremendous wink; "a mystery which, with all your penetration, you will never be able to unriddle."

"I can solve the enigma," remarked Edith; "but it won't do to speak out."

And she glanced at Montalt, who replied by a significant look, that told her she was quite right in her surmise.

"The affair has certainly had a very different result from what might have been anticipated," observed Edwards to Blood. "You have been honoured and rewarded, while I have been upbraided and disgraced."

"Not disgraced, father," interposed Edith. "You have not been commended by his Majesty for your conduct, but you have not been disgraced."

"Not to be commended under such circumstances is equivalent to disgrace," said Edwards. "At least, I feel it to be so."

"A drop more champagne, my good friend," said Blood, again filling his glass. "Twill cheer your heart. To what lucky chance do I owe the pleasure of seeing you and your fair daughter in the Mulberry Garden?"

"I have been to Whitehall in quest of you, Colonel, and have followed you hither," said Edwards.

"Then you have some favour to solicit, my worthy sir," rejoined Blood, in a patronising tone. "Tis granted ere 'tis asked. I have some little interest with his Majesty."

"I am quite aware of it, Colonel," said the other; "I am told that suitors now constantly apply to you."

"You have not been incorrectly informed," observed Blood. "But what can I do for you?—ha!"

"My father desires nothing, Colonel, except to have his case represented to the King," interposed Edith. "His feelings are hurt that his services have not been recognised."

"But I am scarcely a fitting person to represent his case," said Blood, with a half-smile.

"Pardon me!" cried Edwards; "no one knows so well as yourself what efforts I made to preserve the crown."

"Let me tell you in confidence, my good friend," said Blood, tapping his nose as he spoke, "you would have pleased his Majesty much better if you had offered no resistance. Do you understand?—ha!"

"I would rather not understand," replied Edwards. "I did my duty."

"And you have your reward!" observed Blood, with a sneer.

"I always tell my father that he did wrong," said Edith; "but I can't convince him."

"You never will convince him," rejoined the old man. "A few gracious words from his Majesty are all I ask; and those he cannot, will not, refuse me."

"No more, my good friend. You quite touch my feelings," cried the arch hypocrite. "I will mention the matter to his Majesty, and I doubt not I shall prevail; but you have unwittingly offended him."

"Is it possible he can entertain such feelings towards one who has risked his life in defence of his trust?"

"My good friend, you will not understand. But come, champagne is the best remedy for grief. Here is a fresh bottle. Try it. Help the young lady, Montalt. We will drink to your daughter's speedy marriage. My friend Montalt is just as eligible as Cadwallar Pugh. He has not got three hundred a-year in land, or Merlin's Cave, with its hidden treasures; but he is a handsome young gallant, though I say it to his face, and knows how to make money."

"And to spend it, too, I doubt not," said

Edwards. "Such a graceless galliard will not suit me."

"I should take umbrage at the term you have applied to me, sir," exclaimed Montalt; "did not my love for your fair daughter restrain me. Let me tell you, sir, that I am in a fair way of promotion; and when, through the interest of Colonel Blood, I have obtained the post to which I aspire, you will think very differently of me."

"Between ourselves, 'tis an excellent post," observed Blood to the old custodian. "But I must not particularize it."

"You will excuse me if I appear distrustful, Colonel; but I have been deceived once."

"You were wrong then, my good friend, and are wrong now," said Blood, in a low, confidential tone. "Don't discourage the young gentleman's suit. Your daughter evidently likes him."

"We will talk more about it when he has got the post," rejoined Edwards. "Meantime, I cannot allow him to come to the Jewel Tower."

Edith and her suitor here exchanged a glance, which seemed to intimate that the prohibition would not be very strictly attended to.

Just at this moment, the royal party, having finished their repast, issued from the arbour, and proceeded along the walk that passed near the table where Blood and the others were seated.

"As I live, there is his Majesty!" cried Edwards. "I did not know he was in the garden. Here is the opportunity I have prayed for. Present me to him, I entreat you, Colonel."

"Impossible, my good friend—quite impossible!" cried Blood, rising from his seat, and looking very much disturbed. "However much I may desire to serve you, I cannot—dare not do it. His Majesty would be highly displeased. Take my advice, and keep out of his sight."

"Get them out of the garden as quickly as you can," he added in a whisper to Montalt.

Montalt made an attempt to obey, but neither Edwards nor his daughter would stir from the spot.

Edith had caught sight of the Count de Bellegarde; and, besides, the vain little coquette almost fancied that his Majesty would notice her.

V.

THE OLD CUSTODIAN OBTAINS A PENSION FROM THE KING.

MEANTIME, the royal party came on; laughing and talking gaily.

The King and the Duchess of Portsmouth were a little in advance of the others.

"His Majesty will listen to me, I am sure!" cried Edwards, seized by an irresistible impulse. "Since you refuse to present me, I will throw myself at his feet."

"Madman!" cried Blood, trying to detain him.

But the old custodian broke away from his grasp, and, rushing forward, prostrated himself before the King.

So sudden was the act, that Charles really thought the suppliant had lost his senses.

"'Tis the keeper of the Crown jewels, sire. Do you not recognise him?" said the Duchess of Portsmouth.

"Oddsfish! so it is," cried the King, rather annoyed at being thus addressed in public, but assuming a gracious manner. "Arise, my good friend, and tell me what I can do for you."

"I have suffered much, my liege; but I ask nothing beyond an assurance from your Majesty that I have faithfully discharged my trust. If I do not receive it, I shall die heart-broken."

"Brave old man! he deserves a noble recompense," cried the Duchess.

"Great injustice appears to have been done you, my good friend, but it shall be promptly repaired," said the King, in a sympathising voice. "From what you say, I fear that the messages, expressive of my strong approval of your conduct, have not been delivered to you."

"No such messages have reached me, my liege," replied the old man. "But it gladdens my heart to learn that you are satisfied with me. I feared otherwise."

"You shall have wherewithal to gladden your heart," cried Charles. "Services like yours cannot be adequately rewarded, but a pension shall at once be bestowed upon you. Let this be done," he added, turning to Buckingham.

"I humbly thank your Majesty for your bounty," said the old man, bending deeply. "But your gracious words are more to me than the pension. I shall now die content."

"Think not of dying," cried Charles in a tone well calculated to cheer him. "I trust you will live long to guard my jewels. But is no that your daughter? Methinks, I remember her. Bid her come forward."

The pretty coquette was prepared for the summons, and would, no doubt, have been sadly disappointed if she had not received it.

But her father looked confounded, and seeing that the old man was quite unequal to the occasion, Bellegarde flew to her aid, and led her towards the King.

Edith acquitted herself very well in the little ceremony that ensued, and made so graceful a reverence, that the Duchess of Portsmouth turned away in displeasure.

bashfulness was not the pretty damsel's foible, and though all eyes were upon her, she displayed no embarrassment. The compliments paid her by his Majesty were far more agreeable to her than they were to the proud dame who overheard them; and the latter being determined to put a stop to the interview, signed to Bellegarde to take her away, and the Count was forced to comply—but not before the amorous monarch had made the fair damsel comprehend that he was not insensible to her charms.

Blood did not venture to approach the King, fearing he might have incurred his displeasure; and the cold glance thrown at him by his Majesty as he passed out of the garden, did not tend to reassure him.

As to Montalt, he had noticed the effect produced upon the King by Edith's charms, and redoubled his attentions to the bewitching damsel.

BOOK THE FIFTH.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

I.

HOW THE DUKE OF YORK HUNTED THE HART IN WINDSOR FOREST.

ABOUT a week after the visit to the Mulberry Garden, their Majesties and the Court removed from Whitehall to Windsor Castle.

In this regal residence, which has not its peer in Europe, the entertainments given were on a more splendid scale than at Whitehall. Besides all the principal nobles connected with the Court, the Duke and Duchess of York, with all their retinue, had been invited, so that the Castle, vast as it is, was filled with guests.

To see the fair dames, arrayed in the richest and most becoming costumes, gathered together on the magnificent terraces, was a charming sight. To see them troop forth into the Great Park to fly the falcon, or to chase the deer, habited in their riding-dresses of green velvet, and attended by their cavaliers in their picturesque hunting costumes, was a yet more splendid spectacle.

Every day, the Duke of York, who delighted in the chase, and seemed indefatigable, hunted the stag in the forest, and all who shared his tastes attended him.

But there were others who liked hawking just as well as hunting—perhaps, preferred it; since that pleasant pastime was not so fatiguing, and did not separate them from the objects of their adoration—and these went with the King and the Duchess of Portsmouth.

Among the number was Talbot Harland. He was at all the hawking parties, and ever by the side of Dorinda. The Duchess of Portsmouth took a warm interest in his suit, and obtained a promise from the King that if the marriage could be arranged, he would give the fair damsel a handsome portion. This was communicated by the Duchess to Dorinda, who said she would think seriously on the subject, and come to a speedy decision.

Since the Court had been at Windsor Castle, Talbot had not been troubled about Florio. If he was there with the other pages, as was most probable, Talbot saw nothing of him, and Dorinda never mentioned him.

Of course, the Count de Bellegarde was at the Castle. The most amusing person connected with the Court could not be left out. Fond of active sport, and having no love-affair on hand at the moment, the Count hunted daily with the Duke of York, and appeared quite as insensible to fatigue as his Royal Highness himself. The hardest day's work never tired him. He was full of vivacity at dinner, nor did his spirits flag in the evening.

But the chase seemed to have become an all-absorbing passion with him. He talked of nothing else; and, at last, his descriptions, though vivid, became monotonous. The Duke of York sang his praises, and declared he had never seen a Frenchman ride so boldly, or kill a stag so fealty, as the Count de Bellegarde.

No wonder the Count enjoyed the chase in Windsor Forest. Nowhere else could hunting be had in such perfection as in that incomparable deer-park—nowhere else could such noble harts be found—nowhere could finer woodland scenery be gazed upon—nowhere could lovelier glades or smoother lawns be galloped over.

While hunting and hawking took place in the great park, revels were held in the Castle. Every day the distinguished guests sat down to a grand banquet in St. George's Hall; every night there was a ball.

Play went on as at Whitehall. Bellegarde was more frequently in the card-room than the ball-room. But since he had taken with so much ardor to the chase, his customary good luck seemed to have deserted him. Whether he played at cards or whist, he lost; and the Duke of Buckingham won a considerable sum from him at piquette.

DUVAL ROBS THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM. (See page 109.)

Apocryphos of Buckingham, we may mention that his Grace had not yet had an encounter with Claude Duval, though he declared he had given the rascal repeated opportunities of putting his threats into execution.

One night—it might be at the instigation of the Count de Bellegarde, who liked a little mischief—another attempt was made by Lady Muskerrey to induce the Duke to sing his famous ballad. He declined to gratify her.

"Excessively sorry to refuse your ladyship," he said; "but I don't mean to sing my ballad again till I can add the finishing couplet to it."

"You will have to sing it to Claude Duval should you meet him," observed Bellegarde, with a laugh. "Remember, we have a bet on the subject."

"I have not forgotten it," rejoined the Duke. "But what can I do? I can't go in search of the rascal, and he seems afraid to meet me."

"It looks like it, I must own," said Bellegarde. "But I begin to be of his Majesty's opinion, that the cartel came from Lady Muskerrey."

"Méchant!" cried her ladyship, tapping him playfully with her fan. "You know perfectly well I had nothing to do with it. I won't forgive you, unless you dance the gavotte with me."

Professing that nothing would delight him so much, the Count led her to the ball-room.

Next day there was a stag-hunt, as usual, in the Great Park. Many a noble gallant rode forth with the Duke of York; but not one could compare, in richness of apparel or distinction of appearance, with Buckingham or Bellegarde, both of whom joined the hunting-party.

It would have been difficult to say which of the two was the most splendidly equipped, or the best mounted. They formed the most conspicuous figures among the crowd of huntsmen collected that morning on Courbourne Chase, dotted with old oaks and thorns, lying to the right of the Long Walk, which had then only been recently planted by Charles.

No Court dames graced the party with their presence. They were all, out hawking with the King and the Duchess of Portsmouth in the Home Park.

Pleasant it was to watch the cavalcade as it proceeded at a slow pace with the hounds, which were held in leash, to a covert on the further side of the plain.

Here a noble hart was quickly unharboured. Horns were blown, hounds unslipped, and, amid joyous exclamations, the chase speedily commenced.

"Hark, Kingwood!—hark, Rupert!" shouted the Duke of York, cheering on the pack as the hart flew swiftly across the plain, in the direction of a thicket on the heights about two miles off, and known as Hawk's Hill Wood.

Once within the thicket, the hart was safe for a short time; but being at last driven out, he dashed down a long, sweeping glade, bordered on either side by magnificent trees.

Nothing could be more animating than the chase at this moment. The stag was in full view—the hounds were speeding after him, making the woods ring with their melody—and the whole splendid cavalcade was galloping on at the top of their speed.

At the head of the group rode the Duke of York; and close behind him came Buckingham and Bellegarde, both looking as full of excitement as the Prince himself.

But the hart ran very fleetly, and soon began to outstrip his pursuers. At first, they thought he was making for the Great Lake, which lay amid the woods on the right, and in the immediate neighbourhood of which the ground was marshy and extremely dangerous; but, fortunately, he turned off in a different direction, and led them into a more open part of the forest.

Here the country was beautifully undulating—rising into gentle knolls crowned with trees, or dipping into dells, and everywhere offering charming sylvan prospects; but the huntsmen, as may be supposed, thought only of the stag; and as long as they kept him in view, cared for little else.

They had ridden on in this way for two or three miles, and were close upon the confines of Ascot Heath, whither it seemed certain that the hart would take them, when the Duke of Buckingham's charger fell suddenly lame, and prevented him from going on with the hunt.

Bellegarde had no time to express his regret at the accident; but he was not without concern for the Duke, as he galloped off with the chase.

Buckingham found, nevertheless, that his horse had sustained no injury, and, hoping to reach the Count before the poor animal became dead, immediately turned back on.

Naturally, taking the shortest route; and as more than a mile would be saved by passing through the woods that surrounded the Great Lake, he plunged into them, being tolerably well acquainted with their intricacies.

It has already been stated that, in the immediate vicinity of the lake, there was a dangerous swamp. On issuing from the thicket, the Duke came upon this marsh, which did not betray itself in appearance from the solid ground.

No sooner did the unfortunate animal set foot upon the treacherous surface than he was engulfed, and, while floundering about, sank deeper and deeper.

With great difficulty, the Duke extricated himself from his perilous position, but he could not save his horse. In a few minutes, the doomed animal, which continued to struggle violently to the last, disappeared altogether.

II.

IN WHAT MANNER BUCKINGHAM ENCOUNTERED CLAUDE DUVAL.

BUCKINGHAM was standing on the bank of the lake, rooted to the spot, in a kind of stupor, when he heard sounds in the wood that convinced him that horsemen were at hand, and, naturally concluding they must belong to the chase, he called out loudly.

His cry evoked a person who astonished him as much as if the wild huntsman, who once haunted the shores of that gloomy mere, had suddenly appeared before him on his sable steed, and attended by his swart hounds.

A masked horseman, wrapped in a long, black cloak, burst from the wood, and drew up at a little distance from him. The Duke knew at once that it must be Claude Duval.

The redoubted robber was not alone, but was attended only by a stripling, who was masked like himself, and equally well mounted. The figure of this youth, well-defined in a picturesque green velvet riding-dress, was of almost feminine lightness and symmetry.

The graceful squire kept close behind his master.

Removing his feathered hat, Duval courteously saluted the Duke. Buckingham haughtily returned the salutation.

"The devil, whom you serve, and who has lent you a helping hand, by first laming my horse, and then stifling him in this cursed quagmire, must have brought you hither!" he cried; "you could not otherwise have discovered me."

"Pardon me," rejoined Duval, with the marked and peculiar Gascon accent by which his speech was ever characterized; "I did not derive my information from the source you suppose. I am really concerned to find your Grace in this unpleasant predicament, because you may think I am taking an unfair advantage of you."

"No matter what I think," said Buckingham. "You are armed, and on horseback; I am on foot, and without pistols; so there is nothing for it but submission on my part."

"I am glad to find your Grace so complaisant," replied Duval; "I was rather apprehensive, from some remarks that have been repeated to me, that I might have been obliged to—"

"No more," interrupted the Duke, impatiently. "Here is my purse."

"Well filled, I hope!"

"It ought to contain two hundred pistoles, which I won last night at piquette from the Count de Bellegarde. If the amount is not exact, you must blame the Count, not me."

"The Count de Bellegarde is a man of honour," said Duval. "Tis a paltry sum, but the amount is immaterial. What is important, is the fame that will accrue to me from this encounter with your Grace."

At a sign from his master, the youthful squire then rode up, and, with a graceful bow, took the purse from the Duke.

"By my faith, a pretty page!" exclaimed Buckingham, struck by the youth's manner.

"I had counted upon the pleasure of hearing your Grace's celebrated ballad," observed Duval; "but, under the circumstances, I will not press you to sing it. However, you will now be able to add the final couplet."

"The laugh is decidedly against me," said the Duke. "But you ought to give me my revenge."

"Pardieu! I am quite ready to do so—in any way your Grace may desire," rejoined Duval.

"Accord me another meeting."

"Your Grace does me infinite honour. I shall be charmed."

"Do not misunderstand me. This must be a hostile meeting. I shall come to it armed."

"Tout vaque!" "Tis not my fault that you are unarmed at the present moment. If perfectly agreeable to your Grace, we will meet, three nights hence, at midnight, on Grand-becque Chase. Your Grace shall be at liberty to bring a partner with you—say Mr. Talbot Harland. I will only bring with me my faithful squire, Léon. But I engage—foi de Duval!—that he shall offer no interference whatever. You hear, Léon?"

The youthful squire bowed assent.

"I agree!" cried Buckingham. "On the third night hence—at midnight—I shall look for you on Cranbourne Chase. I will bring with me Mr. Talbot Harland, and will bind him to secrecy."

"I have one condition to make," said Duval.

"Name it," rejoined the Duke.

"If I fall, you will not remove my mask."

"I will not—I swear it!" cried Buckingham.

Here Léon made a movement towards his master; but Duval motioned him back.

"Your Grace will aid the poor boy to carry off my body?" he cried.

"Rest easy: your wish shall be fulfilled," rejoined Buckingham. "What is more, I promise to defer the final couplet of my ballad till after the next meeting."

"In that case, you may never have an opportunity of finishing it," said Duval. "I have the honour to salute your Grace."

Next moment, Buckingham was left alone by the side of the lake.

III.

LEON REMOVES HIS MASK.

CLAUDE DUVAL had reached the centre of the thicket, when his course being impeded by underwood, he came to a halt, and perceived that Léon was weeping.

Now that the squire's mask was removed, it could be seen that the features it had hidden were those of an extraordinarily beautiful young woman.

We have already seen that charming face, under more than one aspect.

"In tears, mignonne!" exclaimed Duval. "Don't dim those bright eyes. I thought you were laughing at the successful issue of my encounter with Buckingham."

"I can only think of the hostile meeting you have appointed with him," she replied. "I hope it may not prove fatal to you. I have a presentiment of ill."

"Fatal! Ha! ha!" he cried. "Why, I have fought twenty duels, and mean to fight as many more. Buckingham will not harm me, mignonne. If you allow yourself to feel any uneasiness, it ought to be for him."

"You don't mean to kill him?" she cried, anxiously.

"Ma foi, non! But since he has provoked me to the combat, I shall give him cause to remember it. He shall not boast too loudly of his duel with Claude Duval."

"All you say doesn't cheer me," she rejoined sadly. "What will happen to me if you fall?"

"You must find another lover, I suppose. But I don't contemplate such a catastrophe."

"You seemed to contemplate it just now."

"Pshaw! that was nothing. One must mention such things."

"You are never serious; but it is a serious matter to me. I wish you wouldn't meet the Duke."

"I should deserve to forfeit your love if I complied with the request. I cannot retreat. After I have settled this little affair, we will go to Paris."

"Oh, that will be delightful!" she exclaimed, brightening up at the idea. "But you have talked so often of taking me to Paris, that you must excuse me if I still doubt."

"I will fulfil my promise now, little sceptic," he cried. "To confess the truth, I am tired of my follies. There must be an end of them some time. I meant the encounter I have just had with Buckingham to be the last. But he has forced me into a duel, and I cannot avoid meeting him."

"Why not? He knows you only as Claude Duval."

"What matter? Claude Duval has his honour to maintain, as well as the Count de Bellegarde. Buckingham shall not come off with flying colours. The final couplet of his ballad shall be descriptive of his own defeat."

"Heaven grant it may be so!" ejaculated Sabine, fervently.

"Courage, ma mie!" he exclaimed, in a voice calculated to banish her apprehensions. "All will be well, rely on it. You will soon see Paris, delicious St. Cloud, and superb Versailles. Meanwhile, let us pass the time merrily. Banish care. I will explain my plans to you as soon as I have definitively arranged them; but whatever I may do, you must not leave Windsor Castle till the evening of the duel."

"Command, and I will obey," she rejoined.

"I have no more orders to give just now. Neither must we linger here. Hie! there is some one among the trees. 'Tis Buckingham. I'll be sworn. Let us haste to the forester's hut, where I have left my steed, where I can change my attire and my peruke, and do all that is necessary for my re-appearance in my proper character. Adieu, mon ami Duval! Soyez le bienvenu, Monsieur le Comte de Bellegarde!"

And laughing gaily, he forced his way through the wood, followed by Sabine.

IV.

BUCKINGHAM'S PURSE IS RESTORED BY BELLEGARDE.

HAVING no alternative but to proceed to the Castle on foot, and not choosing to trust himself to the marshy ground near the lake, Buckingham struck into the wood.

But ill luck seemed to attend him. He lost his way, and for more than an hour was involved in the thicket.

As he ascended the long glade leading to the summit of Sion Hill, he looked about in every direction for his companions of the chase, but could see nothing of them.

At length, the trampling of a horse caught his ears, and, turning at the sound, he perceived the Count de Bellegarde galloping towards him.

The Count naturally expressed surprise to find the Duke on foot, and on hearing what had happened, immediately dismounted, and offered his own horse to his Grace. Buckingham, however, declined the obliging offer, and, soon afterwards, was accommodated with a horse by a huntsman who came up. His Grace described the accident that had befallen him in the quagmire near the lake, but said nothing about his encounter with Claude Duval.

If any suspicions as to the possibility of the Count having personated the gallant robber had crossed him, they were now entirely dispelled.

Bellegarde, by his own account, had seen the stag killed on Ascot Heath, and had hunted a second hart with the Duke of York, when, having had enough, or for some other reason, he quitted the chase.

"Where his Highness has got to, heaven knows," he cried. "But I think the hart he is now hunting will take him to Bagshot Heath—perhaps to Reading."

"I thought you were never fatigued, Count," observed Buckingham.

"Rarely," he replied. "Nor must your Grace imagine I am fatigued now. But I have some preparations to make."

"Preparations for what?" asked the Duke, curiously.

"For my journey to Paris. I am going thither to-morrow."

"Going to Paris to-morrow!" cried Buckingham, in surprise. "I need not say how sorry I shall be to lose you. Have you announced your departure to his Majesty? I am sure he will be grieved."

"I have said nothing about it as yet. In fact, it was only yesterday that I received an order from the Duke of Orleans, summoning me to St. Cloud. I am strongly inclined to disobey the mandate, but I dare not."

"No; you must go," cried Buckingham. "But come back soon, or the Duchess of Portsmouth will break her heart. During your exile from Court she was inconsolable."

"You flatter me. But I am not quite so necessary to my fair cousin's happiness as your Grace imagines. She will soon reconcile herself to my absence."

The foregoing conversation occurred in the Long Walk, at that time bordered by double rows of young trees, planted by Charles, to whom we are indebted for the present magnificent avenue to the Castle.

As the interlocutors approached the regal pile, they met the hawking party, with the King and the Duchess of Portsmouth at its head, returning from the Home Park.

His Majesty halted, to talk to them; and noticing the sorry steed on which Buckingham was mounted, inquired whether any accident had happened to him in the chase.

The Duke described how he had lost his charger in the marsh, near the lake, and Charles was expressing regret at the occurrence, when a singular smile on Bellegarde's countenance caught his attention. He asked the Count why he laughed.

"Not at the Duke's misfortune, your Majesty may be quite sure," replied Bellegarde. "I smile because his Grace has omitted the best part of the story. I have been wondering whether he would relate it."

"Ah! what is it?" said the King, to Buckingham.

"Faith, sire, I have not the least idea," rejoined the Duke, evasively.

"Then I must tell it myself," observed Bellegarde. "If any of the details are incorrect, his Grace will set me right."

These preliminary observations caused Dorinda Neville and several other fair equestrians to press forward; and a little circle was formed round the Count, everybody being curious to hear his narration.

"I had quitted the chase at Ascot Heath," commenced Bellegarde, in the lively manner that peculiarly belonged to him; "and had just entered the wood that bounds the Great Park, when I observed two persons galloping along a glade."

"I ought to mention that I was alone at the time. Thinking the persons I beheld were hastening to join the chase, I halloed to them, and they instantly stopped. I then saw the mistake I had committed. Both were masked."

"Oddsfish! I'll wager this is another story of Claude Duval!" exclaimed the King.

"Both were masked, as I have said," pursued Bellegarde; "and this circumstance roused my suspicions—or, rather, I should say, convinced me that one of them was the audacious rascal whom your Majesty has just mentioned. He was as finely dressed as any of your train, and attended by a youthful squire."

"Well, they both rode towards me. Not expecting such an encounter in the park, and being unarmed, while I remarked that Duval had pistols in his holsters, my first impulse was to gallop off; but having very little to lose, I remained stationary."

"As Duval came up, he bowed very politely, and, of course, I returned the salute. 'Bon jour, Monsieur Duval,' I cried. 'I am rather surprised to see you here in his Majesty's park in broad daylight.'

"I don't know why you should express surprise at seeing me, Monsieur le Comte," he rejoined. "You are aware of my intention to rob his Grace of Buckingham. I have waited for an opportunity, and it has at last presented itself. Only a few minutes since I succeeded in my design."

"What!" I exclaimed in amazement. "Have you really dared to rob the Duke?" "My master has just taken this from him," said the squire, exhibiting a purse to my view. "And did his Grace offer no resistance?" I asked. "I had him at a disadvantage," replied Duval. "He was unhorsed, and without arms."

"The rascal spoke truth," remarked Buckingham. "I had just lost my horse in a quagmire. But proceed, Count."

"I hope I shall not offend your Grace by what I am now about to mention, but I could not help asking the rascal whether you had favoured him with your ballad. 'I want an explicit answer,' I said; 'because I have a wager depending upon the point.' 'Had he been on horseback,' rejoined Duval, 'I would have compelled the Duke to sing it, but under the circumstances, I excused him.'"

The Count was here interrupted by loud laughter from the King, in which the Duchesse of Portsmouth, and all those around, joined.

"What more have you to tell?" asked Buckingham, rather angrily.

"Not much," replied the Count. "Fancying the rascal meant to rob me next, I was preparing to empty my pockets, but he stopped me. 'Monsieur le Comte,' he said, 'I have simply a favour to ask of you. I am persuaded you will not refuse it. Oblige me by restoring the purse to the Duke of Buckingham.' 'With much pleasure,' I replied. 'I cannot sufficiently applaud your conduct, but permit me to observe that it is somewhat inconsistent with your character.' 'I perceive, Count, that you understand very little about my character,' he rejoined.

"He then signed to his squire, who handed me the purse. 'No need of explanation,' cried Duval. 'His Grace will perfectly comprehend why I cannot keep it.' Without a word more, he and his squire galloped off, leaving me in a complete state of bewilderment. As requested, I now restore the purse to your Grace."

And taking it from his pocket, he delivered it to Buckingham, amid general laughter.

"How comes it that you did not mention this incident to me before?" demanded the Duke.

"I am sure your Grace will forgive me when I say that I purposely reserved it for his Majesty's amusement," replied the Count.

"I would not have lost it for the world," cried Charles.

He had not ceased laughing as he passed through the gates of the Castle.

V.

THE DUKE OF ORMOND IS AVENGED BY HIS SON.

BLOOD was not amongst the King's retinue at Windsor Castle. His duties detained him at Whitehall.

Of late, he had become sullen and morose, and begun once more to rail bitterly against the Duke of Ormond, hinting darkly at some fresh design that he had conceived, of which his Grace was to be the victim; but his followers urged him to abandon it, and told him frankly they would have no hand in it. Be his project what it might, it was never consummated. The hour of retribution was at hand.

Montalt had paid several secret visits to the Tower, and on most of these occasions he had enjoyed an evening walk on the ramparts with Edith.

For some reason, however, for which he could not account, the fickle damsel began to cool in her manner towards him, and at last told him, in plain terms, that she could meet him no more.

Distracted by this heartless determination,

Montalt flew into transports of jealous rage; and, convinced that he had been supplanted, swore with a tremendous oath that he would find his rival out and slay him.

The malicious little coquette laughed at his passion, and frankly admitted that he was right in his conjecture; but she added, with a peculiarly arch smile, that his rival was quite out of his reach.

This was enough for Montalt. Seeing in a moment how matters stood, he became as humble as he had just been violent.

Edith liked him much better in this mood; and being softened by his humility, consented that their intimacy should not wholly cease. She even agreed to meet him next day in St. James's Park.

"To-morrow afternoon," she said, with a captivating look, "I shall take an airing with my mother on the Mall. Most likely we shall ramble on to the long canal; and if you should happen to be there at the time, I shall not be very much offended if you join us."

"A thousand thanks for the permission!" cried Montalt, kissing her hand rapturously. "I have acted very foolishly; but I will behave better in future. There are some rivals with whom it would be absurd to compete. I am content to wait."

"With such a disposition, there may, possibly, be a chance for you," said Edith. "But mind, you must not come again to the Tower."

"Not till you invite me," he replied.

Each afternoon, Blood walked with his followers in St. James's Park. His insolent deportment on the Mall, and the defiant glances he cast around, provoked many an indignant remark; but the favour he enjoyed at Court, and his own evil reputation, generally secured him from insult in return.

On the afternoon on which Montalt hoped to meet the bewitching coquette, Blood walked forth as usual. Those who encountered him on the Mall, and knew him, remarked that his manner was fiercer than usual. He scowled angrily when regarded too closely, and would have picked a quarrel, if any one had been willing to humour his inclinations.

Montalt had not informed him of his appointment, and being anxious to get away, was seeking for an excuse, when the Colonel quitted the Mall, and took the direction of the long canal.

Seated on a bench opposite the Deocy, they discovered Edith and her mother. The golden-haired damsel was very becomingly dressed, and looked remarkably well. Between her and her mother sat a plainly-attired, middle-aged person, of very quiet manner, who was no other than the King's confidential valet, Chiffinch.

Whatever proposal Chiffinch was making to the enchantress, seemed to be very favourably entertained—at least, Montalt thought so. Her eyes sparkled, and her cheeks flushed, as she listened to the words of the tempter.

All this was quite as intelligible to Blood as to Montalt, and occasioned him no surprise; but it immediately suggested the course that ought to be pursued. No time ought to be lost in paying court to the new royal favourite.

Changing his manner with marvellous celerity, and calling up his most insinuating smiles, he made his bow, and paid her some high-flown compliments.

Chiffinch, having risen at his approach, he at once took the place vacated by the valet, and dividing his attention between mother and daughter, succeeded in pleasing both.

Having accomplished his object, he surrendered his seat to Montalt, who he saw was dying to obtain it; and taking Chiffinch apart, held a brief conference with him. For what he then learnt, he congratulated himself on his discernment.

Proposing to return presently to the ladies, he quitted Chiffinch, and walked on with Flodoard and Mundeville by the side of the canal.

He had not gone far, when two very distinguished personages were seen approaching from the opposite direction.

Both were richly attired, their bearing lofty, while the strong personal resemblance between them, coupled with the difference of age, proclaimed them to be father and son. Such, in fact, was their relationship. They were the Duke of Ormond and his son, the Earl of Ossory.

Blood knew them at once; and the sight of the Duke of Ormond rekindled in an instant all his smouldering hate. His hand involuntarily sought his sword.

On his side, Ormond had recognised his intended assassin, and the Earl of Ossory had made the same discovery; but they would have passed him with dignified scorn, had not Blood, as if possessed by madness, planted himself in the Duke's path.

"Again we meet, but not for the last time," cried the frantic miscreant, shaking his clenched hand at him. "I shall yet hang you at Tyburn."

Disdaining to make any answer, Ormond seized his son's arm, who was about to chastise the insolent ruffian, and forced him away.

Astounded at Blood's insane conduct, his followers dragged him off.

But the affair was not destined to end thus.

Ossory had not gone far, when, foaming with rage, he broke from his father.

"Leave the law to punish him," cried Ormond.

"The law!" exclaimed his son. "There is no law in England, when robbers and assassins can stalk abroad thus. I will punish him myself."

Disregarding the Duke's entreaties, he ran after Blood, who, hearing his footsteps and shouts, likewise burst from his followers, and faced him.

"Cut-throat and robber!" cried the young noble; "I will not sully my steel with the blood of a wretch so vile, but thy insolence shall not pass unpunished."

With his cane he struck Blood several severe blows on the head and shoulders, knocking off his hat and peruke.

Staggered for a moment by the attack, Blood presently recovered, and with a roar like that of an enraged lion, plucked forth his rapier, and made a desperate lunge at Ossory.

The gallant young noble saved himself by leaping backwards, and then flinging away his cane, drew, and engaged his furious adversary.

Blood was a consummate master of fence, and possessed immense strength of wrist, but blinded by rage, he fought wildly.

After the exchange of a few rapid passes, he made a deadly thrust, which Ossory dexterously parried, and returning it with the rapidity of lightning, his point passed through his adversary's heart, the sword-hilt striking against his breast.

Blood fell into the arms of his followers, who had kept aloof during the fray, but now flew towards him.

He almost instantly expired.

His last vindictive look was fixed on the Duke of Ormond, who had hurried to the spot, and witnessed the tragical close of the conflict.

VI.

THE LAST INTERVIEW BETWEEN THE COUNT DE BELLEGARDE AND THE DUCHESS OF PORTSMOUTH.

The gaiety of the Court was somewhat damped by the announcement made by the Count de Bellegarde of his immediate departure for Paris.

The King was sorry to lose him, and did not know how to supply his place. No one possessed such unfailing good spirits as the Count—no one was so pleasant a companion—no one related such diverting stories. The loss of his society was, therefore, a real deprivation to his Majesty.

But if Charles was grieved, the Duchess of Portsmouth—as Buckingham had foreseen—was in despair. To her, Achille was indispensable. He was her confidante and counsellor—not, perhaps, the wisest and best; but at any rate, she consulted and trusted him.

She sent for him to her boudoir, to talk to him privately, and try to dissuade him from going; but all her efforts were fruitless.

"You have some motive that you do not care to avow for your sudden departure," she said, angry that he would not yield to her importunities.

"You are right, sweet cousin. I know you won't betray me. 'Tis absolutely necessary for me to leave the country for a short time."

"What have you done?" she said, looking at him fixedly.

"Nothing very dreadful," he replied, with a smile.

"Have you lost money? If so, I will assist you. I know you have been unlucky at play lately."

"True! The jade Fortune has turned her back on me latterly, but I don't want funds."

"Can I relieve you from any other embarrassment? You may command all my influence with the King."

"I know it, sweet cousin. But this is an affair—however, I cannot explain," he said, stopping short.

"I feel very much disposed to prevent your departure, Achille," she observed, shaking her head. "A word to his Majesty will do it."

"You will throw no obstacles in my way, I am sure, Louise, when I tell you that my honour is concerned in the affair. Question no more, if you love me. I promise to return without delay, if I can. Should you not hear from me within a week, conclude—"

"Conclude what, Achille?"

"That I cannot write," he rejoined, gravely.

"You alarm me. You are bound on some mad enterprise. You shall not go."

"I must, Louise. If we meet no more, cherish the memory of the cousin whom you loved, in spite of his follies."

"Achille, this is serious! I must have an explanation. You know how attached I am to you."

"I require no assurance of your regard, Louisa. Will it surprise you to learn that I am tired of life?"

"You tired of life, Achille? Impossible! I hope you do not meditate any painful act?"

"I will never raise my hand against myself. Be sure of that."

"But do not throw your life away."

He was silent for a moment, and then said, with deep but suppressed emotion,—

"If anything should happen to me, a letter will be delivered to you. By all the love you have ever borne me, I implore you to fulfil my last request."

"I will—I promise it solemnly."

He pressed her hand gratefully, and was again silent for some moments.

Rousing himself at last by a powerful effort, he cried,—

"Before I go, I should like to do a good turn to Talbot Harland."

"This is very generous of you, Achille. I have always looked upon you as Talbot's rival. You know how I took you to task formerly for your attentions to Dorinda Neville."

"There is no longer any rivalry between us. Besides, Dorinda only pretended to encourage me, in order to plague Talbot, as I soon discovered. But I like them both, and it would give me real pleasure to be instrumental in bringing about their union. You can easily accomplish it, if you are so disposed."

"I think the matter is pretty nearly settled," replied the Duchess, with a smile. "The question, I fancy, was put at the hawking-party, this morning; and, judging by Talbot's looks, he was not reduced to absolute despair by the answer he received. I have not yet spoken to Dorinda on the subject; but I will let you know her decision at the ball this evening. You will attend it?"

"Of course," he replied. "My preparations are nearly made."

"Ah, Achille!" she exclaimed, "if we should never meet again after to-night, I shall often think of you."

"You have made me easy by the promise you have given me, and which I know you will keep religiously. My fate may be a mystery to all the world; to you it will be none. You will learn the secret."

He kissed her hand respectfully, and retired, leaving her full of gloomy apprehension.

VII.

DORINDA'S PORTION.

THROWN decidedly out of spirits, the Duchess of Portsmouth was present at the grand banquet in St. George's Hall, and afterwards at the brilliant ball given in the magnificent dancing-saloon.

Before his Majesty sat down to the banquet, Chiffinch arrived at the Castle, and gave him details of Blood's death by the hand of the Earl of Ossory.

Charles was not painfully affected by the news, and perhaps thought himself well rid of an attendant whom he had already begun to find troublesome. But his valet had some other intelligence respecting a certain golden-haired damsel, that unquestionably delighted him.

Whatever Bellegarde might have felt on hearing of Blood's death, he manifested no outward emotion. The Duchess of Portsmouth, who knew he was playing a part, wondered how he could get through it so well. To see him in the dance, or watch him in the card-room among the punters at basnet, one would have thought him the gayest of the gay.

Early in the evening, he had encountered Talbot Harland in the ball-room, and ascertained from him that, contrary to the Duchess of Portsmouth's impression, Dorinda's answer had not been given, the fair damsel declaring that the King's consent must first be obtained.

"Have you spoken to his Majesty?" inquired the Count.

"Not yet," replied the other.

"Well, that point shall soon be settled. Engage Lady Munkerry for the first country-dance, and as soon as it is over, take her ladyship to the Duchess of Portsmouth, whom you will find with his Majesty in the small saloon. Leave the rest to me. I am sure that the result shall be perfectly satisfactory to you."

Thanking the Count warmly, Talbot immediately went in search of Lady Munkerry, who did not require to be asked twice. Half the company stood up on the occasion, and amongst the dancers was Dorinda, her partner being the Count de Bellegarde.

The dance seemed interminable to Talbot; but when it was over, in accordance with his instructions, he led her ladyship, who was full of excitement and delight, to the small saloon.

There they found the Duchess of Portsmouth and the King, no one being with them except the Duke of Buckingham.

They had only just made reverence; when Dorinda entered the saloon, attended by the Count de Bellegarde.

As the fair damsel drew near, the Duchess of Portsmouth stepped forward to meet her, and led her towards the King, who arose at her approach.

Seeing that Dorinda was in some confusion, Charles said, in the most gracious tones imaginable, "The Duchess tells me you have a little request to make."

"Pardon me, my liege," she replied, blushing deeply; "I have nothing whatever to ask of your Majesty."

"Do not mind what she says, sire," observed the Duchess. "She has a favour to ask."

"Oddfish! I will spare her blushes," cried the good-natured monarch. "You desire my consent to your marriage with a very worthy young gentleman, whom I see before me. You have it. Approach, sir," he added to Talbot, who delightedly obeyed the mandate.

"Take her," pursued the King, placing her hand in that of the young man. "May your union be crowned with happiness!"

They knelt before him at the words, and Talbot fluted out his gratitude.

"I have not done," continued Charles, raising Dorinda graciously. "Your bride," he added to Talbot—"and no man ever won a lovelier bride—will have a portion of ten thousand pounds."

"Oh, sire! this is too much!" exclaimed Dorinda.

"Your husband will not think it so," observed Charles, laughing. "I hope the marriage has your ladyship's approval?" he added, playfully, to Lady Muskerrey.

"It is sufficient for me that it has received your Majesty's sanction," she replied. "Without that, it would never have received mine."

"You cannot do better than follow my example in everything," observed Charles, significantly.

"Such is my intention, sire," she returned. "And I will therefore add another ten thousand pounds to the marriage portion which you have bestowed on Dorinda."

"Just what I expected from your ladyship!" cried the King, approvingly.

Here the Duchess of Portsmouth embraced Dorinda; and kissing her on both cheeks, offered her her warmest congratulations. "I congratulate you also," she added to Talbot.

"How much I am indebted to your Grace!" cried the young man, earnestly.

"You are more indebted to the Count de Bellegarde than you are to me," she replied.

"I can accept no thanks, for I do not deserve them," said the Count. "But I wish you all possible happiness, and I am sure you will have it."

Dorinda, as may well be supposed, did not return to the ball-room. Indeed, she was much overcome; and after reiterating the expressions of her gratitude to his Majesty and the Duchess, she retired with her aunt.

Talbot, however, was in too joyous a mood to quit the festive scene; and the Count de Bellegarde betook himself to the card-room, where he won some money.

He was among the punters at the basset-table, when he heard the Duke of Buckingham talking to Talbot Harland. The Duke spoke in a low voice; but by slightly shifting his position, he caught what was said.

"I have a little affair on hand, at which I want your company," observed Buckingham. "It is not an ordinary duel, so you need have no scruples at disobeying his Majesty. You are only required to see fair play."

"If that is all, your Grace may command me," replied Talbot. "I would not for the world offend his Majesty after his great generosity to me. When does the meeting take place?"

"On the third night from this, on Cranbourne Chase, at midnight," replied Buckingham.

"On Cranbourne Chase at midnight!" exclaimed Talbot, surprised, and half repenting the promise he had given. "'Tis a mysterious meeting, indeed."

"No more now," said the Duke. "I will tell you all about it to-morrow."

"He will come," thought Bellegarde.

VIII.

ON CRANBOURNE CHASE AT MIDNIGHT.

THE Count de Bellegarde had taken his departure from Windsor Castle, leaving behind him a blank that could not be easily filled up.

He did not trust himself to another private interview with the Duchess of Portsmouth, though she desired it; but sent his excuses.

On taking leave of the King, he said, with a surprisingly grave countenance, "I fear I must bid your Majesty a lasting adieu."

"Why so?" asked Charles.

"I have some idea of shutting myself up in the Monastery of La Trappe."

"To practice penitence for your past life, ha!" cried Charles. "You have much to repent, no doubt. But think twice before you turn monk. Devote discipline won't suit you."

my friend. There is no joking, believe me, in those gloomy cells."

"It will be a change. If your Majesty does not see me again within a month, you may be sure that I have turned Trappist."

"Heaven forbid! But should such a dreadful misfortune happen, may you rise to be an abbot. Farewell, most holy father! Come back soon to give me your benediction."

Charles thought the Count was jesting; but he afterwards viewed the matter in a very different light.

The appointed night arrived.

A night well fitted for such a meeting—bright and calm. Fleecy clouds covered the sky, and a full moon poured down its radiance upon the towers of the Castle, and silvered the pompous woods of the Great Park.

Although it wanted nearly an hour to midnight, Claude Duval and his squire were riding slowly and silently towards the place of rendezvous. They had come from the forester's hut, and had trucked a narrow road that led through the thick woods then clothing the summit of Snow Hill.

From this eminence, the view of Windsor Castle is superb; and on such a lovely, moon-light night as we have described, the beauty of the scene was enhanced.

On issuing from the sombre thicket, Duval halted to gaze on the splendid prospect spread out before him. His eye ranged over the rich woodland tract, and rested long on the grand pile towering in the distance.

What thoughts occupied his mind at the time, we shall not inquire. Folding his hands upon his breast, he fell into a profound reverie, from which he was at last aroused by Sabine.

"Why do you look so scared?" he asked.

"I have just seen my father," she rejoined.

The answer startled him,

"Seen your father?" he exclaimed.

"Yes; I saw him standing yonder, beside the wood. I saw him as plainly as I behold you now. Death-pale his countenance, and its expression very mournful.

"Fear made me dumb, or I should have called out to you. He pointed to the wood, near the lake, and beckoned me to follow. Then I missed him."

"After this warning, will you go on to meet certain destruction?"

"If I am doomed, I am doomed," rejoined Duval, shrugging his shoulders. "Your superstitious fears, and nothing else, conjured up this phantom."

Though he said this in an incredulous tone, he was evidently impressed, for he presently remarked, "I have something to add to the instructions I have already given you. Here is a letter, which you must deliver to the Duchess of Portsmouth. She has promised me, solemnly, to attend to my request. She will be your friend."

"I shall want no friend if I lose you," she cried, in a despairing voice.

"Do as I enjoin you," he said, authoritatively.

"Oh, if my fears are realized, I shall die!" she exclaimed.

"Sabine, cast off this weakness, and be yourself! You will unman me, and my honour is at stake!"

"You shall not hear another murmur," she rejoined, submissively.

They rode down the woody slopes, and startled a herd of deer couched beneath the oaks at the foot of the acclivity.

As he cantered across the broad plain, Duval, with characteristic levity, began to hum a light French romance. His companion made no remark, though her heart was like to break.

A distant bell tolled the hour of midnight. At the same instant, as if summoned by the strokes, two horsemen appeared on the part of the chase that was nearest the Castle.

"Yonder they are!" cried Duval, almost joyously.

"I see them," she replied, with a shudder.

"Have you ought further to say to me?"

"Only to bid you adieu, in case of the worst," he replied.

She pressed the hand he extended to her lips, and her tears fell on it.

"You are forgetting your promise," he cried.

Having adjusted his mask, he galloped towards his adversary, who, with his second, was now riding quickly to meet him.

As he galloped on, Duval resumed his romance, and sung it so loud and blithely, that it reached the ears of his antagonist.

"Hark! he is singing," observed the Duke to Talbot Harland, who was riding by his side. "'Tis almost a pity to kill so gay a galliard."

"I hope it may not be needful to kill him," replied Talbot.

Presently, Duval changed his melody, and began to sing a couplet of the Duke's famous ballad.

"Does your Grace hear that?" cried Talbot, laughing.

"Ay," replied the Duke. "I like his humour amazingly."

When within fifty yards of each other, the adversaries drew in the rein, advancing at a foot's pace, till they met.

Duval then uncovered, and bowed gracefully to the Duke, who returned the salutation with lofty courtesy.

Throughout the conversation that ensued, Duval spoke with the peculiar Gascon accent that he occasionally assumed.

"Your servant, Mr. Talbot," he said, bowing to him. "'Tis not the first time we have met."

"But it will probably be the last," rejoined Talbot, gravely.

"Perhaps so," said Duval, in a careless tone. "To business!"

"Before proceeding, I have an observation to make," said Talbot.

"I am all attention," replied Duval, bowing politely.

"His Grace the Duke of Buckingham is here, ready to fulfil his engagement," pursued Talbot. "But I have to state, on his Grace's part, that, as he has no real animosity towards you, and as he has, however, reason to believe that your exploits have been intended as practical jests, he is willing to forego the combat, provided you will make an admission to that effect."

"I will make the admission for him," cried the squire, pressing eagerly forward. "All his exploits were practical jests—all!"

"Back, Léon!" cried Duval. "Pardon this interruption, Mr. Harland," he continued, as the squire dejectedly retired. "Have you more to add?"

"Only one thing, to which I trust you will see no objection," replied Talbot. "The Duke will require you to unmask."

"Unmask? Ha!" cried Duval, sharply. "His Grace has no right to make any such demand. With his first requisition I might have complied. Indeed, I will admit that all the feats which he has done me the honour to record in his matchless ballad were practical jests."

"I am very glad to hear it," said Talbot. "After this frank admission——"

"Hear me out!" cried Duval. "I peremptorily refuse to unmask. This discussion is idle, and must cease. The Duke of Buckingham has challenged me, and now he seeks to avoid the combat. I insist upon its taking place."

"I avoid the combat!" exclaimed Buckingham, with a disdainful laugh. "By St. George, that shall never be said!"

A half-stifled cry burst from the squire, but it passed unheeded.

"Are you prepared?" demanded Talbot, as each adversary drew a pistol from his holster.

"Prepared!" they responded, as with one voice.

"Ride off in opposite directions till I bid you stop. Return slowly, and fire when I give the word."

The injunction was obeyed. Each rode slowly off, till Talbot called out "Stop!" and then turned back.

Not till they were within thirty yards of each other was the signal given.

Both fired together.

Duval discharged his pistol in the air, but the Duke took deadly aim. The bullet lodged in his adversary's breast.

Duval uttered a cry, and fell back slightly; but he almost instantly recovered himself. With a wild shriek that betrayed her sex, Sabine flew towards him.

At the same time, Talbot and the Duke pressed forward, eager to render aid.

"Off!" she cried, fiercely, and presenting a pistol at them as she spoke.

"He shall not be unmasked while I have life. Your Grace will not break your plighted word!"

"No," replied the Duke, drawing back, while Talbot followed his example.

"I am mortally hurt, but have enough strength left for flight," growled Duval. "Keep close beside me."

"Fear no pursuit from us," cried Buckingham.

The Duke and Talbot watched them as they flew with lightning swiftness across the plain. Each moment the lookers-on expected to see the wounded man drop from the saddle. But, to their infinite surprise, he held on. He mounted the sides of Snow Hill, and disappeared with his companion in the wood on its brow.

"He will die in the thicket," observed Buckingham.

But the Duke was mistaken. Duval still clung to the saddle.

"Oh, that we could reach the hut!" exclaimed Sabine.

"Not there," rejoined Duval. "Your father's spirit pointed towards the lake. Take me thither—to the morass—you understand," he significantly replied.

She divined his terrible purpose, but did not attempt to oppose it. She led him down the long sweeping glade, along which they fitted like phantoms.

She guided him, swiftly and unerringly, through the thick woods encircling the lake, and brought him to the borders of the morass.

"Now leave me. Farewell for ever!" he cried.

And with a last effort, he forced his horse into the fatal swamp.

Sabine remained looking on in a state of stupefaction.

When all was over, she prepared to follow.

"Leave you! Never!" she exclaimed. "I am yours in life, as in death!"

And she plunged in after him.

The morass willingly offered them a grave in its oozy depths, and kept their secret well.

A miserable pretender afterwards appeared as Claude Duval. With him we have nothing to do. He was very deservedly hanged.

The Count de Bellegarde appeared no more at Whitehall; and the King, though amazed at his folly, never doubted that he had become a monk of La Trappe.

ALBAN SHORE.

HOW JANE MILVERTON, THE MERCER'S DAUGHTER OF CHEAPSIDE, WAS ACCOUNTED THE FAIREST DAMSEL IN LONDON.

WHEN Edward the Fourth was King, there were many fair damsels in the City of London, but none to compare with Jane, only daughter of John Milverton, erstwhile a mercer in Cheapside.

Jane Milverton was in her seventeenth spring when her remarkable beauty first began to attract the attention of the young bachelors of the City; and whenever she walked forth with her mother, she was beset by a host of admirers, who vied with each other in endeavours to win a smile from her.

Their efforts were vain. Brought up by a very careful mother, and being naturally modest and discreet, Jane took little notice of them. However, the report of her beauty spread far and wide, and caused so much talk, that people came from all parts of the City to look at her.

Opinions differed, and faults were found—of course, chiefly by her own sex, who were unwilling to admit that she was as lovely as represented; but none could deny that her figure was exquisite, and that her features had a most charming expression.

To be more precise, we may say that her figure was slight and graceful; her tresses of a pale yellow; her features delicately and beautifully moulded; her complexion excessively fair, and her eyes of the softest blue. We ought to add that there was a singular witchery in the glances of those tender blue eyes, experienced by all who came within their influence; while the pearls disclosed when her coral lips were parted, rendered her smile resistless.

Such was Jane Milverton at seventeen.

As we have just intimated, she had been most carefully brought up by her widowed mother, who, since her husband's death, had led a very secluded life. Indeed, if the young damsel had been educated in a convent, she could scarcely have known less of the world. Strange as it may seem, it is, nevertheless, true, that, until lately, she had been quite unconscious of her own marvellous beauty.

Jane's attire was simple, but it suited her well. Generally, a coverchief, or hood, completely concealed her profuse yellow tresses, but, at times, a pretty little coil allowed them to escape, and flow down her back. A tight-fitting girdle displayed her slim figure to the greatest advantage, and a girle, with a chain attached to it, rested on her hips. The long-pointed shoes that disguised her tiny feet were almost hidden by a dark blue gown, and their sharp extremities could only just be seen peering forth. Beyond the girdle and magnificent gold chain, she wore no sort of ornament—not even a collar round her swan-like throat.

Among Jane's innumerable admirers was a rich goldsmith, of Bombard Street, named Alban Shore. Deeply smitten by her charms, he resolved to make her his wife. He knew he had many rivals, but as the coy damsel had not shown a preference for any one, he persuaded himself he should succeed. He could give his bride a handsome dowry, and that was a great recommendation. Moreover, he bore a most honourable character, as his father, Gethelmar Shore, had done before him. Many a wealthy citizen would have been glad to give his daughter to Master Shore, the prosperous goldsmith and banker, but Alban had shown no disposition to marry till he beheld the fair Jane Milverton.

Alban was under thirty, but the long gown of dark red cloth, buttoned from neck to waist, which he wore above his quilted tunic, and his close, dark cap, with a narrow edge of velvet, combined with his grave looks and demeanour, made him appear at least ten years older. The expression of his countenance was agreeable, and indicated great goodness of heart. He was of middle height, well-proportioned, and strongly built; but his person was completely hidden by his ample gown. From his girdle hung a red leather pouch. Sword, dagger, or weapon of any kind, would have been unsuitable to his peaceful vocation.

Alban Shore made no change in his sober attire when he presented himself one day to Dame Milverton, with the design of proposing for the hand of her fair daughter.

The widow was alone at the time—Jane being in an inner room. As she was still good-looking, she thought the visit might be intended for herself.

Requesting him to be seated, she very considerably sought to relieve him from the embarrassment under which she perceived he laboured.

"I know you very well by sight, good Master Shore," she said; "and, indeed, it is strange, seeing we are such near neighbours, that we are not better acquainted. But I trust to see more of you in future. You will always be welcome."

Alban bowed, and the widow went on:—

"My ever-lamented husband, John Milverton, was one of your worthy father's customers. Several ornaments, which I still wear on occasions, were purchased at Gethelmar Shore's shop in Lombard Street. Among other matters, there was this ring. I pray you look at it, good Master Shore;" holding up a very pretty finger, on which the ring was placed. "You will observe that a posy is written outside it,—

"This and the giver,
Are thine for ever."

Touching and tender, is it not? Alack and well-a-day! the giver is gone, and I am left alone! John Milverton has been dead these ten years, Master Shore, and lies in the churchyard of St. Martin's Pomary. I have placed a monument to his memory in the north aisle of the church. Mayhap you have seen it?"

"Often, madam," he replied; "and a very handsome monument it is."

"It cost me three hundred crowns, Master Shore,—every penny. But the money was well bestowed. Do you recollect my husband, worthy sir?"

"Perfectly, madam. John Milverton was one of the most noted mercers in East Cheap. But he must have been considerably older than yourself."

"Thirty years, Master Shore—thirty years. Some foolish folks used to jeer at the disparity of our ages. I always declared it was a match of Our Lady's making, since it turned out so happily."

"So I have always heard, madam. You must have made the worthy mercer an excellent wife."

"I ought not to praise myself," said the widow, rather flustered; "but I think I did. And if I could have been tempted to take a second husband, I should have been equally anxious to please him. I have had several good offers, Master Shore—very good offers—but I would accept none of them, having a daughter to attend to."

"Very true, madam; and the greatest credit is due to you for the manner in which you have brought up your daughter."

"I am very glad to hear you say so, Master Shore. I think I have done my duty by her. Her poor, dear father would be amazed if he could behold her now. I myself never expected she would grow up so fair a creature."

"Of a truth, she has burst as suddenly into bloom as a flower," observed the goldsmith. "But she always promised to be beautiful. With so fair a mother, how could it be otherwise?"

"You flatter me, sir," simpered the widow. "But it is quite true that at Jane's age I was exactly like what she is now."

"I can well believe it, madam," remarked Shore.

"No doubt she is light-complexioned, and I have always been rather dark," said Dame Milverton; "but the features are similar."

"Precisely similar," observed the goldsmith, with a smile, "except that your nose is inclined to be aquiline, and your daughter's is perfectly straight. And now, madam, I am a man of business, as you are aware, and must come to the point. I dare say you can guess my errand?"

"I have some idea of it, sir," she replied, casting down her eyes.

"I have serious thoughts of taking a wife, madam. Your daughter's charms have produced a great impression upon me."

"My daughter's charms!" exclaimed the widow, looking up. "I thought—"

"I love her devotedly, madam!" pursued the goldsmith; "and if I am fortunate enough to win her, I will do my best to prove how highly I estimate the prize."

"I do not doubt it, sir!" replied the widow, in some confusion. "But you have taken me so much by surprise, that I scarcely know what to say."

"You do not discourage my suit, I trust, madam. Mine are no empty promises. I have always been a man of my word. Jane shall have everything she can desire with me, and I will give her a handsome dowry—ten thousand crowns."

"You speak so fairly and kindly, Master Shore," said the widow, who had now recovered herself, "that you deserve a direct answer. To me your offer is very agreeable. What it may be to my daughter I cannot say, but we will soon ascertain."

"It is everything in my favour that I have your support, madam," said Shore, joyfully.

"Not everything," she replied. "I will do my best to further your suit, but I cannot force Jane's inclinations."

"Heaven forbid you should, madam!" he exclaimed. "Unless she can give me her heart, I will not accept her hand."

"Ah! here she comes to answer for herself," cried Dame Milverton, as a light, joyous laugh was heard outside.

Shore's heart sank within him. Another minute would decide his fate.

An inner door opened, and Jane rushed into the room, with a letter in her hand, laughing very heartily.

III.

HOW TWENTY-THREE BACHELORS FELL IN LOVE WITH JANE, AND ENTREATED HER TO MAKE CHOICE OF ONE OF THEM.

How beautiful she looked! her fair cheeks flushed, her blue eyes shining with unaccustomed lustre, and all the pearls in her lovely mouth displayed. What a bright, joyous countenance! Alban felt more at home with her than ever!

Jane's attention being fixed on the letter she had brought to show her mother, she was quite unconscious of the goldsmith's presence.

"Another proposal!" she exclaimed, as soon as she was able to speak; "and from that presumptuous young popinjay, Randal Rubicel, the haberdasher's son, who stopped us yesterday, and would speak with me. He calls me 'his sweetest Jane,' 'the idol of his heart,' 'his life,' 'his joy,' 'his darling,' and twenty other pretty names, and vows he will kill himself unless I accept him. Well, let him! There will be one coxcomb the less in Cheapside—ha! ha!"

And she indulged in another fit of merriment.

"Jane," said her mother, checking her, "are you aware that Master Shore is here?"

"No, indeed," rejoined her daughter, in dismay; "I thought you were alone. I beg Master Shore's pardon for my heedlessness. He must have thought me very stupid."

"On the contrary," remarked the goldsmith, advancing and bowing, while she returned the salutation, "I have been very much amused. 'I suppose you often receive such letters?'"

"Generally two or three a day—sometimes more," she rejoined, laughing. "But I answer none of them. I had one yesterday from young Simon Mittlebury, the grocer's son, of the Poultry, as full of sweets and dainties as his father's shop. I would read it to you if I had not burnt it."

"Did he think you would condescend to become a grocer's wife?" observed Shore.

"I have had my choice," she continued; "of fishmongers, merchant-tailors, grocers, driers, skimmers, ironmongers, vintners, cloth-workers, and mercers. Being a mercer's daughter, I ought to have selected the last—but young Humphrey Buckram did not please me."

"You have not enumerated a goldsmith in your list," observed Shore.

"For a very good reason; no goldsmith has proposed!" she rejoined.

"The reason exists no longer," said Shore.

"I have come here for the express purpose of offering you my hand."

"You are jesting with me, Master Shore!" she remarked.

"Nay, it is true!" said her mother. "The worthy gentleman has just spoken to me on the subject."

"I trust I may have better fortune than those who have written to you, sweet Jane," said Shore, drawing near her. "Will you accept me as a husband?"

"Nay, you must not press me for an answer at once," she rejoined. "I cannot have time for consideration. I am very busy."

"At least you do not despise me?"

"I do not ask you to come again; but I shall always be pleased to see you if you do come."

"Then I will gladly avail myself of the permission."

"Tis more than she has accorded to any one else," remarked Dame Milverton.

"Then I ought to be content," said Shore. "Having received thus much encouragement, I will venture to offer you this earnest."

Opening the little case presented to her, Jane beheld a splendid chain of diamonds.

"O heavens! how exquisite!" she exclaimed. "May I accept this beautiful diamond chain, mother?"

"Assuredly, child," replied Dame Milverton.

"You will never lack jewels if you become Master Shore's bride. Besides, I must tell you," she added, in a half whisper, "he has promised to settle a handsome dowry upon you."

The remark was not without effect upon Jane, and Shore's hopes began to revive. Evidently the diamonds had pleaded strongly in his behalf.

Jane was still fascinated by the brilliant chain, when a serving-man entered, his countenance proclaiming that he was charged with some important message.

"How now, Griffith! what is the matter?" inquired the widow.

"An' please you, mistress," replied the serving-man, with difficulty preserving his gravity, "there are a dozen young bachelors without, who solicit an interview with Mistress Jane."

"A dozen young bachelors!" exclaimed the gay damsel. "Who are they?"

"Suitors, no doubt," observed Shore, laughing.

"Ay, that's it, your worship," said Griffith, who was a privileged person. "Mistress Jane has turned the heads of all the young men in the neighbourhood!"

"Suitors would never come in such numbers!" cried the widow. "Saidst thou not there were a dozen, Griffith?"

"And I will truth say I counted them, mistress," she replied.

"We will soon ascertain their business," said the widow. "Pray them to step in; my daughter will receive them in my presence."

As Griffith went out, Dame Milverton said to the goldsmith, who was preparing to leave,— "Pray do not go, good Master Shore. You may be of assistance to us."

Next moment, the door was thrown wide open by Griffith, and admittance given to a large party of young men, arrayed in jerkins and hose of red, blue, brown, and yellow, most of them armed with daggers, and some wearing shoes with long, pointed toes.

As the young bachelors entered, they all doffed their caps, and made a profound salutation to the company, which they repeated after advancing a little further into the room.

Though all were well-favoured, fine-looking young men, their appearance was so grotesque that Jane could scarcely keep her countenance, and Griffith grinned from ear to ear.

The leader of the party, who was no other than Randal Rubicel, the haberdasher's son, described by Jane as a popinjay, then proceeded to explain the object of their visit.

"You are fortunate, madam," he said, addressing the widow, but keeping his eye upon Jane as he spoke, "in possessing a daughter universally allowed to be the fairest damsel in London. You see before you twelve young bachelors, each passionately in love with her, and anxious to obtain her hand. Instead of quarrelling, and settling the difference with the sword, we have agreed to present ourselves in a body to the fair Jane, and entreat her to make choice of one of us for a husband. However great may be the disappointment of those passed over, we have sworn to abide by her decision. The course we have adopted may appear strange, but then it rarely happens that a dozen bachelors fall in love with the same damsel. I need scarcely present my companions to you; since, methinks, you are acquainted with them all."

"Yes; this is Master Simon Muttelbury, the grocer," said the widow; "this is Master Puncloon, the vintner; this, Master Serge, the cloth-worker; this, Master Hide, the skinner; this, Master Buckraff, the mercer. But, indeed, you are all well known to me, and there is not one to whom I could object if my daughter's choice should fall upon him."

Rubicel then advanced towards Jane, and, bowing lowly, said,—

"You have heard what has just passed, fair mistress. Will it please you to cast your eyes towards us, and make a selection?"

"I should feel puzzled," she replied. "You are all so much alike, that, were I to choose, it would be at haphazard. I pray you pass before me singly."

"Willingly!" said Rubicel.

And, returning to his companions, he communicated her wishes to them.

Thereupon all the young bachelors marched slowly past Jane, each gazing anxiously at her as he went by, and two or three slightly lingering in the vain hope of being selected, but she did not stop one of them.

The last to make the essay was Rubicel himself; but though he paused, and cast a supplicating look at her, he failed, like those who had preceded him.

The march ended, they all drew up in front, and the question was put to Jane whether she had made a choice.

She shook her head.

A general groan then burst from the assemblage.

"Gentlemen," said Shore, "having had your answer, I must pray you to depart peaceably."

"We shall not depart at your bidding, Alban Shore!" rejoined Rubicel, angrily. "You think to carry off the prize because you are richer than any of us; but you are mistaken! Not till you have vanquished us all shall you wed the beautiful Jane Milverton! You have a dozen duels to fight!—a dozen duels! Speak I not for you as well as for myself, comrades?" he added, to the others.

"You express our sentiments exactly, Rubicel," responded Simon Muttelbury. "This intrusive goldsmith shall fight every one of us, ere we will yield Jane Milverton to him!"

"Ay; every one of us!" echoed the rest of the party.

"You give yourselves strange license, young sirs!" cried the widow, sharply. "You talk of my daughter as if you had the right to dispose of her; but I shall give her to whom I please, without consulting you! You were allowed admittance on the understanding that you would conduct yourselves decorously, and it is a most unmannerly proceeding on your part to insult a gentleman whom you find in my house!"

"Heed them not, madam," said Shore. "I laugh at their threats!"

"We feel the reproof, madam," said Rubicel, "and will at once retire; but Master Shore shall hear from us!"

"Whenever you please!" replied the goldsmith, carelessly.

"Adieu, sweet mistress!" cried Rubicel, kissing the tips of his fingers to Jane. "If you marry, you must marry one of us; we will brook no rivals!"

"I would rather enter a convent than marry any of you!" cried Jane, contemptuously.

"You will change your mind ere long, fair mistress!" cried Humphrey Backram. "Recollect there are twelve proper young men from whom you can always choose."

"Show them to the door, Griffith!—show them to the door!" cried Dame Milverton, impatiently. "We have had enough of this fooling!"

The disappointed bachelors then withdrew, but not one of them left the room without kissing his hand to Jane.

As soon as they were gone, Jane gave vent to the laughter she had hitherto repressed.

"I am glad we are fairly rid of those foolish fogies," she cried. "I hope you will not be troubled on my account, Master Shore."

"Give yourself no concern about me, fair mistress," he rejoined. "If I am happy enough to have obtained your consent to my proposal, I shall not heed their opposition."

"But I have not yet accepted you, Master Shore," she rejoined, with a laugh; "and I must be quite certain that I like you ere I do."

"You will never be serious, Jane," said her mother.

"I hope she will always be gay as now," remarked Shore. "If I had my way, her path should be ever strewn with flowers!"

"Then my life would be a perpetual wedding-day!" cried Jane, still laughing.

"And a very happy life it would be, were such the case!" said her mother.

Just then Griffith re-entered the room, and said to the goldsmith,—

"Your worship must be pleased to tarry here awhile. Those perverse young bachelors are pacing to and fro before the door, evidently awaiting your coming forth."

"Let them cool their heels; 'twill do them good!" cried the widow. "If you have no pressing business to take you hence, good Master Shore, I pray you stay and spend the day with us. We will do our best to entertain you."

The goldsmith accepted the invitation with delight. His rivals had unintentionally done him great service.

III.

FROM WHICH IT APPEARS THAT AN OLD WOMAN HAD FORETOLD THAT JANE WOULD HAVE A ROYAL LOVER.

OWING to this fortunate circumstance, the enamoured goldsmith saw more of the fair object of his affections than he had ever done before.

Never was such a gay, light-hearted creature as Jane Milverton! The most trifling matter excited her merriment, and, as her mother had just stated, it seemed quite impossible she could continue serious for more than a minute.

Alban, however, was enchanted, and would not have had her different for the world. Had he not been already captivated, he could not have resisted her fascinations.

At her mother's request, Jane brought her lute, and sang several merry lays and romances—sang them charmingly.

Alban now felt the full force of her soft blue eyes as they were fixed upon him, while her accents vibrated to his heart. In some of the roundels he was able to take part, and acquitted himself so well that he obtained her applause, and that was all he desired.

But the blending of their voices had so enthralled him, that, unable to restrain his feelings, he renewed his suit, and vowing to be here, and here alone, besought her earnestly to plight her troth to him in her mother's presence.

"I will not engage myself to any one at present," she said. "In three months you shall have my answer—not before."

"Three months! Must I wait so long?" cried Alban.

"Indeed you must. I must know you better ere I accept you."

"'Tis a sufficient reason, and I submit."

"That is not the reason," remarked Dame Milverton. "She is waiting for a suitor who will never come. Master Shore shall hear the truth. He will think you very silly, but no matter. You must know, then, worthy sir," she continued, addressing the goldsmith, "that when Jane was almost a child, she had her fortune told by an old woman, who passed for a witch."

"Not a word more, I insist!" interrupted her daughter.

"Nay; I will go on! The old woman declared that the child whose little hand she held in her own was destined to great good fortune, and would have a royal lover."

"A royal lover!" exclaimed Shore. "And do you really believe in the prediction?" he added, to Jane.

"She does!" interposed her mother; "and that is the reason why she declines to accept you."

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Jane, blushing.

"I am glad you have no better reason for refusing me than this prophecy," said Alban.

"You laugh at me," rejoined Jane, rather piqued, "but it might come to pass. There is no telling."

"Everything is possible," observed Shore. "Unluckily, the King is married. He must get rid of his Queen before he can wed you. I am afraid you will have to put up with one who, though he cannot boast of royal descent, will love you better any monarch could love you. Indeed, unless he is belied, King Edward is not altogether faithful to the Queen."

"But she is very beautiful, is she not?" inquired Jane.

"Not so beautiful as she was, but still very beautiful," rejoined Alban. "As Elizabeth Woodville, daughter of Jacquette of Luxembourg, Duchess of Bedford, and Sir Richard Woodville, subsequently created Earl Rivers by the King, she was accounted the loveliest damsel in the realm. As you are aware, the Queen was the widow of Sir John Gray, of Groby, when the King secretly married her. Some people say she bewitched him, but the only sorcery she practised proceeded from her personal charms. Her first meeting with her royal husband was singular, and, no doubt, it was contrived. One day the King was hunting in Whittlebury Forest, near Grafton Castle, the residence of the Duchess of Bedford, and while riding along a glade, he saw, standing beneath the wide-spreading branches of an oak, a most lovely woman, holding two children by the hand. Struck by her surpassing beauty, he paused to speak with her. Elizabeth Woodville—for she it was—threw herself at his feet, and pleaded for her children, who had been deprived of their inheritance owing to their father's devotion to the House of Lancaster. She did not plead in vain. The King at once granted her suit, and so captivated was he by the charms of the lovely widow, that within a month he made her his bride. Their espousals took place secretly at Grafton Castle, in the presence of the Duchess of Bedford, by whom it was thought the affair had been planned. 'Tis seldom a plot succeeds so well, but the Duchess is wondrously clever, and knew that the King could not resist a pair of beautiful eyes!"

"His Majesty is very handsome, is he not?" asked Jane.

"I marvel you have not seen him," replied Shore, evasively. "He is frequently in the City, for it is his business to conciliate the rich burghesses. On more than one occasion he has purchased articles of jewellery from me. Unluckily, he does not always pay for what he buys. However, I must own he is very affable. Some of his attendants—the Lord Howard and Sir John Cheney, for instance, who pay no better than he does—are excessively haughty and supercilious."

"Oh! how I should like to see him!" cried Jane. "I wish you could conceal me in your shop, Master Shore, when he next pays you a visit."

"No, no," said the goldsmith, laughing. "Were you mine—as I trust you will be—I would keep you carefully out of the way of such a daring and unscrupulous libertine as the King."

"But he shouldn't see me," said Jane.

"You might betray yourself unintentionally," rejoined Alban.

"You are quite right, good Master Shore," said the widow. "One cannot be too cautious where a person who puts no bridle on his passions, like the King, is concerned. That is the reason why I will never allow Jane to stand at the window when his Majesty and his courtiers pass along Cheapside."

"If he caught sight of her, he would infallibly be struck by her beauty," said Shore.

"Suppose he did! what then?" cried Jane. "You seem to fancy I have no power of resistance, and should drop into his Majesty's mouth like a ripe plum. You are both very much mistaken. I have a great curiosity to see the King, and am resolved to gratify it. You look very cross," she added, to her mother. "Where is the harm, I should like to know?"

"There is a great deal of harm," rejoined the widow, angrily. "And I will look you up in your chamber, whenever the King rides by, unless you promise to attend to my injunctions."

During the foregoing discussion, Alban maintained a cheerful exterior, but he was not quite so easy as he had been in his mind. A feeling of jealousy, caused by Jane's ardent desire to see the King, had taken possession of him. But he deemed it ridiculous, and endeavoured—though ineffectually—to shake it off.

The rest of the evening passed very pleasantly. The lute was again introduced, and an occasional song filled up the intervals of conversation.

At length the great bell of Paul's tolled forth the hour of nine, warning the discreet goldsmith that it was time to depart; and though he could scarcely tear himself away, he felt he must needs go.

While he was taking leave, Dame Milverton expressed some anxiety lest he should be troubled by the insolent youths who had threatened him; but he soon quieted her alarm, and volunteered to come next evening.

In parting with Jane, he strove to snatch a kiss, but was unsuccessful.

Griffith, on whom he bestowed a piece of silver, as an earnest of his good will, would fain have attended him with a lantern, but he declined the offer.

IV.

HOW ALBAN SHORE ON THE WAY HOME ENCOUNTERED TWO COURT KNIGHTS, AND HOW JANE WAS SERVED.

THE night proved so dark, that Alban regretted he had not brought Griffith and the lantern with him; for though he had laughed at Dame Milverton's fears, he was not altogether without apprehension of an attack by some of his rivals, who might be lying in ambuscade. Moreover, it also occurred to him that he was without a defensive weapon of any kind.

However, he marched on resolutely, and had preceded about a hundred yards in the direction of Lombard Street, without encountering any one, when he perceived two persons standing at the corner of Wood Street.

Both were muffled up in long mantles, and their appearance being rather suspicious, he would have avoided them, but it was too late, for one of them—a person of much loftier stature than any of the young bachelors—stepped towards him, and in accents that had something of authority in their tone, said—

"Save you, friend! Can't tell us which is Dame Milverton's dwelling?"

Startled by the inquiry, Shore did not immediately answer, and the tall stranger repeated the inquiry, yet more authoritatively.

"What would you with her?" said the goldsmith. "Dame Milverton receives not visitors at this hour."

"Soh! you are acquainted with her," cried the other. "By St. George, that is lucky! You shall show us the house, and introduce us to the widow."

"For whom do you take me, that you venture to make such a proposition?" demanded Shore, controlling his anger.

"I take thee for an honest and estimable burghess," replied the other. "Nay, if I am not wrong—for I cannot distinguish thy features very clearly—thou art Shore, the goldsmith of Lombard Street."

"You have guessed rightly," said Alban; "I am Shore, the goldsmith. Your voice seems familiar to me; but I cannot give you a name. You belong not to the City—of that I am certain."

"No, by the mass, I belong to the Court! My companion and myself are knights, attendant upon the King. He is Sir William Chamberlain, and I am Sir Edward de Longespée. Now you know who we are, will you conduct us to Dame Milverton's habitation? We have heard much of the extraordinary beauty of her daughter Jane, and desire to behold the fair young damsel."

A jealous pang shot through Shore's breast as he listened to the explanation. He had previously suspected their design; but this plain avowal quite staggered him.

"I will not be accessory to any, such plan, Sir Edward," he replied. "If you desire to behold Dame Milverton's daughter, you must call at a proper hour."

"My belief is, you are in love with her yourself, Master Shore," cried Sir William, advancing, "and are therefore unwilling we should see her."

"Be not alarmed, Shore," said Longespée; "we have no intention of carrying her off. Very likely her charms have been overrated."

"There is not a damsel at Court who is half so beautiful," cried Alban.

"Said I not thou art in love with her?" exclaimed Sir William, laughing. "Thou hast betrayed thyself, Shore."

"We will not be baffled in our quest," said Longespée. "Since this churlish goldsmith refuses to direct us, we will find out the house without him. Good night, Shore! Thou wilt regret thy incivility."

And they moved on.

Greatly disturbed, the goldsmith was considering what he should do, when the door of the "Mitre," a famous tavern close at hand, was suddenly opened, and forth issued the whole of the young bachelors, who had been carousing together. From their unsteady gait, it was evident their potations had been deep.

The light streaming from the entrance of the tavern revealed Shore to them, and setting up a loud shout, they hurried towards him.

"By St. Martin! this is a rare piece of luck!" cried Rubicel. "Who would have thought of finding our goldsmith here? Since Fate has delivered thee into our hands, thou shalt not escape till thou hast sworn to resign all pretensions to the fair Jane."

"Thou hearest, Shore?" cried Simon Muttiebury. "The oath shall be dictated to thee."

"I will take no oath on compulsion," said Alban. "Detain me at your peril!"

"At our peril!" cried Muttiebury, with a scornful laugh, and drawing his sword as he spoke. "That is good! Thou hast best comply without more ado."

"Swear to resign the damsel, and thou art free," said Rubicel.

"Never!" cried Shore. "You seek in vain to intimidate me," he added, as swords were flourishing in his face, "Help! help!"

"Cease this clamour," exclaimed Muttiebury, "or we will silence thee effectually!"

But the goldsmith called out more loudly.

His cries reached the ears of the courtiers, and they hurried back to the spot.

Recognising Shore's voice, and finding him beset by numbers, they whipped out their blades, and ordered his captors to set him free.

Instead of obeying, the valorous young citizens turned upon them; but after a few blows had been exchanged with their powerful adversaries, their swords were knocked from their grasp, and they were compelled to let the captive go.

While the discomfited bachelors picked up their weapons, the goldsmith tendered his best thanks to his deliverers.

"What offence hast thou given these varlets, Master Shore, that they should thus maltreat thee?" demanded Longespée.

"That they themselves can best explain, Sir Edward," replied Alban.

"We bear him no ill will," said Rubicel. "He is our rival for the hand of the fairest damsel in the City. By reason of his wealth, his chance is greater than ours, so we have been trying to persuade him to retire."

"Go to, rascal!" cried Longespée, laughing. "Thy mode of persuasion savours of force. But thou speakest of the fairest damsel in the City. That should be Jane Milverton."

"Your worship hath made a good guess," replied Rubicel. "'Tis she, in sooth."

"Then ye are all her suitors?"

"All!" cried the bachelors, with one voice.

Longespée and his companion laughed heartily.

"We are not Jane's only admirers," said Muttiebury. "For that matter, half the young men in London are in love with her. Doubtless her charms have been heard of at Court, and may even have reached the King's ears."

"Thou art right, good fellow—they have," said Longespée. "I should like to judge of this paragon of perfection. I may not think so highly of her as thou dost. What suits thy taste may not suit mine."

"There cannot be two opinions as to Jane Milverton's beauty," said Rubicel. "She dwells hereabouts. A serenade might bring her to the window, and you could then obtain a glimpse of her. Unluckily, we are not provided with lute or cittern."

"But you have voices worth listening to, I'll be sworn," said Longespée, pleased with the notion.

"Now I bethink me, there is a minstrel in the 'Mitre,'" continued Rubicel. "We might take him with us."

"Excellent!" cried Longespée. "Fithce, fetch him!"

And as Rubicel departed on the errand, he added to the goldsmith, "I shall have my wish, and without trouble."

Shore was too much vexed to make a reply. A couple of silver groats induced the minstrel to accompany the party. The young bachelors led the way to the widow's denicile, which was at no great distance, and the two courtiers followed.

Shore went with them, resolved to see the end of the adventure.

Like all the adjoining habitations, Dame Milverton's house was built of lath and plaster, and had bay windows, and pointed gables of carved oak.

A light was visible in the lower room, but the window-curtains were drawn. Everybody felt certain, however, that those inside the apartment were Jane and her mother.

As soon as the young bachelors had arranged themselves, the minstrel struck up a tender love-song—all the youths joining in chorus at the end of each couplet.

At first, very little notice was taken of the serenaders, but by-and-by there were indications that the song was listened to; and before it concluded, the curtains were drawn back, and Jane and her mother could be seen.

As the damsel held a taper in her hand, her fair features were clearly distinguishable.

Never was a creature more charming seen than was presented to the lookers-on. The two courtiers were enraptured.

"'Tis she!—'tis Jane Milverton herself!" said Rubicel. "What think you of her? Is her beauty over-rated?"

"Not a whit," rejoined Longespée. "By my halidome! she is the loveliest creature I ever beheld. I should never tire of gazing at her."

"You are crazed, like all the rest," said his companion, laughing at his enthusiasm.

"I must not lose this opportunity," said Longespée. "I will speak to her."

"Nay, I beseech you, do not!" cried the other.

Unaccustomed, however, to put any restraint upon himself, and regardless of consequences, the tall Knight derided the counsel, and marching up to the window, tapped against it.

Startled by the noise, Jane looked in the direction whence it proceeded, but could only discern a lofty figure.

Longespée tapped again.

"A word with you, fair damsel, I entreat," he cried.

"Who is it?" asked Jane. "I hold no converse with a stranger."

"Open the window, and you shall learn who I am," said the Knight.

"Whoever you are, I owe you no thanks for bringing these troublesome youths here," she rejoined. "Begone, and take them with you. They have disturbed me sufficiently."

"Deny me not!" implored the Knight. "I have something important to say to you."

"How tiresome he is!" exclaimed Jane. "Well, I must get rid of him."

And she was stepping towards the window, when some one amid the throng collected outside, called out in a loud voice, "Beware!"

In an instant the taper was extinguished, and Jane vanished.

Immediately afterwards, the curtains were again drawn, and nothing more could be seen of the inmates of the house.

Feeling that his chance was over, the Knight drew back.

"Who called out?" he angrily demanded.

No one could tell him. But he suspected it must have been Share, for the goldsmith could not be discovered.

"Are you now ready to depart?" inquired his companion, approaching him.

Longespée answered in the affirmative.

The other then placed a whistle to his lips, and blew a call.

The young bachelors were filled with wonderment, but their surprise increased when two grooms appeared, each leading a horse.

The Knights instantly mounted, and, bidding "Good night" to the youths, rode off in the direction of Ludgate.

"Those must be great personages," remarked Rubicel to his companion. "Marked you not that their grooms wore the royal livery?"

IN WHAT MANNER JANE'S CONSENT WAS WON BY ALBAN.

NEARLY three months had passed by, and during this period of probation Alban was constant in his attendance upon Jane.

On each evening he came to her mother's house, and was always well received, but he could not flatter himself that he made much progress in the young damsel's affections.

She did not dislike his society, but appeared indifferent to him; and he felt her coldness deeply. Sometimes he fancied she loved another, but he was utterly unable to discover his rival. It could not be one of the twelve young bachelors; for though they still persecuted Jane with their addresses, she would listen to none of them. It could scarcely be Sir Edward de Longespée, for nothing more had been seen of him since the night when he accompanied the serenaders, and tapped against the window.

Alban was perplexed. He mentioned his suspicions to Dame Milverton, but she told him he was mistaken. She was certain he had no secret rival.

Notwithstanding these assurances, he was far from easy, and suffered so much from Jane's coldness, that he resolved to bring the matter to an issue one way or the other.

Generally, Dame Milverton was with them when they met; but on the evening in question she had been induced, by a sign from Alban, to leave them alone together.

No sooner had she quitted the room, than taking Jane's small white hand in his own, he pressed it to his lips. Nor did he part with it as he addressed her.

"I beseech you to abridge the term you have imposed upon me, sweetest Jane," he said. "I and I am not equal to so severe a trial. Besides, why should we wait so long? You know me now as well as you will ever know me, for I have no concealment from you."

How fondly I love you I need not say; but I desire to prove my love by the devotion of a husband. Your mother has given her consent to the marriage—why withhold yours? My house is ready for you; my servants are anxious to call you mistress; all that money can procure shall be yours!”

“I know you can give me wealth, Alban,” she rejoined. “But you cannot give me rank.”

He looked at her for a moment in surprise, and then said in a half-reproachful tone:—

“That silly prophesy still dwells on your mind, I perceive, Jane. I would I were a prince, for your sake!”

“Would you were!” she exclaimed.

Then seeing how much she had pained him, she added, “I am very foolish—very ungrateful. ‘Tis a poor return for your love and kindness to wish you were some one else. Nevertheless, I must own I should like you better if you were a prince.”

“E! these are your real sentiments, Jane,” he remarked coldly, and letting go her hand, “it will be better that all should be at an end between us.”

“Be it so, if you wish it,” she rejoined. “I have spoken frankly. As Alban Shore, the goldsmith, I love you; but I should love you better if you were a noble—still better if you were a prince.”

“If this is jesting, I do not like it,” he said. “Be serious for a moment, if you can. Do you love me well enough to wed me?”

“I can’t tell.”

“But you must decide.”

“Suppose I say ‘No?’”

“In that case, I shall instantly take my departure, and shall not return.”

Uttered in a firm, sad tone, these words produced an impression upon Jane.

Suddenly changing her manner, she replied,

“Then, I must needs say ‘Yes.’”

An instantaneous revulsion took place in Alban’s feelings.

Catching her in his arms, and pressing her rapturously to his breast, he exclaimed,—

“Our marriage shall take place to-morrow.”

“Why so much haste?” she asked.

“Because I have waited too long already—because I am afraid of losing you.”

“How distrustful you are!” she cried.

“Have I not reason for distrust?” he rejoined.

Just then Dame Milverton entered the room, and seeing how matters stood, called out,—

“So all is settled at last, I perceive. I am right glad of it.”

“Yes; Jane has agreed that our marriage shall take place to-morrow,” cried Alban, joyfully.

“To-morrow!” exclaimed the widow. “That is allowing but scant time for preparation.”

“So I think,” observed Jane. “I am in no such hurry. Next week, or next month, will please me just as well.”

“But it won’t please me!” cried her mother. “We will have no postponement. All can be managed without difficulty,” she added, glancing at Alban.

“Yes, there need be no delay,” he exclaimed. “We will be married at Paul’s. I will go and make all needful arrangements. I leave you to invite the wedding guests, madam,” he said to Dame Milverton.

“Stay,” cried Jane, as he was hurrying off.

“I have something to say to you.”

“I’ll hear it when I come back,” he cried.

“I want to catch Father Bellasius.”

Jane again attempted to remonstrate, but he stopped her mouth with a kiss, and rushed out of the room.

“My consent has been wrested from me,” she cried, as soon as he was gone. “I hope I shall not repent.”

VI.

HOW ALBAN SHORE WAS WEDDED TO THE BEAUTIFUL JANE MILVERTON IN SAINT PAUL’S CATHEDRAL, AND HOW THE KING SALUTED THE BRIDE AT THE PORCH.

SHORTLY before noon, on the day appointed for Alban Shore’s marriage with the beautiful Jane Milverton, it chanced that the King, who had signified his intention of holding a conference with the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, at Guildhall, entered the City on horseback.

Accompanied by his chief favourites, Henry Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, who filled the office of High Constable, and the Lord Hastings, Grand Chamberlain, his Majesty was preceded by a small party of mounted archers, and followed by half-a-dozen henchmen in doublets of blue satin, richly embroidered, murrey-coloured silk hose, and black velvet caps.

Edward the Fourth was then in the very prime of manhood, and justly accounted the handsomest man of his day. His figure was a remarkable combination of strength and elegance—his limbs being very gracefully formed, yet full of vigour. Trained from early youth in all manly exercises, he became so skilful that, as Earl of March, in his nineteenth year, he overthrew every knight he encountered in the tilt-yard.

As the King wore neither beard, nor moustaches, the fine classical outline of his features could be fully distinguished. His complexion was fair, his eyes blue, and his chestnut locks were worn thickly at the back of the head. Yet there was nothing effeminate in his expression; and although good nature seemed stamped upon his handsome lineaments, he had a very courageous and determined look.

Edward’s extreme affability and easy manner rendered him popular with all classes; while his gallantry and good looks gained him the goodwill of the fairer portion of his subjects.

Brave, courteous, handsome, chivalrous, accomplished, he seemed the very model of a king; but we are bound to say that he had many faults. Though good-natured, he was quick to take offence, unforgiving when offended, sanguinary in the field, and a confirmed voluptuary.

Elegant in his tastes, the handsome monarch was exceedingly fond of rich attire. Cloth of silver and gold, and velvet lined with the most precious furs, were his constant wear.

On the present occasion an embroidered doublet, of murrey-coloured velvet, fitting tightly to the shape, and having pinked sleeves, so as to show the fine linen beneath it, displayed his figure to the greatest advantage, while blue silk hose set off his shapely limbs. The points of his yellow morocco boots, then called poulaines, and more than an ell in length, were fastened to the knee by chains of gold. His mantle was of purple velvet, lined with the most precious fur. Round his neck was a collar of sun and roses, with the white lion of the House of March appended. A magnificent girdle, studded with gems, and placed above the hips, sustained his sword and dagger, both of which had splendid hilts. His purple velvet cap was without a plume, and ornamented with pearls.

A consummate horseman, Edward was never seen to greater advantage than in the saddle, and the noble steed he now bestrode seemed proud of his princely rider. The charger was caparisoned in blue cloth of gold, embroidered with the royal badge, a flaming sun.

The two nobles by whom the king was attended were fine-looking men, but could not for a moment be compared with their royal master.

Buckingham had a doublet of tawny satin, with a surcoat of violet, ingrained; and Hastings wore a green satin pourpoint, embroidered with gold, and a velvet surcoat of the same colour. Each was decked with a magnificent chain and girdle, and had a collar of suns and roses like the king.

Though Edward's visits to the City were of frequent occurrence, crowds always collected to gaze at him, and welcome him with shouts, while fair, smiling faces could be seen at all the open windows. On the owners of these fair faces the debonair monarch failed not to bestow an admiring glance as he rode along.

On the morning in question, he had a good many buxom dames and comely damsels to greet; and as he was careful not to neglect any of them, his progress from Ludgate to Saint Paul's was necessarily rather slow.

But he appeared in high good humour, and not unfrequently joked with Buckingham and Hastings, who laughed heartily, as becomed them, at the king's pleasantries.

Occasionally, also, he would call their attention to some fair maiden, speaking of her in terms of praise, so loudly uttered as to summon a blush to her cheeks.

Just as the royal cavalcade arrived at Saint Paul's, a great number of persons issued from the cathedral, and ranged themselves on either side of the steps, evidently expecting that some one they were anxious to behold would speedily come forth.

So engrossed were they by this object that they scarcely noticed the king, who, not wishing to interfere with them, reined in his charger, and signed to the attendant guard to halt.

Instantly the command obeyed, when the great portal was thrown open, and forth came a bridal party.

The marriage between Alban Shore and the lovely Jane Milverton had just been solemnised in St. Etheldreda's chapel, in the presence of an immense number of spectators, amongst whom were the twelve disappointed bachelors.

Jane looked exquisitely beautiful in her bridal costume. A wreath encircled her fair brow, and her sunny locks, being entirely unbound, flowed down her back. The long white veil, that covered her almost from head to foot, was removed by the bridesmaids as she knelt at the altar.

The ceremony was performed by Father Bellasius, a canon of the Cathedral. It was remarked by the bridesmaids that Jane's accents were scarcely audible; and when the nuptial rites had been performed, and Dame Milverton embraced her daughter, she perceived that Jane trembled.

Alban, however, was now the happiest of men; and when his discomfited rivals, who had gathered round him, strove to provoke him by their looks, he regarded them with supreme disdain.

The scene within the cathedral as the bridal party moved along the aisle was extraordinary. Hundreds of spectators, eager to obtain a glimpse of the beautiful bride, pressed upon the newly-wedded pair: and as Jane had not resumed her veil, the curiosity of these persons was gratified.

All who beheld her declared she looked charming, and it was universally thought that she was the loveliest bride that had ever been seen in the ancient cathedral.

At length, after several interruptions, the little procession reached the portal; and as the newly-married pair came forth, Jane's gaze passed rapidly over the vast throng collected outside, and alighted upon a splendid-looking personage on horseback, who, with the two nobles in attendance upon him, was stationed at a little distance from the portal.

"'Tis the King!" observed Alban.

The information was unneeded. The sumptuous apparel and majestic demeanour of the horseman, combined with the deference paid him by his attendants, proclaimed his exalted rank.

Nor could she, for a moment, doubt to whom that stately figure and noble countenance belonged. It was he whom she had so ardently desired to behold.

But her surprise increased when he spoke, and she recognised the voice of the presumptuous stranger who had addressed her at the window of her mother's dwelling.

What strange emotions were excited in her breast by the discovery!

After gazing at her for a moment with looks of undisguised admiration, Edward pressed forward his charger, while the archers kept back the crowd.

"By my troth, Master Shore," he cried, in a good-humoured voice, "you are a right clever fellow, and as lucky as clever! I know not by what arts you have beaten a whole host of rivals, and contrived to win for yourself the fairest damsel that our good City of London can boast; but, however you have gained her, you deserve our hearty congratulations on your success, and you have them!"

"I humbly thank your Majesty," replied Alban, bowing profoundly, while Jane made a deep reverence, "in my own name, and in that of my bride. I can assure your Majesty that I esteem myself singularly fortunate in having obtained such a prize!"

"No wonder!" cried Edward. "But hark ye, Shore! you must not exclude your beautiful wife from public view. If so, all the young bachelors in the City will regret that she has bestowed her hand upon you. Let her be seen; let her appear at all shows and entertainments; let no restraint be put upon her. She must do as she pleases, go where she pleases, and be indulged in all her whims and fancies. This ought now to be agreed upon."

"It is agreed upon, my gracious liege," replied Shore. "My wife shall do exactly as she pleases."

"'Tis well!" cried Edward. "We are now satisfied you will make an indulgent and easy-going husband, and the fair Jane will be the most enviable wife in the City, as she is undoubtedly the prettiest."

Great merriment followed the King's speech.

"I know not how to thank your Majesty for the interest you are pleased to take in me," said Jane, whose cheeks were suffused with blushes. "But indeed I am very grateful."

"Bring thy wife nearer to me, Shore," said the King. "I have a trifling gift to bestow upon her."

And as the injunction was obeyed, and the blushing bride, who really looked lovelier than ever, stood beside him, Edward detached a small diamond clasp from his attire, and presented it to her.

Then, bending down, he passed his arm round her waist, and slightly raising her, imprinted a kiss on her rosy lips.

That Shore approved of this proceeding on the part of the gallant monarch, we cannot avouch; but he forced a smile; and it is quite certain that Jane was not offended.

The lookers on were highly diverted.

In the midst of the general merriment, the King bade adieu to Jane, and, attended by his suite, rode on to Guildhall.

VII.

HOW JANE FOUND A DANGEROUS CONSPIRACY IN ALICIA FORDHAM.

SOME three years had flown since Jane became the wife of Alban Shore; and if she was not perfectly happy, it was her own fault; for she had a most devoted husband, who strove to gratify her every wish.

As she had heretofore been styled the loveliest damsel in the City, she was now known as the fairest wife. None so beautiful as Mistress Shore.

The goldsmith was envied for his good fortune by a great number of City gallants, among whom were the young bachelors previously mentioned, all of whom were still bachelors. But though many of these impertinent coxcombs would fain have intruded upon her notice, Jane gave none of them the slightest encouragement.

During the long interval we have chosen to pass over, Jane had sustained a very great and indeed irreparable loss in the death of her mother. This sad event occurred quite unexpectedly about a year after she had quitted the maternal roof, and was a source of great grief to her. Alban himself sincerely lamented his mother-in-law, and he had more reason for regret than he was aware of at the time. As long as Dame Milverton lived, she watched most carefully over her daughter, who was always governed by her counsels.

Deprived of her mother's judicious advice, Jane chose a friend nearly of her own age, who flattered her in order to obtain an influence over her, and made it her business never to say anything disagreeable. Alicia Fordham, the friend in question, had been one of Jane's bridesmaids, and had since become the wife of a mercer, dwelling in the Poultry.

A lively brunette, with fine dark eyes and dark tresses, and a pretty figure, which she set off to the best advantage by dress,—Mistress Fordham had a very agreeable, insinuating manner. She laid herself out to please Jane, and succeeded so well that she soon became her bosom friend and confidante. Mistress Shore could not exist without her.

This intimacy had a mischievous effect upon the goldsmith's young wife, and would never have been permitted had her mother been alive.

Shore did not altogether approve of it, though he had no idea of the danger; but seeing how fond Jane was of her friend, he did not like to interfere. Moreover, Mistress Fordham was careful to do nothing to forfeit his good opinion.

Never since her wedding-day had Jane set eyes upon the King. Almost immediately after their meeting at the portal of the cathedral, a conspiracy broke out in the North, that led to a renewal of the civil wars that had previously desolated the kingdom, and the best blood in the country again flowed in torrents on the field of battle and on the scaffold.

Defeated by Warwick, Edward was compelled to fly the kingdom, and take refuge in Holland. But he returned, and soon raising another army, marched upon London, where the citizens opened the gates to him.

Then followed the sanguinary Battle of Barnet, at which Warwick was slain; and three weeks afterwards, the fate of the Lancastrians was decided at Tewksbury, when Queen Margaret of Anjou, and her son, were taken prisoners. The young Prince was massacred by Clarence and Gloucester, in the presence of the victorious Edward, and the Queen was sent a prisoner to the Tower.

The unfortunate Henry VI having been secretly put to death in the Tower, and all the chief partisans of the Red Rose removed, Edward became a tranquil possessor of the throne, and gave himself up for a time to ease and enjoyment.

But, growing tired of this indolence, he roused himself, and entered into a league with his brother-in-law, the Duke of Burgundy, for the invasion of France. With this design he collected a large army, and made other warlike preparations, and he was endeavouring to obtain the necessary supplies for the expedition at the time when our story is resumed.

Firmly attached to the House of York, Shore had watched the long struggle in which Edward had been engaged with the keenest interest. His chief desire, however, was that these internal dissensions should be settled, and the kingdom restored to tranquillity. A civil war was not favourable to his business, either as a banker or a goldsmith, and while it lasted, more jewels and plate were sold than bought. It is true that he could have lent money to half-ruined nobles and knights at any rate of interest he chose to demand; but, as we have said, he was not a usurer. Thus, though he regretted the fate of the unfortunate Henry VI, he was rejoiced when Edward was firmly settled on the throne. The projected invasion of France was popular with the citizens, and Shore shared the general enthusiasm.

One day, when Jane was alone in an upper room, looking into Lombard Street, Mistress Fordham presented herself in a state of great excitement, and exclaimed,—

"What do you think, Jane? The King is coming here this morning. You have often said you wished to see his Majesty again. Now you will have an opportunity. He has business to transact with Shore, and will be here at noon."

"How know you this, Alice?" inquired Jane.

"A royal messenger is below," replied Mistress Fordham. "I saw him as I came in, and learnt his errand. No doubt the King wants to borrow money for the French invasion. But he is sure to ask for you."

"That is very unlikely," replied Jane, blushing. "I make no doubt he has quite forgotten me. He only saw me on one occasion—nearly three years ago."

"But recollect what occurred then," said Alice. "'Tis impossible he can have forgotten you."

"I hope he has," said Jane.

"I am quite sure he has not," rejoined Alice. "I myself witnessed the scene at the porch of the cathedral, and the King's looks showed plainly enough how much he was in love with you. No! no! be sure he has not forgotten you."

"But I have never heard from him since—never received the slightest message," cried Jane.

"That is easily accounted for," rejoined Mistress Fordham. "The rising in Yorkshire took place at the time, and his Majesty was obliged to march off at once to put down the insurgents. Since then, as you know, he has been constantly engaged in warfare, and has had no time, until lately, to think of lighter matters. As to his having forgotten you, that is quite out of the question."

"You alarm me, Alice. If I thought it likely the King had any design—such as you suggest—in coming here, I would avoid him; for, though I would never listen to his addresses, I should not like to trust myself with him—for it may be very difficult to say 'No' to a King, and my duty to my husband will not allow me to say 'Yes.' Do you really believe he troubles his head about me?"

"I scarcely know how to reply, since you put the question to me in that way," said Mistress Fordham. "I am quite certain the King was in love with you—greatly in love—three years ago. Possibly circumstances may have obliterated your image from his memory, but as you are now lovelier than ever, I am quite certain when he beholds you again that his passion will be revived."

"What would you advise me to do?" cried Jane. "I ought not to see him again."

"Why not?" cried Mistress Fordham. "Surely you have sufficient reliance on yourself! But it will be time enough to consider what you ought to do when you see him."

"No; it will then be too late," said Jane. "To enable you to judge for me, I will confess that for some time after the interview with the King, to which you have just alluded, I did indulge a feeling for him that savoured of love; but I conquered it at last, and now he is nothing to me. Were I to see him again, the feeling might return. You know I have the best and kindest of husbands, and I would not wrong him for the world."

"Shore is an excellent man," said Alice, "But if he were ten times better than he is, I should not think him comparable to the King."

"Alice, I will not allow you to disparage my husband."

"Nay, I deny him none of his merits. I only wish he was as handsome as the King."

"He is quite handsome enough for me," replied Jane. "I am sure he has always been faithful to me, and that is more than the Queen can say of her royal consort."

"Poh! she does not trouble herself about his Majesty's infidelities," said Mistress Fordham. "Fortunately for herself, she is not of a jealous disposition."

Just then a great noise was heard in the street, and, guessing the cause of the disturbance, they flew to the window, and beheld the King.

With him were the Lord Hastings and the Lord Howard, and he was attended by a small body-guard of mounted archers, and a couple of grooms, one of whom held the bridle of his charger as he dismounted. A small body-guard of archers kept back the crowd.

Edward paused for a moment to say a word to Lord Hastings, and during this interval Shore came forth bare-headed, and after making a profound obeisance, ushered the King ceremoniously into his house.

The two nobles did not alight, and the crowd collected in the street was kept back by the archers.

VIII.

SHOWING ON WHAT ERRAND THE KING CAME TO LOMBARD STREET.

HAD Jane acted up to the prudent resolution she had formed, she would have instantly retired from the window when she found it was the King; but she appeared quite fascinated, and continued gazing at him as long as he remained in sight.

How majestic was his mien! Sumptuous attire set off his noble person to the greatest advantage, and so lofty was his stature that he quite dwarfed those who stood near him.

That the King noticed her, Jane could not doubt. Just as he was about to enter the house, he cast his eyes upwards, and gave her a glance of recognition.

Momentary as was the look, it caused the most violent perturbation in her breast, and she shrank from the searching scrutiny of Alice, who was closely watching her.

"Well! was I not right?" cried the latter. "I said you would soon see the King, and lo! here he is. But you look quite overcome. You had better sit down."

"Yes. I do feel rather faint," replied Jane, sinking into a chair. "But I shall recover in a moment. I did not think I should have been so foolish. The King's sudden appearance has thrown me into this state."

"Prepare yourself for an interview," remarked Mistress Fordham. "Depend upon it you will be sent for."

"Nay, then, I must indeed prepare," cried Jane, starting up. "I must make some slight change in my attire. Call Drusilla for me, I beg you, Alice."

"No change is necessary," replied Mistress Fordham. "You cannot look better. Your dress suits you to admiration, and I am sure his Majesty will be of my opinion. There is not a lady at Court who looks half so well in her velvet and jewels."

"Ah! Alice, you are a dreadful flatterer. But I am running headlong into the danger I ought to avoid. I must stop while there is yet time. Help me, Alice, help me, or I am lost!"

"Why, what a silly, timorous creature you are! There is nothing to cause this uneasiness. His Majesty will pay you a few compliments, and then the interview will be over."

"But it may lead to another interview; there is the danger, Alice."

Whatever reply Mistress Fordham intended was cut short by the sudden entrance of a very pretty handmaiden, whose looks betokened great excitement.

"The King is coming up-stairs, madam," exclaimed Drusilla.

"Oh, dear! what shall I do?" cried Jane. "Receive him, of course," rejoined the other. "What else can you do?"

"Nay, madam, there's nothing to be afraid of," observed Drusilla, in an encouraging tone. "His Majesty looks very gracious. He even smiled at me when I was sent up to you by master. But here he is."

"Saints protect me!" mentally ejaculated Jane.

But, before describing the meeting between Edward and the goldsmith's wife, we must see what took place in Shore's back parlour, whither the King had been conducted when he entered the goldsmith's shop.

No sooner were they alone together in this room than Edward, who wanted to borrow money from the rich goldsmith, thus opened his business:—

"I have come to you for assistance, good Master Shore," he said. "You know that I am about to invade France, with the design of gaining the crown of that country; or, at least, Normandy and Guienne. I have been very liberally dealt with by some of your fellow citizens; but, though I have obtained large sums from them, I have not yet got enough. You must find me ten thousand crowns. I will repay you if I am victorious, as I shall be, for I have the aid of the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne."

"Ten thousand crowns! 'Tis a large sum," observed Shore.

"Nay, if you require it, I will give you ample security—jewels of fully thrice the value."

"The deposit is unnecessary," said Shore. "Your Majesty shall have the sum you require. I will take your royal word for the repayment of the money."

"By St. George! you are a noble fellow, Shore!" cried Edward. "Not without reason have you been praised for liberality. You shall not find me ungrateful. Ask any favour in return; 'tis granted ere asked. I swear it by my father's head!"

"I have no boon to ask now, my gracious liege," rejoined Shore. "Hereafter I may venture to remind your Majesty of your promise."

"When you please," cried the King. "Be sure I shall not forget it. And now, since we have settled this grave affair so satisfactorily, let us turn to a pleasanter matter. It was my good fortune to behold your lovely wife on your wedding day at St. Paul's, and unless my eyes deceived me, I caught sight of her just now at the window above your shop. I would fain have a word with her."

"I will send for her at once," rejoined the goldsmith.

And, opening a side door, he called for Drusilla.

"Nay, by my faith," cried the King, "Mistress Shore shall not come to me; I will go to her. Lead the way, I pray you; lead the way."

Though somewhat discomposed by the order, Shore could not refuse compliance, but, with the best grace he could, conducted the King to the upper room.

IX.

HOW JANE AND HER HUSBAND WERE BIDDEN TO THE FESTIVITIES AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

JANE felt as if she should sink to the ground, when the door was thrown open by her husband, and the King entered the room; but his Majesty's easy and affable manner quickly reassured her.

Raising her graciously as she bent to him, Edward pressed her hand to his lips, and he paid a like gallant attention to Mistress Fordham.

After reminding Jane of his former meeting with her, he said, playfully, "I hope your husband has followed the advice I gave him on that occasion? I suppose he allows you your own way in everything? You do not look as if your inclinations were thwarted."

"Indeed, my liege, I have no complaint to make," replied Jane. "My husband is most indulgent to me. Mistress Fordham will tell your Majesty that there is not a citizen's wife in London who has more liberty and indulgence than myself. Alban has never yet refused a request I have made to him."

"That is much to say, in good sooth," observed the King, "and speaks well both for you and him. We will now put his good nature to the test. Some festivities will be shortly held at Windsor Castle. The Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress, with the aldermen and their wives, will be our guests. You must come with them. Amongst other shows, there will be a tournament."

"Oh, how delightful!" exclaimed Jane. "I have longed so much to see a tournament."

"Then your desire shall now be gratified," said Edward. "You hear, Shore. You must bring your fair wife to our castle of Windsor next week, where both she and you shall be well cared for, and see all that is to be seen."

"I thank your Majesty," replied Shore, bowing profoundly. "Both my wife and myself are highly honoured by the invitation. 'Tis more than we could expect to be included among your Majesty's guests."

"None will be more welcome," said Edward. "And I am sure no lovelier dame will grace the gallery of the tilt-yard. I shall not be sorry that the haughty Court dames should find themselves outshone by a citizen's wife. I have always maintained that the fairest women are to be found here in London."

"The citizens' wives are greatly beholden to your Majesty," observed Mistress Fordham.

"Nay, I assert the simple truth," said the King. "But you must come with Mistress Shore to the tourney, and witness her triumph."

Alice bent low as she signified her delighted assent.

"Will it please your Majesty to take the money with you?" inquired Shore. "If so, I will give orders respecting it."

"Prithee, do so," rejoined the King, evidently well pleased by the suggestion.

Thereupon the goldsmith made an obeisance, and quitted the room.

No sooner was he gone than Mistress Fordham retired towards the window, so that the King and Jane were left alone together.

"The moment I have so eagerly longed for has arrived," said Edward, taking the hand of the goldsmith's fair wife, and gazing tenderly into her face. "I can now have a word with you. During the long interval that has elapsed, I have never ceased to think of you. In the tent, or on the field, your image has been constantly before me. I have looked upon you as my guardian angel."

"I did not suppose your Majesty ever thought of me," said Jane. "You, who have seen so many beauties—"

"But none of them ever produced the same effect upon me as you. Tell me, sweet Jane," he said, in the soft tones that had generally proved resistless, "have you ever thought of me?"

"Too often for my peace of mind, my liege," she replied. "I have sometimes wished I had never beheld you."

"Oh, say not so!" he cried. "You will have no cause to regret meeting me, for henceforward I will devote myself to you. Fate has separated us for a while, but we are now restored to each other, and we will part no more."

"I must not listen to such language, even from your Majesty," said Jane, trembling.

"You forget that I have a husband, whom I ought to love above all other men, and whose happiness depends upon me."

"Your husband will surrender you to me," said the King. "Nay, he must—if I so will it."

"Your Majesty may take me from him by force—but he will never yield me up. Of that I am certain," replied Jane.

"But you will come to me if your own free will—will you, not, sweetheart? From love, or pity, you must needs be mine—I cannot live without you.”

“Press me not for an answer, my liege! I dare not give it,” murmured Jane.

“Confess you love me, and I shall be satisfied!” cried Edward.

“Hist! hist!” exclaimed Alice. “There are footsteps on the stairs.”

Next moment, Shore entered the room; and if he had looked towards his wife, he must inevitably have noticed her confusion.

His attention, however, was directed to the King, who had drawn back when the warning was given by Mistress Fordham.

“All is prepared, my liege,” he said. “The bags of money will be delivered to your grooms.”

“I thank you heartily, good Master Shore,” replied Edward. “I repeat you have conferred a great boon upon me. Adieu, fair mistress!” he added, turning to Jane. “We shall soon see you again at Windsor Castle.”

“Why do you not answer?” cried Shore. “Yes, my gracious liege. I will not fail to bring her and Mistress Fordham.”

With a look at Jane, who only just dared to raise her eyes, and who almost shrank from his gaze, the King quitted the room, ceremoniously attended by Shore.

Shortly afterwards, shouts in the street proclaimed that he was mounting his charger, and Alice, who had rushed to the window, called out,— “Come hither quickly, Jane. His Majesty is looking for you.”

But Jane did not stir.

A trampling was then heard, announcing the departure of the royal cavalcade. But Jane still continued motionless.

Presently Alice left the window, and Jane said to her,—

“Is he gone?”

“Yes,” replied the other. “Why did you not gladden him with a parting smile? He looked back as long as he was in sight.”

“I have done wrong in listening to him, Alice,” said Jane, gravely. “I must not see him again—I will not go to Windsor.”

“Not go to Windsor!—not attend the tournament! What excuse will you make to your husband?”

“I will tell him the truth.”

“Very proper, no doubt—but extremely foolish,” cried Alice, half contemptuously. “You will only make Shore uncomfortable. If you are wise, you will hold your tongue.”

“Perhaps that may be the best course,” observed Jane. “At all events, I won’t go to Windsor.”

“We shall see,” muttered Alice.

Determined to use all her influence to frustrate Jane’s good intentions, Mistress Fordham thought it best not to say anything at the moment, feeling convinced that another and more favourable opportunity for discussing the matter would speedily arise.

She therefore took leave of her friend, proposing to come next day, when she hoped to find that Jane had changed her mind.

“I don’t think I shall,” replied the goldsmith’s wife.

“Don’t decide till to-morrow,” said Alice; “and, meanwhile, say nothing to Alban.”

Rather reluctantly Jane assented to the suggestion, and Alice took her departure.

X.

HOW JANE DETERMINED NOT TO GO TO WINDSOR, AND BY WHOM HER PRUDENT RESOLVE WAS OVERTHROWN.

ALBAN could not help remarking that his wife seemed thoughtful during the remainder of the day, and he was the more surprised by her pensive looks, as he expected she would have been overjoyed by the royal invitation to the tournament.

However, he did not question her on the subject, but on the following day, finding she still looked more serious than was her wont, he said, “Why so melancholy, dearest Jane? Has aught occurred to trouble you? Confide your grief to me.”

“Nay, I have no grief,” said Jane, trying to force a smile.

“Something is certainly upon your mind,” observed Alban. “Does aught connected with the King’s visit disturb you? It may be that you have some dread of appearing among the Court dames, and fancy they may look down upon you. Dismiss any such notion. A goldsmith’s wife may not take rank, but she cannot be slighted; and depend upon it no disrespect will be shown you. If I thought so, you should not go.”

“Oh, no; you are mistaken!” she cried: “I have no fear of being treated with disrespect. But I think it will be best not to go to Windsor. Do not ask my reasons, for I cannot very well explain them. It will be a great disappointment to me not to see the tournament; but I am sure I should experience some annoyance that would do away with all my pleasure.”

“Make yourself quite easy, sweetheart. The King will take care you experience no annoyance.”

“That may be; but you know how censorious people are, and were his Majesty to pay me any attentions, improper constructions would infallibly be put upon them.”

“But if I am satisfied, you need not mind what other people say,” remarked Alban. “I have too much faith in you to be jealous, even of the King.”

“You are too good,” cried Jane, almost overcome. “I do not deserve your confidence.”

“What terrible matter have you kept back from me?” said Alban, smiling good-humouredly, and taking her hand. “Tell me, sweetheart—tell me.”

“Since you will have me speak,” rejoined Jane, summoning up her courage for the dreaded disclosure, “the King professes to be in love with me.”

The announcement did not produce the effect she anticipated. Shore's equanimity was not in the slightest degree disturbed. On the contrary, he smiled, and said, "That is only what I expected. His Majesty professes to be in love with every pretty woman he meets. Many of them are foolish enough to believe him; but I am sure that is not the case with you."

Jane made no answer, and her husband went on.

"You must not for a moment treat the matter seriously. Your safety is in indifference, real or assumed."

"But what am I to do if the King should continue to persecute me with his addresses?"

"Act as I advise, and he will soon desist," replied Shore.

Just then Mistress Fordham made her appearance.

She saw at a glance how matters stood, and though she blamed Jane's imprudence, she was glad to find that Alban seemed so unconcerned.

"Jane has just let me into a secret," he said; "but I daresay it is no secret to you. She tells me the King is in love with her. Knowing his character, I should be surprised if he were not. His passion gives me no sort of uneasiness, because I feel sure it will never be reciprocated. Jane's affection for me could no more be shaken than could mine for her."

"I admire your calmness, sir," rejoined Mistress Fordham. "You view the matter most sensibly. I have always said you are the best of husbands, and you now prove the truth of my assertion. You are quite right in the good opinion you entertain of your wife. Rest assured she will never deceive you."

"I am certain of it," replied Shore. "I should be sorry she stayed away from any mistaken apprehension of the King's designs, which, if contemplated, can easily be baffled." "I will do whatever you desire," said Jane.

"Spoken like a dutiful wife," he cried. "Since the matter is settled, I will now tell you that I have just seen the Lord Mayor. Hearing we are invited to the royal festivities, he offers to take us in his barge to Windsor."

"Oh! that will be delightful!" exclaimed Jane.

"Then you will not blame me for accepting he offer?" remarked Shore.

"Blame you? Oh, no! I should have been grieved if you had declined it. Nothing could please me better than such a trip. But Alice must go with us."

"That is arranged. There will be a large party on board the barge, consisting of the aldermen and their wives, and some other important citizens. I think you will find it amusing."

"I am sure I shall," cried Jane, who was now radiant with delight. "His Majesty seems very desirous to please the citizens."

"He wishes to show his gratitude for the substantial aid they have given him towards the projected invasion of France," replied Shore. "But I must now leave you, sweetheart. I have some matters of business to attend to."

Well pleased at having brought back the smiles to his wife's fair cheek, he then quitted the room.

"Was there ever such an obliging husband!" exclaimed Alice.

"Never, I am certain," replied Jane. "I should be culpable, indeed, were I to betray his trust in me!"

XI.

OF THE GOODLY COMPANY ASSEMBLED IN THE LORD MAYOR'S BARGE.

VERY lovely was the morn on which Jane and her husband, with Mistress Fordham, stepped on board the Lord Mayor's barge.

At the prow of the burnished vessel floated a large silken banner, emblazoned with the City arms. The oarsmen were clad in rich liveries; several pages were in attendance; and trumpeters in embroidered tunics and velvet caps, made the towers on the bridge ring with the bruit of their silver clarions.

Already the principal part of the company was assembled, and the grand saloon of the barge, hung with silken curtains, and provided with velvet-cushioned seats, presented a splendid sight, being filled with the wives of the sheriffs and aldermen, and some other City dames, all of whom wore rich attire and costly ornaments; collars of gold round the neck, and girdles set with precious stones.

Tall steeple caps, with large butterfly wings attached to them, predominated among the fair assemblage; but a few crescent head-dresses could be seen.

At the upper end of the saloon, and conspicuous by the suppleness of her person, as well as by the splendour of her apparel and ornaments, sat the Lady Mayoress.

A prodigiously fine woman. No wonder her full-blown charms had attracted the King's admiration. Her dress consisted of a crimson velvet gown, richly embroidered, and a large turban-shaped head-dress, adorned with pearls.

The other ladies were, likewise, splendidly dressed, and several of them possessed considerable personal attractions; but there was not one who did not flatter herself that she had been the special object of the gallant King's regards. To gain the goodwill of the citizens, Edward made love to their wives, and, judging by the result, the plan succeeded.

The Lord Mayor was arrayed in crimson velvet, and had a furled velvet cap on his head, and a gold baldric round his neck. The sheriffs and aldermen wore scarlet gowns, with purple hoods, and the splendour of their habiliments added to the brilliant appearance of the assemblage. Moreover, as we have intimated, there were several wealthy citizens among the company, and they were all richly attired.

Jane drew all eyes upon herself as she entered, and was conducted to the upper end of the saloon by the Lord Mayor. She was very charmingly dressed in a gown of blue velvet, trimmed with fur; and in lieu of a scepter cup, she wore a roll of white silk, through the centre of which her fair tresses were allowed to pass, and flow down her back. A murmur of admiration arose as she passed on; for there was a witchery about her that was quite irresistible, and the ladies were forced to admit the supremacy of her beauty.

She was very graciously received by the Lady Mayoress, who assigned her a place near her own seat. This attention was the more marked, as the stately dame's manner towards Mistress Fordham was exceedingly stiff and distant.

A few more arrivals took place, and then the whole party being assembled, the gorgeous vessel commenced the ascent of the river, amid the clangour of trumpets, and the shouts of the throng congregated on the wharf.

At first, the progress of the barge was slow—intentionally so, perhaps—and it was a very pretty sight to watch it as it moved on, accompanied by a crowd of smaller barques, nearly all of which were occupied by persons in holiday apparel.

It being understood by the occupants of the barques that the fair Mistress Shore was on board the barge, great curiosity was manifested to obtain a glimpse of her. But this was not so easily accomplished, since Jane was hidden by those around her; and it was not till she was subsequently brought on deck by the Lord Mayor, that she was recognised, and welcomed by a loud shout.

As the day was remarkably fine, a delightful excursion could be calculated upon; and having this pleasant prospect before them, the company were all in high spirits, and nothing was heard in the saloon, or on deck, but lively sallies and laughter.

A water-party, at the time of which we treat, must have been remarkably agreeable; the river being then perfectly clear, and its banks free from all unsightly structures. Indeed, from London Bridge to the old Palace of Westminster, built by Edward the Confessor, and greatly enlarged by the then reigning monarch, a constant succession of picturesque buildings delighted the eye.

Higher up, charming prospects opened on the view; quaint habitations, constituting a small village, and each village boasting a church; ancient mansions, half hidden by trees; gardens with terraces; and, amidst the lawns, sloping down to the water's edge; gray convents, and other monastic-looking houses; parks with long, sweeping glades, amidst which herds of deer could be deeried; such were the principal features of the scenery, through which ran the bright, pellucid river.

Jane was enchanted. Often had she made a little voyage on the Thames, but never under circumstances more agreeable—never on a finer day.

Moreover, the greatest court was paid her—the Lord Mayor and all the principal personages, vying with each other in attention.

Having traversed the silver current for several miles, the barge had now brought its company to a most lovely region, that still retained the primitive beauty, though lacking, of course, the quiet and secluded character which the surrounding country had.

The river was now flowing past a lovely hill, partially clothed with wood. From the summit of the eminence an unequalled prospect could be obtained: over a vast plain, then so thickly covered with timber that it resembled a forest. At intervals the river could be traced as it wound its way through the plain, and the distant view was bounded by the towers of Windsor Castle.

Nearer could be seen the antique village of Kingston, with its reverend church.

The exceeding beauty of the river banks at this point—the verdant slopes and noble trees on the left; the lovely meads on the right—all combined to form a most exquisite picture.

XII.

HOW THEY WERE ENTERTAINED AT SHENE PALACE, AND HOW MALBOUCH, THE KING'S JESTER, CAME ON BOARD THE BARGE, AND WHAT PASSED BETWEEN HIM AND JANE.

SHORTLY afterwards, the royal manning of Shene, hitherto screened from observation by the intervening woods, came into view, and formed a most striking object with its grand facade, its immense bay windows, battlements, and turrets.

Nothing could be finer than the situation of Shene Palace, the windows of which commanded the magnificent prospect just described, while its garden and terrace extended along the margin of the river.

As the barge approached the stately pile, a boat put off from the landing-place, having on board a chamberlain and three or four serving men in the royal livery.

At a sign from the chamberlain, the barge was stopped; and the official, respectfully saluting the Lord Mayor, invited him and the rest of the party, in the King's name, to enter the palace and partake of some refreshment.

The invitation was readily accepted, and the company having landed, were conducted by the chamberlain to the great banqueting-hall, where a splendid collation was laid out for them. At the same time he explained that these preparations had been made by his Majesty's command. Half an hour being spent over the repast, the Lord Mayor and those with him returned to the barge, very well satisfied with their entertainment.

An addition was here made to the party in the person of Malbouch, the King's favourite jester. As Malbouch was proceeding to Windsor Castle to join his royal master, he begged to be taken on board the barge, and of course his request was readily granted. Moreover, he was not placed with the other servants, but was allowed to remain on deck with the company, and he amused them very much by his caustic remarks.

Malbouche's grotesque attire proclaimed his office. On his head he wore a cockscorn, and carried a bauble in his hand. Over his shoulder was suspended a broad baldick hung with silver bells. The royal badge was embroidered in front, and at the back of his scarlet cloth tunic, which had loose hanging sleeves lined with white. His hose were parti-coloured, red and white.

Short and round-shouldered, Malbouche had an ill-favoured countenance, marked by a decidedly malicious expression, and lighted up by a pair of piercing black eyes.

Like all jesters, Malbouche was privileged to say what he pleased, even to his royal master, and he took full advantage of the license.

"What hast thou been doing at Shene, my merry knave?" said the Lord Mayor to him.

"I came here on important business, my lord," replied Malbouche. "I was sent by my royal master to see that your lordship and those with you were fittingly entertained."

"Why did his Majesty select thee for the office? Thou art scarce suited to it," observed the Lord Mayor.

"The King is a better judge than your lordship," rejoined Malbouche. "Besides, I knew that fair Mistress Shore was to be of the party, and I wished to behold her."

"Were that really thine object, thou hast come on a very foolish errand," observed Jane.

"Not so," replied Malbouche. "I rarely pay compliments. But I have seen a marvel. The King had said much of you, but all he said fell short of the truth."

"Pooh! thou art turned flatterer," remarked Jane.

"You will not think so, fair mistress, when you know me better," rejoined the jester. "The Court dames and damsels give me a very different character. Take advice, fair mistress, and stay not long at Windsor, or you are never like to return. Were I Master Shore, I would not have brought you at all."

"Then art a disloyal knave to say so," observed the goldsmith.

"And you are ever confident," replied Malbouche. "I warrant me you would not expose your brightest jewel to a band of robbers."

"Dost compare thy royal master and his nobles to a band of robbers?" observed Shore.

"An' your jewel be lost, you will cry out that it is stolen," remarked the jester.

"Why dost thou not give like caution to others besides me?" observed Shore.

"Because none of them have such a precious gem," was the rejoinder.

The goldsmith said no more, fearing the jester might make some farther sarcastic remark calculated to give offence to the City dignitaries.

Presently, Malbouche observed to the Lord Mayor,—

"Shall I tell your lordship why you are all bidden to Windsor? 'Tis that the King expects an answer from his royal cousin, Louis of France, to whom he has sent a defiance by Garter, King-at-Arms."

"That is no secret," replied the Lord Mayor. "The citizens of London are ready and willing to aid his Majesty in a war with France. Normandy and Guienne belong to us of right, and we would gladly recover them."

"Then the King is wiser than I deemed in embarking in the war," observed the jester. "But what of James of Scotland? Will he not take advantage of the opportunity thus afforded him to invade England?"

"We have a truce with the King of Scotland," rejoined the Lord Mayor. "There is nothing to fear from him."

"If he break not the truce, I will send him my fool's cap," said Malbouche.

XIII.

HOW THE KING AND QUEEN, WITH THE LORDS AND LADIES OF THE COURT, RETURNED FROM HAWKING IN THE FOREST.

MEANWHILE, they had gradually neared Windsor Castle, and were now passing by the Home Park, the beautiful woods of which grew down to the margin of the river.

Jane had long been gazing at the proud regal structure, which she now beheld for the first time. Much as she had heard of it, its grandeur far surpassed all her preconceived notions.

From the eminence on which the lordly pile was reared, it seemed to look down majestically on the surrounding plain. The royal standard floated from the keep, and a party of armed men could be seen on the northern terrace.

On the right of the river, surrounded by trees, was the College of Eton, founded some five and thirty years previously by the unfortunate Henry VI. But Jane's gaze remained fixed upon the Castle, and she could look at nothing else till they reached the wharf near the bridge.

Here half a dozen magnificent chariots, with richly caparisoned horses attached to them, were waiting to convey the Lord Mayor and the rest of the party to the Castle. Mounted grooms and henchmen, appareled in the royal liveries, were likewise in attendance. The foremost chariot was assigned to the Lord Mayor, but at the special request of the Lady Mayress, Jane and her husband, with Mistress Forham, rode with them.

As soon as the equipages were filled, the cavalcade made its way through the old town, and, mounting the steep street that led past the walls of the Castle, came to a gateway, flanked by strong towers, leading to the basement court. They did not, however, enter the court, but, by the directions of the officer in attendance, proceeded to the great park, where the King had pitched his pavilion.

Driving past the south terrace of the Castle, they presently turned off into a long avenue bordered by magnificent trees, and having tracked it for about a quarter of a mile, came to an opening on the right, that admitted them to a large clear space, in the midst of which was the royal pavilion. Fashioned of red velvet, lined with silk, and embroidered all over in gold, with the King's cognizance—the "rose en soleil"—it presented a superb appearance.

Accustomed to camp life, Edward liked it during fine weather; and hence, though he had the noblest castle in the realm close at hand, he chose to pitch his tent in the forest.

But the place was deserted at the time of the arrival of the Lord Mayor and his party, for his Majesty and the Queen were hawking in the forest with the lords and ladies of the court. However, the new comers had only just alighted, and were still collected in front of the royal pavilion, when word was given that the King was returning, and immediately afterwards a numerous and splendid party could be seen approaching through the trees.

At the head of the cavalcade, which comprised, as just intimated, all the principal lords and ladies of the court, as well as the two royal dukes, rode the King and Queen.

Edward was magnificently dressed, as usual. His tunic was of green velvet, embroidered with gold, and trimmed with sable. His cap was likewise of green velvet, adorned with a heron's plume, and a silver bugle hung from his shoulder. Attached to his girdle was a wood-knife. His courser was splendidly equipped, but not so much so as to impede the action of the high-mettled animal.

The Queen, who rode a snow-white palfrey, trapped in cloth of gold, embroidered with white roses, was exceedingly handsome; but her features had a very jaunty expression, and her fine eyes had sometimes a sinister look. Her tresses were still light and luxuriant, and her figure faultless. Personally, she was quite as attractive as when the King first beheld her, and became so passionately enamoured of her, that he married her despite all opposition.

To Edward's credit, it must be stated that although he had long ceased to love his consort, he paid her the utmost deference. On her part, the Queen manifested no jealousy, though quite aware of his numerous infidelities, being perfectly content with the homage he paid her in public. Owing to this judicious course, they had no quarrels, and Elizabeth never lost her influence over her royal husband. Her great desire was to aggrandize her own family; and she succeeded so well in the aim, enriching her father, ennobling her brother, and exalting her sisters by marrying them into the proudest families, that she incurred the animosity of all the old nobility. Confident, however, of Edward's support, she set them completely at defiance.

The Queen was arrayed in a tight-fitting long-waisted côte-hardie of baudekyn. Over the gown, which was so long that it quite concealed her pointed shoes, she wore a furred mantle, which displayed her charming figure to perfection. It is needless to describe the costly ornaments with which she was bedecked, the jewels running down the centre of her gown, or the splendour of her girdle and collar; but we must mention that her hair was confined by a golden comb, with large and preposterous side ornaments, like wings, attached to it.

The Queen was attended by a score of ladies, almost all of whom were young and beautiful, and made a splendid show on their mettlesome palfreys.

The costume of these fair dames and damsels was somewhat varied, but they had one feature in common peculiar to the period—namely, the tall steeple cap.

With the Queen were the two young princesses, Elizabeth and Cicely, both very pretty girls. They rode what were then called hobby-horses, and managed them extremely well.

Mingled with the ladies of the Court were an equal number of nobles and distinguished personages, chief amongst whom were the King's two brothers, George, Duke of Clarence, and Richard, Duke of Gloucester. Neither of them possessed Edward's lofty stature, handsome physiognomy, or majestic deportment. Indeed, the Duke of Gloucester was deformed and crook-backed, by which epithet he was constantly distinguished.

The Duke of Clarence, who was not yet thirty, was slight, but well-formed, and had a noble countenance; the expression, however, of his eyes was shifting, and betrayed his treacherous character. His habiliments were splendid, and he was mounted on a fiery steed.

Some seven or eight years previously, the Duke of Clarence had espoused Isabella, eldest daughter of the great Earl of Warwick, surnamed the "King Maker," and who, in fact, had enabled Edward to obtain the crown. Soon after his alliance, the ambitious young Duke, who secretly aspired to the throne, revolted against his brother. True to no one, however, he deserted Warwick at the most critical juncture, and joining his brother with several thousand men, enabled him to win the battle of Barnet, at which Warwick was slain.

The Duchess of Clarence was amongst the ladies, but there was no cordiality between her and the Queen. At the time of her marriage, the Duchess was considered very handsome; but she now looked pale and thin, and appeared far from happy. Could she be happy, indeed, when she knew that the Duke, her husband, had betrayed her father, and caused his death?

But if Clarence was perfidious, he was not half so dangerous as his brother, the dark, deceitful Gloucester. Clarence had not the talent to conceal his designs, but Gloucester, who was equally treacherous, was a deep dissembler, and worked in secret. Though the throne seemed completely shut out from him, he determined to mount it, and nothing turned him from his purpose.

To look at that bold, crafty visage, in every line of which cunning was written; to feel the effect of that dark, searching eye, caused those who came near him to comprehend that they were in the presence of a master spirit. Gloucester could not inspire regard; but he inspired dread. Men hated him, but served him well, because they feared him. Even Edward experienced the force of his determined will.

Gloucester would have been of the average height had not his crooked back diminished his stature by several inches. In other respects, he was well-proportioned, and strongly built. His features were decidedly handsome, though the expression was sinister. His complexion and hair were dark, and his eyes exceedingly fine, and their glances full of fire. Not only did Gloucester possess the wisdom of the serpent, but the venom. Courageous, and a good leader, he never hesitated to attack a superior force.

There was no love between him and the Duke of Clarence, whom he had deeply offended by his marriage with Anne, the younger daughter of the Earl of Warwick, and widow of Prince Edward, son of Margaret of Anjou, and the unfortunate Henry VI. Having helped to despatch the young Prince, after the battle of Tewkesbury, which sealed the fate of the Lancastrian party, Gloucester resolved to marry the Princess, and succeeded in his design, notwithstanding all the efforts of Clarence to prevent him.

By this match, Gloucester secured a large portion of Warwick's immense possessions, and laughed at his brother's displeasure. A long and bitter dispute ensued, which at length was settled by the King, but from that time the brothers nourished a deadly animosity towards each other.

Gloucester was as fond of dress as the King, and wore the richest stuffs and the most splendid ornaments. His embroidered mantle was so disposed as to hide his hunchback as much as possible. His black velvet cap was adorned with gems.

It would seem scarcely possible that the Princess Anne could endure the man who had slain her husband, and forced her into a marriage that at first had appeared hateful to her; but Gloucester had so won upon her regard, that she now seemed to like him. She was among the Queen's ladies, and rode by the side of the Duchess of Clarence.

The Princess Anne was far handsomer than her sister, and to judge from her countenance, was disturbed by no secret grief. Her attire was very sumptuous. She wore a cotte-hauble of blue velvet, and her girdle was studded with gems. Pa-sionately fond of hawking and of the chase, she had greatly enjoyed the day's pastime.

Of the nobles who composed the King's suite, we may enumerate the Duke of Buckingham, the Marquis of Dorset, the Lord Hastings, the Lord Rivers, the Queen's brother, the Lords Howard and Stanley, Sir Thomas Montgomery, and Sir Thomas St. Leger—the latter being a great favourite with the King. All these nobles and gentlemen were attired in hunting dresses of green velvet, embroidered with gold, and were mounted on fleet, well-bred coursers.

At the rear of the cavalcade came the falconers, carrying the hawks in their hoods and jesses; and the huntsmen, with the hounds in leash. These, with a great number of grooms, piquers, and pages, completed the splendid train.

XIV.

OF THE GRAND COLLATION GIVEN IN THE PAVILION; AND OF THE STRANGE PRESENT BROUGHT BY GARTER FROM LOUIS OF FRANCE.

As the King entered the open space, and perceived the Lord Mayor and his party stationed near the royal pavilion, he rode forward, and offered them a most gracious welcome. While distributing his smiles among the happy fair dames, he bestowed a special greeting on Jane.

Shortly afterwards the Queen came up, and the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress were presented by the King to her Majesty, who expressed herself delighted to see them. Some other presentations then took place, and during these formalities, the nobles and ladies composing the cavalcade dismounted, and their coursers and palfreys were led away by the grooms.

Having welcomed his guests, Edward sprang from his charger, and bidding them follow him without ceremony, took the hand of the Lady Mayoress, and conducted her to the pavilion, in which a splendid collation was laid out. They were followed by the Queen and the Lord Mayor, and pursuing the example thus set them, the royal dukes and the nobles each selected a citizen's wife, while the sheriffs and aldermen were honoured by Court dames. Jane fell to the share of the Lord Chamberlain, who took care to place her near his royal master.

Though a rigorous observer of regal etiquette, Edward would sometimes dispense with it altogether, as on this occasion, when, his great object being to conciliate the citizens, he treated them with unwonted familiarity. At the same time, though excessively affable, he was dignified in deportment, as usual.

The interior of the pavilion was splendid, as it was roofed with cloth of gold. The tables were covered with plate, and there was a superb buffet. The daintiest fare and the most exquisite wines were set before the guests.

At the close of the repast, the King caused a large goblet to be filled by his cup-bearer, and drank to the Lord Mayor and the citizens. After which, they all rose, and pledged his Majesty in return.

"You are aware, my good and faithful lieges," said the King to the citizens, "that we have sent a herald to our cousin, Louis of France, to signify to him that he must forthwith restore to us the duchies of Guienne and Normandy, and if he refuses to do so, we will make war upon him, and invade his dominions with all our power. We shall soon know what answer Louis hath sent, for Garter, the herald, as we learn, hath returned to London from his embassy, and is on the way hither."

At this juncture, Malbouche, who was stationed at the back of the King's seat, whispered something in his Majesty's ear.

"Say'st thou that Garter has arrived?" cried Edward.

"Yea, my liege," replied the jester, speaking in a loud voice, so that all around might hear. "And he hath brought your Majesty some presents. King Louis hath sent you the best horse in his stables, and a noble steed it is. But that is not all—he hath sent your Majesty something more."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Edward. "Doth he think to pacify me by gifts?"

"There is much significance in the present," replied Malbouche. "But here comes the herald, who will give your Majesty all needful explanation."

As he spoke, Garter appeared at the entrance of the pavilion, and way was made him to approach the King.

"Thou art welcome from France!" cried Edward, as the herald bent profoundly. "Hast thou made our demand of King Louis? Speak out! We desire that all should hear his answer."

"King Louis's answer was very brief, my liege," rejoined Garter. "He received me very well, and manifested neither anger nor impatience while I made my demand. When I had done, he regarded me fixedly, and somewhat sternly, and remarked, 'Tell the King our cousin that we counsel him to do nothing.' That was all he said. In token of his friendly feeling towards your Majesty, he hath sent you the best horse in his stables."

"Anght more?" inquired Edward.

"Yea, my liege," replied Garter, with some hesitation. "Just before my departure he sent his quarter-master, Messire Jean de Lailier, with a wolf, a wild boar, and an ass, as a further present to your Majesty."

"He!" exclaimed Edward, angrily. "Now, by St. George! that seems like a studied insult."

"'Twas doubtless intended as an apology," remarked Malbouche. "Methinks I can explain it. The wolf is your Majesty—a vile comparison, doubtless—the wild boar is Charles the Bold of Burgundy, and the ass is the Duke of Bretagne."

Incensed as he was, Edward could not help laughing at the jester's explanation, and some half-suppressed merriment was heard among the company.

"Our cousin of France shall find that his jest is ill-timed," said the King. "Our preparations for the invasion are complete, and, by St. George, we will soon set foot in his dominions."

At this announcement loud acclamations arose from the assemblage, and it was evident that the nobles and citizens were of one mind in regard to the war.

Soon after this, the King arose and quitted the pavilion, taking the Lady Mayoress with him. His Majesty was followed by the Queen, the Lord Mayor, and the rest of the splendid company.

Shortly afterwards, the Queen entered her chariot with the two princesses, and was driven to the Castle, whither other chariots followed, filled by the Duchesses of Clarence and Gloucester, and other noble dames.

XV.

HOW JANE PROMISED THE KING AN ANSWER AT THE BALL.

THE festivities of the day were not yet ended. A grand ball was to be given in the evening at the Castle, to which all were looking forward with delight.

A great portion of the company proceeded to the Castle on foot, and they could now be seen shaping their course thither beneath the trees.

As the evening was delightful, nothing could be more agreeable than the walk, and Jane, who was accompanied by her husband and Mistress Fordham, enjoyed it greatly.

They had just entered the great avenue, and were proceeding slowly along the gentle ascent leading to the Castle, which rose before them in all its grandeur, when the trampling of horses was heard behind, and the King was seen approaching, accompanied by Lord Hastings and some half-dozen grooms.

As soon as he came up to Jane, the King dismounted, and consigned his horse to a groom, while Hastings engaged Shore and Mistress Fordham in conversation. The grooms kept at a respectful distance.

As may be supposed, the enamoured monarch did not lose the opportunity, but protested his passion in the most ardent terms.

"You have heard what has just passed," he said. "I am about to invade France with a large army. You shall go with me, and you will then be really Queen."

Jane was dazzled by the brilliant prospect opened before her.

"Could I believe that your Majesty would really devote yourself to me, I might be induced to consent. But no, no!" she interrupted. "I must not—cannot."

"Do not decide too hastily," he said. "Give me your answer at the ball to-night."

"My answer will still be the same, my liege," she replied, trembling.

"I hope not," he rejoined. "Think what you will throw away! But I must not continue this converse, lest I should excite your husband's suspicions. Adieu for the present."

At a sign, his horse was instantly brought him by the groom, and he rode off with Hastings towards the Castle.

Meanwhile, Shore had returned to his wife. Fixing a melancholy look upon her, he said,—

"I cannot mistake the nature of his Majesty's attentions to you, Jane. He loves you, and has told you of his love."

Jane made no reply; but her silence convinced Alban Shore that he was right in the surmise.

"You must not be exposed to this danger," he said. "You shall not enter the Castle."

"You are needlessly alarmed," said Jane. "I should be sorry to miss this grand ball. To-morrow I shall be quite willing to return, but not now."

"To-morrow may be too late," muttered Shore. "I have made up my mind that you shall go at once."

"But I am quite sure the King will not permit our departure," she said.

"He will know nothing about it till we are far hence," rejoined Shore, peremptorily.

"Alice," cried Jane, to Mistress Fordham, "what do you think? Alban says we must go back immediately."

"Not stay for the ball!" exclaimed Mistress Fordham. "It would not only be a great disappointment to us, but a positive disrespect to his Majesty. Were I you, I would positively refuse to go."

"You counsel badly, mistress," remarked Shore, angrily. "Jane will obey me."

Alice gave her a look, encouraging her not to yield.

"I never knew you so unreasonable before, Alban," said Jane. "You have ever treated me with the greatest kindness and indulged all my fancies. But now you would deprive me of a gratification on which I have set my heart."

"You know my motive, Jane," he cried, in a reproachful tone.

"Yes. But I do not admit it! Dismiss these silly fears. No harm will ensue."

"Since you give me that positive assurance, I will trust in you," he said.

"Then you consent to stay for the ball?" she cried eagerly.

"Very reluctantly," he replied. "I have a presentiment of ill."

"Nonsense!" cried Mistress Fordham. "If the King really meant to rob you of your beautiful wife, do you think she would be safe in Lombard Street?"

"Make yourself easy, Alban," said Jane. "The King is very powerful, but he shall not take me from you."

"I am content with that promise," he rejoined. "We will stay for the ball."

And they proceeded to the Castle.

XVI.

HOW JOUSTS WERE HELD IN THE LOWER COURT OF WINDSOR CASTLE; HOW THE PRIZE WAS BESTOWED ON JANE BY THE MARQUIS OF DORSET; WHAT OCCURRED AT THE BALL; AND HOW SHORE LEFT HIS WIFE.

On entering the upper ward of the Castle, Shore, with his wife and Mistress Fordham, were met by the chamberlain, who conducted them to apartments on the north side of the quadrangle. Here they found their trunks, which had been brought from the barge, and by the time they had made the necessary change in their attire, they were summoned to a magnificent repast, which was served in St. George's Hall. The King and Queen, with the royal dukes and duchesses, were seated at a raised table, and in the centre of the room sat the principal nobles and ladies.

Supper over, the company adjourned to a large apartment, which was brilliantly lighted up. Jane was quite bewildered by the splendour of the scene. The King had now laid aside his mantle, and appeared in a blue velvet tunic richly embroidered with gold. Amongst his other accomplishments, Edward excelled in dancing, and on this occasion he selected his partners from the wives of the citizens.

Jane's turn came at last, and, when the bransle was over, he led her to a room opening out of the hall, which seemed to be empty at the time.

Thinking they were entirely alone, Edward addressed a few passionate words to her, and said, "Now, then, sweetheart, I must have your answer. Will you remain with me?"

Ere she could reply, they were disturbed by the unexpected appearance of Shore, who had followed her into the room.

Edward signed to him angrily to begone, but he did not move.

"I am ready to obey you, my liege," he said; "but I must take my wife with me. Come, madam," he added, to Jane, who, however, hesitated and consulted the King by a look.

"I shall not interpose my authority," said Edward. "Mistress Shore is free to depart if she thinks proper. Do as you please, madam," he added to Jane.

"Then I will stay," she rejoined.

"Since this is your decision, Jane, farewell for ever!" said Alban, in a reproachful tone. "You know how fondly I have loved you. But I now put you from me. You are no longer mine."

He looked at her for a moment fixedly, hoping she might relent; but as she did not stir, he made an obeisance to the King, and quitted the apartment.

"Do not let him go, my liege," said Jane. "I shall be miserable if he departs in this mood."

"Nonsense! you are far better without him, sweetheart," said the King; "but since you desire it, I will give orders that he be not allowed to quit the Castle."

With this, he led her back to the ball-room, and, summoning the Lord Chamberlain, gave him some directions in a low tone.

Next morning a sumptuous breakfast was given at the royal hunting lodge in the Home Park, to which all the guests were invited, and after the repast, they were taken to see the vineyard.

Our climate must certainly have been better in the fifteenth century than now-a-days, since grapes from which tolerable wine was made were then grown at Windsor.

The vineyard was situated on a slope facing the south, so that the grapes had the full benefit of the sun, and now hung in ripening clusters from the trellised vines. With the gay crowd wandering about the alleys, the enclosure presented a very charming picture.

After another banquet in St. George's Hall, the whole company repaired to the jousts. Barriers were here erected in the lower ward, and overlooking them was a superb gallery, hung with blue velvet, and embroidered with white roses. This gallery was reserved for the Queen, the two duchesses, the Court dames, the Lady Mayoress, and the wives of the citizens.

A large crowd was collected round the barriers, and the vast court was filled with knights, pages, esquires, and halberdiers, all in the royal livery.

Loud fanfares of trumpet were sounded as the King came forth, equipped in a full suit of shining mail, with a snowy plume in his helm, and mounted on a charger trapped in cloth of gold, adorned with his cognizance.

His Majesty was attended by the Duke of Buckingham, the Lords Howard, Dorset, and Stanley, Sir Thomas Montgomery, and Sir John Cheyne, all clad in armour, and all well mounted.

As soon as the King had taken his position on one side of the lists, the trumpets were again sounded, and the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Rivers, the Lord Hastings, all clad in armour, and attended by half-a-dozen knights and gentlemen, rode into the lists.

The two parties having ridden past the central part of the gallery, in which were the Queen with the two royal duchesses and the two princesses, and bowed to her Majesty, took their places on either side of the lists. Jane sat with the ladies of the Lady Mayoress's party.

Shortly afterwards the trumpets were sounded, and the signal being given by the King, two knights clapped spurs into their steeds, and rode against each other.

These were the Lord Howard and the Lord Rivers. They met in mid career, and both lances were splintered, but neither cavalier was unhorsed.

They were followed by the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Hastings, with pretty nearly the same result; except, perhaps, that the advantage was slightly in favour of Hastings.

Next the Duke of Clarence and the youthful Marquis of Dorset, the Queen's son by her first husband, Sir John Gray, ran against each other, and a general murmur of satisfaction arose, when the youthful Marquis, who was exceedingly handsome, struck off the Duke's helmet.

Clarence did not bear his defeat with a good grace, but looked highly displeased.

Many more lances were splintered, but good fortune attended the young Marquis of Dorset, who unhorsed one of the knights on the side of the Duke of Clarence, and at length was adjudged the victor by the King.

Amid the plaudits of the assemblage, the shouts of the heralds, and the clangour of trumpets, the youthful Earl rode towards the royal gallery, and as he bent before the Queen, she hung a wreath of white roses on the point of his lance.

The handsome young noble glanced round the bevy of beauties, as if considering on whom he should bestow the prize, and many a bosom throbbled high at that moment; but as there could be no question that the fairest amid the throng was Jane, he rode up to the part of the gallery where she was stationed, and, lowering the point of his lance, presented the wreath to her.

Loud applause followed, as Jane took the prize thus gracefully offered her, and the King seemed particularly well pleased.

Some other diversions followed, after which the Queen and all the ladies withdrew, and returned to their apartments in the Castle.

In the evening there was a grand supper in St. George's Hall, and when the company had feasted royally, a pleasant surprise was given to the ladies.

The great doors of the hall being thrown open, a troop of sirens came in, singing melodiously. They were followed, after a short interval, by an immense sea-monster, which, from its size, caused the greatest astonishment and even terror among the female beholders. How the huge fish was moved could not be understood, the mechanism being hidden; but it seemed to roll, or rather swim, into the hall, without even being guided, only moving its tail and fins.

On reaching the centre of the hall, the monster opened its enormous jaws, and forth came a troop of mermaids and mermen, who performed a grotesque dance, while the sirens sang, amid the merriment of the company.

This exhibition ended, the dancers returned to their retreat, and the huge sea-monster quickly disappeared from the hall.

Other amusements followed, after which the company adjourned to the ball-room, where dancing instantly commenced.

No opportunity occurred to the King that night for any private converse with Jane; but next morning, at an early hour, he repaired to her apartment.

Mistress Rotherham was with her, but she seemed to be in a state of great distress, and when Edward appeared, she rushed towards him, and threw herself at his feet.

THE MEETING OF KING EDWARD AND THE DUKE OF BURGUNDY. (See page 36.)

"My husband has really left me, my liege," she cried, "and has forbidden me to return to him."

"Give yourself no concern about him," he replied, raising her gently. "You shall remain with me. Listen to me, sweetheart," he continued. "You like the Hunting Lodge in the Home Park? Is it not so?"

"I have seen nothing so charming, my liege," she replied.

"'Tis yours. Take possession of it at once. You shall have your own servants, and everything you can desire. Thus much for Windsor. At Shene, at Whitehall, at Eltham, at the Tower, wherever I may be, you shall have your own apartments."

Her thanks were murmured in a low voice.

"My sole desire is to make you happy, Jane," he said.

Something like a sigh was her response.

"Why that sigh?" he inquired, gazing at her tenderly.

"I am thinking of poor Alban," she replied.

"Think of him no more," said Edward. "You are now mine, and shall be ever with me. When I embark for France you shall accompany me."

"And your Majesty will not abandon me?" cried she, gazing at him imploringly.

"Never," cried Edward, fervently. "Never! I swear it!"

"Bear witness to the vow, Alice," cried Jane.

"Ay, bear witness!" said Edward; "and call me false and perjured if I break it. But that I will never do."

"I will trust you," replied Jane, and her head sank upon his shoulder.

Ever many hours she was installed at the Hunting Lodge.

BOOK THE SECOND.

THE EXPEDITION TO FRANCE.

I.

HOW JANE RESIDED AT THE HUNTING LODGE IN THE HOME PARK, AND HOW KING EDWARD PREPARED TO INVADE FRANCE.

"THE King seems infatuated with Mistress Shore," observed the Duke of Buckingham to Lord Hastings, as they walked together one morning in the upper quadrangle of Windsor Castle. "Think you she will retain her influence over him?"

"For many reasons, I think she will," replied Hastings. "In the first place, she is incomparably beautiful, and beauty weighs much with the King, as you know. But she has something more than beauty to recommend her. Her disposition is most amiable, and her manner extremely engaging. She is always ready to do a service to any one who needs it. Her influence over the King is unbounded, but she does not abuse it. What is most surprising is that she has embraced the Queen's part, and does all in her power to further her Majesty's plans."

"Is it from interest of good feeling that she acts thus?" inquired Buckingham. "You know I have been away, so that I have not yet had any opportunity for observation."

"'Tis from goodness of heart," replied Hastings. "Mrs. Shore, as I have just said, is the most amiable person living. She has more suitors than the Queen herself. Everyone who has a favour to ask, or a petition to present, comes to her. The King can refuse her nothing; yet she asks little for herself. She might soon grow rich if she chose; but she gives away almost all she receives. His Majesty bestows the richest dresses upon her, costly ornaments, diamonds and plate, and has given her an almost regal establishment at the Lodge; but, by my faith! I believe she does not desire it, but would rather live less ostentatiously."

"You amaze me," said Buckingham. "I did not think such a woman existed."

"Curtis, there are few like her," rejoined Hastings, laughing. "She has many enemies, no doubt, foremost among whom are Clarence and Gloucester; but they are unable to do her any injury. The Queen, as I have hinted, is favourable to her, and wisely declares that as the King must have a favourite, she would rather it should be Mistress Shore than any other."

"But what of Shore? Is he reconciled to the loss of his beautiful wife?"

"Since she has left him, he has disappeared altogether," replied Hastings.

"Disappeared!" exclaimed Buckingham.

"Ay, he has sold his house in Lombard Street, all his plate and jewels, has discharged all his servants, and gone—no one knows whither. 'Tis said he has become a monk, but this is doubtful. He was devoted to his wife, and her abandonment of him seems to have disturbed his reason."

"Only a fool would grieve for a woman who leaves him," said Buckingham. "A sensible husband would have reconciled himself to the loss, and have reaped all the benefit he could from it. With Jane's help he might have risen at Court."

"Evidently he disdained such a course. But let us go to the Lodge. You will find the King there. His Majesty desires that as much respect shall be paid Mistress Shore as if she were actually Queen."

"I understand," replied Buckingham.

Passing through the postern near Edward the Third's tower, and crossing the drawbridge over the moat, they proceeded to the Lodge, which was situated in the Home Park.

A pleasant walk through the vineyard brought them to the garden, which was beautifully laid out.

On the terrace in front of the Hunting Lodge, several pages in the royal liveries were grouped, conversing with the King's falconers, who had their hawks in readiness. On the right were grooms, with a splendid charger and a beautiful palfrey. Halberdiers were stationed at the entrance, and within were a gentleman usher, and a number of serving-men.

Preceded by the usher, the two nobles gained the private apartments, and entered an antechamber, crowded with courtiers and suitors, who bowed respectfully as the distinguished personages passed through their midst.

The Lord Chamberlain and his companion were then admitted to an inner room, where they found the King and Jane.

Seated in a velvet-covered fauteuil, in an easy attitude, with his foot on a tabouret, Edward was glancing at a letter which he held in his hand, and Jane was leaning over his shoulder. The attitude was well calculated to display the grace and beauty of her figure. She was attired in a tight-fitting cote-hardie of green velvet, with a girdle above the hips, and her sunny tresses were covered by a net of gold. Edward simply wore a tunic of embroidered satin, and had a black velvet cap on his head.

At a little distance from the King was Malbouche, the jester, who was playing with a small monkey, fastened to a stand.

On entering, the two nobles made a profound obeisance to the King, and did not neglect to salute the royal favourite.

"You are welcome, my Lord of Buckingham," said Edward. "I am right glad to see you back."

"Your Majesty will be pleased to learn that I bring with me five hundred archers," replied the Duke. "They are now encamped with the rest of the army on Blackheath, and await your Majesty's orders."

"Tis well," replied Edward. "We shall now be able to muster fifteen thousand mounted archers, besides ten thousand foot soldiers. In a few days I shall march the whole army to Dover, where the embarkation will take place. I have just received a letter from my brother of Burgundy, wherein he promises to send me five hundred flat Dutch boats for transportation of the horses to Calais. Our own ships will convey the men-at-arms and ordnance."

"I hope your Majesty will be able to land all the men in safety," said Hastings. "Louis has several men-of-war at Boulogne, and he may capture some of our transports."

"Heaven forbid!" exclaimed Jane.

"I suppose you would dissuade his Majesty from this expedition, madam?" remarked Buckingham.

"Your Grace is mistaken," she replied. "I would have him go on with it, unless his terms are agreed to. Having defied the King of France, he cannot honourably withdraw."

"If I conquer France, I will make you a Countess, sweetheart," said Edward, "and give you a castle in Touraine, with a proud domain attached to it."

"I would rather have this hunting-lodge than any castle in France," she replied.

"Peradventure your Majesty may not get beyond Calais," remarked Malbouche. "I have no great faith in your two potent allies, the Duke of Burgundy and the Duke of Bretagne."

"Neither have I," said Jane. "I fear they may play you false."

"I will hedge them, sweetheart. 'Tis their interest to be true to me. They are both bound to London."

"Your Majesty has determined to commence the embarkation forthwith," said Buckingham, "this time that a portion of the army should march to Dover. I will take my five hundred archers thither without delay, if your Majesty desires it."

"You shall take thrice that number, my lord," said Edward, "and Hastings shall follow with as many more. Ere a week is out, the whole army shall assemble at Dover."

"Whom think you, my lords, his Majesty is about to take with him to France, and at my suggestion?" observed Jane.

"A score of young knights, who will all wear your colours," rejoined Buckingham.

"A score of the wealthiest citizens in London," replied Jane.

"With what object?" demanded the Duke, surprised.

"To show them honour, and make them witnesses of the enterprise," said Edward.

"These fat and well-fed citizens will never be able to endure the fatigues of war," observed Hastings.

"Then their voices will be for peace," said the jester; "and should his Majesty require another loan—as most assuredly he will—they will help him to raise it."

Some further discussion ensued respecting the march of the army to Dover, after which the two nobles departed, and the King and Jane rode out into the Great Park, attended only by the falconers and a couple of mounted grooms.

II.

HOW KING EDWARD EMBARKED WITH HIS FORCES AT DOVER, AND HOW HE WAS RECEIVED AT CALAIS.

ERE a week had flown, Edward reached Dover with his whole army.

On the morning after his arrival, he mounted to the ramparts of the ancient castle, to watch the embarkation of the troops. He was attended only by a young esquire and a page, both remarkable for good looks and symmetry of person.

From the lofty post he had chosen, the French coast was perfectly distinguishable, and even the tower of Notre Dame de Calais, with some of the buildings of the town, could be seen.

But the King's attention was chiefly attracted by what was going on in the harbour.

To a military spectator, the crowd of vessels there collected would have presented a most singular and striking appearance. The larger ships were exceedingly lofty, and stood so high out of the water, that they might be compared to floating castles. They were richly gilded, and the royal ensignance was not only displayed at the sides, but painted on the sails.

These ships of force, as they were designated, had four masts—the in front and two near the stern. The masts were painted and gilt. The sails were white. The fore-castle and mainmast were painted on the summit of which archers and archers could be stationed.

The King's own ship, the Rose Blanche, as she was called, could be easily distinguished among her companions from her superior height and splendour. Her stately sides were embellished with the royal arms; the royal standard was hoisted at the prow; and the masts were hung with small flags of beaten gold.

Though these ancient vessels cannot be compared in point of utility with ironclads and modern "leviathans of the deep," it must be allowed that their appearance was infinitely more magnificent and imposing.

Beside the large ships, there were vast numbers of smaller vessels—picturesque looking galleys, with a high crook, surmounted by a carved figure, with the rudder at the side, and a short strong mast, having a sort of cage at the top, in which armed men could be placed; barges, balingers, pinnaces, and carvels.

Then there were certain long vessels, called huissieres, having two rows of oars, with doors and bridges, for the transport of horses; and, in addition to these, there were the five hundred flat-bottomed Dutch boats sent by the Duke of Burgundy.

No grander spectacle can be imagined than was now offered to the King, and the sea being almost as calm as a lake, the fleet could be seen to the greatest advantage. Even in the days of Edward III., and the Black Prince, no such armament had ever been provided for the invasion of France as was now collected.

But in other respects the picture was exceedingly lively and interesting. Not only were the inner and outer courts of the castle filled with men-at-arms and archers, but the cliffs were covered with troops, as were the quay and the beach.

Knights and esquires were constantly riding to and fro, bringing companies of foot-soldiers to the quay, to be conveyed thence in small boats to the pinnaces and carvels, and hundreds of horses were put on board the huissieres and Dutch boats.

Having contemplated this exciting scene with the greatest interest for more than an hour, Edward quitted the ramparts, and attended by the young esquire and the page just alluded to, and whom he addressed as Isidore and Claude, mounted his horse, and rode down to the harbour, to superintend the proceedings in person.

But though the King's presence stimulated the men to greater exertions, the embarkation did not go on rapidly, and the whole fleet could not be got ready to sail before the following morning.

The flat-bottomed boats, containing the horses and artillery, and which were propelled by oars, had been previously sent off, but they moved very slowly and had not made more than a couple of leagues.

While remaining on the beach for several hours, the King returned to the castle. The two pages, from the richness of their attire and grace of person, had excited considerable attraction. Isidore, the chief of them, had evinced great interest in the embarkation.

Next morning, at an early hour, amid the roar of cannon from the castle, the clangour of trumpets, and the beating of drums, the King went on board the Rose Blanche, which looked like a gorgeous pavilion, the fore-castle and cabin being hung with cloth of gold and arras, and the deck carpeted with velvet.

Amongst the distinguished persons already assembled on board the royal vessel, were the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, Thomas of Rotherham, Bishop of Lincoln and Lord High Chancellor; the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Northumberland, the Lords Dorset, Hastings, Stanley, and Howard, Sir Thomas Montgomery, Sir Thomas St. Leger, and other knights and esquires.

Somewhat removed from these important personages were Dr. Morton, the King's chaplain and confessor, and the King's physician and almoner.

Edward was very sumptuously attired, and was attended by the young esquires, Isidore and Claude. Malbouche the jester was likewise in attendance upon his royal master.

Shortly afterwards, the signal was given, and amid another roar of ordnance from the castle, that made the cliffs echo, the whole of the mighty armament was put in motion.

The sight was truly splendid. Already the galleys, balingers, pinnaces, and carvels, which were crowded with knights, esquires, archers, and men-at-arms, were in movement, and they were now followed by the larger vessels.

Close beside the Rose Blanche was another large and richly-ornamented ship called the Asincourt, on board which were the wealthy citizens invited by the King to accompany the expedition. All these personages were now on deck, and gazing with admiration at the spectacle.

Never from the heights of Dover had so grand a spectacle been witnessed as was then beheld.

The weather was most propitious, the day being brilliantly fine, with just sufficient wind blowing from the right quarter to waft the fleet across the Channel.

After a time, as the sun became hot, a rich awning was drawn over the deck, and a splendid repast was served, to which the King and all the principal personages sat down.

Edward was waited upon by the two pages, and being somewhat self-indulgent, did not quit the table till the towers and walls of Calais came in sight.

Almost immediately after the Rose Blanche had quit anchor, Lord Walslock, the Lieutenant-Governor of Calais, attended by several officers, came on board.

Finding the King surrounded by nobles, he went the knee before him, and said,—

"You are welcome, my liege. All is ready for your Majesty, and those with you, in your loyal town of Calais."

"I thank you, my lord," replied Edward, graciously. "But what of my good brother of Burgundy? Has he arrived at Calais, and what number of men-at-arms hath he brought with him?"

"I have not such good tidings to give of the Duke of Burgundy as I could desire, my liege," replied Lord Wenlock, rising. "His Grace has raised the siege of Neuse, and has taken his army into Lorraine. But as yet he hath sent no men to Calais, nor hath he come hither himself."

"Ah! by St. George! this is strange!" exclaimed Edward, looking greatly surprised and displeased. "His Highness promised to meet me at my landing with three thousand mounted men-at-arms, and a large body of foot, and you say none have arrived?"

"My liege, it is as I tell you," replied Lord Wenlock. "The Duke of Burgundy hath taken the whole of his army into Lorraine."

A murmur of displeasure arose from the nobles grouped around.

"Then he has broken his treaty with me," cried Edward, angrily. "He stipulated to find me ten thousand men. But what of the Constable St. Pol, and the Duke of Bretagne?"

"Would that I could give you good tidings of them, my liege!" replied Lord Wenlock. "As yet, they have done nothing."

"And they will do nothing," said the Duke of Gloucester. "Your Majesty has been deceived by false promises."

"So it would seem," cried Edward. "But I can stand alone."

"Better alone than with such perfidious allies," said Gloucester.

"This is a grievous disappointment," remarked Clarence, "and will give confidence to Louis."

"Your Majesty will design to listen to my advice, you will turn back without landing," said Mulbouché.

"Peace, thou foolish varlet!" cried the young esquire, who was standing behind the King. "His Majesty would scorn thy counsel. Though King Louis were before Calais with all his army, our royal master would land and give him battle."

"Thou art right, Isidore," said Edward. "Our plans are in no way changed by these untoward circumstances. We shall prosecute the war with as much vigour as if the Duke of Burgundy had been here to join us. Return at once, my lord," he added to the Governor, "and prepare for our entrance into the town."

Thereupon Lord Wenlock departed, and as soon as his boat touched the strand, a great stir was observable among the crowd assembled on the quay.

Great shouts arose, and repeated discharges of cannon took place. The royal standard of England was hoisted above the Lantern Gate towards the port, and another broad banner floated above the tower of the Cathedral of Notre Dame de Calais.

Meanwhile a considerable number of archers, men-at-arms, and horses had been very expeditiously landed from some of the transports, and these were now collected on the quay.

All being at last in readiness, a splendid bark came out for the King and his nobles; and as Edward stepped upon the landing-place, which was covered with velvet, he was met by the Mayor of Calais, and the heads of the Municipal Council, in their robes, who bent the knee before him, and offered him the keys of the town on a velvet cushion.

This ceremony gone through, a procession was quickly formed, at the head of which marched the Mayor and the Municipal Council.

These authorities were followed by the Lieutenant-Governor on horseback, wearing a richly-furred mantle.

Fortunately, the citizens of London had landed in time to join the procession, and they followed Lord Wenlock.

A body-guard of mounted archers preceded the King, who rode a milk-white charger, and wore a crimson velvet surcoat, lined with ermine. On his right side walked Isidore, and on the left Claude.

Behind his Majesty came the two royal dukes, with the whole of the nobles who had been in attendance upon him during the voyage, while another troop of archers brought up the rear of the procession.

In such state, amid the roar of cannon, the ringing of bells, the beating of drums, and loud flourishes of trumpets, intermingled with the shouts of the inhabitants, Edward entered Calais by the Lantern Gate, and proceeded to the cathedral, where he offered up thanks for his safe voyage, and invoked heaven's aid for his arms.

On that night, the King and his suite were lodged at the Hotel de Ville, which had been prepared for his Majesty's reception.

III.

HOW THE ENGLISH ARMY WAS ENCAMPTED WITHOUT THE WALLS OF CALAIS; AND HOW ISIDORE, THE YOUNG ESQUIRE, WAS SENT ON A SECRET MISSION TO KING LOUIS.

NEXT day the disembarkation commenced, and was conducted with the greatest possible dispatch. As may be imagined, the greatest confusion prevailed in the port; but at length, the whole of the men and horses were safely landed, and took up their quarters in the camp, which was formed outside the walls of the town.

Never before had so large an English army been seen in France as was now collected at Calais. There were fifteen hundred men-at-arms—most of them gentlemen—mounted on strong barded horses. Besides these, there were fifteen thousand archers, all well equipped and well mounted, and above four thousand foot soldiers—making a total of upwards of twenty thousand men. No wonder those who beheld this mighty host, commanded by a warlike monarch, who had gained almost every battle he had fought, predicted the conquest of France. But Edward himself was not altogether so sanguine, and felt greatly mortified that he had been deserted by the Duke of Burgundy, on whose aid he counted.

Seen from the old walls of Calais, the English camp presented a most striking sight. Laid out in long lines, the tents extended for more than a mile among the sandy dunes. The ground was not all that could be desired, but none better offered. The camp was divided into six quarters, four of which were allotted to the horsemen, as being the most numerous, and two to the footmen. Through the midst of the tents ran a broad street, and in the centre of the camp a large square was reserved for the assembling of the troops. Another place, surrounded by palisades, was appointed for the horses; and near the market-place was an entrenched spot, designed for the munition of the ordnance.

Besides the ordinary tents, there were others much larger and handsomer, in which the knights and officers were lodged. Bell-shaped and fashioned of rich stuff, these tents were surmounted by banners, emblazoned with the arms of their occupants.

But the most splendid feature of the camp, and which threw all else into the shade, was the royal pavilion, which was placed in a commanding situation near the town. This superb tent attracted universal attention. Its size was equal to its splendour. It consisted of five of the largest tents or pavilions, composed of cloth of gold, and connected by covered passages, so as to form a palace of immense extent, and comprehending every convenience. This will be understood when we state that each of the five grand pavilions had a smaller tent attached to it on either side, and only separated by curtains from the other part of the structure.

The interior of this gorgeous silken palace was truly regal and magnificent, and constituted a series of splendid apartments, in which the two royal dukes, with the Lord High Chancellor and all the nobles and knights in immediate attendance upon the King, could be lodged. Here also were lodged the wealthy citizens of London, whom Edward had invited to accompany him on his warlike expedition to France. Here the luxurious monarch could be served with as much state and splendour as if he had been at Windsor Castle. Here he banqueted daily; a long table, decked with vessels of silver, being laid in the central pavilion, which was hung with cloth of gold.

Externally this grand pavilion presented a splendid appearance, each angle of the roof being ornamented by gilt heraldic devices, representing the King's badges—the falcon within a fetterlock, the rose and sun, a white hart, a white wolf, a cable dragon, and a bull—each holding a small flag,

Thus splendidly housed, Edward could well afford to wait for a few days for the Duke of Burgundy, but as the Duke came not, he waxed impatient, and determined to commence the campaign without him.

Before doing so, however, he judged it proper to send another herald to Louis, who was then at Compiègne with his army, and he was about to give orders to this effect, when the young squire, Isidore, who chanced to be alone with his royal master at the time, said,—

"Your Majesty may smile, but the proposition I am about to make is perfectly serious. You will do well to send me to King Louis. I am firmly persuaded that I can obtain an advantageous treaty of peace for your Majesty."

"Thou negotiate a treaty!" exclaimed Edward, laughing incredulously.

"Yes, I," replied Isidore. "I should proceed very differently from any herald or ambassador your Majesty might send, and I think I should succeed. Although you have brought this vast army to France, I am well aware that your Majesty does not desire the war, but would rather come to a pacific arrangement, if it can be effected on satisfactory terms."

"Very true," remarked Edward.

"I am equally certain that Louis is of the same opinion," pursued Isidore. "He, too, desires peace; and I am very much mistaken if he will not make large sacrifices to obtain it."

"Nay, forsooth, he will not part with any portion of his kingdom, or even a small town—such as Boulogne—unless it be wrested from him," said Edward; "but he will do much to avoid a war, which he must perceive is inevitable unless he comes to terms."

"He cannot doubt that you are in earnest, and after all the preparations you have made," said Isidore. "He will therefore be ready to pay a large sum to get rid of you. What will your Majesty accept?"

"A hundred thousand crowns down before I will conclude a peace with him," said Edward.

"Is that all?" asked Isidore.

"No; I shall require an annuity of fifty thousand crowns; and a marriage must be contracted between the Dauphin and my eldest daughter, the Princess Elizabeth. On such terms I may consent to take back my army to England."

"I am of opinion that I can obtain these terms for your Majesty," replied Isidore.

"You are very confident," observed the King. "But, for many reasons, I cannot trust you with the mission. The matter is too important."

"If I fail, no harm will be done," said Isidore. "But I shall not fail."

"You are aware of the risk you will incur in the journey to Compiègne? I can only send a very small guard with you."

"A small guard will suffice. I feel sure I shall arrive in safety."

"Since you are bent upon the expedition,

"I will not oppose you," said Edward. "You shall have my signet ring," he added, taking a large ring from his finger. "Show this to my brother Louis, and it will convince him that you come from me, and are empowered to treat with him."

"I understand," replied Isidore, as he took the ring. "Claude must accompany me."

"Be sure I shall not send you without your friend and companion," replied Edward, smiling. "But you ought to take Malhouche as well, for you are going on a fool's errand. However, all shall be ready for you and Claude to-morrow morning—horses and attendants. Moreover, a guide shall be found well acquainted with the country, and on whom you may place perfect reliance, and a safe-conduct shall be prepared for you and your attendants."

"I am greatly beholden to your Majesty for allowing me to undertake this expedition," said Isidore, joyfully. "I scarcely expected you would consent."

"You are wilful, and must have your way; but I shall never forgive myself if harm should befall you," said the King.

At an early hour next morning, a little party on horseback set forth from the camp, and took the road towards Ardres and St. Omer.

The party consisted of three well-mounted men-at-arms, at the head of whom rode the young esquire, attended by Claude. Both wore green velvet riding-dresses embroidered with gold, green velvet caps, and morocco boots; and each was armed with sword and dagger. They were provided with mettlesome jennets, which they managed like perfect cavaliers; and to judge from their manner, they evidently did not think any danger attended the adventure they had undertaken.

Cyriac Franklin, the principal man-at-arms, had been specially enjoined by the King to take charge of Isidore and his companion. He was strongly-built, and had a resolute look.

The party rode on through the flat and uninteresting country near Calais, then as now intersected by dykes, and had proceeded for about three leagues, when they descried a small party of horsemen advancing towards them at a rapid pace.

The leader of this little troop, whose appearance proclaimed his exalted rank, was a very powerful-looking personage, and rode a superb war-horse.

He was clad in a complete suit of polished mail, encrusted with gold, and the crest on his helm was formed by a golden lion. Over his shoulders was a crimson velvet mantle lined with ermine, and from his neck depended the order of the Toison d'or. His features, which could be easily distinguished, since his visor was raised, were strongly marked, and had an exceedingly proud, almost fierce, expression. His complexion was swarthy, and his eyes black and glaring.

As he came up, he glanced inquiringly at the young esquire, and seemed inclined to stop and question him, but suddenly changing his mind, he rode on.

Isidore, who had borne the knight's scrutiny as well as he could, now turned to Cyriac, and said, "Mistake that is the Duke of Burgundy."

"You are right!" replied the other. "'Tis Charles the Bold, in person."

The young esquire and the page exchanged glances.

"I am glad we had started before the Duke reached the camp," remarked Isidore. "Had he seen the King he might have prevented our journey."

"'Tis fortunate he did not guess our errand, or he might have compelled us to turn back," said Claude.

Leaving them for the present, we will follow the Duke of Burgundy to the English camp.

Aware of the great dissatisfaction felt at his conduct by the English soldiers, the Duke had need of all his hardihood to confront them; but though menacing looks were constantly thrown at him, he rode slowly through the camp, and stopped not till he came to the royal pavilion.

He then dismounted, and leaving his charger with one of his men, entered the pavilion, and commanded the usher, who advanced to meet him, to conduct him at once to the King.

The usher bowed low, and led him ceremoniously through a sort of gallery filled with nobles and knights, who bowed reverently as the Duke passed with haughty step, and then drawing aside a curtain of arras, which masked the entrance to a side tent, ushered the princely visitor into the presence of the King.

IV.

HOW CHARLES THE BOLD ARRIVED AT THE ENGLISH CAMP; AND OF HIS INTERVIEW WITH KING EDWARD IN THE ROYAL PAVILION.

CHARLES, Duke of Burgundy, one of the most renowned princes of his epoch, and well deserving of the surname he had acquired of Le Téméraire, was in the full vigour of manhood, being only just turned forty.

Temperate and abstemious, almost to a fault, the Duke could not control the terrible fits of anger to which a fierce and violent temper rendered him liable, and he frequently indulged in acts of savage barbarity, apparently inconsistent with a generous and noble nature, such as he once possessed. But his disposition had become hardened and unrelenting by the constant warfare in which he was engaged, and he seemed resolved to render himself feared rather than beloved.

Ever since he succeeded his father, Philip the Good, Charles the Bold had been continually at war with Louis XI., whom he detested because he felt himself inferior to that monarch in dignity and power, and he repeatedly declared that he would not rest till he had subdued the French King. Despite this threat, he entered into several treaties with the crafty Louis, and even received a large bribe from him to discontinue the war.

A ROYAL SURPRISE. (See page 50.)

but the treaties were broken almost as soon as made.

Charles the Bold's warlike ambition and warlike tendencies would not allow him to remain tranquil, and he was ever planning some new campaign. Firmly believing in his own great military capacity, he would never allow that he had been fairly defeated, and in the latter part of his career, after the disastrous battle of Granson, a deep dejection seized him. But at the time of his introduction to the reader, though he had sustained several reverses, his confidence in himself was entirely unshaken. He had given numberless proofs of the greatest intrepidity, and at the battle of Montlhéry, when he was surrounded by the enemy, he performed prodigies of valour.

Eleven years prior to our story, the Duke of Burgundy espoused Margaret of York, sister to the King of England, at that time remarkable for her beauty. Subsequently to the marriage, Edward sent him the Order of the Garter.

Charles the Bold was warmly attached to his royal brother-in-law, and when Edward was driven from his dominions by Warwick, and compelled to take refuge in Holland, the Duke furnished him with money and ships, and enabled him to regain his kingdom.

For this aid Edward naturally felt grateful, and promised to aid Charles in his ambitious designs against Louis. On his part, the Duke was most urgent that his royal brother-in-law should invade France, doubtless anticipating that he himself would reap the real harvest of the war.

Incited by the Duke's representations of an easy conquest, Edward got together a large army, as we have related; but in the meantime, Charles, from some unaccountable caprice, had laid siege to Neuss—a strongly-fortified town on the Rhine, not far from Cleves—and failing in his attempt to take it, turned his arms against the Duke of Lorraine, who had been induced by the wily Louis to declare war against him.

This was the ostensible reason why the Duke of Burgundy had not joined his royal brother-in-law at Calais, according to his promise.

Two finer looking men than Charles the Bold and Edward of England could not be seen. Yet there was not the slightest personal resemblance between them. Both were of lofty stature, but Edward was the taller of the two, and had the most graceful figure. Moreover, his features were far handsomer than the Duke's.

Charles had a noble cast of countenance, but his deportment, though haughty, was exceedingly dignified; but his stern look inspired uneasiness—even terror. His person was well-made, but robust, and indicated great strength.

Showered from head to foot in shining mail, he wore his harness as easily as a velvet jerkin. For a few moments he stood there, with his left hand upon the hilt of his lengthy sword, looking steadily at Edward, as if uncertain how he should be received.

Edward did not embrace the Duke, or even offer him his hand, but saluting him coldly, said, "Soh! you are come at last, brother!"

"It is not my fault that I have not been here sooner," replied the Duke. "I have lost sixteen thousand men before Neuss, and was compelled to send the remains of my shattered army into Lorraine."

Edward regarded him intently.

"From the steps you have taken, brother," he said, "it would seem that you are more anxious to make the conquest of Lorraine than to aid me in the conquest of France."

"Mistake me not, brother," rejoined Charles the Bold. "I have been compelled to change my plans. I will be better now that we should not join our forces, but make war separately. Indeed we have no choice, since the country has been so devastated by Louis, that both armies could not find sufficient food."

"But why did you allow Louis to lay waste the country?" demanded Edward.

"I could not prevent him," said Charles, angrily.

"No; because you were occupied on the Rhine, instead of being here according to your promise," cried Edward.

"Calm yourself, brother, and listen to me," said the Duke. "This is what I propose. While you pass the Somme, and proceed by way of Laon and Soissons, I will drive the Duke of Lorraine from Luxembourg, and after possessing myself of Bar and Lorraine, will meet you at my good city of Rheims, where you can be crowned King of France."

"The plan pleases me not," rejoined Edward. "Since you seem to forget the terms of our treaty, I must remind you of them. It was agreed that I should pass over into France at the head of an army of ten thousand men, well armed and well equipped, while you were to assist me in person with all your forces to accomplish the invasion. As soon as war was declared we were to march together and attack the common enemy in all convenient places; and in the event of the conquest of France, it was agreed that I should bestow upon you the Duchy of Bar, the counties of Champagne, Hovers, Ru, Guise, the barony of Dunoy, with all the towns on both banks of the Somme."

"I have not forgotten our agreement," rejoined Charles.

"I have not done," pursued Edward. "On your part, you expressly undertook to furnish for the war an army of twenty thousand men. Where are they?"

Charles made a movement of impatience.

"I must tell you plainly, brother, that your extraordinary conduct is viewed with the deepest dissatisfaction by my nobles, my knights, and my men. They do not understand why you should engage in another war at this particular juncture. If they were surprised that you should baggage Neuss, they are still more astonished that you should attack Lorraine."

"I owe your nobles and knights no explanation," remarked the Duke, sternly.

"But you owe me one, brother," rejoined Edward. "I am not satisfied."

"You are angry with me without reason," said Charles. "All will yet go well. I have just received a letter from the Constable Saint Pol, in which he promises to deliver up Saint Quentin to you. Furthermore, he engages to serve me and all my allies—especially your Majesty—against all enemies. I will place his letter in your hands. Are you now content with me?"

Without making any direct reply, Edward took the despatch, and said, "I will assemble my council at once, and you shall meet them."

"Hold me excused, brother," replied the Duke. "I have come hither at the greatest inconvenience to myself, in order to explain matters to you personally, and I now desire to return to my camp in Lorraine without delay."

"By Saint George! you shall not go, brother, even if I forcibly detain you!" cried Edward, in a determined tone. "Your sudden arrival, and hasty departure, would have an injurious effect on the army. I will march forthwith to Peronne; and you shall accompany me thither!"

"Since you will have it so, I yield to your request," replied the Duke, though with evident reluctance. "But there must be no needless delay. Commence the march as soon as you can."

"The camp shall be struck to-morrow morn," said Edward. "I will give immediate orders to that effect."

He was about to summon an attendant, when Charles stopped him.

"There is a slight matter that I would fain mention to you, brother," said the Duke, regarding him fixedly. "As I came hither, about three leagues hence, on the road to Guines, I encountered a handsome young esquire, with a page and two or three men-at-arms, who evidently came from your camp."

"How know you that?" said Edward, sharply.

"The men were clearly English, and so was their leader," replied Charles. "Whither were they bound?"

"You should have questioned them yourself, brother," replied Edward, carelessly.

"It struck me afterwards that the youth might be a messenger to Louis," remarked Charles, still keeping his eyes fixed on the King.

"If I sent a messenger to Louis, he would not be a youth, such as you describe," replied Edward. "I can give you no information respecting him."

Though by no means satisfied, Charles made no further remark.

A council of war was then summoned at which the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, with all the principal nobles, were present.

Charles the Bold repeated all he had said to the King, and his explanation appeared satisfactory to every one save Gloucester.

The letter from the Constable Saint Pol, which it may be proper to mention, was under to the Queen of England, was laid before the council, and the promises contained in it, apparently made in good faith, dispelled much of the distrust hitherto felt.

At the close of the meeting, the citizens of London were presented to the Duke of Burgundy by the King, and were received by Charles with the utmost courtesy.

After surveying the camp, so soon to be broken up, the King and the Duke, who seemed now to have come to a perfectly good understanding, entered Calais, and proceeded to the church of Notre Dame, where they both alighted and made their prayers at the high altar.

A grand banquet in the royal pavilion concluded the day; and at this splendid entertainment were present not only all the important personages who had accompanied the King in the expedition, but the Mayor and most worshipful citizens of Calais, as well as the much-honoured citizens of London.

V.

HOW KING EDWARD MARCHED HIS ARMY TO PERONNE; AND HOW THE CONSTABLE SAINT POL REFUSED HIM ADMITTANCE TO SAINT QUENTIN.

By noon next day, all preparations being completed, the camp was struck, and the march of the army commenced into Artois. The first division was led by the King, who was accompanied by Charles the Bold, the Earl of Northumberland, and Lord Hastings, and attended by the spearmen of Calais, in black velvet gowns, and having mussy chains round their necks.

Owing to the immense number of baggage waggon and other equipages, together with the long train of artillery, the progress of the army across the marshy land in the neighbourhood of Calais was exceedingly slow, and the main body did not get beyond Ardres.

The first division, however, reached Saint Omer; but Edward, at the suggestion of the Duke of Burgundy, who represented to him that the inhabitants would be greatly inconvenienced, did not enter the town.

Towards evening, next day, the whole army arrived at Arras; and Edward, despite the Duke's remonstrances, took possession of the Hotel de Ville, and quartered the brigade under his own immediate command upon the town's people.

Bapaume formed the limit of the next day's march; and on the fourth day, Peronne was reached.

In the immediate vicinity of this strongly fortified town, situated on the north bank of the Somme, and possessing a castle garrisoned by Charles the Bold, Edward proposed to halt till Saint Quentin, which was only a few leagues distant, should be delivered up to him by the Constable Saint Pol.

Throughout the march, the conduct of the Duke of Burgundy had been such as to inspire distrust. Evidently, he was most unwilling that the English army should enter any town belonging to him, or disturb the inhabitants. At Arras, where his wishes were disregarded, he could not conceal his vexation; and now at Peronne, though he could not refuse Edward admittance to the town, he would not lodge him at the Castle.

The drawbridge was kept constantly raised, and no one was permitted to enter the fortress. Determined not to brook further delay, and fancying he perceived some symptoms of uneasiness about his brother-in-law, Edward called upon him to compel the Constable to fulfil his promise to deliver up Saint Quentin.

Accordingly, Charles sent a letter to the Constable; but as the messenger did not return forthwith, the King waxed impatient, and set out for Saint Quentin, with a guard of two hundred archers, accompanied by the Duke of Burgundy, who had likewise a small guard with him.

On arriving within a couple of leagues of Saint Quentin, Edward commanded the captain of the guard to ride on with twenty men, and announce his approach to the Constable.

On reaching the town with his company, the officer found the gates shut, and a number of armed men on the walls. Two large pieces of ordnance were placed on the summit of the gate, and the engineers threatened to fire upon him if he did not at once withdraw with his men.

Highly offended, the officer demanded admittance in the name of the King of England, whereupon a body of cavalry, commanded, it was thought, by the Constable Saint Pol in person, sallied forth, killed the officer, and three of the men, and drove off the rest, who galloped back as hard as they could, to warn the King of his danger.

Edward was riding slowly along, at the head of his men, with Charles the Bold by his side, and the Lords Hastings and Howard close behind him, when the discomfited soldiers came up, and told him what had happened.

Highly incensed, he cried out to the Duke of Burgundy, "By my soul, brother! you shall rue this treachery!"

"Am I answerable for the Constable's misdoings?" observed Charles, coldly. "Visit your anger upon him."

"Think not to impose upon me by this equivocation!" cried Edward, furiously. "You are the real author of the mischief! Can I doubt that the Constable is acting by your orders? But, as I live, both you and he shall regret it!"

"Calm yourself, I pray you, my liege," intimated Hastings, fearing that the quarrel might proceed to some dire extremity. "Doubtless, his Grace will be able to offer an explanation."

"By Saint George of Burgundy! I know nothing of the matter," said Charles, as I will prove to you. Let us ride on, and demand an explanation from the Constable."

But Edward refused to proceed.

"You have deceived me," he said, sternly, "and I will not trust you further. You shall return with me to Peronne."

"As your prisoner? Never!" rejoined Charles, laying his hand upon the hilt of his sword. "Whoso dares hinder my departure had best look to himself! Come with me, Burgundians!"

Thus enjoined, his scanty band of followers pressed towards him.

Edward seemed disposed to stay him, but Hastings again interposed.

"He will never surrender himself, my liege," said the Earl; "and if he be slain, you will be held accountable for his death."

Edward was sufficiently master of himself to listen to this judicious advice.

As the Duke departed, he called out to him, "Take refuge in Saint Quentin, brother. The Constable will gladly let you in, though he refuses me admittance."

Disdaining to make any reply, Charles rode slowly away with his followers.

Firmly resolved to break off the alliance with his faithless brother-in-law, Edward returned to Peronne.

In the first impulse of his wrath, he determined to assault Saint Quentin, and wrest the town from the Constable; but when he grew calmer, he deemed it advisable to await the result of the message to Louis.

Beginning to feel some uneasiness respecting Isidore, he resolved to send another messenger to Compiègne, and could find none more suitable than a cordelier, named Father Severin, who had accompanied the army from Dover.

Edward's instructions to the cordelier, who could speak French fluently, were that he should proceed as quickly as he could to Compiègne, and ascertain if any mischance had befallen Isidore and Claude. Father Severin was charged to render them all the assistance in his power. Moreover, he was furnished with a letter, which he was to deliver to Louis, in case circumstances rendered the step necessary—not otherwise.

Provided with a stout, ambling nag, and with ample means for the journey, the cordelier set out alone, as it was not deemed prudent to send an escort with him.

Having taken this precautionary step, Edward employed himself in preparing for a vigorous prosecution of the war, should Louis decline to accept his conditions.

The bulk of the army were anxious that the campaign should commence in earnest, as they felt sure that the same success that had formerly attended the English arms awaited them now. Moreover, their patience was well-nigh exhausted and provisions were becoming scarce. They, therefore, ardently hoped that the King would soon order an attack upon Amiens.

The principal knights and nobles were, however, quite satisfied with what had already been done, and the citizens were of the same opinion.

Unaccustomed to hardships of any kind, the latter were annoyed by the trifling discomforts to which they had been subjected during the march from Calais to Peronne, and wished themselves safe back again in London.

VI.

HOW ISIDORE PROCEEDED TOWARDS COMPIEGNE, AND HOW HE WAS STOPPED BY A PARTY OF BURGUNDIAN SOLDIERS ON THE WAY TO MONTDIDIER.

AFTER the encounter with Charles the Bold, which had caused considerable alarm to Isidore and Claude, they proceeded across a plain, rendered famous at a subsequent period for the meeting between Henry VIII and Francis I; and, without halting at Ardres, rode along the banks of a little river to Saint Omer, where they halted for the night.

Resuming their journey at an early hour next morning, and passing through Bethune, they reached Arras without hindrance or misadventure.

There they would have sojourned for the night, but as it seemed likely they might be detained by the authorities of the town, they decided upon proceeding as far as Doulens.

Next day they rode to Peronne, but did not enter the town, and after refreshing themselves and their horses, shaped their course towards Montdidier; but they had not proceeded much more than a league, when they perceived they were followed by a small party of Burgundian soldiers, with an officer at their head.

The leader of the troop called out to them to stop, and, as it was impossible to fly, they obeyed.

Facing about with his attendants, and assuming a courageous look, Isidore waited till the officer came up, and then haughtily inquired his business.

"Pardon me, fair sir," said the officer, courteously. "The orders I have received from the Governor of Peronne are to take you and your attendants back to the town. Be pleased, therefore, to come with me."

"I protest against any interruption in the name of the King of England!" said Isidore. "I am an envoy from his Majesty to King Louis."

"I must remind you, fair sir, that you are still in the territories of his Highness the Duke of Burgundy," said the officer, who had not in the slightest degree abated his courtesy.

"I am quite aware of it," replied Isidore. "But the Duke your master, is the ally as well as the brother-in-law of King Edward."

"Nevertheless, his Highness does not choose that a message even from the King of England be sent without his Grace's knowledge and approval to the King of France."

"Now has the Duke learnt that I am charged with any such message?" demanded Isidore.

"I am not bound to give any explanation," replied the officer; "but it would seem that his Highness encountered you and your party near Ardres, and suspecting your errand, has sent an order to have you stayed."

"No doubt you have calculated the consequences of such a step. It will naturally give great umbrage to the King, my master."

"I have simply to obey orders. You will be first taken to Peronne, and will then be sent back to the English camp. Compel me not, I pray you, to use force."

"Since needs must, I will go with you," said Isidore. "But I again warn you that the King, my master, will deeply resent this interference!"

"I cannot help it," rejoined the officer, shrugging his shoulders.

With great reluctance, Cyriac and his comrades accompanied the Burgundian soldiers; but, as their young leader did not seem inclined to offer any resistance, they obeyed, and the whole party turned back, and proceeded towards Peronne.

They had not, however, got far when a troop of horsemen, whose accoutrements and the standard which they carried showed they were French soldiers, issued from a wood, and made quickly towards them.

At the sight of this troop, which more than trebled his own in number, the Burgundian officer, though a brave man, looked quite dismayed. In the leader of the hostile troop, he had recognised the Sire de Comines, one of the chief counsellors of the French King; and he felt almost certain that this was only a reconnoitring party, and that a much larger force must be close at hand.

Bidding his men save themselves, he seized hold of Isidore's bridle, and tried to drag him along; but Cyriac came to the young esquire's assistance, and soon liberated him.

The Burgundian officer then struck spurs into his horse's flanks, and galloped off with his men towards Peronne.

Pursuit, however, was not attempted by the Sire de Comines, who presently came up with his troop.

VII.

WHAT PASSED BETWEEN ISIDORE AND THE SIRE DE COMINES.

THE chief councillor and chamberlain of the French King was a noble-looking personage, and his strongly marked but handsome countenance was stamped by intelligence, and had a grave and rather stern expression.

Originally in the service of Charles the Bold, with whom he was a great favourite, Philip de Comines was induced to abandon the Duke by the magnificent offers made him by the wily Louis XI, who desired to secure to himself a person of such ability.

On the defection of Comines, all his estates were immediately confiscated by the Duke of Burgundy; but he was amply rewarded for the loss.

Louis appointed him his chief councillor and chamberlain, with a pension of six thousand livres, and besides bestowing other lucrative honours upon him, created him Prince de Talmont.

Endowed with great shrewdness and power of observation, Philip de Comines kept a record of the most important events that occurred during the reign of Louis XI, and to him we are indebted for the best chronicle of the period under consideration.

But, though the pursuits of the Sire de Comines were studious, he was well-skilled in military matters, and as fond of the sword as the pen. An excellent horseman, he constantly accompanied his royal master in the chase. He was above the middle height, and strongly built.

On the present occasion, he was clad in a suit of mail, damasked with gold, and graven with his arms, and over his armour he wore a rich mantle.

As he came up, he looked hard and inquiringly at Isidore, and said, "By your looks and habiliments you should be an English esquire. What do you here?"

"I am the bearer of a message from the King of England to King Louis of France," replied Isidore.

"By Saint Philip!" exclaimed De Comines, "your royal master does not show much respect to his Majesty in sending to him such a cockcomb as thou art. Deliver thy message to me; I will convey it to the King."

"May I inquire who makes me the offer?" said Isidore.

"I am the Sire de Comines, Prince de Talmont, the King's chief councillor and chamberlain," said the other.

"And his Majesty's best adviser," replied Isidore, taking off his cap, and bowing lowly. "I have often heard my royal master speak of you in terms of the highest commendation."

"Ah! indeed," exclaimed De Comines, looking hard at the speaker. "It appears you have much influence with King Edwards."

"Not much," replied the esquire. "But he can trust me."

"And you have really an important message for King Louis? Do not trifle with me."

"My message is most important, as you will admit when I tell you that on the result of my interview depends war or peace!"

"Do you come as an ambassador from the King of England?" cried De Comines.

"No," replied Isidore; "but I am authorized by the King to negotiate a truce."

Though scarcely crediting the assertion, De Comines made no remark; but, after reflecting for a few moments, said, "I will take you to the King. I had other matter in hand, but this shall supersede it."

During the foregoing brief colloquy, the attentances of both speakers had been carefully watched by Claude and Cyriac, who soon an understanding had been arrived at.

They were not surprised, therefore, when the Sire de Comines ordered his men to return at once to Compiègne, while Isidore explained to his followers that he was about to accompany the French noble.

The whole party then set off at a brisk pace for Roze, where they halted, and then proceeded to Gournay.

After resting themselves and their horses at the latter place, they rode on to Compiègne.

During the whole of the journey, De Comines paid great attention to the young esquire, and seemed very anxious to obtain information respecting Charles the Bold.

All Isidore could tell him was that the Duke had joined the King at Calais, but with only a very slender attendance.

VIII.

HOW ISIDORE MET THE COUNT DE BEAUJEU IN THE FOREST OF COMPIÈGNE; AND HOW THE YOUNG ESQUIRE AND HIS COMPANION WERE LODGED IN THE ROYAL PALACE.

EVENING was coming on as the Sire de Comines and Isidore, with the others, entered the extensive forest adjoining Compiègne, and they were pursuing the road that led through it, when from a side alley, about a bow-shot in advance, there issued a small hunting party, consisting of some half-dozen huntsmen, at the head of whom rode a man of middle age, habited in a green velvet hunting-dress. This person had a couteau de chasses in his belt, and a riding whip in his hand. Despite his plain attire, there was an air of distinction about him, and his manner, albeit peculiar and abrupt, was not devoid of dignity. He rode a very fine horse, and though his own attire was extremely plain, the liveries of the huntsmen were magnificent.

"Tis the Count de Beaujeu. I did not expect to meet him here," exclaimed De Comines.

With this, he signed to his men to slacken their pace, and rode on alone to join the Count, who waited till he came up, the huntsmen slowly continuing their course, accompanied by the hounds.

The name and title of the stranger conveyed nothing to Isidore. He had never before heard of the Count de Beaujeu; but, he was struck by his appearance. In age the Count might be about fifty, perhaps rather more; but he looked full of vigour. His features were strongly marked, and characterized by great shrewdness, and had a very crafty and sarcastic expression.

While conversing with De Comines, the Count ever and anon cast a scrutinizing glance at Isidore, proving that the young esquire was the subject of their discourse.

At length Isidore was summoned, and presented to the Count, who thus addressed him, eyeing keenly as he spoke.

"Soh! you are an envoy from the King of England. I am told, young sir, you have some qualifications for the office. Indeed, you are good-looking, and the Sire de Comines says you speak our language well; but I cannot understand why your royal master should send you on the errand, unless a jest is intended."

"I fear the laugh would be against me: if I attempted to jest with King Louis," rejoined Isidore.

"You are right," remarked De Comines.

"Yet King Louis jested with his royal brother when he sent him that singular present of the wolf, the wild boar, and the ass," observed the esquire.

"What said King Edward to the gift?" demanded the Count, laughing.

"I dare not tell you, my lord; but his Majesty was highly offended."

"Perchance, it is in reprisal that he now sends you as his envoy?"

"I am sent because his Majesty felt certain I should succeed in the mission," Isidore observed.

"He must place great reliance on your powers of persuasion," remarked the Count, drily.

"Persuasion will be unnecessary, my lord," rejoined the esquire. "King Louis will gladly accede to the proposition I am empowered to make to him."

"You think so?" cried the Count.

"I am sure of it," rejoined the esquire, "because it is his interest to do so."

Both the Count de Beaujeu and De Comines laughed heartily at this observation.

"You treat the matter lightly, my lords," said the esquire; "but your royal master will view it very differently."

"We shall see!" rejoined the Count. "Have you a written authority from the King?"

"I have his signet-ring," replied Isidore, taking off his glove, and displaying it.

"Enough!" exclaimed the Count, after he had carefully examined the ring. "I am satisfied. You shall have an audience of the King to-morrow."

"I thank you, my lord," said the esquire; "but, perchance, you promise more than you can perform."

"I promise nothing, save that you shall see the King," rejoined the Count. "I have influence enough with him to procure you an audience; that is all. Take the youth to the palace," he added, to De Comines.

So saying, he rejoined the huntsmen, and, again putting himself at their head, rode off at a brisk pace, and quickly disappeared.

"I have heard that the King has some strange favourites," observed Isidore. "The Count de Beaujeu must be one of the strangest of them."

"He has more influence than any one else with the King," rejoined De Comines. "His Majesty can do nothing without him."

Isidore would fain have questioned him further as to this singular personage; but finding him disinclined for converse, he forbore.

Nothing more passed between them till they emerged from the forest, and came in sight of the old town of Compiègne. Pleasantly situated on the banks of the Oise, it formed a very charming picture from this point of view.

Close to the town, but not within the walls, was the palace—a large fortified edifice, surrounded by a deep moat, supplied with water by the Oise. The aspect of the buildings, with its towers and ramparts, was exceedingly striking.

Dismissing the greatest part of his men, with orders to proceed to the town, and retaining only a small guard, De Comines conducted the young esquire and his attendants to the palace.

The drawbridge was raised, but was instantly lowered on the appearance of the party; and, crossing it, and passing through a gateway, which was strongly guarded, they reached the court-yard.

Here several grooms and pages, in the royal livery, were collected; and by the time Isidore had dismounted, a gentleman usher made his appearance.

Addressing the usher, De Comines told him that lodgings were to be provided for the young esquire and his attendant, pointing as he spoke to Claude, who was now standing beside his master; upon which the usher bowed profoundly, said that orders to that effect had been given him, and all was ready for the young esquire's reception in the best part of the palace.

The significance with which the latter part of the speech was uttered did not escape Isidore, and he remarked with a smile to De Comines, "The Count de Beaujeu, I perceive, has been beforehand with us."

In sooth, you are indebted to him for this attention," replied De Comines.

"I am none the less indebted to you, my lord," said Isidore. "Without your aid I should not be here now."

"Perhaps not; but all difficulties and dangers are surmounted, and you are safe in the royal palace. To-morrow you will see the King. No doubt I shall be present at the audience."

"And the Count de Beaujeu also?"

"Most likely. Till then, adieu! The usher will conduct you to your apartments."

Praying the young esquire to follow him, the usher then led him and Claude, who kept constantly near his master, to a wing of the palace facing the Oise, and commanding a charming view.

It would seem that the rooms assigned the young esquire and his attendant must have belonged to one of the Count's ladies, for an elderly gouvernante, who was addressed as Madame Benoitte, and her daughter Colombe, appeared to have sitting charge of them, and waited upon the guests. No pages or valets were allowed to enter the rooms.

Strange as it seemed, this arrangement proved extremely agreeable to Isidore and his companion, nor could they complain, for the utmost attention was shown them by Madame Benoitte and Colombe. Supper was served early, and, after partaking of it, Isidore retired to rest, being somewhat fatigued by the journey.

Next morning, there was a great stir within the palace, and Isidore inquired whether anything unusual had happened, and was informed by the gouvernante that the King was inspecting the garrison.

Feeling certain he should receive a summons when it was proper to present himself to his Majesty, the young esquire did not leave his room, but passed the time in contemplating the beautiful view of the town and the river from the windows.

He was thus occupied when De Comines entered the room, and, after courteously saluting him, proposed to conduct him to the King.

"His Majesty has graciously consented to grant you an audience," he said. "Have no misgiving; he is in a perfectly good humour, and I think all will turn out as well as you could desire."

"I am glad to hear it," replied Isidore. "But where is the Count de Beaujeu? I hoped to see him."

"You will see him anon," replied De Comines. "Let me show you the way to the King's cabinet."

They then went forth together, leaving Claude behind, though the page would fain have accompanied his master.

After traversing a corridor thronged by various officers connected with the royal establishment, who made way respectfully for them, and threading several narrow passages, they came to a second corridor, quite as crowded as the first.

Here they entered an ante-chamber, in which some half-dozen distinguished-looking personages were collected. These persons bowed to De Comines, and looked hard at Isidore, but made no remark.

Stationed at the further end of the room was an usher, bearing a white wand. On seeing them approach, he opened the door of the royal cabinet.

Greatly was Isidore surprised to find that there was no one in the little chamber except the person whom he had hitherto known as the Count de Beaujeu. The supposed Count, however, no longer wore the hunting dress in which he had been first seen, but a costume that proclaimed his exalted rank. It was needless for De Comines to inform the esquire that this was King Louis.

Stepping forward, Isidore bent the knee to the monarch, who smiled graciously as he raised him.

IX.

NOW ISIDORE HAD AN AUDIENCE OF KING LOUIS XI IN HIS MAJESTY'S PRIVATE CABINET OF THE PALACE.

Now in 1423, Louis XI was now upwards of fifty, but still strong and remarkably active. He was of middle height, and stooped slightly, but his person was well formed. His features were sharp and intelligent, and his face being scrupulously shaven, its expression could easily be read. His eyes were gray, and their glances singularly keen and searching.

On his closely-cropped head he wore an embroidered velvet skull-cap, above which was a bonnet bordered with pearls, and having a little leaden figure of the Blessed Virgin placed in front. About his person were a number of saintly relics and images.

On the present occasion, his attire consisted of a tawney-satin tunic, embroidered with gold, over which he wore a purple velvet robe, furled with ermine. Dark red silk hose, and velvet buskins of the same hue, completed his costume. Around his neck hung the chain of the order of Saint Michael, which he himself had founded in 1469.

The cruel, treacherous, and vindictive character of this able and most sagacious monarch is well known. Dissimulation was his practice; his favourite motto being, Qui nescit dissimulare, nescit regnare. It is said of him by Mézerai, "that he never neglected to revenge himself, unless he feared the consequences would be dangerous." And he always acted up to this principle, for he sought to make himself feared.

"Louis XI," says M. Pitre-Chevalier, "is one of those political giants that arise at the moment of social revolutions; some carry the sword, others the pen—he carried the axe, and the executioner was his gossip. This inflexible organizer, who bequeathed to France in the midst of the remains of the old world the elements of a new world, a homogeneous kingdom, a public administration, manufactures, roads, ports, and that equality before the king, which one day became equality before the law—this man, who alone in his time comprehended and carried his thoughts in his head—this politician so fine, that he attempted to deceive Heaven, and braved Satan, of whom he was so much afraid—this Louis XI, in short, for his name alone ought to define him, said to himself, while thinking of his great vassals, whom he meant to destroy, 'My two cousins, Burgundy and Bretagne, shall fall the first.'"

Numerous assassinations were said to be the charge of this terrible King. It is said that he poisoned Agnes Sorel, the beautiful and amiable favourite of his father, Charles VII; and so fearful was the father of being poisoned by his son, that he refused all nourishment, and died from excess of precaution.

Those who became the confidants and favourites of Louis were men of the lowest condition. The three persons, who had the greatest ascendancy over him were his provost-marshal, Tristan l'Hermite, whom he familiarly styled his gossip; his keeper, Olivier le Dain; and his physician, Jacques Coctier. His best and sincerest adviser was Philip de Comines, whom he had contrived to detach from the service of Charles the Bold.

Louis never forgave a minister who abused his confidence; and having discovered the treacheries of Cardinal Baluz, he subjected him to a long and terrible imprisonment in an iron cage.

Ever since he ascended the throne, Louis had been engaged in a constant struggle with his great vassals, his rebellious subjects, and his powerful and ambitious neighbours.

Dangerous leagues were continually formed against him by his brother, the Duke de Guienne; and when the Duke died, it was said that Louis had removed him by poison. Other dark crimes were laid to his charge, and not unjustly.

The last and most dangerous league formed against Louis was that with which we have now to deal, and which comprehended the Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Bretagne, and King Edward of England. But he hoped to break up this formidable alliance by his superior craft, and his first object was to get rid, at any cost, of the warlike monarch who had invaded his kingdom.

Fortunately for his purpose, the Duke of Burgundy had acted towards his royal ally with inconceivable folly, and Louis was not slow to take advantage of the Duke's egregious blunder. If he could separate Edward and Charles, the Duke of Bretagne would be easily dealt with.

Regarding the young esquire with a smiling and encouraging look, the wily monarch said to him, "I promised you should see the King, and you perceive I have kept my word."

Isidore bowed, and Louis went on, in a cajoling tone, "I am very glad my good cousin, the King of England, has sent you to me. He could not have chosen a better messenger."

"I was not chosen, sire," rejoined Isidore. "I volunteered to come."

"Pâques-Dieu! you have plenty of courage!" exclaimed Louis. "Yet I am surprised the King could trust you."

"He knew I was in no danger, sire; and he knew, also, that he could rely upon me."

"Are you in full possession of his Majesty's wishes, and able to treat for him?" asked Louis.

"I am, sire."

"In that case, I am persuaded we shall arrive at a satisfactory understanding. Believe me, when I assert that I have always desired to live on terms of amity with my good cousin, and, however appearances may be against me, my sincere wish has ever been that the two kingdoms should be at peace. Never since my accession to the throne have I undertaken a war against England; and if I received the Earl of Warwick, it was against the Duke of Burgundy, and not against King Edward."

"I will take care to mention this to my royal master," remarked Isidore.

"I know very well," pursued Louis, "that my good cousin has been induced to invade my kingdom by the artful representations of Charles of Burgundy. But the Duke is unable to aid him. He has just returned from the siege of Neuss, wholly discomfited. His army is in such a deplorable condition that he dares not show it to the King, your master."

"It would certainly appear so, sire," observed Isidore.

"I am also aware," said Louis, "that King Edward has an understanding with the Constable Saint Pol, whose niece he has married. But let him beware. The Constable is a traitor, as I know to my cost."

"His Majesty has little faith in him," observed Isidore.

"Mark me!" said Louis, significantly. "My good cousin will do far better to conclude a loyal peace with an old enemy, than to count upon the promises of his faithless allies."

"Such a peace may be concluded," said Isidore.

"You think so?" cried Louis, eagerly.

"I am able to state to your Majesty the terms on which alone King Edward will consent to make peace."

"Let me hear them," cried Louis.

"Before King Edward will leave the kingdom, he requires seventy-five thousand crowns down."

"He shall have them," said Louis.

"Further, an annuity for life of fifty thousand crowns."

"Granted!" cried Louis. "Is there aught more?"

"Yes, sire; the most material part has to come," said Isidore. "The next condition is that a marriage shall be contracted between the Dauphin and King Edward's eldest daughter, the Lady Elizabeth of York—it being understood that the Princess shall receive an annual pension of sixty thousand crowns, secured on the revenues of Gasconne, and to be paid at the Tower of London until such time as she shall come to France, to reside with her royal husband."

"This demand requires consideration," said Louis. "But I may possibly accede to it. How say you, De Comines?"

His councillor replied, in a few words, calculated only for the King's ear.

"Dear in mind, sire, the advice of Sforza, Duke of Milan—'Give what you have not got, and promise what you cannot give.'"

Seeing the shift of the minister, Louis added, to the esquire, "I agree to the proposed marriage. Is there aught more?"

"There are some other demands," replied Isidore; "but they are of minor importance, and relate chiefly to the citizens of London. I doubt not they will be readily conceded by your Majesty."

"By such matters do not need discussion," said Louis. "I agree to the terms proposed to me; my motives must not be misunderstood. I desire peace, but am fully prepared for war, and the passages of the Somme are well guarded, and King Edward will not be able to pass the river without severe fighting—even if he should succeed in passing it. Is he prepared for a long campaign? I doubt it. The Duke of Burgundy has led him to suppose he can march on without difficulty. He will find it otherwise. The country has been wasted, and as he will not be able to procure "provisions for his army, he may have to retreat ingloriously."

"King Edward will not retreat, if the war once commences," said Isidore. "Of that your Majesty may rest assured. All difficulties will be surmounted, and he will return in triumph like Edward the Third from Cressy and Poitiers, and Henry the Fifth from Agincourt."

"We are talking of peace, not war," cried Louis, sharply.

"True, sire," rejoined Isidore; "and peace can be made, provided my royal master's terms are agreed to by your Majesty. A formal treaty has been drawn up, which only lacks your Majesty's signature."

"Have you the treaty?" demanded Louis, hastily.

"Tis here, sire," rejoined Isidore, taking the paper from his breast.

Louis almost snatched the document from him, and ran his eye eagerly over its contents.

"Your Majesty will find nothing more set down than what I have stated," said Isidore.

"You have not misled me, I see," cried Louis. "When this treaty is executed—and I know you have sufficient interest with King Edward to bring that about—you shall have, in token of my regard, nine thousand crowns in gold, besides the thousand I will presently bestow upon you."

"Ten thousand crowns of gold!" exclaimed the esquire. "Tis a royal gift!"

"But you will richly deserve it, if you are the means of securing a peace between the two kingdoms," observed De Comines.

"The conditions are fully agreed upon," said Louis; "but to keep up appearances, they must be formally discussed by ambassadors, on King Edward's part, and commissioners on mine; after which, an interview can take place between my good cousin and myself, when the treaty can be executed, and a truce concluded."

Isidore bowed assent, and Louis went on.

"You must be content to be my guest for a few days," he said, "while certain preliminaries are arranged; but you shall have as much privacy as you can desire."

"I am in no haste to depart," replied the esquire; "but I trust I may be permitted to communicate with the King, my master, who may feel some uneasiness concerning me."

"Tis my wish that you should write to King Edward," said Louis. "One of the guard who attended you can take the letter to him. Very few words will suffice, as the message might fall into wrong hands. Have you a man with you whom you can trust?"

"There is an archer named Cyriac, my liege, on whom I can perfectly rely."

"I have had some converse with the man," remarked De Comines, "and will answer for his fidelity."

"Enough," said Louis. "He shall have a safe conduct, which will protect him, unless he should fall into the hands of the Duke of Burgundy. Do not for a moment hesitate," he continued, with a slight laugh, "that I mean to detain you as a hostage. But I may have a correspondence with King Edward, which you alone can conduct."

"I quite understand, sire," said Isidore.

"During your stay at Compiegne, which I will endeavour to make pleasant to you," said Louis, "you will do exactly as you please. Servants and horses shall be placed at your disposal. You can visit the town, ride in the forest, go where you will; all I require is that you do not leave without my consent."

Seeing that the interview was at an end, Isidore bowed profoundly to the King, and was re-conducted to his apartments by De Comines.

X.

HOW TWO SPLENDID LADIES' DRESSES WERE SENT BY KING LOUIS AS A PRESENT TO NIDORE AND CLAUDE.

ISIDORE'S first business was to write the letter agreed upon to King Edward; and, having sealed it, he sent for Cyriac, to whom he entrusted it, enjoining him to deliver it into the King's own hands.

Cyriac, who had already received a safe conduct, promised to execute his mission faithfully.

"No mischance, I trust, will happen to thee," said Isidore; "but shouldst thou fall into the Duke of Burgundy's hands, destroy the letter, and answer no questions touching thine errand."

"Fear not; I will say nothing, even if I be put to the torture," rejoined Cyriac.

"Shouldst thou reach the King in safety," pursued Isidore, "tell his Majesty that all has gone well, and that I have come to a satisfactory understanding with King Louis. Add that my return is uncertain, but his Majesty need have no anxiety about me."

Cyriac then departed, and shortly afterwards set out. He met with no interruption; at first, on his journey, but before reaching Ferme, he encountered the Sire de Sainville, with a party of soldiers, in the service of the Constable Saint Pol.

De Sainville showed no respect for his safe conduct, but, thinking something might be made of him, took him to Saint Quentin.

Brought before the Constable, Cyriac was sharply questioned, but refused to disclose his errand, though threatened with the ladder.

Unluckily, however, the letter, which he had no opportunity of destroying, was found upon him; and this, though containing only a few words, satisfied the Constable that a negotiation was going on between Edward and the King of France.

On making this important discovery, he clapped the unhappy messenger in prison, and set himself to consider how the affair could be best turned to his own advantage. After much deliberation, he resolved to warn the Duke of Burgundy; but as the Duke was now with Edward, he could not, for the present, communicate with him.

Leaving this double-dealing personage to arrange his schemes, we will return to Compiègne, and see what had happened to Isidore. If the young esquire had been a noble of the highest rank, greater attention could not have been paid him than he received from the wily monarch.

Everything that could be devised in so dull a court as that of Louis, was done for his amusement. Various sports and diversions were provided for him, and he was taken by the King to hunt in the park and the forest; and Louis and the courtiers appeared delighted with his skill. On all occasions he was attended by Claude. Several entertainments were given by the King, at which he appeared as a distinguished guest.

One morning, Claude came into his chamber before he had risen, and laughing heartily, said,—

"What think you the King has sent?"

"Nay, I cannot guess," replied Isidore.

"Two splendid ladies' dresses," replied Claude; "one of cloth of velvet, evidently intended for you, and the other of figured satin, which, I suppose, must be meant for me."

"Let me look at them!" cried Isidore, springing from the couch, and putting on a loose robe.

Exclamations of wonder and delight followed, when the dresses were brought in by Claude, and after they had been sufficiently admired, Isidore was easily prevailed upon to try the effect of the velvet costume.

Not satisfied with a mere trial of the gown, Claude insisted that the whole dress should be put on; and when the toilette was completed, Isidore stepped into the adjoining saloon, where there was a large mirror, to see the effect of the transformation.

The change, indeed, was magical. The handsome esquire had become a most beautiful woman.

Isidore was still standing in front of the glass, attended by Claude, who was arranging the dress with all the nicety and skill of a female hand; when sounds of laughter warned them that other persons were present; and turning, they perceived the King.

Louis had entered without being announced, accompanied by the Sire de Comines.

For a moment, he seemed lost in admiration of the lovely woman he beheld; while, on her part, Jane—for she it was—exhibited some little confusion at being thus discovered.

Claude, however, did not seem at all embarrassed, and, perhaps, might have been an agent in the plot.

"Pardon me, fair lady," said Louis, advancing. "I had all along suspected that the handsome young esquire sent to me by the King of England was no other than the lovely Mistress Shore, and I had, therefore, recourse to this stratagem to elicit the truth."

Having now recovered her composure, Jane made a graceful reverence to the King, and said, "Since the secret has been discovered, it would be idle to attempt to preserve my incognito; but I beseech your Majesty to believe that no disrespect has been intended to you by King Edward. He consented very reluctantly to send me."

"Pardieu-Dieu! I am right glad he did send you!" cried Louis. "No other envoy could have pleased me better, or served him so well. By Saint Denis!" he continued, gazing at her with increased admiration. "I marvel not that my good cousin has been enslaved by so much beauty. Such charms are more than mortal could resist—especially a mortal so inflammable as King Edward."

"I have always understood that King Louis never condescended to flatter," remarked Jane.

"Truth sometimes sounds like flattery," rejoined Louis. "And in good sooth it would be impossible to flatter Mistress Shore. But come and sit by me, madame. I have something to say to you."

And he led her to a sofa, while the others retired to a short distance.

"Pray consider me an old friend, madame," he said, in a wheedling tone, "and speak to me as freely as you would to King Edward. I should like you to carry away an agreeable impression of your visit to Compiègne."

"I cannot fail to do that, sire, having experienced so much kindness from your Majesty."

"Poh! I have done nothing," said Louis; "nothing, at least, in comparison with what I will do. Say the word, and I will make you a countess."

"I have really no desire for rank, sire, or my wish would have been already gratified."

"It shall be no barren title," said Louis. "You shall have a large revenue."

"I have more money than I need, sire," she rejoined.

"Comment! diantre!" exclaimed Louis, in surprise. "You are the first of your sex I have met with who has refused honours and wealth."

"Friendship is not to be bought, sire," she remarked.

"How, then, can yours be won?" he cried, regarding her fixedly. "Are you willing to exchange the Court of England for that of France?"

"No, sire," she replied, firmly. "I will never quit King Edward."

A strange smile played upon Louis's cynical features, as he observed,—

"Your King is reputed to be inconstant."

"All men are inconstant, sire," she rejoined.

"I do not expect a paragon. But King Edward is the best of men."

"No one can esteem all his noble qualities more highly than myself," said Louis. "But he has many advisers who are inclined to me, and I should like, therefore, to have a friend near him."

"I will gladly serve your Majesty, if I can do so without prejudice to King Edward's interests."

"That is all I can ask," said Louis. "Come point was touched upon in our previous discussion," he added, in a far more serious tone than he had hitherto assumed; "but I am sure I shall have all the aid you can render in the matter. There is an illustrious prisoner in the Tower of London, whose liberation I would fain accomplish. 'Twould be treason to aid her escape; but I am sure you feel pity for her."

"You allude to Margaret of Anjou, sire. My sympathies are with the house of York; but I do pity the unfortunate Queen from the bottom of my heart. Could I open her prison door, she should be free at once. These may be treasonable sentiments, but I have uttered them to King Edward, and he has not reproved me. You misjudge him, sire, if you suppose he is insensible to the sorrows of that bereaved wife and mother."

"Nevertheless, he will not set her free without a heavy ransom," said Louis. "That ransom I am prepared to pay. The unhappy Queen's father, the good King René, is willing to make a sacrifice of part of Provence, to procure his daughter's liberation from captivity. I will advance the money, and if King Edward's demands are not too exorbitant, Queen Margaret will be set free."

"What sum are you willing to pay for the Queen's liberation, sire?" asked Jane.

"Fifty thousand crowns," replied Louis. "The offer is from King René, not from me."

"If I have any influence with King Edward, no greater demand shall be made," said Jane.

"I place the matter in your hands," said Louis. "It may be that the poor widowed Queen may owe her liberty to you."

"Ah! if I could only hope so!" exclaimed Jane.

"'Tis somewhat strange that no answer has been received from King Edward," observed Louis. "Our messenger, I trust, has not fallen into the hands of the Duke of Burgundy, or been detained by the Constable Saint-Pol. My provost-marshal, Tristan, shall take a small troop of horse to Noyon to make inquiries about him. To-morrow, or next day, I shall go to Amiens, and I must pray you, fair lady, to bear me company, unless we hear from King Edward in the interim. Of course, you can resume your disguise, if you think proper."

"I thank your Majesty," she replied. "It is not my intention to abandon it until I have done with camps, and return to England. Had I not adopted that costume, I could not have accompanied King Edward."

"And if you had been left behind, I should have been the greatest loser, since I should not have had the pleasure of receiving the favour of her sex at Compiègne."

As he spoke, he raised her hand to his lips, with an air of gallantry, and quitted the saloon.

As soon as they were gone, then Jane's attendant, who, it is scarcely necessary to explain, was no other than Alix, habited as a page, began to laugh very heartily.

"I would not desire a more diverting sight than I have just witnessed," she said. "I am certain you have captivated King René. A truce will be impossible if things go on thus. King Edward will have to continue the war to get you back again."

Jane tried to look grave, but failed. "Come and help me to change my dress," she said. "I have become so accustomed to the ease and freedom of male attire, that I cannot bear a gown."

XI.

HOW LOUIS XL HUNTED THE WILD BOAR IN THE FOREST OF COMPIÈGNE.

HALF AN HOUR afterwards, Jane reappeared as the young esquire Isidore, and, followed by the supposed page, Claude, descended to the court-yard of the palace.

They were just in time to see the redoubted provost-marshal start on his expedition. A terrible personage was Tristan l'Hermite. Not a trace of feeling could be discerned in his inflexible countenance. No smile ever parted his thin, tightly-compressed lips.

Armed in a coat of mail, over which he wore a surcoat with large loose sleeves, Tristan had a huge two-handed sword attached to his girdle. Ordinarily, he was attended by a couple of ill-favoured varlets, provided with halbers; nor were they absent on the present occasion, as their aid might be needed.

The provost-marshal had brought his horse close up to the King, who was stationed on a flight of steps. Having received his instructions, Tristan bent respectfully and departed, accompanied by a small detachment of archers, among whom were the two executioners before-mentioned.

As soon as he was gone, Louis called for horses and hounds, and noticing the young esquire amid the assemblage of courtiers, invited him to join the chase, telling him the day's sport would commence with a boar hunt. Isidore could not have refused; but, in sooth, he was very curious to see the royal pastime promised him.

Shortly afterwards, a large party of nobles and gentlemen, all well mounted and armed for the boar hunt, set forth from the palace, headed by the King.

In preparation for the boar hunt, Louis was accoutred in doublet and hose of coars gray cloth, fitting close to the limbs.

A short two-edged sword hung from his girdle, and, like all his attendants, he was furnished with a sharp boar-spear. A boar-spear was likewise given to Isidore, but the King laughingly told him he would not have to use it.

In close attendance upon the King were three hunters, each of whom had in slip a couple of large and powerful hounds, having leather caps fastened round the body, to protect them from the boar's tusks—a very inadequate defence, as it turned out.

Thus attended, and taking care Isidore should not be far from him, Louis rode into the depths of the forest.

The spot where the boar was lodged was marked by strong nets, hung from trees to tree. These toils served to imprison the savage beast in his lair; and while they were being removed, Louis counselled the young esquire to take up a position near some distant bushes, which he pointed out, so that he could witness the sport without much risk.

Soon afterwards, the boar was unconched, and proved to be an animal of the largest size, and armed with tremendous tusks. Stalking forth very deliberately into the open space where the King and the nobles were grouped, he eyed the assemblage menacingly, and seemed singling out some one to attack.

A couple of hounds were now let slip, and, cheered by the huntsmen, they assailed the boar fiercely, striving to seize him by the head. But both were speedily shaken off. Despite his leathern coat, one was ripped up by the boar's merciless tusks, and the other disabled.

Having thus liberated himself from his assailants, the chafed animal turned upon the huntsmen nearest him, feined at them with his tusks, broke their spears, and put them to flight.

Delighted with the proofs thus afforded of the formidable brute's prodigious strength, Louis ordered the four remaining hounds to be unleashed, and cheered them on himself to the attack.

The conflict seemed unequal, but the boar comported himself well, and gained the applause of all the hunt, especially of the King, who was enraptured by his prowess.

At first, the advantage seemed with the hounds, but, ere long, two were laid sprawling on the ground, and the others were so much hurt that they could not hold the boar, who dashed off towards the bushes near which Isidore and his companion were posted.

Claude instantly galloped off, for it was clear that the infuriated beast meant to attack them; but Isidore displayed no alarm. Dexterously avoiding the boar's onslaught, he struck the fierce brute with his spear, but could not pierce his tough and bristly hide; and this manoeuvre was successfully repeated, until the King had time to come up with his attendants.

Seeing the young esquire's peril, Louis drew his sword, and, by a downward stroke, hamstringed the boar, causing the animal to sink on his haunches. Next moment, Isidore's spear, plunged under the shoulder, pierced the boar's heart.

"By Saint Hubert! a great feat!" cried Louis. "You have slain the fiercest and largest boar in the forest."

"But for your Majesty's aid, the boar would have slain me," rejoined Isidore.

"and then I should have borne the blame of the mischance," said the King, "though I cautioned you to keep out of the way of danger. However, you have displayed great courage.

The boar's head shall be yours, and you can send it to King Edward if you choose."

"His Majesty would be astonished if he received such a present from me, sire," replied Isidore.

"Pardieu-dieu! we must not alarm him!" cried Louis; "nor shall you run any further risk. We will pursue a safer sport, in which you excel."

After this, no fewer than seven noble stags were slain, his Majesty being always foremost in the chase. Nor was Isidore far behind. The young esquire rode so well, that he attracted general attention, and received warm commendation from Louis himself. The last stag roused led them to the furthest extremity of the forest, where he was slaughtered by the King's own hand; and the party were riding slowly back, when they suddenly came upon an extraordinary scene.

XII.

HOW ISIDORE SAVED A CORDELLIER FROM THE CORD.

In the centre of an open space, at the north side of the forest, grew an immense oak, with wide-spreading arms.

Underneath this mighty tree were stationed Tristan l'Hermite and his archers; and at the very moment when the royal hunting-party approached the solitary spot, the provost-marshal was superintending the execution of certain prisoners he had taken.

Already three unhappy wretches, just strung up, were dangling overhead from the branches of the oak.

A fourth prisoner was kneeling upon the ground, with his hands clasped in prayer, awaiting a like fate. He was a cordelier, and his hood was thrown back, so as to display his features, which now wore the livid hue of death.

Near him stood the two caitiffs, watching for a sign from their leader to tie him to the fatal tree.

On beholding this scene, Louis pressed forward, not with any intention of staying the execution, but because he felt curious to know what offence the wretched culprits had committed.

Tristan, however, thought it best to get the job done, and talk afterwards. Accordingly, he gave the word to his assistants, and in another moment all would have been over with the unfortunate cordelier, if Isidore had not come to his rescue.

The young esquire, who was close behind the King, had recognised the features of the kneeling monk. The face was too well known ever to be forgotten. The recognition was mutual. But it was not a vindictive look that the cordelier fixed upon the esquire, nor was it supplicatory. It was rather a look of scorn.

But, be it what it might, it checked Isidore to the quick; and he addressed to the King, "Sire, you have promised me a boon. I now ask one from your Majesty. Spare me the life of that man."

Tristan heard the request, and glanced significantly at his royal master, to intimate that the prisoner ought not to be spared.

"What has he done?" demanded Louis.

"Sire, he is a spy employed by the Duke of Burgundy," replied Tristan.

"Impossible!" cried Isidore. "I know him. He is an Englishman."

"He was taken with those men, who are Burgundians," said Tristan, doggedly, determined not to relinquish his prey.

"I believe him to be a messenger from the King of England," said Isidore, earnestly.

"It is true," said the cordelier. "I so represented myself, but my assertion was not credited."

"I had no proof of what the man stated, sire," remarked Tristan, gruffly.

"Because my safe-conduct and letter of credence had been taken from me by the Burgundians," cried the cordelier.

"If this monk be executed, King Edward will most assuredly require a strict account of his death," said Isidore. "An untoward occurrence at this juncture might be fraught with serious consequences."

"Since you take a personal interest in the prisoner, it is sufficient," said Louis. "Release him," he added, to Tristan.

Thereupon, the cordelier was instantly set free, and prostrating himself before the King, thanked him for his gracious interposition in his behalf.

"Rise, father," cried Louis. "You have had a narrow escape. You should address your thanks to this young esquire, not to me. 'Tis to him you owe your life."

The cordelier bent his head, but spoke no word.

"Draw nearer," said Louis. "If thou hast any message to me from the King of England, deliver it."

"I have no message, sire," replied the monk. "His Majesty had become anxious for the safety of his envoy, and sent me to ascertain that all was well with him. I met with misadventures on the way; as you are aware, being captured by those Burgundian soldiers, and re-captured by your provost-marshal, who refused to listen to my explanation. All would have been over with me had not your Majesty appeared so opportunely, and saved me; and I again thank you for my life, though it is scarcely worth preserving. My errand is fulfilled. I can now report to my royal master that I have seen his envoy, and that he is well."

"Thou shalt have something more to report," said Louis. "But do I understand thee aright? Hath not Cyriac, the archer, arrived?" He was despatched thence some days ago, with a missive to King Edward."

"No messenger had arrived, sire, when I departed; and King Edward, as I have said, had become uneasy. Cyriac, I doubt not, has been captured, for I learnt from the Burgundian soldiers that an English archer was in the hands of the Constable Saint Pol."

"Ha!" exclaimed Louis, angrily. "By Saint Denis! the Constable shall regret his interference. But you must get back quickly, and allay your royal master's fears respecting his envoy. Where is King Edward now?"

"Encamped near Peronne," replied the monk.

"Faster than! So near?" exclaimed Louis. "Then 'tis time we were at Amiens. Since my provost-marshal hath brought thee here, he shall escort thee back. Thou hearest, Tristan," he added, to that important officer.

Find a horse instantly for this good friar, and conduct him as nigh as thou canst to Peronne."

I will bring him within a league of the town," said the provost-marshal. "He must do the rest himself."

Give him whatever gold thou hast about thee," pursued Louis.

Tristan slightly murmured at this injunction, and the cordelier hastened to say that he desired no reward.

"Stay a moment," cried Louis, as if an idea had suddenly crossed him.

Then, turning to Isidore, he said, "I am very unwilling to part with you, but if you desire to return with this friar I will not hinder you."

"I thank your Majesty," replied the young esquire; "but as I may have more to do, I will avail myself of your gracious invitation, and prolong my stay for a few days. Tell the King," he added, to the cordelier, "that I am not a prisoner, but a highly-honoured guest of the King of France. Say that I have accomplished all I undertook. Say, further, that I could have returned with thee had I been so minded, but for many reasons, which his Majesty will understand, I deemed it best to remain here."

"I will repeat all that has been told me," rejoined the monk.

"Acquaint King Edward that to-morrow we proceed to Amiens," said Louis. "If his Majesty desires, to treat with me, and three days hence will send commissioners to the village of Corbie, near that town, I will send other commissioners to confer with them. You understand?"

"Perfectly, sire," replied the monk. "I will not fail to deliver your message."

While this was passing, Isidore gazed earnestly at the cordelier, but the latter sedulously avoided meeting his glance. Nor did he look at the young esquire as he withdrew.

Louis then rode on with his attendants to the Palace, while Tristan, in obedience to his Majesty's behests, escorted the friar on the road towards Peronne.

Late in the evening the cordelier arrived at the English camp, and was immediately taken to the royal tent. Edward was overjoyed to learn that Isidore was in safety, and was well satisfied with the message sent him by the French King.

Next day, as appointed, Louis set out for Amiens, taking Isidore with him. He was accompanied by a large retinue of nobles and knights, and guarded by five hundred men-at-arms. The inhabitants of the town received him with every demonstration of delight. The church bells were rung, and cannon discharged from the walls.

The King first proceeded to the cathedral, where mass was celebrated, and the vast building being crowded on the occasion, presented a magnificent sight.

Louis fixed his quarters in the Chateau de Saint Remi, where his large retinue could be accommodated. Apartments in the chateau were, of course, assigned to Isidore and his attendant, Claude; and if the young esquire had been a prince, greater consideration could not have been shown him.

As the time approached when the terms of the peace he so ardently desired were to be settled, Louis redoubled his attentions to the English King's favourite, being still apprehensive of some miscarriage.

But all seemed to be going on smoothly, and a message was received from Edward stating that he agreed to the proposed meeting at Corbie, and would send his commissioners thither on the appointed day.

The commissioners appointed by the English King were the Lord Howard, subsequently created Duke of Norfolk; Sir Thomas Saint Leger, one of the King's body-guard; Dr. Morton, Bishop of Ely, who subsequently became Lord Chancellor and Archbishop of Canterbury; and Dr. Dudley, Dean of the Royal Chapel.

The commissioners chosen by Louis were Jean de Bourbon, Admiral of France, the Seigneur de Saint Pierre, and the Bishop of Evreux.

All difficulties seemed to have been removed, but still the suspicious King of France continued uneasy. He feared, and not without reason as it turned out, that the Duke of Burgundy would make a determined effort to break off the treaty. To guard against this eventuality, which might have destroyed all his plans, he induced Isidore to write a letter, to the King of England calculated to produce the desired effect.

XIII.

BY WHOSE CONTRIVANCE ISIDORE OVERHEARD WHAT PASSED BETWEEN LOUIS AND THE ENVOYS OF THE DUKE OF BURGUNDY AND THE CONSTABLE OF SAINT POL.

At this critical juncture, the Duke of Burgundy was at Valenciennes, and he, having received some intelligence that secret negotiations were going on between the two kings, he immediately despatched his chief councillor, the Sire de Coutai, to Louis, to make such terms with the King as he might deem advisable. At the same time, the Constable, Saint Pol sent the Sire de Sainville on an errand of a like nature.

Both ambassadors arrived at Amiens about the same time, but were not allowed to meet.

Anxious that Edward should know what dependence could be placed upon his allies, Louis devised a plan by which Isidore might overhear what passed at the audience.

In the reception-chamber was a large screen, behind which the Sire de Comines and the young esquire were concealed, while Louis sat down upon a fauteuil in front.

As soon as all was arranged, the Sire de Coutai was introduced, and immediately announced the Duke's willingness to enter into a separate treaty with the King, if terms could be agreed upon.

"What terms does the Duke require?" demanded Louis.

"Eu and St. Valery, sire," replied De Coutai.

"I will rather burn them to the ground than give them to him," replied Louis. "Tell the Duke, your master, that I am about to conclude a peace with the King of England, and if I gave those towns to any one, it would be to him, whom I have found loyal and honourable."

"I knew not that the treaty was so far advanced, sire," remarked De Coutai. "Methinks the Duke, my master, ought to have been informed of it."

"Wherefore?" demanded Louis, sternly.

The Duke of Burgundy has deceived his royal brother-in-law, and the King of England will no longer trust him. The English nobles and knights are boiling with rage at the tricks played them. Every treaty I have made with the Duke has been shamefully violated, and, by Saint Denis! I will not make another treaty with him, unless he chooses to cede to me a part of his possessions."

"That he will never do, sire!" said De Sainville.

And with a profound reverence to the King, he retired.

At a summons from Louis, De Comines and Isidore came from their place of concealment.

"Now what think you of the Duke of Burgundy?" said Louis to the young esquire.

"Unless I had overheard what has passed, I could not have believed in his duplicity and ill faith, sire," replied Isidore. "King Edward will never trust him more."

"King Edward is unlucky in his allies," remarked Louis, drily. "You will find that the Duke is more than matched by the Constable Saint Pol. But you must back again to your hiding-place, for here comes the Constable's envoy."

As De Comines and Isidore slipped behind the screen, the Sire de Sainville was introduced by the usher, and was very graciously received by the King.

"My Lord the Constable desires me to offer your Majesty the assurance of his entire devotion," said De Sainville. "He will act in any way you may command him. From the first, he has energetically combated with the Duke of Burgundy against his alliance with England, and has endeavored to induce him to break it off. At last his representations have been successful."

"And for this good service I am indebted to the Constable?" remarked Louis.

"Entirely so, sire," remarked De Sainville.

"I know not what he said to the Duke; but I never saw his Grace in such a furious passion. Very little would have induced him to fall upon the English, and plunder them. He was especially enraged against his brother-in-law, the King of England, and spoke of him in no measured terms."

"Aha! what did he say? How looked he when he spoke?" demanded Louis.

"He looked half-frenzied, sire," replied De Sainville. "His gestures were as violent as his words. He stamped furiously on the ground thus," suiting the action to the word, "and smote the table with his gauntleted hand. This was the manner of his speech," continued De Sainville, trying to give an imitation of the tremendous voice: "By Saint George, this King of England has no royal blood in his veins. He is the son of Blagbourn, the handsome archer, who took the fancy of the Duchess of York. Fiends take him for a vile ingrate! When he fled from the Earl of Warwick, who made him a King, and then dethroned him, he came to me without a denier, and I gave him money, ships, and men, and enabled him to regain his kingdom, and now he abandons me! But, by my father's head! he shall regret it."

"Ha! ha!" laughed Louis. "Said he aught more?"

"Much, sire," replied De Sainville. And again mimicking the Duke's voice, he said, "This luxurious King has come here as if to a festival. He has brought with him a pack of fat citizens, who think only of feasting and carousing. In addition to these boon companions, he has brought with him his favourite, the fair Mistress Shore."

"Hold there!" cried Louis. "I will hear nought against Mistress Shore. She is accounted the handsomest woman in London. Nor can we match her in Paris. Pâques-dieu! King Edward did well to bring her. Had I been in his place, I would not have left her behind. Truly, the Duke must be mad to talk thus! But nath his choler abated?"

"N & a-whit, sire. He is still infuriated as ever against King Edward."

"And King Edward is justly indignant against him, so there is little chance of their reconciliation," remarked Louis. "I thank my good brother, the Constable, for the assurances he has given me of his attachment, but I cannot entertain any proposition from him for the present. I will send a messenger to him when I have aught to communicate."

With this, he dismissed De Sainville, who felt he had gained nothing, and that the wily King had been merely trifling with him.

As soon as the envoy was gone, De Comines said to himself again came forth.

"There is not much to choose between the Duke and the Constable, you perceive," observed Louis, laughing.

"Know not which is worst," said Louis. "Better have an enemy like your Majesty, than such treacherous allies as these."

"That is precisely what I said," rejoined Louis.

I am impatient to recount what I have just heard to King Edward," cried the squire. "Shall I set out to the English camp at once?"

"No—defer your departure till the preliminaries of peace are settled," remarked Louis. "Should you be taken by the Duke of Burgundy or the Constable, a heavy ransom would be demanded for you. But even if there were no danger, I own I should be sorry to part with you."

"If I prolong my stay the King may grow impatient—"

"Write and reassure him. With such a hostage in my hands, I feel perfectly certain King Edward will perform his promises to me. He would be the first to laugh at me if I parted with you. So you must e'en tarry with me a little longer. I will do my best to amuse you."

Seeing it was useless to remonstrate, Isidore assented with a good grace, and withdrew.

De Comines was about to retire at the same time, but the King detained him.

"I have something for you to do," he said.

"I want a large sum of money—a very large sum. Cost what it may, we must get these English out of the country. We must refuse them nothing to get rid of them—nothing, except an acre of land, or a town. However short might be their stay, as in the time of the King, my father, the damage done would be enormous. Money must not be spared. The Chancellor must set out instantly for Paris, to raise the largest sum he can. Everybody must lend me money—everybody must aid me at this juncture. With money I can carry out my plans, and get rid of these accursed English, who have been brought here by that perfidious Charles the Bold, to serve his own purposes."

"Your Majesty need have no fear," said De Comines. "You will easily obtain all the money you require."

"Ay, but I must have it at once," cried the King. "If my coffers are replenished, they will soon be emptied again. Beside the sum to be paid to King Edward, I shall have to make large gifts to his brothers, the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester—to all his privy-councillors—to his grand Chamberlain, the Lord Hastings, who stands highest in his favour—to the Chancellor—to the Lord Howard—to Sir John Cheyne, the Master of the Horse—Sir Thomas Montgomery, and Sir Thomas Saint-Leger."

"Your Majesty must not omit the most important of all—the fair Mistress Shore," said De Comines.

"Hitherto, she has refused all I have offered her," said Louis; "but I have won her by fair speeches. It may be she will accept some gift at parting. We shall see. King Edward could not have served me better than to send his mistress here. I marvel not he is so much enamoured of her. Of a truth, she is very charming."

De Comines smiled.

"Your Majesty must not take her from him," he said, "or most assuredly the truce will be broken."

"I have no such thought," cried Louis. "I am all anxiety to get rid of Edward and his army. We must keep them all in good humour till they go. Rich presents shall be distributed among the King's retinue. I must entertain them all—entertain them royally. Those fat citizens, of whom I hear, must be feasted; and the common soldiers must have wine enough to drown them. All the taverns in Amiens shall be thrown open to them."

"A grand scheme, and I doubt not it will answer your Majesty's expectations," remarked De Comines.

"But to carry it out, I must have money," cried Louis—"a vast sum, as I have stated."

"I see the necessity, sire," said De Comines. "The money shall be procured."

"Then about it at once!" cried Louis. "Let the Chancellor and the chief financiers set out for Paris without delay, and bring back with them two hundred thousand crowns."

XIV.

HOW THE SIRE DE MERANCOURT BECAME ENAMOURED OF JANE, AND OF THE STRATAGEM BY WHICH HE OBTAINED ADMITTANCE TO HER CHAMBER.

By this time it had become generally known that the handsome young envoy from the King of England was no other than the beautiful Mistress Shors in disguise, and several young nobles of the Court sought to win her regard, but she would listen to none of them.

The Sire de Merancourt, a daring and profligate young noble, famed for his successes, had made sure of an easy conquest, and was especially mortified by the repulse he received, but he determined not to give up the pursuit.

"Shoshall be mine," he said to the Seigneurs de Brasseur and Briquabee, with whom he was conversing. "It would be an eternal disgrace to us if she were allowed to return to her royal lover. If he loses her, as he will, he will only have himself to blame. It would be a poor compliment to our French gallantry to suppose that we should not make ourselves agreeable to her. She affects to be cold, as if it were possible a fair creature, who has excited so strong a passion in King Edward's breast as to make him neglect his Queen, could be cold!"

"No, no!" cried Briquabee; "and I hold it impossible she can be faithful to such an inconstant lover as King Edward. She is afraid there are too many spies about the Court, and that any little affair in which she might be engaged would come to the ears of her royal lover."

"Our King keeps a jealous watch over her; that is certain," remarked De Brasseur; "One would almost think he was in love with her himself."

"Despite all difficulties, she shall be mine!" cried Merancourt. "I have never yet found the woman who could resist me, nor shall fair Mistress Shors. To-night I am resolved to see her alone; but I must have recourse to stratagem to obtain admittance to her chamber. To-morrow, you shall hear how I have been received."

They then separated.

On that evening, Jane was alone in her room with Alicia. She had resumed her female attire, but her attendant was still in the garb of a page.

Just as they were about to retire to rest, a tap was heard at the outer door; and when it was incautiously opened by Alice, a richly-attired young noble stepped in, and passing through the ante-chamber, shut the door, and fastened it inside, before Alice could follow him.

All this was the work of a moment. Then, rushing up to Jane, he fell on his knees before her, and, seizing her hand, pressed it passionately to his lips.

"At length I behold you in the dress of your own sex!" he cried, with well-feigned rapture; "and I must be permitted to express my admiration of your beauty! Perfectly as your disguise suits you, your own costume is infinitely more becoming!"

"Cease this strain, my lord," she cried, endeavouring, but vainly, to snatch away her hand. "I will not listen to it. Why have you come hither at this hour? Had I not supposed you brought a message from the King, you would not have been admitted to this chamber! I must pray you at once to retire."

"Pardon me if I venture to disobey you, fair lady," he cried, quitting his kneeling position, but still retaining her hand. "If I am guilty of any apparent disrespect towards you, you must attribute it to the passion that overmasters me. I love you to distraction, and would run any risk for you. You cannot be insensible to love like mine!"

"Your words produce no other effect on me save displeasure, my lord," replied Jane, coldly; "and I must again beg you to retire, unless you would seriously offend me."

"Hear what I have to say!" cried Merancourt; "and if you still reject my suit, I will obey you. You cannot hope long to retain King Edward's love. Even now, perchance, it is on the wane, since he is noted for his inconstancy. But my love for you will be lasting. To me you will not be a toy, to be thought of for moments of dalliance, but an object of deep affection."

"I will hear no more," cried Jane, interrupting him angrily. "Leave me instantly, I command you."

"What if I refuse to go?" rejoined Merancourt.

"Then I will summon assistance!" she cried.

"I have taken all needful precautions to prevent interruption. My servants are without in the gallery."

"Alice!" she exclaimed, in alarm.

"Your attendant is shut up in the ante-chamber," he rejoined. "No one can come to you. You are completely in my power."

"Not so!" cried Jane. "I can rouse the palace with my shrieks!"

"Be silent, madame, on your life!" he exclaimed, in a menacing voice, and grasping her arm so tightly that she could not stir from the spot.

At this juncture, when all seemed lost, unlooked-for assistance arrived.

A loud authoritative voice was heard in the ante-chamber, which instantly caught the quick ear of Merancourt.

"Confusion! 'Tis the King!" he exclaimed.

"The King! Then I am saved!" cried Jane.

And bursting from him, she flew to the door of the ante-chamber, and drew back the bolt.

Next moment, Louis entered the inner room, followed by Tristan l'Hermite.

"Tu-dieu!" ejaculated the King. "Are we interrupting an amatory tête-à-tête?" But as no immediate reply was given, he said, sharply, "What brings you here, Sire de Merancourt?"

"Since your Majesty demands an answer, I have only to say that I came here by this fair lady's invitation," replied De Merancourt.

"'Tis false, sire!" cried Jane; "and, till now, I did not believe a French noble would seek to shield himself by a base subterfuge. The Sire de Merancourt came here for a dishonourable purpose, and I have to thank your Majesty for my preservation."

"I cannot for a moment doubt what you tell me, madame," rejoined Louis. "Nor does the Sire de Merancourt, who has thus sullied his proud name, attempt to contradict you. You are under arrest, my lord," he added to the young noble. "To-morrow we will decide upon your punishment."

As Tristan advanced to fulfil the King's command, Merancourt stepped towards Jane, and said,—

"Before I go hence, I ask forgiveness from this fair lady. My sole excuse," he added, in a penitential tone, "is that her charms have driven me distraught."

"And I am willing to attribute your conduct to disordered reason, my lord," said Jane. "I would please me best, sire, if this matter were forgotten," she added to the King.

"Since such is your desire, madam, I will not oppose it," said Louis; "though I feel I am dealing far too leniently with the offender. The Sire de Merancourt may thank you for his escape. What I came here to say to you must be reserved till to-morrow. May your sleep be sound after this disturbance, and no ill dreams annoy you!"

So saying, he departed, with Tristan.

Merancourt fixed an imploring look at Jane, who averted her gaze from him, and, looking deeply, followed the King from the room.

XV.

OF THE TERRIBLE REPROACHES ADDRESSED BY CHARLES THE BOLD TO KING EDWARD.

MEANWHILE, the negotiation continued without interruption.

A conference took place at Corbie, as appointed, between the French and English commissioners, and the terms of the treaty having been definitively settled by them, it was agreed that the two monarchs should hold an interview at Picquigny, when they could mutually swear to the performance of the conditions.

Intelligence of this important arrangement having reached the Duke of Burgundy, who was then at Luxembourg, he set off at once with a retinue of only sixteen men, and on the evening of the same day arrived at the English camp.

Dismounting at the entrance of the royal pavilion, he burst abruptly into the King's presence.

Edward, who was conferring with the Lord Howard at the time, instantly arose on the Duke's entrance, but forbore to embrace him. For a few moments they stood gazing at each other.

"The Duke was the first to break silence."

"I would speak to you alone," he said.

At a sign from his royal master, Lord Howard instantly retired.

As soon as they were alone, the Duke advanced somewhat nearer to the King, and, regarding him fiercely, said,—

"Is it true you have made peace with Louis without consulting me?"

"Nothing can be more certain," replied Edward. "The negotiation was concluded two days ago, at Corbie, between the Admiral of France, the Lord of Saint Pierre, and the Bishop of Evroux, on the part of Louis, and the Lord Howard and three chief commissioners, on my part. I was about to send you word that the treaty was signed."

As Edward spoke thus calmly, the Duke made an effort to repress his wrath; but it now burst forth with perfect fury, and he stamped and foamed with wrath.

"Ha! by Saint George! by our Lady! by our Lord and Master!" he cried, dabbing in pieces a small table that stood near him. "You have signed your own dishonour! You consent, at the bidding of the wily Louis, to recross the sea without fighting a single battle—without even splashing a lance! Have you forgotten what was done by your valiant ancestor, King Edward the Third?—how, with much smaller force than yours, he invaded France, and gained the glorious battles of Crécy and Poitiers? Have you forgotten the great deeds of Henry the Fifth, whose race you have extinguished, and whose son you have murdered? With half the number of men you have brought with you, King Henry fought and conquered at Azincourt! Nor would he return till he was master of France. And you," he continued, in accents of the deepest scorn—"you, who boast of having won nine battles, now propose to depart, having done nothing, and won nothing! You allow yourself to be cajoled, and accept a worthless peace!"

After a momentary pause, he went on.

"Mistake me not. 'Tis the maintenance of your honour that brings me here. To me this ignominious truce matters nothing. Not for my own interest did I counsel you to invade France. I do not need your aid. Charles of Burgundy can defend himself against his foes, as his foes will find. Farewell, brother!"

And he turned to depart, but Edward called out to him.

"Stay, brother. I have listened to you patiently—too patiently, perchance—and, by heaven! you shall now listen to me."

"Say on, then," cried the Duke, sternly. "But think not to move me."

Edward then went on, the calm dignity of his deportment forming a marked contrast to the Duke's violence.

"Better than any one else, brother," he said, "you are acquainted with the motives of my voyage to this country, and if you choose to forget them, I must refresh your memory. Amiens and other towns had been taken from you by Louis, and despite all your efforts, you could not regain them."

"By Our Lady! I shall regain them, and without your aid," cried the Duke.

"But your design in bringing me here," pursued Edward, "was that I should hold Louis in check, and keep him from Flanders and Artois, while you made war on your own account on parts of Germany and Lorraine. To lure me over, you made abundance of fair promises, and declared I should win mountains of gold. You would wait for me, you said, in the Boulonnais, with a large army. Where are your knights, your men-at-arms, and your foot soldiers?—melted like snow in the sun. When you came to me in Calais, you had not even a page to attend you."

"I might have had a fair dame, disguised as an esquire, to accompany me, had I so chosen," observed the Duke, scornfully.

"An idle taunt," said Edward. "I came to France solely to aid you; but since, owing to your folly, you are unable to carry out your projects, I have nothing more to do here. Had I desired to fight for the honour of England, I should have acted very differently. Not requiring your help, I should have made the invasion at the time and place that best suited me; and ere I had been in France a week, several towns taken or burnt, and a multitude of enemies destroyed, would have shown that it was England's quarrel, and not Burgundy's, in which I was engaged."

"You talked otherwise, brother, when you sought my aid to regain your kingdom," observed Charles, in a tone of haughty reproach. "And I refused you, Henry VI., or his son, whom you have slain, would now be on the throne of England. For the last time I ask, are you resolved to make this disgraceful peace?"

"Firmly resolved; nor do I hold the peace to be disgraceful," rejoined Edward. "I shall sign the treaty, and, by Heaven's grace, I will keep it."

"Be it so," cried the Duke, furiously; "Louis has completely outwitted you. This stain upon your arms will dim the splendour of all your former exploits."

Thereupon, he quitted the pavilion, and, mounting his charger, rode off with his slender retinue.

Though highly incensed, Edward did not seek to stay him.

XVI.

SHOWING IN WHAT MANNER THE WHOLE ENGLISH ARMY WAS ENTERTAINED BY KING LOUIS AT AMIENS.

So delighted was Louis with the result of the negotiation, and so fearful lest some misunderstanding should arise before the treaty was concluded, that he spared nothing to keep the English in good humour.

Presents were bestowed with a lavish hand. Annual pensions were promised to Edward's privy-councillors, to the Lord Hastings two thousand crowns, to the Lord Chancellor a like sum, and one thousand crowns each to the Marquis of Dorset, the Lord Howard, and Sir John Cheyne. Numberless other presents were made, both jewels and money, by the open-handed French monarch; and as he had now raised a large loan in Paris, he cared not what sums he spent.

As a boon to the English soldiers, by whom we may be sure it was highly appreciated, he sent a hundred charrettes, laden with good wine, to the English camp, which, since the truce had been agreed upon, had been pitched on the banks of the Somme, within a league of Amiens.

Twenty waggons followed, laden with provisions, so that the whole army could make good cheer. This extraordinary liberality on the part of Louis produced the effect anticipated, and put all the men in good humour.

But the French King's hospitality did not end here. He caused it to be announced in the English camp that all knights and esquires, and all the chief men-at-arms, would be welcome at Amiens; that all the taverns in the town would be thrown open to them, and that they would everywhere be entertained free of cost. Special invitations were given to nobles and distinguished personages, and to the citizens of London.

At first, this invitation was laughed at as a jest, but those who rode from the camp to Amiens found it was seriously made. Four long tables had been placed at the north gate, furnished with all kinds of delicious viands, hams, tongues, dried fish, and a profusion of the best wines of Bordeaux.

The King's chamberlains, the Seigneur de Craon, Briquet, Bouchard, and others, presided over the tables, and when an English knight appeared, a groom went up to him, and bowing respectfully, led his horse to one of the chamberlains, who courteously besought him to alight, saying, "Come, and break a lance with us, fair sir!" A place was then found him at the table, and assiduous serving-men ministered to his wants.

As will be readily conjectured, the tables became so crowded that not a place could be found, and those who came late were sent on to the taverns, where they were hospitably entertained.

A goodly sight it was to see the English knights received thus courteously by their somewhat enemies, who now challenged them only with goblets of wine, and the French King's courtiers were infinitely amused by the scene.

But none of the English were so gratified by their reception as the citizens of London. For more than a week these self-indulgent personages had been restricted to poor fare, and had drunk but little wine. Dainties of all kinds were now set before them, with abundance of fine wines, and they feasted as joyously as if they had been at some great City banquet, and drank the health of their royal host in flowing cups. Louis had given orders that they should want nothing, and his injunctions were obeyed.

But as the festival went on, the courtesy of the chamberlains and the civility of the attendants were severely tried by their guests, who began to wax noisy and insolent, and quarrels were with difficulty averted.

If the knights were troublesome, it was still worse with the men-at-arms and archers, who now began to flock into the town in crowds, invaded the taverns and private houses, and drank to excess. Had the French been disposed to fall upon them when they were thus stupefied, they could easily have massacred them all. But Louis had no such design. The Sire de Torci, grand master of the cross-bowmen, complained to him of the disorderly conduct of the English soldiers, but the King commanded him not to interfere, dreading lest a quarrel should begin.

Next day, however, the influx of English soldiers into the town became so great that the guard grew alarmed, and the Sire de Comines deemed it necessary to warn the King, who was preparing to attend mass in the cathedral.

"Sire," said the councillor, "I am unwilling to interfere with your devotions; but the matter on which I have to speak to you is urgent. Something must be done, or mischief will infallibly ensue. More than nine thousand English soldiers are now in Amiens."

"Diable! Nine thousand!" exclaimed the King, amazed.

"Yes, sire, and they are all armed. Others are continually arriving, and none are stopped at the gate, for fear of giving them offence. I have your Majesty's consideration for your former, that has been carried a little too far."

"Péque-dieu! this must be stopped," cried Louis. "Mount at once. Ride to the English camp as quickly as you can, and see Lord Hastings, or Lord Howard, or some other English noble of sufficient authority to stop the invasion. If need be, see the King himself. Away with you. I will meet you on your return at the north gate."

As the Sire de Comines departed on his errand, Louis—who was not very seriously alarmed, for he thought the numbers had been greatly exaggerated by his councillor—proceeded to the Cathedral.

As he entered the sacred edifice, justly accounted one of the noblest structures in France, he found the whole interior thronged with English soldiers.

Though somewhat alarmed at first, he was quickly reassured by the quiet deportment of the men, who were looking upwards at the lofty roof; surveying the enormous pillars lining the aisles, peering into the numerous beautiful chapels, or gazing with wonder at the three magnificent rose windows adorning the transept.

Thus occupied, they did not even notice the King's entrance by a side door. When the solemn service commenced, they all knelt down, and at its close departed without making any disturbance.

Wishing to ascertain as far as he could by personal observation what was going on outside the town, Louis determined to mount the Cathedral tower, and though Tristan endeavoured to dissuade him, he persisted, and accomplished the ascent.

Two other persons were on the summit of the tower when he reached it with Tristan, and these proved to be Isidore and Claude.

"I did not expect to find you here," said Louis, as soon as he recovered sufficient breath to speak.

"I came here to look at the English camp, sire, since I am not allowed to go there," rejoined Isidore.

"Can you see it?" cried Louis.

"Distinctly, sire," was the reply. "I can point out the King's pavilion to your Majesty."

"Show it me," said Louis, advancing to the battlement.

About half a league off, in a broad plain, contiguous to the River Somme, and surrounded by fine trees, lay the English camp, presenting a vast array of tents, in front of which stood Edward's large cloth of gold pavilion, plainly distinguishable, as well for its superior size and splendour as from the royal standard floating above it. Close beside the pavilion a clump of spears was collected, and the sunbeams glittered brightly on their polished helms and armour.

Riding slowly along the central alley of the camp, attended by a score of knights, was a majestic personage, mounted on a richly-trapped charger. Isidore felt sure this must be the King, and Louis himself entertained the same opinion. The whole camp seemed astir, and various martial sounds, such as the beating of drums and the fanfares of trumpets, were distinctly audible, even at that distance.

But the attention of Louis was chiefly attracted by the number of men-at-arms marching from the camp to Amiens. Now and then, a knight, or a few mounted archers, rode in the same direction; but, generally speaking, the throng consisted of foot-soldiers.

From the lofty position he had taken up, a very good idea could be formed by Louis of the actual state of the town, and it was such as to cause him considerable uneasiness. Of course, the ramparts and gates were guarded by his own soldiers, as was the Château de Saint Remi, where a large body of troops were assembled, but all the public places seemed filled with English archers and men-at-arms, who far outnumbered the French.

"Grand Dieu!" exclaimed Louis, filled with consternation at the sight. "How are we to get rid of them?"

"Only let them drink enough, sir," rejoined Tristan, significantly, "and I warrant they shall not trouble your Majesty long."

"May the fiend take thee for the villainous suggestion!" said Louis, sharply. "No harm must be done them. They are my guests, and shall depart in safety."

"But they are quarrelsome, sire, and our soldiers will brook no insults," said Tristan.

"If a quarrel arises, our own soldiers will be in fault, because they will disobey my express injunctions," said Louis. "Therefore, punish them—not the English."

"I would these accursed Englishmen had never been allowed to enter the town!" grumbled Tristan. "I fear they will never return to their own quarters!"

"If your Majesty will allow me to go to the English camp, I am sure I can prevail upon King Edward to recall them," said Isidore.

"No, no; I do not desire to trouble the King," cried Louis. "Return to the Castle, and do not stir forth again unless I send for you."

Without another word, he descended from the tower, followed by Tristan, and immediately quitting the Cathedral, repaired to the north gate.

There he found several of his captains, and ordered each of them to assemble a hundred men secretly in his quarters, so as to be ready in case of emergency. Moreover, he directed that the guard at the Castle should be doubled—giving strict instructions that the slightest disposition to tumult should be everywhere repressed, but that the greatest forbearance should be shown towards the English.

These orders given, he proceeded to the long tables outside the gate, which were still crowded as before. All the guests arose on his appearance, and made the place resound with their shouts.

After pledging them in a cup of wine, Louis begged them to be seated, and turned his attention to the citizens of London, who had again found their way to the place of entertainment. They were charmed with the King's gracious manner, as were all whom he addressed, and matters were proceeding most satisfactorily, when the Sire de Comines returned from the English camp, bringing with him Lord Hastings, the Earl of Northumberland, and Lord Howard.

On seeing these nobles, Louis felt quite easy. He received them without ceremony, and invited them to a repast, which he had caused to be set out in the guard-chamber of the gate.

XVII.

HOW THE SIRE DE MERANCOURT AGAIN ATTEMPTED TO CARRY OUT HIS DESIGN, AND BY WHOM HE WAS SLAIN.

MEANWHILE, Isidore and Claude, in obedience to the King's commands, had quitted the tower of the Cathedral, and returned to their apartments in the Château de Saint Remi, where they remained till evening.

Isidore had heard of the arrival of the English nobles, and fully expected they would bring him some message from King Edward; but none came, and he did not attempt to conceal his disappointment.

"Methinks the King has forgotten me," he said. "He is content that I should remain as a hostage for him, and cares not to send me a word when an opportunity offers, though he knows how welcome a message would be. As to Lord Hastings and the others, their negligence is inexcusable. They ought to have waited upon me as soon as they had seen King Louis."

"But consider what they have to do!" said Claude. "It will be no easy matter, even for Lord Hastings, to get back these unruly soldiers, now they have broken loose. Be sure no disrespect is intended you. Your term of probation will soon be over. Two days hence, the truce will be signed, and then you will be at liberty once more."

"That will be delightful!" cried Isidore. "Oh, how glad I shall be to return to England! I am quite tired of France."

Thus they continued to converse, till it began to grow dark, and Isidore had given up hopes of seeing Lord Hastings, or any other English noble, when an attendant entered the room, having with him a page, who said that he was come to conduct the young esquire to the King.

"I will attend him at once," replied Isidore, joyfully. "Where is his Majesty?"

At the north gate of the town, replied the page. "There are several English nobles with him."

"You hear!" cried Isidore, to Claude. "They have not forgotten us."

"So it seems," replied Claude. "Shall I accompany you?"

Isidore assented, but the page said his orders were only to bring the young esquire; so Claude was, perforce, left behind.

Wholly unsuspecting of any ill design, Isidore quitted the chamber by a postern, and entered a public place, which was now filled with English soldiers, evidently fresh from the tavern.

To avoid these men, the page turned into a narrow thoroughfare, which appeared totally free from obstruction, though it did not seem to Isidore to lead in the direction of the north gate.

It was now growing dark; and as there were no lights in the houses, the streets they were tracking had a gloomy and deserted look, and offered a strong contrast to the noisy and crowded public place they had just quitted.

As they went on, Isidore noticed two persons about fifty yards in front, one of whom turned round ever and anon, as if to watch them.

Trifling as was this circumstance, it caused him some alarm; but his uneasiness was increased when he perceived they were followed by another individual, who appeared to regulate his pace by theirs, and kept at a certain distance behind them.

At the same time, Isidore began to suspect that the page was taking him in a wrong direction, and he questioned him on the point.

"Are you sure this street leads to the north gate?" he asked.

"Quite sure," replied the other. "I have brought you this way to avoid those drunken English soldiers."

Somewhat reassured by the answer, Isidore went on, until a gateway could be distinguished, communicating, no doubt, with some large mansion; and near this gateway the two persons, who had thus far preceded them, suddenly halted.

Isidore's misgivings now returned, and with redoubled force; and he would have retreated, if he had not perceived that the third individual was still behind.

He, therefore, endeavoured to pass on; but one of the persons who had inspired him with so much terror stopped him, and said, in accents that were instantly recognised as those of the Sire de Merancourt,—

"Will not the fair Mistress Shore deign to enter my house?"

"I know not what you mean," replied the supposed esquire; "but I cannot be hindered. My attendant will tell you that I on the way to the King."

"The King must wait for you, fair lady," said Merancourt. "The stratagem has succeeded perfectly, and has placed you in my hands. Enter, I beg of you."

"You will repeat your audacious design, my lord," rejoined Jane. "I will rather die than enter your house. Release me, I command you!"

"Do not compel me to use force, madame," said Merancourt. "You cannot escape me now. The gate is open, and will be closed as soon as you have passed through it. I will then defy King Edward—ay, even with our own King to aid him—to take you from me!"

"You will for ever stain your name, my lord, if you commit this infamous act!" cried Jane, struggling to free herself from him. "Help, help!"

"You call in vain," he rejoined. "No help will come."

"You are mistaken, villain!" cried a voice that thrilled through Jane's breast, and instantly dispelled her fears. "Defend yourself!"

Next moment, a knightly personage—it was the same individual who had followed her at a distance, and inspired her with distrust, like the others—came up, and attacked Merancourt, sword in hand.

Thus assailed, the libertine noble was compelled to relinquish his hold of Jane, who, however, did not take to flight, but awaited the issue of the conflict.

It was of brief duration.

Merancourt soon found he had a formidable antagonist to deal with. His sword was stricken from his grasp; while, at the same time, a tremendous downward blow from his adversary's weapon cut through his steel cap, and stretched him lifeless on the ground. Merancourt's attendant took no part in the combat, nor did he exhibit disposition to molest Jane.

Things remained in this state for a few moments, when the household, alarmed by the page, rushed forth with torches, and revealed a terrible scene.

Beside the body of the traitorous noble he had slain, stood the tall and majestic figure of a knight, clad in magnificent armour. He was leaning upon his sword, and the supposed esquire was clinging to his arm.

Not far off was Merancourt's pusillanimous attendant, who called upon the household to avenge their slaughtered lord, and they were preparing to make an attack upon the knight, when the sound of horses' footsteps was heard rapidly approaching, and, the next moment, a large party rode up to the spot.

At the head of the party was the French King in person, and with him were the Sire de Comines, Tristan, the Lord Hastings, and the other English nobles, who had come over from the camp. Louis was followed by some half-dozen grooms, and a small escort of mounted archers.

"Pâques-dieu!" he exclaimed, gazing at the scene. "De Merancourt slain!"

"Yes, sire; he deserved his fate," rejoined Jane. "I have been rescued, as you perceive, by this English knight."

"By Our Lady, he has done well!" exclaimed Louis; "although he has robbed my cousin, Tristan, of a fee. But how is your deliverer called?" he asked, gazing at the tall knight, who had now lowered his visor.

Before replying, Jane consulted the knight, and then said,—

"With your Majesty's permission, he desires to preserve his anonymity."

"As he will," rejoined Louis; "though I should have been glad to have a little talk with him. Perchance he does not know our language?"

"He speaks it perfectly, sire," replied Jane.

"Then let him ask me a boon, and, by Saint Louis, my ancestor, I will grant it!" replied the King.

"I take you at your word, sire," said the tall knight, stepping forward, and making a stately bow. "Tis plain, from what has just happened, that the charge of this fair lady must be a great trouble to your Majesty. Lest any further mischief should happen, I will ask you to allow me to conduct her in safety to King Edward."

"But I hold her as a hostage," cried Louis.

"Have no fear, sire," said the knight; "King Edward will perform his promise."

"You answer for him?" cried Louis.

"As for myself, sire," replied the knight.

"Then take her to him. By my faith, I shall not be sorry to be rid of the responsibility. Tell my good cousin, King Edward, that I have done my best to look after her, but, as he wots well, a precious jewel is more easily guarded than a fair woman. I would have hanged this daring traitor had he stolen the prize, but still the King might not have been altogether content."

"Tis better as it is, sire," replied the knight.

And, with another stately bow to the King, he sprang upon a charger brought him by a groom while the previous discourse took place.

At the same time Jane was provided with a palfrey by Claude, who, it appeared, was among the attendants of the English nobles.

"A word at parting," said Louis, signing to Jane, who came close up to him.

Lowering his voice to a whisper, he then added, "King Edward must be at Picquigny on the appointed day. Come with him."

"Rely on me, sire," she replied.

And, bending low, she joined the knight.

The English nobles then took leave of Louis with every mark of respect, and Lord Hastings assured his Majesty that he should experience no further annoyance from the soldiers who had so much abused his hospitality, and who should thenceforward be kept strictly within the camp.

As they turned to depart, Louis ordered De Comines to escort them to the north gate.

As soon as they were gone, he remarked to Tristan, with a singular smile, "Canst thou not guess the name and rank of that tall knight by whom De Merancourt has been slain?"

"No, sire," replied the provost-marshal; "but I conclude he is some one of importance, from the attention paid him by your Majesty."

"So far thou art right, gossip," rejoined Louis. "He is a person of the utmost importance—no other than the King of England."

The King of England!" exclaimed Tristan, in astonishment. "And your Majesty had him in your power, and allowed him to depart! Dieu! I could not have believed it."

XVIII.

HOW A WOODEN BRIDGE WAS BUILT ACROSS THE SOMME, AT PICQUIGNY, BY LOUIS, FOR HIS PROPOSED INTERVIEW WITH THE KING OF ENGLAND.

PICQUIGNY, the little village selected by Louis XI for his proposed interview with Edward IV, belonged to the Vidame of Amiens, and was distant about three leagues from that town.

It was situated upon the Somme, which, though not very wide at the point, was extremely deep—a circumstance to which Louis attached the utmost importance, as he did not desire that the English troops should be able to ford the river. On a high, rocky hill dominating the village, stood a large chateau, bearing a strong resemblance to Windsor Castle; but this fortress was now in ruins, having been partially destroyed by the Duke de Bourbon.

Having chosen the spot, after due consideration, Louis caused a wooden bridge to be constructed at Picquigny, according to his own plans. In the centre of the bridge, which, though merely intended for a temporary purpose, was solidly built, was a sort of latticed cabinet, or shed, divided in the midst by stout oaken bars, placed so close together, that only a man's arm could be thrust between them. Neither door nor wicket was allowed, consequently no one could pass through the barrier. By this means all danger of a sudden and treacherous attack was avoided.

Roofed with boards, the structure was sufficiently large to contain a dozen persons on either side. The bridge was protected by high rails, and was exceedingly narrow, so that those using it were almost compelled to proceed singly.

Only a small boat, with one oarsman, was to be allowed on the river during the meeting.

Louis had been led to take all these precautions from a terrible incident that had occurred at the meeting between his father, then Dauphin of France, and Duke John of Burgundy, on the bridge of Montreuil, and, as he justly alluded to this tragical occurrence, it may be proper to narrate it.

When Duke John of Burgundy advanced with a powerful army, to raise the siege of Rouen, it was agreed between him and the Dauphin, afterwards Charles VII, that they should hold a meeting at the bridge of Montreuil.

In the middle of the bridge a strong barrier was therefore erected, shut by a gate that could be bolted on either side. All the Duke's serving-men tried to dissuade him from the interview, telling him he would be betrayed, but their prayers and entreaties were of no avail.

THE MEETING OF EDWARD AND LOUIS. (See page 65.)

A Jew, belonging to his house, told him if he went he would never return. Nothing would deter him. Setting out with four hundred men-at-arms, he arrived at Montereau about two o'clock, and at once proceeding to the barrier with his attendants, found the Sire de Beauveau and Tanneguy's Duchâtel ready to receive him.

"Monsieur awaits you," said Tanneguy, bowing.

Having taken the oath, the Duke said, "You see that I and the Sire de Navailles are unarmed."

No sooner had he passed on, than Tanneguy urged De Navailles to follow.

The Dauphin was already in the wooden cabinet in the middle of the bridge, with his attendants. The Duke advanced, and, taking off his black velvet cap, bent the knee to the Prince, who immediately raised him.

Then Tanneguy shouted, "Kill! kill!" Whereupon the Dauphin's attendants struck down the Duke with their battle-axes and swords, and likewise slew the Sire de Navailles who attempted to defend his master.

A crowd of armed men then rushed on the bridge from the side of the town, and all the Burgundian knights were seized and made prisoners.

Such was the terrible occurrence that caused Louis to be so cautious in constructing the barrier at Picquigny.

Apparently, he had no desire to repeat his father's treacherous act, which had been attended by direful consequences, and he probably reflected that if Edward should be slain like the Duke of Burgundy, a large army, with skilful leaders, was close at hand to avenge his death.

But Louis was not altogether free from fear that some treachery might be practised against himself. No gate was therefore allowed in the middle of the bridge.

At length the day arrived appointed for the meeting of the two monarchs.

On the morning a circumstance occurred which, in that superstitious age, could not fail to be regarded as a favourable omen by the whole English army. A white dove alighted on Edward's pavilion, and remained there till the King set out for the interview.

The first, however, to arrive at Picquigny was King Louis, who was still fearful something might go wrong.

Attended by eight hundred picked men-at-arms, he had with him the Duke de Bourbon, and the Cardinal de Bourbon, Archbishop of Lyons, besides many other nobles and knights. His three favourites, Tristan l'Hermite, Olivier le Dain, and Jacques Coctier, were likewise in attendance upon him.

On this occasion, as a mark of special favour, or it may be from some other motive, Philippe de Comines was attired precisely like his Majesty, in a gown of black velvet, and wore round his neck the collar of Saint Michael.

All the arrangements were made in obedience to the King's commands. The bridge had been completed on the day before, and now formed the object to which all eyes were directed.

On one side floated the French oriflamme—on the other the royal standard of England. A dozen mounted arbalestriers guarded the left bank; while a like number of English archers were stationed at the opposite entrance.

The village of Picquigny, and the partly-demolished chateau, were occupied by the French men-at-arms, and it was clear that their position was the most advantageous, the bank on this side being high, and the road good, whereas the ground on the other side was flat and marshy, and the causeway extremely narrow.

Had treachery been intended, this approach would have been fraught with danger to Edward. But he had no distrust. Indeed, the sight of his army, drawn up in battle array at no great distance, was well calculated to reassure him.

That mighty host, with its knights clad in glittering mail, its lances, its archers, its men-at-arms, and its long train of artillery, presented a most imposing appearance, and increased the anxiety of Louis to get rid of such a strong hostile force. He watched Edward as he rode along the narrow and dangerous causeway, just described, and could not help admiring his goodly presence.

Splendidly attired in cloth of gold, with his girdle blazing with gems, the English monarch wore a black velvet cap, ornamented with a large fleur-de-lys of diamonds. Never did he look more regal than on this occasion; and his stately figure, handsome countenance, and majestic deportment not only excited the admiration of Louis, but of all who beheld him. He rode a magnificently-trapped war-horse, with housings covered with the royal cognizances.

Close behind him, and mounted on a palfrey, came a young esquire, whose slight, graceful figure was displayed to the greatest advantage in a doublet of white velvet, embroidered with silver, hose of white silk, and brodequins of crimson morocco. A cap of blue velvet, adorned with a white plume, covered his sunny locks.

The Duke of Clarence, who came next, was almost as superbly attired as his royal brother, but he could not for a moment be compared with him. Gloucester was absent, having declined to attend the meeting. Then came the Earl of Northumberland, the Marquis of Dorset, and the Lords Hastings and Howard, all four arrayed in blue cloth of gold, and well mounted.

Then followed the Bishop of Lincoln, at that time Chancellor of England. The Chancellor was attended by Sir John Cheyne and Sir Thomas Montgomerie.

A body-guard of a hundred lances, commanded by Sir Thomas Saint Leger, accompanied the King.

As Edward rode on by the side of the deep-flowing river, and gazed at the bridge on which the interview was to take place, some misgivings crossed him, and he began to think he had been outwitted by the wily French King. Was the treaty really as ignominious as it had been styled by the Duke of Burgundy? If so, it might yet be broken.

Agitated by these thoughts, he glanced at Isidore, who, reading what was passing in his breast, urged him by a look to go on.

On reaching the pavilion placed near the entrance of the bridge, Edward was greatly surprised to find there was not a French noble—not even a page—stationed there to receive him, but he soon understood that no one could cross the bridge.

Laughing at the unusual precautions taken by Louis, he waited till his retinue had assembled, and then alighting, stepped upon the bridge, closely followed by Isidore.

XIX.

IN WHOSE PRESENCE THE MEETING TOOK PLACE BETWEEN THE TWO MONARCHS, AND HOW THE TREATY AGREED UPON WAS SWORN TO BY THEM.

As Edward advanced at a slow and dignified pace, he could see Louis watching him from behind the barrier, like some wild animal peering through the bars of a cage.

On his part, however, the French King was greatly struck by the good looks of the English monarch, for he remarked to De Comines, "By my faith! our good cousin is very handsome."

"And note you not, sire, that the King has got Isidore with him?" rejoined the councillor.

"Ay; all will go well," said Louis.

With the French King were a dozen nobles—the most important among them being the Duke de Bourbon, and his brother, the Cardinal,—but they were almost hidden from view by the barrier.

Behind Edward came the Duke of Clarence, the Chancellor, the Earl of Northumberland, the Marquis of Dorset, Lord Hastings, and other nobles and knights.

On arriving within a few paces of Louis, whom he could now distinguish perfectly, with De Comines standing behind him in precisely similar attire, Edward removed his velvet cap, and made a profound reverence, almost bending his knee to the ground.

Louis returned the salutation with equal form, after which they both arose, and embraced each other as well as they could through the bars.

"You are right welcome, cousin," exclaimed the French King, in tones of the utmost cordiality, and with a look of perfect good-nature. "There is no one on earth whom I more desire to see than you. Heaven has praised that we met at last under such agreeable circumstances, and with such kindly feelings towards each other."

"I heartily reciprocate your Majesty's sentiments," replied Edward. "I am overjoyed to meet a monarch who has justly acquired a reputation for consummate genius and wisdom. Believe, I pray you, that it has been matter of the greatest regret to me whenever I have had a difference with your Majesty."

"Let all that be forgotten, cousin," said Louis, with great bonhomie. "We are good friends now, and I hope shall long continue so. I rejoice to see you, and all those with you—and not the least, the young esquire who has lately been my guest. But a truce to compliments! Let us to business."

"By all means, sire," replied Edward. "We are quite ready."

At a sign from him, the Chancellor advanced. He was in his ecclesiastical habits, and spoke as follows, in solemn and impressive accents—

"When two of the most powerful monarchs on earth meet together to settle a dispute—not by arms, but peaceably and reasonably—it is a joyful thing for themselves and for their people, but it is also highly pleasing to our blessed Lord, whose kingdom is of peace. It was said of old that in Picquigny a great peace would be concluded, and the prediction has now come to pass, and in a most remarkable manner. Moreover, another wonderful thing has happened. This very morn-a dove, white as silver, alighted on the tent of the King of England, and remained there for some time, in the sight of the whole army."

"Shewing that the peace is approved by Heaven," said Louis, bowing his head reverently; "since the dove is the emblem of peace. Did not the Holy Spirit, in the form of a dove, appear at the baptism of our Lord, who is the Prince of Peace. There cannot be a better omen."

After reciting a prayer, during which Louis knelt down devoutly, the Chancellor proceeded to read the conditions of the treaty.

This done, the most important part of the performance took place, and the incident excited great curiosity among the spectators.

Owing to the separation of the two monarchs by the barrier, some little difficulty was experienced in carrying out the ceremonial about to be described; but, at last, it was satisfactorily accomplished.

Each sovereign, placing one hand upon a missal, and the other on a portion of the true cross held towards him by the Chancellor, solemnly swore to observe and maintain the conditions of the treaty, which was to remain in force for seven years.

The guardians of the treaty, on the part of the King of England, were the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, the Chancellor, the Keeper of the Privy Seal, the Governor of the Cinque Ports, and the Lieutenant-Governor of Calais.

Those on the part of the King of France were the Sire de Beaucien, and Jean de Bourbon, Admiral of France. Next, the King of France engaged, not for himself alone, but for his successors, to pay to the King of England, annually, the sum of fifty thousand crowns, to be delivered at the Tower of London; promising, also, to contract for a loan with the bankers Medicis, of Florence.

A marriage was likewise agreed upon between the Dauphin and the Lady Elizabeth of England—Louis agreeing to pay to the Princess a pension of fifty thousand crowns.

On his part, Edward agreed to return to England with his whole army, as soon as he had received the sum of seventy-five thousand crowns, without taking or attacking any town on the way, and to leave as hostages the Lord Howard and Sir John Cheney—with one other person, to be named by the King of France.

A final stipulation was made by Louis for the liberation, on payment of a ransom of fifty thousand crowns, of Margaret of Anjou, then a prisoner in the Tower of London.

All being arranged, Louis, who was in high glee, said to Edward,—

"You must come and see us in Paris, cousin. I will fitte you as well as I can, and you will find there some of the fairest ladies in France, who will be delighted to see a monarch so renowned for good looks and gallantry."

"Your Majesty tempts me very strongly," replied Edward. "Having heard so much of the Parisian dames, I would fain ascertain whether they are as charming as represented."

"Report scarcely does them justice, as you will find, cousin," said Louis, still laughing.

"Nay, then; I must needs accept your Majesty's invitation," cried Edward. "Before I return, I will spend a month with you at the Louvre."

Louis seemed rather disconcerted. A month was much more than he had calculated upon. But Isidore came to his assistance.

"What will become of the army while your Majesty is enjoying yourself at Paris for a month?" remarked the page.

"Bah! the army can remain at Calais," replied Edward, carelessly.

"That will scarcely suit his Majesty of France, methinks," said Isidore. "Besides, it will infringe the main condition of the treaty."

"You are right," cried Louis, hastily. "In my desire to entertain my good cousin, I had overlooked this difficulty. I fear I must defer the pleasure of seeing your Majesty to another occasion," he added, to Edward.

"But the chances are I shall not be in France again," said Edward. "If I neglect this opportunity, I may never see your beautiful city."

"Oh, your Majesty will be sure to come over when the Lady Elizabeth is married to the Dauphin," said Isidore.

"Certainly," replied Louis. "I shall expect you then, cousin, and will prepare some magnificent fêtes for you."

"But the fair dames will have grown old by that time," said Edward.

"Others, equally fair, will have succeeded them," rejoined Louis. "And now a word, cousin. As you are aware, I have stipulated for a third hostage. My choice falls on this young esquire. He shall go with me to Amiens, but I will send him back before you embark at Calais."

"Are you content with the arrangement?" said Edward to the esquire.

"Perfectly," was the reply. "I have experienced too much kindness from his Majesty to entertain a doubt that he will take good care of me."

"Then be it so," said Edward. "If you fail to come to Calais, I shall return to fetch you," he added, with a laugh.

At the King of England's request, De Comines was then presented to him by Louis.

Edward received him very graciously, and shook hands with him through the barrier.

"'Tis not the first time I have met the Sire de Comines," he said. "I saw him in Flanders, and was much beholden to him for the trouble he took to do me a service at the time of the revolts of the Earl of Warwick. I hope to have an early opportunity of proving my gratitude. Should he visit our Court, he will be right welcome."

De Comines bowed, and some other presentations took place; after which the nobles on either side retired, and the monarchs continued their conference.

They spoke of the Duke of Burgundy, and Edward described his last interview with the Duke, and mentioned that he had refused to become a party to the treaty.

"What shall we do, cousin, if he persists in his refusal?" asked Louis.

"Possibly he may change his tone," said Edward. "But if he continues obstinate, your Majesty must deal with him as you think fit. He will have no further aid from me."

"And what of the Duke of Bretagne?" asked Louis. "Shall I make war upon him, if he holds aloof?"

"Never with my consent, sire," rejoined Edward, somewhat sternly. "Should he be attacked, I shall be constrained to assist him with all my power. The Duke of Bretagne has proved a good and faithful ally, and in my necessities I have never found so true a friend. Therefore, I am bound to stand by him, and by Saint George, I will do so!"

A cynical smile lighted up the French King's countenance.

"I do not wonder your Majesty should feel grateful to the Duke of Bretagne," he said, in a sarcastic tone, "when I recollect that the Duke holds in his hands the last representative of the House of Lancaster, and the sole aspirant to the crown of England. As long as Henry, Earl of Richmond, is in safe keeping, your Majesty has nothing to fear."

Edward made no reply to this observation, and Louis went on.

"There is only one person left about whom it is needful to speak," he said. "You will guess that I allude to the Constable Saint Pol. I scarcely think you will interpose in his behalf."

"Act as you will in regard to the traitor, sire," cried Edward, almost fiercely. "He has proved false to both of us, and deserves death."

"My determination is to bring him to the scaffold," said Louis; "but I am glad your Majesty approves the design."

With this, the conference ended.

After some further mutual expressions of regard, the sincerity of which may well be doubted, the two monarchs again embraced each other through the barrier, and separated.

XX.

HOW IT WAS SAID AT THE FRENCH COURT THAT SIX HUNDRED CASKS OF WINE AND A PENSION SENT KING EDWARD BACK TO ENGLAND.

BEFORE Edward quitted Picquigny, the Lord Howard, Sir John Cheney, and Isidore, who were to remain as hostages with the King of France, were sent across the river in the boat we have alluded to, and accompanied Louis to Amiens.

Apartments were assigned them in the Château de Saint Remi, and Isidore returned to his former lodgings.

In the evening Louis sent for him, and said,—

"I know you do not like to be separated from the King your master. You shall return to him to-morrow. I have only brought you here to have a little conversation with you, and make you some presents.

"I have already told your Majesty that I do not desire any presents," replied Isidore.

"But I shall be highly offended if you refuse this necklace," he added, opening a case, and displaying a magnificent collar of glittering diamonds.

"I should be sorry to offend your Majesty," replied Isidore, unable to resist the splendid gift.

"And I must also insist upon your acceptance of twelve thousand crowns. Nay, you need not hesitate. None of his Majesty's attendants are so scrupulous."

"But I suppose you expect me to do something for the money, sire?" observed Isidore, with an arch smile.

"I wish you to entertain a pleasant remembrance of the meeting at Picquigny," said Louis; "and to keep me in the King's good opinion."

"That will be very easy to do, sire."

"I am not so sure. I have many enemies. I desire to stand well with my good cousin. May I count on your good offices with him?"

"Entirely, sire."

"I was foolish enough to invite him to Paris," pursued Louis. "I did not foresee the consequences of the visit. But it is quite plain that the attractions of the place might detain him longer than would be desirable. You yourself might be supplanted in his favour."

"I will take care he does not go to Paris, sire," rejoined Isidore.

"Enough," cried Louis. "To-morrow you shall be escorted to the English camp." Always feel certain I am your friend. If there is any favour I can grant, hesitate not to ask it. Adieu!"

Next day, the Duke of Gloucester, who had declined to be present at the meeting at Picquigny, came to Amiens, and was exceedingly well entertained by Louis, who presented him with some magnificent silver vessels and plate, together with two richly caparisoned steeds. Rich gifts were likewise bestowed on the Duke of Clarence.

So extraordinarily lavish was Louis, that not a single English noble visited him, but he received a present of some kind. The large sums of money promised to the Lord Hastings, the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Dorset, and others, were punctually paid. Nothing was omitted.

Isidore was escorted to the English camp by the Sire de Comines, who took with him seventy-five thousand pounds for the King.

Having received this amount, Edward forthwith raised his camp, and marched back to Calais, where he rested for a few days, and then, greatly to the satisfaction of the wily Louis, embarked with his whole army, and arrived safely at Dover.

BOOK III.

• THE DUKE OF CLARENCE.

I.

HOW ISIDORE INFORMED MARGARET OF ANJOU THAT HER CAPTIVITY WAS AT END, AND HOW THE ANNOUNCEMENT WAS RECEIVED.

In a gloomy chamber, in the upper story of a fortification situated in the north-east angle of the ancient wall surrounding the inner ward of the Tower of London, sat a majestic dame.

The chamber was almost circular in form, and in the stone walls, which were of enormous thickness, were three deep recesses, very wide at the entrance, but terminated by narrow grated outlets.

Communicating with this prison-lodging was a small cell, contrived in the thickness of the wall. The room was scantily furnished, and contained only an oak table, and two or three chairs of the same material.

Against the wall, near one of the recesses, was fixed a crucifix, and beneath it was a prie-dieu of the simplest fashion.

She who was confined within this prison-chamber was not more than forty-five, but she looked much older, for sorrows, such as few have known, had done their work with her. Her frame was wasted, but not bowed; and her features, though stamped with grief, still retained traces of their former beauty. Her eye was bright, and her expression proud, showing that, despite the agonizing affliction she had endured, her spirit was unsubdued. Her gown was of dark blue velvet, then used for mourning, and her hair was covered by a white linen frontlet. This majestic dame was Margaret of Anjou, once Queen of England, widow of Henry VI, and mother of Prince Edward, ruthlessly slain at Tewksbury.

Margaret heard the door of her prison open, but believing it to be the gaoler who had come in, and being occupied with her devotions at the time, she did not raise her eyes from her missal.

When she looked up, at length, she perceived a youth of slight and graceful figure standing at a little distance from her.

It was Isidore. The royal livery in which he was clad, and which was embroidered with the badge of the House of York, displeased the Queen; but the demeanour of the young esquire was exceedingly respectful, and his looks expressed profound sympathy.

"I come from the King, gracious madame," said Isidore, with a profound obeisance. "I have just returned with my royal master from France."

"Then you can tell me how your master's ignominious retreat was conducted," rejoined Margaret, scornfully. "After all his preparations and boasting, I am told he has not fought a battle."

"He has concluded a very advantageous treaty of peace with the King of France, madame, and that is better than a victory," replied Isidore.

"Such a peace is more disgraceful than a defeat!" cried Margaret, sharply. "'Tis plain, Louis has overreached him, and I am glad of it. But I should have been better pleased if you had brought me word that Edward's host had been routed, and he himself and his brothers slain. Then I would have rewarded you with my last jewel."

"I hoped, madame, that your wrath against the King had in some degree abated," said Isidore.

"My wrath against the blood-stained usurper, whom you style King, but who has neither right nor title to the throne on which he sits, will never abate," rejoined Margaret. "Never can I pardon him who murdered my son, who ought now to be King, and who caused my husband, who was King, to be foully assassinated. Maledictions, such as a widow and a bereaved mother can utter in her agony, have been invoked by me on his head. Daily have I implored Heaven to avenge my wrongs. I have prayed that Edward may be cut off in his pride, and he shall be cut off! I have prayed that his race may be extinguished, and it shall be so! I have prayed that all dear to him may perish, and they shall perish miserably!"

"Oh, madame, this is too terrible!" cried Isidore, trembling and turning pale.

"What is it to thee, if they perish?" said Margaret. "Thou art nought to him—ha?"

"No, madame; but such imprecations are treasonable, and I ought not to listen to them."

"Repeat them to thy master," said Margaret, haughtily.

"No, madame," replied Isidore; "he shall hear naught from me likely to exasperate him against you. The King's feelings towards you are now kindly, and I would not change them."

"I would rather he hated me than loved me," said Margaret. "I am not so abject as to ask his pity. Fallen as I am, I know he fears me still."

"Calm yourself, I beseech you, gracious madame," said Isidore, after a pause, "and listen to me. I have said that I bring you good news."

"Is Edward on his death-bed, or hath the relentless Gloucester been slain?" demanded Margaret, sternly.

"I have come to announce to you, madame, that your captivity is at an end."

"Is this so?" said Margaret, looking steadfastly at the speaker. "Then, indeed, Edward of York is greatly changed, for I thought that naught but self-interest could move that heart of stone. How came this to pass? He hath not done it, I am well assured, of his own free will."

"King Louis hath agreed to pay a ransom of fifty thousand crowns for your liberation, madame," said Isidore.

"Then I owe nothing to Edward," cried Margaret, joyfully. "'Tis to Louis I am indebted for freedom!"

"'Tis to your august father, King René, that you owe your liberation, gracious madame," said Isidore. "To accomplish this, he has ceded Provence to Louis."

"Has the King, my father, made this great sacrifice for me?" cried Margaret. "Oh, this is too much!"

And sinking into the chair, she covered her face with her hands, and wept aloud and unrestrainedly.

These were the first tears she had shed since she beheld the body of her murdered husband borne on a bier from the Tower to be exhibited at Saint Paul's, and they greatly relieved her.

Isidore turned aside his head, unable to control his emotion.

Margaret was the first to break the silence. Scarcely conscious that she was not alone, she murmured,—

"Why has my father done this? 'Tis too much—too much! I have lost him his beautiful Provence—his Provençe that he loved so well! He has given up that sunny land, with its vines and olives, and cities near the bright blue main, that he may embrace me once more! He does not know that I have grown old—that I am no longer the fair daughter he doted on. He should have let me die here, in this prison-chamber, and kept his dear Provence."

"You are dearer to King René than Provence, madame," said Isidore, turning round, and gazing at her with streaming eyes. "I am sure your royal father would have died of grief if he had not beheld you again."

"I thank thee for the words, gentle youth," said Margaret, much moved. "Though thou wearest the livery of my deadly enemy, thou hast a tender heart."

And she extended her hand to him. Isidore bent down, and reverently pressed it to his lips.

"I would thou hadst a better master, gentle youth," said Margaret. "I cannot ask you to go with me; nor is it likely thou wouldst share my fortunes, if I did."

"I cannot leave the King, madame," said Isidore.

"Then let me give thee one piece of counsel," said Margaret. "Make the most of thy present fortune. Assuredly, thou wilt not have Edward long."

"Oh, madame! fill me not with these dreadful forebodings, I entreat you! I should die if I lost the King."

"Die if you lost him!" exclaimed Margaret. "Let me look more narrowly at thee," she added, seizing Isidore's hand. "'Tis as I suspected. Thou art a woman! Thou art Edward's beautiful favourite, Jane Shore! Nay, deny it not. I heard thou hadst accompanied him in his expedition to France, in male attire."

"Suffer me to depart, gracious madame," said Jane. "I have no more to say."

"But I have more to say to thee," rejoined Margaret, still detaining her. "Did thy master send thee to insult me? Had I not been a prisoner, thou wouldst not have dared approach me. I would have had thee thrust from my presence."

"Madame, my desire has been to spare you pain. I deemed my disguise sufficient, and did not for a moment suppose you would recognise me."

"I recognised thee not. Thou hast betrayed thyself," said Margaret. "But thou hast learned something from me—something thou wilt not forget. My lips have pronounced thy fate. Thou art dear to Edward—very dear, it may be. Thou shalt perish miserably."

"Recall your words, gracious madame, I implore you!" cried Jane. "I have done nothing to offend you. On the contrary, my desire has been to serve you. From the bottom of my heart, I have pitied you—"

"Thou pity me!" cried Margaret, with sovereign scorn. "I would not have thy pity. Back to thy lord and master, and tell him all I have said. Bid him act as he will. He can send the mercileless Gloucester, if he desires, to slay me. I am defenceless, and a prisoner, but I have been a Queen, and I will brook no insult. Begone!"

So imperious was her tone, and so energetic her gesture, that Jane attempted no remonstrance; but stepped back to the barred door of the prison-chamber, and tapped against it. It was instantly opened by the gaoler, and she departed.

II.

NOW CLARENCE REVEALED HIS DESIGNS TO JANE.

On his return from the inglorious expedition to France, enriched by the large sum paid him by the wily Louis XI, Edward, always addicted to the pleasures of the table, gave himself up to ease and enjoyment.

At Windsor Castle, where he kept his Court, there was now continual feasting and revelry. Grand banquets and entertainments were of almost daily occurrence, and the luxurious monarch passed his time in a constant round of pleasure.

So indolent and enervated did he become by these habits of self-indulgence, that he neglected all hardy exercises—seldom hunted, though he had heretofore been passionately fond of the chase—and scarcely ever appeared in the tilt-yard, though he was the most expert jouster of his day.

Worse than all, he neglected public affairs, for he now disliked anything that gave him trouble, and left their management to the Queen, who displayed consummate ability in directing all matters entrusted to her care. She had now obtained a complete ascendancy over her consort, and maintained it to the last.

The only person who strove to rouse the King from the indolent state into which he had sunk was Jane, but she was unsuccessful in her efforts.

At that time, the Court was divided into two parties, strongly opposed to each other; the most powerful and the most numerous consisting of the new nobility, created by the influence of the Queen, and, consequently, devoted to her interests.

At the head of this party was her brother, Earl Rivers, whom she had contrived to marry to the richest heiress in the kingdom, and who was now governor to her son, the young Prince of Wales. Next in importance to Lord Rivers was the Marquis of Dorset, the Queen's eldest son by her first marriage, who had been recently appointed Constable of the Tower, and Keeper of the King's treasures.

Most of the old nobility had been banished from Court at the instance of the Queen, who desired their removal on account of their supposed hostility to herself; but three of her avowed enemies still enjoyed the King's favour—namely, the Duke of Buckingham, Lord High Constable; Lord Hastings, Grand Chamberlain; and Lord Stanley.

Singular to relate, the Queen manifested no jealousy whatever towards her inconstant husband's beautiful favourite, and even went so far as to conciliate her; frequent conferences taking place between them in private at the hunting lodge where Jane resided.

Edward had now been for several months at Windsor, which might not inaptly be described as the Castle of Indolence, when the Duke of Clarence, who had absented himself from Court in consequence of some affront offered him by the Queen, suddenly re-appeared at Court.

He was unaccompanied by the Duchess, whom he had been obliged to leave at Ludlow Castle in Shropshire, on account of the feeble state of her health.

Edward welcomed him with his accustomed cordiality; but the Queen received him with marked coldness. She regarded him with distrust, having received information that he was secretly plotting against the King.

On the morning after his arrival at the Castle, the Duke paid a formal visit to Mistress Shore, who resided, as heretofore, at the hunting lodge, and was received by her with as much ceremony as if she had been queen. She was splendidly dressed, and looked surprisingly well; and Clarence really thought, as he failed not to tell her, that she quite eclipsed the most exalted lady at Court in beauty.

Jane accepted the compliment, but did not appear much gratified by it. She disliked the Duke, for she was well aware of his insincerity.

There was little resemblance, either in person or manner, between Clarence and his royal brother. Yet the Duke was very handsome, and possessed a fine figure. But his features had a sinister expression, and his manner was haughty and repelling, though not wanting in dignity. His habiliments were of the richest velvet, and his girdle and cap blazed with diamonds.

None of the haughtiness of which we have just spoken was perceptible in his deportment towards Jane. On the contrary, he was extremely deferential to her; so much so, as to excite her suspicion.

"I am sorry to hear the Duchess is unwell, my lord," she said, as she motioned him to a seat. "I trust it is only a slight indisposition."

"She is suffering from extreme debility," replied Clarence. "She has not left her couch for a month. She is under the care of Ankaret Twynhyo, a young woman of extraordinary skill, who understands her case perfectly."

"You are fortunate in having such a nurse, my lord," rejoined Jane. "Methinks you called her Ankaret Twynhyo. 'Tis a singular name. She cannot be an English woman."

"No; she is from Ghent, and was recommended to us by my sister, the Duchess of Burgundy. She is as well skilled in medicine as a physician, and I have the greatest faith in her. If anyone can save the Duchess, Ankaret can."

"I fear, from what you now say, my lord, that the Duchess must be dangerously ill," remarked Jane.

"I hope not," replied Clarence. "But she seems to lose strength daily. However, everything will be done for her by Ankaret. But let us speak of the King. He does not look well, and is much changed since I saw him last. What ails him?"

"Indolence, my lord; nothing but indolence," replied Jane. "You will render him a great service if you can induce him to take more exercise."

"If you have failed, madame, who have more influence over him than anyone else, how can I hope to succeed? Perhaps," he said, with a singular smile, "a fresh insurrection might rouse him to activity. But I cannot get up one merely to effect his cure. The consequences of such a step, though beneficial to him, might be fatal to myself."

"I desire no such violent remedy, my lord," replied Jane. "But you are right. A rebellion would infallibly restore his energies."

"Unluckily there are no rebels left," observed Clarence. "All the Lancastrians are slain, except Harry of Richmond, and he is held in captivity by the Duke of Bretagne."

"I quite despair of rousing the King," remarked Jane. "All my efforts have proved fruitless."

"I do not wonder you are uneasy on his Majesty's account, madame," said Clarence. "I am told he commits too many excesses, and drinks far too much of the good wine of Chalosse sent him by Louis. If he be not checked—and who shall check him since you cannot?—most assuredly he will be seized by a sudden apoplexy."

"You alarm me, my lord!" cried Jane.

"I do not wish to alarm you, madame," pursued the Duke; "but you ought to be prepared for such an event, since it is highly probable. Consider what would then be your position?"

She looked earnestly at him, but did not speak.

"You will always have a friend in me, madame," he said, with a certain deliberation.

"And in the Queen, too, my lord!" cried Jane.

"'Twere best not to calculate too much upon her Majesty," said the Duke. "In the event of the King's sudden death—which Heaven forbid!—great confusion would ensue, and great changes take place. The two princes would be set aside. By right, the crown belongs to me. I will not disturb Edward, but I will not allow his son to succeed him."

Astonishment kept Jane silent, and the Duke went on.

"As I have intimated, Edward has no title to the crown. It can be proved that he is not the son of my father, the Duke of York. Neither is he lawfully married to her whom he styles his 'Queen.' A former wife is yet living—the Lady Eleanor Butler—to whom he was privately wedded by the Bishop of Bath, who can prove the marriage."

"You amaze me, my lord!" cried Jane.

"From what I have stated," pursued the Duke, "you will see that the children of Elizabeth Woodville cannot succeed to the throne. My title is incontestable. Behold

"this document, madame." And as he spoke, he took a parchment from his breast. "This is an authentic copy of the Act of Parliament passed when the Earl of Warwick was next heir to the crown after the male issue of Henry the Sixth. King Henry died in the Tower, as you know. Prince Edward, his only son, was slain at Tewksbury. I am Edward's successor. I ought now to be King—and, in effect, I am King. For many reasons, I shall leave my brother Edward in quiet possession. But when the throne becomes vacant—as it will be ere long—I shall occupy it; not his son!"

A brief pause ensued, after which the Duke said, "Mark me, the Act has never been repealed, and is therefore still in force. I pray you look at it, madame. Convince yourself that I have spoken the truth."

"I do not desire to look at the Act, my lord," she replied. "You must convince others of the legality of your title, not me."

"I have already done so, madame," he replied, replacing the parchment in his doublet. "All the old nobility are satisfied, and will support me. Besides, I can raise an army in the North."

"Be not too sure of that, my lord; be not too sure that the old nobility will support you," cried Jane. "'Tis possible you may not survive the King, your brother, whose youthful son you desire to supplant. Heaven may thwart your designs. Your imprudence in divulging your scheme to me may cost you your head!"

"And you intend to betray me to the King, madame?" said Clarence.

"I shall reveal all you have said to me, my lord," she rejoined. "You cannot complain. I did not invoke your confidence, and have given you no pledge of secrecy."

"Beware what you do, madame!" said Clarence, sternly. "You imagine you hold my life in your hands, but you are mistaken. I exacted no promise of secrecy from you, because I knew you would not be bound by it; but you will be silent when you learn what you have to fear. Make the revelation to Edward, and I will meet it with a counter-charge that will ruin you for ever in his esteem! Trust me, your wisest course will be to become my ally. The time will soon come when I shall be able to reward my friends, and I shall not forget those who serve me well. Several of the King's confidants are leagued with me against the Queen and her family. Her enemies must naturally be my friends."

"But I am not the Queen's enemy," said Jane.

"That will not pass with me!" exclaimed Clarence, incredulously. "Again I ask, may I count upon you as an ally?"

After a moment's reflection, Jane said, "What would you have me do?"

"Nothing that will give you trouble," he replied. "Certain matters must come to your knowledge that it may be desirable I should know, especially when I am absent from Court."

"But how communicate them to you?" she asked.

"I have a spy in the King's household, who will convey a letter safely to me," replied the Duke.

"His name?" asked Jane.

"Baldwin," replied the Duke.

"Can he be trusted?" she asked.

"Perfectly," answered Clarence. "He is devoted to me."

"Here comes the King!" exclaimed Jane, as the door was suddenly thrown open by an usher.

"Be silent, on your life, madame!" said Clarence, in a low tone. "I am playing too deep a game not to have calculated all chances. The slightest indiscretion on your part will only precipitate matters."

Next moment, Edward entered the room, attended by his jester, Malbouche.

III.

HOW THE KING SHOOK OFF HIS LETHARGY.

PERSONALLY, Edward was not much changed; but he had an indolent and enervated appearance, that proclaimed the luxurious habits in which he indulged. He was arrayed in a robe of the richest velvet, lined with fur, and his jerkin was magnificently embroidered.

After returning the obeisances made him, he sank into a fauteuil, as if the exertion he had just undergone had been too much for him.

"Bring me a cup of wine," he said to a page, who still remained in attendance.

"If I might venture to interfere, I would advise your Majesty to refrain till dinner," said Jane.

"The walk from the Castle has made me thirsty," he replied, emptying the large silver flagon brought him by a page. "'Tis right good Gascoigne wine," he added. "Louis may have deceived me in some things; but he has sent me good wine. He has no such wine as this, I am told, at his own table."

"Louis drinks very sparingly, and mingles his wine with water," observed Jane; "and it would be well if your Majesty would follow his example."

"Nay, by my faith! that I will never do," cried Edward. "What! spoil wine like that I have just drunk, with water! That were indeed a folly, of which not even Malbouche would be guilty!"

"Nay, my liege," rejoined the jester; "I have just made a vow that I will touch no wine for three months."

"What induced thee to make a vow so foolish?" remarked Edward.

"Because I drank too much yesterday, my liege," replied Malbouche.

"For the same reason, I might make a like vow," said the King, laughing.

"'Twere well for your Majesty if you did, and kept your vow rigorously," said Jane.

"What! Would you have me forswear wine altogether?" rejoined Edward.

"I would," said Jane.

"That were a penance far too severe," observed Clarence. "When his Majesty has finished the famous Chalosse sent him by King Louis, he may think about it. My wine, by preference, is Malmsey."

"Say you so, brother?" cried Edward. "Happily, I can suit your taste. More wine!" he added to the page. "A cup of Malmsey for the Duke of Clarence."

"And for your Majesty?"

"Chalosse," replied the King. "Malmsey is too sweet for me."

Before the page went forth, Jane called him to her. Presently he returned, bearing two goblets on a salver, one of which he offered to the Duke.

"Like you the wine, brother?" inquired Edward.

"'Tis excellent?" cried Clarence. "No other wine shall pass my lips, if I can help it. My last draught shall be of Malmsey."

"I trust your wish may be gratified, brother," observed the King. "'Tis better than some vile medicinal potion. Ah! thou hast poisoned me!" he ejaculated, as he well-nigh emptied the cup. "What hast thou given me?"

"Cold water, an' please your Majesty," replied the page, scarcely able to repress a smile at the grimace made by the King.

"Nay, your Majesty must chide me," remarked Jane. "He merely obeyed my order. Finish the cup, I pray you. 'Twill clear your head for business."

"I have no business to attend to," replied the King. "The day shall be entirely devoted to amusement."

"As all your Majesty's are, and as all mine should be, were I king," remarked Malbouche.

"Will you not ride in the park?" said Jane. "The day is delightful."

"No; 'tis too hot. I am better here," said Edward, indolently. "Bring your lute, and sing to me—the while my brother Clarence and myself amuse ourselves with cards and dice."

"Ever some trifling amusement," sighed Jane, preparing to obey. "Nothing will rouse him."

Just at this moment, the door was again opened, and the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Hastings were ushered in.

"Welcome, my lords," cried Edward. "You are just in time for a game at cards. Sit down, I pray you."

"My liege," replied Buckingham, "we are sorry to interrupt you; but you must needs return with us to the Castle. A council has been hastily summoned, and your presence at it is absolutely necessary."

"Be it what it may, you must dispense with me," replied Edward. "I am not in the mood for business."

"'Tis a matter of the utmost importance, my liege," remonstrated Hastings. "The expenses of your household have largely increased, and must be provided for. No further burden can with safety be laid upon the nation."

"Then the grants from the crown must be resumed," said Edward. "There is no other way to raise money. We have loved large sums from the clergy."

"What do I hear?" cried Clarence, starting up. "The crown grants resumed! Then I shall lose my lands. Your Majesty cannot contemplate such a step?"

"Money must be had, brother," replied Edward, calmly. "My household, as you have just heard, is expensive."

"But the expenses are not to be defrayed by me," cried Clarence, angrily. "I protest against a measure so unjust—vehemently protest against it."

"The council will listen to your objections, brother," said Edward, calmly.

"But they will be guided by your Majesty," rejoined the Duke. "Be their decision what it may, I will not part with my possessions without a struggle."

"Reserve what you have to say for the council, brother," said Edward. "Come with me. I promise you a fair hearing."

Then, rising from his seat, and instantaneously resuming all his wonted dignity of manner, he said to the two nobles,—

"My lords, I attend you."

By a powerful effort, he had completely shaken off his lethargy. His figure seemed loftier, and his countenance assumed a wholly different expression from that which it had just worn.

The transformation was so remarkable, that the beholders were struck by it, and none more so than Jane, who gazed at him with admiration.

As he turned to bid her adieu, she said to him in a low tone,—

"If I never beheld your Majesty again, I should rejoice at this blessed change!"

Edward then went forth, accompanied by the Duke of Clarence and the two nobles, and proceeded through the vineyard to the Castle.

IV.

IN WHAT MANNER THE DUCHESS OF CLARENCE WAS POISONED BY ANKARET TWYNHYO; AND OF THE FATE OF THE POISONER.

As the Duke of Clarence entered the upper ward of the Castle with the King, a messenger, who had just arrived, approached him, and presented him with a letter.

Struck by the man's looks, the Duke said to him,—

"Thou bring'st ill news, I fear?"

"My lord," replied the messenger, "when I left Ludlow Castle the Duchess had not many hours to live. Mistress Ankaret Twynhyo ordered me to convey this letter with all speed to your Grace, and I have come as swiftly as I could."

"Does Mistress Ankaret give no hopes of the Duchess's recovery?" said Clarence.

"None, my lord!" replied the messenger. "Tis scarce probable you will find her Grace alive on your return."

"I will start at once!" cried the Duke. "Heaven grant I may not arrive too late! Your Majesty has heard the sad tidings brought by this man, and will excuse my hasty departure."

"Not only excuse it, brother, but urge it," said Edward. "Leave the letter with me, that I may read what the nurse says."

"I have not yet opened the letter my liege," said Clarence, uneasily.

"No matter!" cried Edward. "There can be no secrets in it. Give it me."

And he took the letter from the Duke. To hide his confusion, Clarence hurried away, without taking formal leave of the King, or bidding adieu to the two nobles.

"I am alarming myself without cause," he thought. "Ankaret would be sure to write most guardedly. Yet she might say something that would awaken Edward's suspicions. 'Tis unlucky the letter should fall into his hands."

Thus ruminating, he mounted his steed and quitted the Castle, attended by the half-dozen retainers he had brought with him.

As soon as he was gone, the King remarked, with a singular smile, to the two nobles,—

"If the Duchess dies—and it seems she will die—Clarence will soon seek another spouse, and I foretell that his choice will fall on Mary of Burgundy. When the Duke was slain at Nanci, and his immense territories devolved on his daughter, I felt sure my greedy brother would have grasped at such a prize, had not his hand been tied. But now he is free—or will be free—there is nothing to prevent him from trying to obtain the great heiress. But he has counted without me, for I shall thwart his scheme."

Both his hearers smiled at the King's remark.

"Let us see what the letter contains," pursued Edward, opening it.

As he scanned its contents, his brow grew dark, and his looks proclaimed that he had made some startling discovery.

"Beyond doubt, this Ankaret Twynhyo is a poisoner!" he exclaimed. "Mark what she says in this letter, and judge: 'The draught wrought as expected, and as your Grace desired. For a short time, the Duchess seemed to rally, but she soon grew worse again, and is now rapidly sinking. I shall try the effect of another draught—but with little hope of saving her.' Here is a plain intimation that the poisonous draught has done its work."

"'Tis not quite plain to me, my liege," remarked Hastings. "The words may bear a different construction."

"I do not think so," cried Edward. "The woman shall be arrested and interrogated. I have no doubt whatever of her guilt. I am certain she has administered poison to the Duchess."

Thereupon, he proceeded to the council-chamber.

Early next morning, the Duke of Clarence, who had continued his rapid journey throughout the night, came in sight of the towers of Ludlow Castle.

Picturesquely situated on the banks of the River Corvo, near its junction with the Teme, this commanding pile, which formed one of the noblest baronial residences in the kingdom, had been occupied by Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, Clarence's father; but after the battle of Wakefield, at which the Duke of York was slain, the Castle was dismantled by Henry VI, and for some time neglected.

At a subsequent period, it was bestowed by Edward on his brother Clarence, who restored it to all its pristine splendour, and placed a strong garrison within its walls. Here the ambitious and treacherous Duke planned his schemes for securing the crown.

On arriving at the Castle, Clarence's first inquiries were as to the state of the Duchess, and on learning that she still breathed, he hurried to her room.

In a carved oak bedstead, in a richly furnished chamber, lay the emaciated figure of the once beautiful Isabella, eldest daughter of the great Earl of Warwick.

A mortal pallor overspread her countenance, and the damps of death were gathering on her brow. It was evident dissolution was at hand, and that the vital spark was about to quit its earthly tabernacle.

The Duchess was speechless, and incapable of movement, but her eyes were open, and were turned towards the Duke as he entered the chamber. On her breast was laid a small crucifix, but she was unable to raise it.

Amid the deep hush of the chamber could be heard the voice of a priest, who was reciting the prayers for a departing soul.

Partly concealed by the richly embroidered curtains, stood Ankaret Twynhyo, a tall, dark-complexioned, handsome woman, of middle age.

She had a very striking countenance, owing to the peculiar expression of her large black eyes. She was plainly attired in a kirtle of dark red camlet, and wore a white coverchief.

Clarence saw her as he entered, but avoided her glance, and looked only at the Duchess, whose dying gaze was fixed upon him.

He took his wife's hand, but it was cold, and could not return his pressure. He questioned her by his looks, and she tried to respond, for she evidently knew him.

In vain! The agony came on, and the light within her eyes was extinguished.

The Duke threw himself on his knees beside the bed; and again there was a deep hush, broken only by his sobs, and by the voice of the priest.

At a later hour, the Duke was alone with Ankaret, in his cabinet. He questioned her as to the contents of the letter she had sent him.

"Has it not reached you?" she cried. "I ordered Colville to deliver it into your Grace's own hands."

"It was snatched from me by the King before I could open it," said Clarence. "Heaven grant there was nothing in it to damage me!"

"It is unlucky the letter should fall into the King's hands," said Ankaret. "But your Grace need have no uneasiness. I wrote most carefully."

"If the King's suspicions are aroused, they are not easily allayed," said Clarence. "It may be that you have some noxious drugs, or medicines, in your possession. If so, destroy them!"

"Fear nothing, my lord," she replied. "The poisons I use are not confectioned in the ordinary manner. This small phial, which I keep concealed in my breast, was given me by an Italian, and a few drops of it are sufficient for the purpose, as you have seen. Methinks I have earned my reward."

"You have," replied Clarence, shuddering. "Here are the thousand golden crowns I promised you," he added, giving her a bag of money. "I would counsel your immediate departure, but that flight would excite suspicion."

"I will remain until after the Duchess's funeral," said Ankaret. "Till then, I will leave this money with your Grace. If search be made, so large a sum must not be found upon me."

"You are right," rejoined Clarence, as he took back the bag.

Scarcely were the words uttered, than an usher entered, and stated that an officer from the King was without, and desired to speak with the Duke.

"Is he alone?" asked Clarence, vainly endeavouring to conceal his uneasiness.

"No, my lord; he has a guard with him," replied the usher.

"Admit him!" said the Duke.

Accordingly, the officer was introduced.

Bowing respectfully to the Duke, he said,—"My duty compels me to intrude upon your Grace. I hold a warrant from his Majesty for the arrest of Ankaret Twynhyo, one of your Grace's female servants."

"On what charge?" demanded the Duke, haughtily.

"On a most serious charge!" replied the officer.

"Give it a name, sir?" cried Clarence.

"She is suspected of having poisoned the Duchess, my lord," replied the officer. "Her Grace, I am told, has just departed this life."

"But she has died from natural causes—not by poison," said the Duke. "Ankaret is totally innocent of the heinous crime imputed to her."

"I trust, my lord, she may be able to establish her innocence," rejoined the officer. "But the King believes her guilty."

"He can have no proof of her guilt," said the Duke.

"Pardon me, my lord; his Majesty has proof under her own handwriting."

"That cannot be," cried Ankaret. "I have committed no offence. I have written nothing to criminate myself."

Then throwing herself at the Duke's feet, she exclaimed, "Your Grace will not deliver me to certain destruction."

"I cannot protect you," said Clarence. "But you have nothing to fear."

"Yes; I have the torture to fear!" she replied, springing to her feet; "and I will never endure it! I will rather die here!"

And, placing the phial to her lips, she emptied its contents.

"What have you done, miserable woman?" cried the officer, astounded.

"Escaped the rack!" she replied. "Now you may take me with you, if you will. But you cannot bring me before the King. I defy you!" she added, with a fearful laugh.

"Have you naught to declare before you die, woman?" said the officer, noticing an appalling change in her countenance. "This act proves your guilt. But were you instigated to the dreadful deed?"

Clarence awaited her reply in terror, fearing she would accuse him.

"I confess that I poisoned the Duchess," she said.

"Had you an accomplice?" demanded the officer. "Answer, as you will answer to the Supreme Judge, before whom you will presently appear."

She made an effort to answer, but the quick poison had already done its work, and she fell dead into the arms of the officer.

"Saved!" mentally ejaculated Clarence.

V.

THE CHASE OF THE MILK-WHITE HART IN WARGRAVE PARK.

In those days, when so many strange and terrible events occurred, the death of the unfortunate Duchess of Clarence was soon forgotten; and though the strongest suspicion attached to the Duke, Ankaret's dying statement, as reported by the officer, served to clear him from all participation in the crime.

But the King had judged correctly. The Duchess had not been laid a month within the tomb, when Clarence, fearful of having the great prize snatched from him if he delayed longer, solicited the hand of Mary of Burgundy, and his suit being supported by the mother-in-law of the young heiress, who was likewise his own sister, and devoted to his interests, he would probably have succeeded, but for the determined opposition of Edward.

With such an accession of power as would have been afforded him by this alliance with the heiress of Burgundy, the ambitious Duke would have become far more powerful than his royal brother desired, and Edward would not therefore allow the marriage to take place.

Clarence's rage at this grievous disappointment knew no bounds, and, carried away by passion, he was indiscreet enough to threaten vengeance against the King. These menaces were reported to Edward, and the Duke's ruin was resolved upon. But a pretext must be afforded for his destruction, and he was allowed to withdraw from Court, and retire to Ludlow Castle, where he occupied himself in planning an insurrection.

Edward was quite aware of his schemes, for he had spies in the Duke's household; but he gave himself no concern about him, and abided his time.

Among the Duke's confidants, and known to be privy to his schemes, was Sir Thomas Burdett, owner of Wargrave, a large park adjoining Windsor Forest, and well stocked with deer.

By this time, Edward, though he still feasted too frequently, had resumed his former active habits, and spent the greater part of each day in hunting, hawking, and other sports. On such occasions he was generally accompanied by Jane, who was an admirable equestrian, and, despite her slight frame, could stand a great deal of fatigue.

One day he announced his intention of hunting in Wargrave Park, and set out betimes from Windsor, as the place was somewhat distant. He was accompanied by a large and splendid party, among whom were the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Hastings, and other nobles; but no other lady was with him, except Jane.

Edward seemed rather preoccupied as he rode through the forest, and it is certain, he was not thinking wholly of the chase; but whatever grave matter engrossed his thoughts, he did not mention it to Jane, though he now and then exchanged a serious word with Buckingham and Hastings.

Sir Thomas Burdett, in whose park he was about to hunt, was a man of fierce and ungovernable temper, and had been engaged in many private quarrels. He had fought at the battle of Barnet, under the Earl of Warwick; but his estates were saved from confiscation by Clarence, to whom he owed a large debt of gratitude, and was anxious to repay it.

Wargrave Park, as already intimated, was well stocked with deer, and Sir Thomas being a great hunter, cared not how many stags he killed—the more the merrier; but, amid the herds, there was a milk-white hart that he loved, and would never allow to be chased.

So tame was the beautiful animal, that it would come to feed out of Sir Thomas's hand, and was generally seen beneath the oaks in front of the mansion.

As a safeguard, and to show that it belonged to him, he hung a chain of gold round its neck, and the hart seemed proud of the decoration.

This gentle creature, never hitherto disturbed by hunters, Edward resolved to kill, his object being to excite the anger of its owner. Had Jane been aware of the King's design, she would have striven to dissuade him from it, and would certainly not have aided him.

Edward entered Wargrave Park, Thomas Burdett, wholly unsuspecting of purpose, came forth, and placed all his deer at his Majesty's disposition, promising him excellent sport.

"You have a milk-white hart, I understand, Sir Thomas?" remarked Edward.

The knight replied in the affirmative, and pointed out the animal beneath the trees.

Thereupon, the King rode with Jane towards the spot, followed by the huntmen and hounds. Long before their approach, the whole herd took to flight, except the gentle hart, which lifted up its noble head, and looked at them unconcernedly.

"Oh! how much I should like to have that lovely creature!" cried Jane. "But Sir Thomas will never consent to part with it."

"He must part with it!" remarked Edward, significantly.

"Ah! here it comes!" exclaimed Jane, as the stag tripped forward to meet them.

But as it got within half a bowshot of the party, it stopped. Something had alarmed it.

After gazing for a moment, as she thought, wistfully, at Jane, the stag dashed off.

At a sign from the King, the horns were blown, and the hounds unleashed, and the whole party started in pursuit.

Unable to restrain her steed, Jane was obliged to keep near the King.

"You do not mean to kill that stag, my liege?" she cried. "Twere a cruel deed!"

Edward made no reply, but his looks proclaimed that such was his intent.

Jane rode on, occasionally renewing her entreaties, but the King continued obdurate.

Never before had such a chase been seen, either in Wargrave Park or Windsor Forest, and those who witnessed it were wonderstruck at the swiftness of the beautiful stag, as it speeded along the glades, and passed through the groves.

Jane thought it would escape, but on reaching the limits of the park, it turned, and, after rapidly retracing its course, made for the mansion, hoping to find refuge with its master.

But before the terrified animal could reach this place of safety, it was pulled down by the hounds, and killed by Edward's own hand.

Taking the chain from the hart's neck, the King gave it to Jane, and bade her wear it.

"I like not the gift, my liege," she said, perceiving that the chain was sprinkled with blood. "I fear it will bring me ill luck."

"Nay, by my faith, you shall wear it," said Edward. "It will remind you of this merry chase."

Placing the bugle to his lips, he winded a mort.

Next moment, the whole party came up, and gathered round the slaughtered stag.

At the same time Sir Thomas Burdett reached the spot, almost distraught with grief and rage.

Looking down at the poor beast, he exclaimed, in the bitterness of his heart,— "Must thou be the victim of his savage sport? Would that thy horns were plunged deep in his body who slew thee!"

Scarcely had the imprudent words escaped him, than he was seized by a couple of huntsmen.

"Ha, traitor! ha, villain!" exclaimed Edward, furiously. "Thy tongue ought to be plucked out for those treasonable words!"

"Pardon him, I implore you, my liege," in terposed Jane. "Ask grace of the King, Sir Thomas," she added to the knight, "and he will grant it to you."

"Let him take my life, if he will," rejoined Burdett, sternly. "I doubt not he seeks it, or he would not have done me this grievous wrong."

"Peace, sir," said Jane. "You aggravate your offence. Humble yourself, and I will intercede for you."

"I want not your intercession. I would not owe my life to you" cried Sir Thomas, scornfully.

"Thou art a vile traitor, and shalt die!" cried Edward, as he sprang into the saddle.

"I go to my doom," said Burdett. "But mark me, sire! This deed will not be unavenged!"

"Ha! say'st thou?" cried Edward, hoping to draw something further from him. "Who will avenge thee?"

"Heaven!" replied the knight. "Heaven will avenge me!"

Then, turning to the men who held him, he said,—

"A moment, and I will go with you."

And as they released him, he knelt down beside the hart, and patted its forehead gently, muttering the while,—

"They have killed thee, my poor beast, that they might kill thy master!"

After taking this farewell of his favourite, which moved Jane greatly, if it moved no one else, he arose, and delivered himself to his captors.

Meantime, the King had given orders that he should be taken to his own house, being strictly guarded the while, and then brought as a prisoner to Windsor Castle.

Thus ended the chase of the milk-white hart in Wargrave Park; and it was long afterwards remembered, because divers calamities were traced to it.

As Jane rode back through the forest, she was much dispirited, and Edward vainly endeavoured to cheer her.

That night she dreamed that the chase was renewed, but it ended differently. Hotly pursued, the hart stood at bay, and gored the King dangerously with its horns.

As to the unhappy knight, he was first taken to Windsor Castle, as had been enjoined, and was then arraigned before the judges, charged with high treason, condemned to death, and executed within two days.

VI.

OF THE QUARREL BETWEEN THE KING AND CLARENCE, AND HOW THE DUKE WAS ARRESTED.

The Duke of Clarence was at Ludlow Castle when this tragical event occurred, and so incensed was he when he heard the particulars of his adherent's execution, that he set out at once for Windsor to demand an explanation of the King.

Nor had his anger abated by the time of his arrival at the Castle. He sought an immediate audience of the King, and obtained it.

Edward was alone in his cabinet, when Clarence was ushered into his presence. Perceiving at once, from his brother's looks and deportment, that he was scarcely able to control himself, he resolved to take advantage of any indiscretion on the Duke's part.

"Your Majesty will not doubt what has brought me hither," said Clarence, in a haughty tone. "I have come to demand from you an account of the death of my faithful adherent, Sir Thomas Burdett?"

"Tis plain you have not heard what has happened, brother," replied the King. "Your adherent has been found guilty of high treason."

"And has been put to death, because he uttered a few hasty words when you killed his favourite deer!" said Clarence. "No tyrant could have acted with greater severity!"

"It may be well you should put some guard on your own speech, brother," rejoined Edward, sternly. "Sir Thomas Burdett was justly executed. 'Twas proved at his trial, by his servants, that he practised magic arts—that he fashioned small leaden images of ourself and the princes, our sons, and melted them, praying we might consume in like manner; and that he calculated our nativity, predicting death on a certain day. For these practices—not altogether for his treasonable speech—was he condemned to die."

"I do not believe in these idle charges," cried Clarence. "The servants who accused him of sorcery were suborned. Sir Thomas was loyal and true."

"In vowing fidelity to you, brother, he did not reserve his allegiance to me," rejoined Edward.

"The accusations are false, I repeat," cried Clarence. "His trial was a mere mockery, for his destruction was resolved upon. This is shown by the haste with which the affair was conducted."

"Dare you say this to me?" cried Edward.

"Ay; and I dare tell you that you have acted unwisely as well as unjustly in this hasty procedure, and that you may have reason to regret what you have done."

"You threaten, methinks, brother!" remarked the King.

"This deadly blow has been aimed against me," said Clarence, giving way to ungovernable passion. "These false charges have been brought against Burdett in order that they may prejudice me, but I repel them with scorn and indignation. Is this your gratitude? To me you owe your re-establishment on the throne, when you had been driven from it. Had I not aided you, Warwick would inevitably have proved the victor at Barnet."

"You forget that I should never have had to fight for my kingdom but for your treachery and desertion," rejoined Edward. "In pardoning the rebellion for which you ought to have lost your head, I did enough. But I have bestowed favours without end upon you."

"You have latterly deprived me of half my possessions by the intolerable act of resumption," said Clarence. "Moreover, you have thwarted my marriage with Mary of Burgundy, which the Duchess, our sister, had fully arranged. Think you I will tamely submit to such a wrong?"

"I know not—and care not," rejoined Edward, in a tone of indifference.

"I am treated as if I have no title to the crown," cried Clarence; "whereas, my title is superior to your own. There cannot be a doubt that the Duke of York was my father."

"What would you insinuate?" said Edward, fiercely.

"Methinks the inference is sufficiently clear," said Clarence.

"Retract what thou hast said, or, by Saint Mark, I will strike thee dead at my feet," cried Edward, starting up and drawing his dagger.

Clarence did not blench, but prepared to defend himself.

What might have been the end of this unnatural quarrel, it boots not to consider, but fortunately at this moment Jane entered the cabinet, and, seeing how matters stood, she rushed forward and placed herself between them.

"Hold, my liege!" she exclaimed. "Forget not that the Duke of Clarence is your brother!"

"He has dared to defame his own mother, and merits death at my hand!" said Edward. "But I will not sully my steel with his blood. I will leave him to the executioner."

And he sheathed his dagger.

"The Duke cannot mean what he has said, my liege," cried Jane. "He has spoken in anger. Let him depart, I pray you!"

"No," replied Edward. "He stirs not hence, save to the Tower. I have forgiven him many injuries; but it would be worse than weakness to forgive him now. His anger has caused him to betray the project he has formed. 'Tis no less than to disinherit me and my issue."

"Since you have discovered the design, my liege, 'tis innocuous," said Jane. "Clanency may excite better feelings in his breast. Throw yourself at the King's feet, my lord, and, perchance, he may vouchsafe you a pardon."

"Never!" cried Clarence. "Let him take my life, if he will, I have been goaded to madness by great wrongs, and no wonder I have become desperate."

"You hear, my liege," cried Jane. "His Highness owns he has been in fault."

"If he sincerely repents, and promises not to offend again, I may be induced to forgive him," said Edward, somewhat mollified. "But let him bend his proud neck."

"Ask not too much, my liege," implored Jane. "Suffer him to depart."

"Bid him return forthwith," said Edward, "and shut himself up in Ludlow Castle, till I grant him liberty. Any infraction of my orders will be visited with death."

"I need not repeat his Majesty's commands to your Highness," said Jane. "But I would exhort you to make all haste you can to Ludlow Castle."

"I will take refuge there as in a sanctuary," said Clarence.

"But you will find it no sanctuary if you again offend, brother," said Edward, sternly.

"Fare you well!"

Clarence made no response; but, with a haughty reverence, departed.

For some time after he was gone, Edward maintained a moody silence, and Jane did not venture to address him. At length he spoke.

"Clarence's nature is wholly faithless," he said. "To me he has always been false, and he was equally false to Warwick. He will now commence fresh plots against me."

"Let us hope not, my liege," said Jane. "At all events, I am glad you pardoned him."

"I have only pardoned him conditionally," rejoined the King.

Shortly afterwards, Lord Hastings entered the cabinet, looking very much disturbed.

"I have been sorely tempted to disobey your Majesty's commands, and detain the Duke of Clarence," he said. "We have abundant proofs that he has been conspiring against you, and if not checked, he is certain to breed confusion, and perhaps cause another insurrection."

"Such is my own opinion," said Edward. "But Mistress Shore has pleaded for him, and I have yielded to her entreaties."

"He is so actively mischievous, that he ought not to be at large, my liege," said Hastings.

"I have ordered him to return at once to Ludlow Castle, and keep close there," rejoined Edward.

"But you neglected to send a guard with him, my liege," said Hastings. "He has gone to Shene."

"To Shene!" cried Edward. "Follow him thither at once with a dozen men-at-arms. Arrest him, and clap him in the Tower. There he will be quiet, and may plot at his ease, without danger to me."

"My liege!" cried Jane.

"You see in vain," rejoined Edward. "I am deaf to your entreaties. About the business at once, my lord!"

"Give me this warrant for the Duke's arrest, my liege," said Hastings, "and he shall be lodged within the Tower before night."

This was done, and Hastings set out at once for Shene Palace, where he found the Duke, and arrested him.

VII.

HOW CLARENCE WAS IMPRISONED IN THE BOWYER'S TOWER.

CLARENCE manifested great displeasure at what he termed the King's violation of faith, but he did not offer any resistance, and, his attendants being dismissed, he was conveyed, by water, to the Tower, and placed in a prison-lodging at the rear of the donjon.

The fortification wherein the Duke of Clarence was confined, and which, from this circumstance, has acquired a peculiarly gloomy celebrity, is situated in an angle at the north of the ancient wall surrounding the inner ward.

The structure is of great strength, and originally consisted of two stories, approached by a circular stone staircase. The basement floor, in which the Duke was confined, and which exactly corresponded with the upper room, now demolished, was vaulted and groined, and contained three deep recesses, contrived in the thickness of the walls, and each terminated by a narrow, grated embrasure. Near the ponderous door there was a small cell, likewise formed in the substance of the wall.

The fortification derived its name, as will be readily conjectured, from having been originally the residence of the master-bowyer, one of the officers of the Tower; but even at the date of our story, it had long been used as a place of confinement for state prisoners.

In this gloomy prison the ambitious and luxurious Clarence was left to fret.

For a short time he persuaded himself that his royal brother, whom he had so deeply injured, but who had so often forgiven him, would relent and set him free. But his expectation vanished as he reflected upon what he had done, and he blamed his own imprudence. He well knew he had a bitter enemy in the Queen, and that she would harden the King's heart against him. Besides, he had many other powerful enemies bent upon his destruction, while his friends were unable to serve him.

He could think of no other person who would act as a mediator between him and the King except Jane, and hearing she was at Westminster, he contrived to send a message to her. But before she could respond to his appeal, he had a visit from his brother, the Duke of Gloucester, which entirely altered his frame of mind.

Unaware that the deeply dissembling Gloucester secretly aspired to the throne, and, consequently, desired the removal of every obstacle in his way, Clarence confided in him, and when he visited him in his prison, laid bare his secret heart to him.

"Tis certain I have deeply offended the King, our brother, by seeking to disinherit him and his children," he said; "but I do not despair of obtaining a pardon, through the instrumentality of Mistress Shore."

"Do not apply to her, brother," rejoined the wily Gloucester. "Mistress Shore will do you more harm than good. That she will undertake your cause I nothing doubt. But her previous interference in your behalf displeased the King, and if she troubles him again, all my exertions will be ineffectual. I hope to find a better advocate for you than Mistress Shore."

"Impossible! She has far more influence with Edward than anyone else, and can counteract the Queen's animosity, which I have most reason to dread."

"What if I secure the Queen herself, brother?" said Gloucester. "Already I have spoken with her Majesty, who shows a kindly disposition towards you. Upon that feeling I will work till I have enlisted her sympathies in your behalf, and then you are safe, for the King will not refuse her if she solicits your pardon. But if Mistress Shore steps in beforehand, and torments Edward with importunities, even the Queen will fail."

"I should have thought the Queen more likely to inflame Edward against me than to pacify him."

"You have to thank me for this favourable change in her sentiments," said Gloucester. "But the utmost caution must be observed, or her enmity may again be aroused. Have nought to do with Mistress Shore, brother—that is my counsel."

But I have besought Mistress Shore to come to me," said Clarence.

"Tis well you told me this, or you had spoiled all," said Gloucester. "Forbid her to speak to the King—peremptorily forbid her! Heed not giving the minion offence. Dismiss her!"

"By so doing, I shall make her my enemy."

"No matter. You must choose between her and the Queen. But I must now leave you."

"Your discourse has cheered me greatly, brother," said Clarence. "Come again soon, I pray you."

I must not come too often," replied Gloucester. "But I have brought you something that will cheer you better than my society. Something to gladden your heart, brother."

"What is it? A book? A lute?" cried Clarence.

Just then, a noise was heard outside.

"Someone comes," cried Gloucester. "It may be Mistress Shore. I would not meet her. You shall hear from me ere long. Farewell!"

But before he could depart, the door was opened by Dighton, the gaoler, and Jane entered the room, attended by Malbouche.

Bowing haughtily to her, Gloucester was about to pass forth, when the jester said to him—

"I expected to find your Highness here."

"How art knave?" cried the Duke, surprised.

"Because I fancied you would like to change places with the Duke, your brother," replied Malbouche, with a grin.

"Go to," cried Gloucester. "Thou art a meddling fool!" And he quitted the chamber in some confusion.

VIII.

HOW A BUTT OF MALMSEY WAS SENT TO CLARENCE BY THE DUKE OF GLOUCESTER.

"I THANK you, madame, for this kindly visit," said Clarence. "Your sympathy for the unfortunate proves the goodness of your heart."

"I fear I can render you little assistance, my lord," said Jane. "The King still continues violently incensed. 'Tis in vain I endeavour to exculpate you. He will not listen to me. Your enemies are too powerful."

"One of the worst has just gone forth," remarked Malbouche.

"My brother! The Duke of Gloucester! I cannot believe it," cried Clarence.

"'Tis true," said the jester. "He is leagued with the Queen against your Highness."

"Thou art mistaken," exclaimed the Duke. "He asserted, even now, that the Queen is friendly to me."

"Alas! my lord, it is not so," said Jane. "I fear you have but one friend to plead your cause with the King."

"And Gloucester would have me alien at that friend!" cried Clarence. "Oh, madame, how much I owe you! Without you I were lost."

"I will save you, my lord, if I can," said Jane. "I will beg your life on my knelt knees. But I dare not promise that my prayer will be granted."

"Yes, yes; it will!" cried Clarence, eagerly. "The King can refuse you nothing. If he spares me, he may rely on my fidelity and devotion for the future. No more plots, no more insurrections. Let him take back all my possessions. I shall be content with bare life."

"Should your Highness be pardoned, as I trust you may be," said Jane, "I am well assured the King will act generously. Your possessions will not be forfeited."

"You give me some hopes, then?" cried Clarence.

"If your enemies prove not too powerful, my lord, I trust I shall prevail," said Jane.

Here an interruption was offered by the entrance of Sir Robert Brackenbury, the lieutenant of the Tower.

"His Grace the Duke of Gloucester hath sent your Highness a butt of the choicest malmsey," said Brackenbury. "The men are now bringing it hither."

"I am half inclined to return the gift," cried the Duke.

"Nay, my lord, I pray you do not," said the Lieutenant. "You will offend his Grace, and, moreover, the wine will cheer you, and enable you to bear your confinement. Ha! here it comes."

And as he spoke, a huge cask was pushed into the room—not without some difficulty—by three stout porters.

"'Twill incommode your Highness if it stand here!" said Brackenbury. "Place it in yonder recess," he added, to the porters.

And the men, having fulfilled their task, departed.

"Your Highness can now drown your cares!" cried Malbouche, as he gazed at the butt, which completely blocked up the embrasure.

"I can drown myself whenever I am so minded!" rejoined Clarence.

The hint did not seem lost on Brackenbury, to judge from the singular expression of his countenance.

"Will it please your Highness to taste the wine?" he added. "If so, I will have the cask broached forthwith."

"Not now, Sir Robert," rejoined Clarence.

"Behrew me, if I would drink a drop of it," said Malbouche.

"If your Highness has any fear, I will not as your taster," observed Brackenbury.

"Thank you, good Sir Robert," said Clarence. "If I thought the wine would procure me oblivion, I would drink deeply of it."

"Avoid it, my lord, if you are wise," remarked Jane, in a low, significant tone.

Then, turning to the Lieutenant, she added, "I will pray you conduct me to the gate, Sir Robert."

Brackenbury bowed in assent, and immediately afterwards the party quitted the prison, and Clarence was left alone to his reflections.

IX.

HOW CLARENCE WAS TRIED FOR HIGH TREASON AND CONDEMNED TO DEATH.

WITHIN a week from this date, Clarence was placed at the bar of the House of Lords, charged with high treason, the Duke of Buckingham being appointed high steward for the occasion.

The prosecution being conducted by the King in person, it was evident from the first that the prisoner would be found guilty. So overpowered, indeed, were the nobles by Edward's vehemence and passion, that not a single voice was raised in the Duke's favour.

Yet Clarence defended himself courageously and well, and produced a strong impression upon his auditors. Energetically denying the accusations brought against him by the King, he denounced the Queen and the Duke of Gloucester as his mortal enemies, and the secret contrivers of this scheme for his destruction.

His defence, however, as had been foreseen, proved unavailing, and when he gazed around at the noble assemblage at the close of his eloquent address, all looks were averted from him. He was found guilty, condemned to death, and sentence pronounced upon him by the Duke of Buckingham.

But Edward objected to a public execution, and it was thought, from the reluctance thus manifested by the King, that he would pardon his unfortunate brother.

Perhaps the Duke himself entertained some such expectation. The firmness he had displayed throughout the trial never deserted him, and he heard his sentence with composure.

With a haughty step he marched from Westminster Hall to the barge that was waiting to convey him back to the Tower, and was wholly unmoved by the cries of the populace.

But when he was alone in his prison-chamber in the Bowyer's Tower, his courage deserted him. He then felt how vain it was to struggle against his enemies.

Not one of those whom he had favoured, and helped to raise to greatness, had spoken in arrest of judgment—not one would plead for him—while some, he felt sure, would harden the King's heart against him.

His sole hope rested upon Jane. If anyone could save him, she could. Convinced of this, he sent for Sir Robert Brackenbury, who, he thought, had a friendly feeling towards him, and besought him to despatch a messenger to her with a letter which he had prepared, and the Lieutenant complied with the request.

Instead of writing an answer, Jane came in person, accompanied, as before, by Malbouche. The expression of her countenance was calculated to revive the Duke's hopes. Brackenbury was present at the interview.

"I had not waited for your letter, my lord," she said, "to implore a remission of your sentence from the King, and I trust your life will be spared. You will be banished for a time to Ireland—"

"That is nothing!" cried Clarence, joyfully. "I can endure a long exile with patience, but I cannot meet death, with the fortitude I expected. Oh, how much I owe you, madame!"

"I deem it right to inform your Highness," said Jane, "that the Duke of Gloucester has been striving to obtain a warrant for your secret execution; but I do not think, after my representations to his Majesty, that he will succeed."

"Heaven confound the fratricide and murderer! He is worse than Cain!" exclaimed Clarence, furiously. "He seeks to slay me, that he may mount the throne himself. Is it possible Edward does not perceive his aim?"

"His Majesty can only see one thing at a time, your Highness," remarked Malbouche.

"He will find out his mistake when it is too late," said Clarence. "The Queen, too, will regret her misplaced confidence in the dissembling villain."

"Send back his butt of malmsey, my lord," said Malbouche. "'Tis still here, I see."

"Ay, and the sight of it disturbs me!" cried Clarence. "I have not tasted, nor will I taste, the contents of the cask. Take it hence, I pray you, Sir Robert?"

"Heed not this fool's advice, my lord!" said Brackenbury. "You will be glad of the wine anon."

"'Tis no fool's advice, as his Highness will find," said the jester.

"Well, to-morrow the cask shall be removed, if his Highness desires it," rejoined Brackenbury.

"To-morrow!" ejaculated Malbouche. "Who knows what may happen before to-morrow?"

"Dost think the butt will be emptied, knave?" said the Lieutenant.

"I know not what to think," rejoined the jester. "But strange qualms come o'er me when I look at it."

"I must now take leave of your Highness," said Jane. "I shall continue to watch over your safety."

"I like not to say farewell for ever, madame," rejoined the Duke, in a despondent tone. "But have a foreboding we shall never meet again in this world."

"Dismiss the thought," said Jane. "Your enemies shall not triumph over you if I can prevent them."

"Beware of yonder cask," said Malbouche. "That 's my parting counsel to your Highness."

Jane and the others then went forth, and the Duke was once more left to his melancholy reflections.

Before Jane and the Lieutenant reached the Tower stairs, near which the barge was moored, they encountered Sir William Catesby, the Duke of Gloucester's chief confidant.

He had just landed from a covered boat, and was accompanied by two stalwart but repulsive-looking attendants.

To Jane, Catesby's appearance at this juncture seemed ominous of ill; and Brackenbury's countenance grew sombre as he noticed his ill-omened attendants. Malbouche absolutely shuddered at the sight of them.

"Have you any business with me, Sir William?" inquired the Lieutenant, as Catesby came up.

"Very important business, Sir Robert," replied the other, in accents distinctly heard by Jane and her companion. "I bring you a warrant for the immediate execution of the Duke of Clarence. 'Tis the King's pleasure that the execution be done in secret. More anon."

With this, he delivered the warrant to Brackenbury, who bowed as he received it.

At the same moment, an irrepressible cry from Jane attracted the attention of Catesby's sinister attendants, and they both turned their sullen faces towards her.

X.

SHOWING IN WHAT MANNER THE DUKE OF CLARENCE WAS PUT TO DEATH.

"THOUGH I have a warrant for this secret execution, I like it not," remarked Brackenbury, as he stood with Catesby near the entrance to the Lieutenant's lodgings. "It savours of a murder, and I would rather have no hand in it."

"It must appear that the Duke has died a natural death," rejoined Catesby. "Miles Forrest and Swartmoor, the two men I have brought with me, will do the deed well, and give you no trouble. But since you dislike the business, leave it to me. Give me the keys of the Bowyer's Tower, and order the gaoler not to go there till to-morrow morning."

"Right glad am I to be relieved of a duty so unpleasant," said Brackenbury. "For a mountain of gold I would not have such a crime upon my conscience. If I understand aright, the Duke is allowed to choose the manner of his death?"

"Even so," replied Catesby. "But me thinks 'twere best not to give him the choice. I have my own idea of an easy end, and that I shall now put in practice."

"Would that the matter could be delayed!" exclaimed the compassionate Lieutenant.

"That were impolitic. When Louis was consulted by our own King about the imprisonment of the Duke of Clarence, the shrewd French monarch replied, in a verse from Lucan,— Delay not when you are ready to act. That is my own maxim."

'Tolle moras, semper nocuit differe paratis.'

"But the Duke is unprepared," said Brackenbury. "He must not be cut off in his sin. I will take his confessor, Father Lambert, to him."

"I object not to the confessor," rejoined Catesby; "but my plan must not be marred."

"Tell me naught of your plan, and then I cannot interfere with it," said the Lieutenant.

"Enter my lodgings, I pray you, and take Forrest and Swartmoor with you. 'Twere best they should not be seen about. On my return, you shall have the keys of the prison, and all else you may require."

"No need of haste," rejoined Catesby. "Nothing will be done before midnight."

"The deed befits the hour," observed Brackenbury.

He then proceeded towards St. Peter's Chapel in quest of Father Lambert, while Catesby called to his men, and took them into the Lieutenant's lodgings.

Clarence was pacing to and fro within his prison-chamber, in a very agitated state of mind, when the door was unlocked, and Brackenbury entered with Father Lambert, who was well-known to the Duke, and, indeed, acted as his confessor.

Extending his arms over the illustrious prisoner, who bent reverently before him, Father Lambert exclaimed,—

"The saints be with you, my son."

Then, regarding him earnestly, he added, "I trust I find you resigned to Heaven's holy will."

"My sufferings are severe, father," replied the Duke; "but, I strive to bear them patiently. I thank you for this visit. Your exhortations will greatly comfort me."

"My son," said Father Lambert, solemnly, "I have come to help you to prepare for death."

"Is it so near at hand?" demanded Clarence, reading in the Lieutenant's looks a confirmation of the dread announcement.

"Alas! my lord, I can give you no hope," said Brackenbury. "The King is inexorable. Your enemies have prevailed!"

"But when am I to die, and how?" cried

Clarence. "How many hours are left me? Shall I behold another day?"

"My lord, I cannot answer the questions you put to me," rejoined Brackenbury. "'Tis certain you have not long to live. 'Twere best, therefore, to employ the little time remaining to you in preparation for eternity. To that end, I will leave Father Lambert with you. He will tarry as long as you list, and I promise you shall not be interrupted. May our Blessed Lord absolve you of all your sins!"

He then went forth, leaving the Duke alone with the priest.

The Duke had much to confess, for nearly three hours had elapsed ere Father Lambert rejoined the Lieutenant, who was waiting for him at the foot of the stone staircase.

"How left you his Highness, holy father?" inquired Brackenbury, in a tone of deep solicitude.

"Truly and heartily contrite," replied the priest. "I have given him full absolution."

Greatly comforted by the prayers and exhortations of his ghostly counsellor, Clarence became more composed.

When night came on, he did not seek his couch, but while seated in a chair, sank into a profound slumber, from which he was aroused by the opening of the door.

The foremost of those who entered bore a lamp, that served to dispel the gloom, and showed him three persons, whose appearance filled him with dismay.

Springing to his feet, he stood gazing at them in speechless terror. Their proceedings surprised him. He who bore the lamp set it down, while his ruffianly attendants placed a flagon and some silver goblets they had brought with them on a little oak table that stood in the centre of the room.

"Is it thou, Catesby?" demanded the Duke, at length. "What brings thee here at this untimely hour?"

"I am come to have a carouse with your Highness," replied the other.

"Thou mockest me! Knowest thou not I am condemned to death?"

"'Tis in the hope of cheering your last moments that I have thus intruded upon your Highness," rejoined Catesby. "I have been informed by his Grace of Gloucester that your Highness is well supplied with wine. Nay, by the mass! I desecrate a butt of malmsey in yonder recess. We shall scarce finish it at a sitting; but let us make the attempt!"

"No more wine shall pass my lips," said the Duke; "but drink as much as you will, and let your men help you!"

"I thank your Highness for the offer," rejoined Catesby. "Knock off the lid of the cask, and fill the flagon," he added to his attendants.

As the order was obeyed, the powerful odour of the wine pervaded the chamber, and slightly assailed the Duke's brain.

Filling a goblet to the brim, Catesby emptied it at a draught.

"By the mass! 'tis a rare wine!" he cried.

"His Highness said you might taste it," he added, filling a cup for each of his attendants.

"By Saint Dominick, I never drank such wine!" cried Miles Forrest. "It gladdens the heart."

"A cup of it would revive me were I at the last gasp!" exclaimed Swartmoor.

"You hear what they say, my lord?" cried Catesby, filling another goblet. "By Heaven! 'tis the true elixir vite!—a sovereign remedy against earthly ills."

"Ay, that I'll warrant it!" cried Miles Forrest. "Would my cup might be replenished!"

"And mine!" cried Swartmoor.

"Stint them not, I command you!" said the Duke to Catesby. "Since the wine pleases you, my good fellows, drink of it lustily."

"We should enjoy it far more an' your Highness would bear us company," said Miles Forrest.

"Ay, marry, should we!" cried Swartmoor.

"Better wine was never drunk," that I maintain!" cried Catesby. "Were I to yield to my own inclinations, I should half empty yon cask."

"And we could empty the other half," said his attendants laughing.

"Set about the task," cried Clarence.

"But your Highness must help us," said Catesby.

"I am prevented by a promise given to Father Lambert," replied Clarence. "When the wine was brought here, the good priest cautioned me against it, declaring that a draught of it would be fatal to me, and I promised not to touch it."

"The wine cannot be wholesome to us, and noxious to others," said Catesby. "But, be it what it may, I am resolved your Highness shall taste it."

"You will not dare to use force, sir?" cried Clarence, alarmed by his tone and manner, as well as by the altered deportment of the two ruffians. "I will resist to the death!"

"Resistance will be idle, my lord," said Catesby. "Take him to the cask," he added to his myrmidons. "If he will not drink, plunge his head into the wine!"

"Off, villains!" cried Clarence, as they approached. "I guess your design. You would drown me."

They replied by a dreadful laugh, and seizing the Duke, a terrible struggle commenced.

As they dragged him away, despite his desperate efforts to free himself, the table was upset, and the flagon and goblets rolled to the ground, with a hideous clatter.

Catesby did not stay to see the dreadful deed done. Snatching up the lamp, he rushed from the room, and stationed himself outside the door.

While standing there, he heard a terrible splash, followed by half-stifled cries, mingled with imprecations from the murderers. Then all became silent.

Only for a few minutes.

A dreadful sound was next heard of a heavy body thrown on the floor.

Catesby waited no longer.

On re-entering the room, he saw an inert mass lying on the ground.

Beside it stood the two murderers.

The floor was flooded with wine. Wine, also, was streaming from the long locks of the victim, and from the upper part of his rich habiliments, showing how his death had been accomplished.

Next day, it was rumoured throughout London that the Duke of Clarence had died suddenly during the night in his prison-chamber in the Tower; and the circumstance seemed so suspicious, that loud murmurs of indignation were everywhere heard.

To allay the popular excitement, the body was exposed at Saint Paul's that all might behold it. But no one was imposed upon by the exhibition, and the general opinion remained the same—that the Duke had not come fairly by his end.

Within the fortress, these doubts were speedily converted into certainty; for the unheard-of manner of the illustrious prisoner's death could not be concealed from the gaolers.

Thenceforth, a superstitious horror brooded over the Bowyer's Tower. Always gloomy, it was now supposed to be haunted. Strange sounds were heard at dead of night in the chamber wherein the ill-fated Clarence had met his mysterious death, and the hapless prisoners who succeeded him were scared almost out of their senses by fearful sights and sounds.

BOOK IV.

EDWARD THE FOURTH.

I.

HOW CAXTON PRESENTED A PSALTER TO THE KING.

DEEPLY, but unavailingly, did Edward reproach himself that he had not pardoned his unhappy brother. Perhaps, if Jane had seen the King after the meeting on the wharf with Catesby and the murderers, whose dark design she suspected, her prayers might have prevailed; but, owing to Gloucester's management, she could not obtain access to his Majesty till all was over, and Edward had a weight upon his soul that could not be removed. His brother's blood seemed to cry out for vengeance against him, and he trembled lest the dark offence of which he had been guilty should be visited upon his children.

Only three months previously he had created Edward, his eldest son, still quite a boy, Prince of Wales, and Richard, the youngest, Duke of York. What if both should be taken from him, and his line cut off? He confessed he had provoked Heaven's wrath, and that the punishment would not be greater than he deserved.

To stifle his remorse, he again began to indulge in the excesses that had heretofore proved so baneful to him. But self-indulgence did not lighten his mental anguish, while it increased the bodily infirmities that had stolen upon him of late. His temper became uncertain, and he frequently gave way to violent fits of passion.

This change in his habits, though regarded with much concern by those who loved him, was highly satisfactory to the darkly-designing Gloucester, as it held forth the promise that the life of the royal voluptuary would not be long.

But another passion, besides luxury, had taken possession of the King, from which he had hitherto been wholly free. Owing to the sums extorted from his subjects under various pretexts, the estates he had confiscated, and the large annual pension he received from Louis XI., he became very rich, and as his treasures increased, he grew covetous.

Hitherto lavish, if not generous, he was now avaricious and grasping. His gifts were rare and no longer princely, and his courtiers complained of his excessive parsimony. The engaging qualities that had won for him the regard of the people in his earlier days, and aided him to establish the throne, had disappeared; but he was still affable, and retained his fondness for splendid attire. His unequalled symmetry of person was gone, and his strength enervated by indulgence. Jane had lost none of her influence over him, and exercised it beneficially as ever. The King's new-born avarice troubled her exceedingly, though not on her own account, but she had many suitors whom she desired to serve, and whom she was now obliged to send empty away.

Amongst those who presented themselves, one day, in the ante-chamber of her apartments in the Palace of Westminster, was William Caxton.

This remarkable individual, who was the first to introduce the art of printing into England, was then turned seventy, but was still hale and hearty, and looked as if several years of active and useful life were still left him—as, indeed, they were, for he lived to be eighty-one.

Temperate in his habits, still capable of great mental and bodily exertion, plain in attire, quiescent in look, and sedate in manner, Caxton presented a striking contrast to the indolent and luxurious Edward, whose strength had been impaired, and whose beauty and personal symmetry had been destroyed, by continual excesses.

On the marriage of Margaret of York, Edward's sister, to Charles the Bold, Caxton, who had been engaged in commercial pursuits in Holland and Flanders, was appointed to a place in the household of the Duchess, and, by her command, translated and printed Raoul Lefevre's "History of Troy."

Shortly afterwards he returned to his own country. Patronised by Lord Rivers, the Queen's brother, and protected by the Bishop of Hereford, he established a printing-press in Westminster Abbey. Here was produced his renowned "Game of Chess," which enjoys the distinction of being the first book printed in England. Here, also, were printed many other books, among which were the poems of Chaucer; and the famous printer was still adding to his long list of marvellous works, when he presented himself, on the morning in question, in Jane's ante-chamber.

When Caxton's name was announced by the usher, Jane desired that he might be instantly admitted, and expressing her pleasure at seeing him, she presented him to the King, who was fortunately with her at the time.

Edward was seated in a fauteuil, propped up by cushions, with his foot on a talbouret, conversing with Malbouche, who stood beside him; but he slightly raised himself as Caxton was brought forward, and, kneeling down, proffered him a small book.

"Deign, sire," he said, "to accept this psalter, printed expressly for your own use. I regard it as the best specimen of my art, or I should not presume to offer it to your Majesty."

"'Tis beautifully executed," said Edward, taking the psalter from him, and motioning him to rise. "You have achieved wonders, good Master Caxton."

"The art is only in its infancy, my liege," replied the printer, modestly. "Wonders, no doubt, will be achieved by those who come after me."

"Meantime, you have done much," said Jane, to whom the King had handed the book, and who seemed greatly pleased with it. "This great invention," she said, "which you have so successfully carried out, will be one of the memorable events of his Majesty's reign."

"Ay, marry, we have reason to feel proud of you, good Master Caxton," said Edward. "When my sister, the Duchess of Burgundy, wrote to me that you had printed for her Raoul Lefevre's 'History of Troy,' I did not comprehend that a greater feat had been accomplished than any deed of arms, and that you had conquered a kingdom hitherto unknown. Since then I have watched your progress with much interest, and it has been matter of the highest satisfaction to me that you have chosen our capital, and not a foreign city, as the scene of your important labours. My brother, Lord Rivers, hath often spoken of you in terms of the warmest commendation; and I have fully intended, though I have too long neglected to do so, to visit your printing-press in Westminster Abbey."

"Why not go there now, my liege?" cried Jane. "Of all things, I should like to see this wonder-working press!"

"'Twill, indeed, be a great gratification if your Majesty will so far honour me," said Caxton, delighted by the proposition; "but I am wholly unprepared."

"No preparation is necessary," said the King. "If the visit be postponed, it may never be made."

"Very true, sire," said Malbouche. "Your Majesty constantly forms good resolutions, but rarely keeps them. 'Tis too much trouble,' or 'Another time will be best.' An excuse is never wanting."

"I have had so much fatigue, that I am now glad of repose," said the King.

"I do not wonder at it, my liege," remarked Caxton. "Though, for my own part, nothing wearies so much as idleness. But then I have not the same excuse as your Majesty."

"In sooth, I have no excuse," said Edward. "My health suffers from want of exercise, and my physicians counsel me to spend five or six hours each day on horseback."

"And so do I, my liege," observed Jane. "You must, perforce, return to Windsor, and hunt daily in the forest."

"And forego grand banquets for a time," added Malbouche. "I am the best physician."

"Wouldst starve me, knave?" cried Edward, testily.

"No, my liege," replied the jester. "But I would limit your repast to a dozen dishes, and never allow it to exceed twenty. Nor would I suffer you to consume more than three flasks of that good wine of Chalosse, sent you by Louis of France, of which your Majesty is so fond."

Caxton could scarce repress a smile.

"Faith, the wine is so good, that I am tempted to drink too much of it!" remarked the King.

"A war with France would prove a certain cure for all your Majesty's ailments," said Caxton.

"I must not have recourse to it," rejoined the King. "But let us go see your printing-press."

The party then left the palace by a private door, and proceeded to the Abbey.

II.

THE VISIT TO THE CAXTON PRINTING PRESS.

The chamber in which stood the first printing-press established in England was situated at the back of the Abbey near the cloisters, and had once been a chapel, whence originated the designation still applied to a printer's work-room.

In this antique apartment, which was built of stone, and had a groined roof, and pointed windows filled with stained glass, was set up the cumbersome machine that had already wrought so many wonders. Near it were ranged a few frames of the simplest and most primitive construction, furnished with cases containing the handsome black letter used by Caxton.

On one side was a large oak table, piled high with folios bound in vellum, and some books of smaller size, all being products of the Caxton press.

Behind the table, in a deep recess, stood a desk and stool—the desk being covered with papers, and the stool occupied by a Franciscan friar, who was evidently compiling some historical work from the documents placed before him.

Three apprentices of very sedate deportment, and attired in jerkins of coarse brown serge, were at work, picking out letters from the cases with great deliberation.

An air of extreme quietude pervaded the chamber.

On the entrance of the royal party the apprentices suspended their work, and the monk ceased writing, and withdrew into the depths of the recess. But Jane noticed him, and a feeling of uneasiness, for which she could scarcely account, came over her.

"How tranquil all seems here, good Master Caxton!" remarked Edward, as he looked around. "Yours must be an agreeable occupation since it can be thus conducted."

"We are as quiet as if we were in a convent, my liege," replied Caxton. "Nay, many holy men lend me aid. Friar Sylvius, who has left his desk, is compiling a portion of my Polychronicon."

"To what does that work relate?" inquired Jane.

"When completed, 'twill be a chronicle of the chief events of his Majesty's reign," rejoined Caxton. "Father Sylvius is now preparing a narrative of the recent expedition to France, with an account of the treaty with King Louis."

On hearing this, Edward expressed much satisfaction, and said he would question the friar anon, and, if need be, give him some information. Caxton then proceeded to explain the process of printing, and, to demonstrate it more clearly, caused a few lines to be set up, and pulled at the press, addressed to the Dame de Beaulieu. The sheet was respectfully presented by one of the apprentices to Jane, who bestowed a boon upon them.

The books, of which mention has been made as lying on the table, were next examined, and much admired by the King and his companion.

"All these have been printed by me within the last few years," said Caxton, as he displayed them. "This is the 'Sayings of the Philosophers'; this is a translation of Ovid's 'Book of Metamorphoses'; here are the 'Chronicle of England'; here is the 'History of Reynard the Fox'; here is 'Godfrey of Bouillogne'; this is the 'Pilgrimage of the Soul'; and this is the 'Liber Festivalis.'"

"A goodly collection, in truth, Master Caxton," observed Edward, glancing at the volumes as they were handed to him. "I am well acquainted with two of them, 'Godfrey of Bouillogne' and 'Reynard the Fox.' Ovid's 'Metamorphoses' I have read in the original Latin, and I hope to profit by the 'Sayings of the Philosophers.' You recommended to me the 'Pilgrimage of the Soul,'" he added, to Jane; "but I have not yet read the work."

"I have studied it carefully," said Jane; "and can pronounce it an excellent treatise. But your Majesty has read all Chaucer's Poems, which have likewise been collected by Master Caxton."

"Ay, marry!" rejoined Edward; "I have read them with infinite delectation." But will now say a word to Father Sylvius. Come with me," he added, to Jane.

Thereupon he entered the recess, at the further end of which stood the friar, with his hood partially drawn over his face. Fancying that the King did not require his attendance, Caxton remained in the chapel.

As the King approached, Father Sylvius bowed reverently, but did not raise his hood, so that Jane could not discover his features. But her uneasiness increased, and when he spoke, his voice vibrated to the inmost recesses of her breast.

"We learn from Master Caxton that you are writing a chronicle of our reign, holy father," said Edward. "We hope the record will be faithful."

"I have merely undertaken to describe your Majesty's expedition to France," replied the friar. "I am so far qualified for the task, in that I was present at the time. My sole regret is, that I have not a battle, like that of Asincour, to recount."

"You may yet have your wish," rejoined the King. "Our cousin Louis seems inclined to violate the treaty of Picquigny. If he continues to trifle with us in regard to the marriage of the Dauphin with our daughter, the Lady Elizabeth, we shall call him to a strict account; and if we again invade France, thou may'st rest assured we will not return without having taken from him two of his duchies."

"Sire," said the Franciscan, in a deep, low voice, "no second invasion will take place!"

"Ha! what mean'st thou?" exclaimed Edward, sharply. "Dost pretend to pry into the future?"

"No, my liege," replied Father Sylvius. "But the opportunity of successfully invading France is gone. You cannot count upon the support of the Flemings, who are now attached to the interests of Louis. Charles the Bold is dead. The Duke of Bretagne is afflicted with an illness that renders him incapable of any great enterprise. Your new allies, the Kings of Spain and Portugal, will not assist you. It follows, therefore, that if you undertake another war with France, it must be alone and unaided—and this you will not do."

"Thou art mistaken, father," cried Edward. "Let Louis provoke me, and he shall feel my wrath—feel it in every vein in his heart. I will strike a blow that he cannot resist."

"That you might do so, my liege, were you strong, as of old, I doubt not," said Father Sylvius. "But you may find, when you most need them, that your energies are departed. Think not of war, but make your peace with Heaven. It may be," he added, with impressive solemnity, "that you will not have too much time allowed you for repentance."

With difficulty, Edward restrained his wrath, but he contented himself with saying, with forced calmness,—

"Know'st thou not that thy talk is treasonable, and touches thy life?"

"That consideration will not deter me from speaking freely, sire," rejoined the Franciscan.

"I deem it my duty to warn your Majesty that your time may not be long on earth. 'Twere best, therefore, that the interval should be passed in penitence and prayer. Make atonement if you have done wrong or injustice."

"Have I done thee wrong, that thou dar'st address me thus?" demanded Edward.

"The greatest wrong that man can endure," replied the monk. "Thou hast taken my wife from me."

And throwing back his hood, he displayed the features of Alban Shore.

Even Edward recoiled at the sight of the man he had so deeply injured.

"Let us go hence, my liege," said Jane. "His looks terrify me."

Shore was again about to speak, but the King commanded him, in a stern, menacing tone, to be silent.

"I spare thee, though thou dost richly deserve death," said Edward. "But put a bridle henceforth on thy tongue, or no mercy shall be shown thee."

"Sire, give heed to my words," said Shore. "I am not distraught, as you may imagine, nor have I any desire of vengeance. But I warn you that the evil day is at hand. Thou, also, art warned!" he added to Jane.

"Spare him, my liege! spare him, for my sake!" she cried, seeing that the King was about to order the imprudent man's arrest.

Though highly incensed, Edward yielded, and went forth with her. Calming himself by a great effort, he spoke with as much composure to Caxton as if nothing had occurred to disturb him, and shortly afterwards quitted the chapel with his attendants.

III.

FOX AND GESE.

THE Court had removed from Westminster to Windsor Castle, and Edward had not been at the latter place many days when intelligence was brought him that the young Duchess Marie of Burgundy, daughter of Charles the Bold, whom Clarence had sought in marriage, but who had bestowed her hand upon Maximilian, Duke of Austria, had been killed by a fall from her horse while hawking.

This sad event disturbed the King greatly, inasmuch as it was likely to lead to important occurrences. The ill-fated Duchess, thus suddenly snatched away in the spring of life, left one child, a daughter, then only three and a half years old. Marguerite of Austria, the child in question, was now the greatest heiress of the day; and it was said that when the wily Louis of France heard of the death of the Duchess, wholly disregarding his treaty with the King of England, he resolved to affiancé the infant Duchess to the Dauphin.

This startling piece of news, conveyed by the English ambassadors at the Court of France, was well calculated to alarm Edward; but after reflecting upon it, and consulting with the Queen, he thought it improbable, well knowing that Maximilian, the father of the child, would be averse to the alliance; and he therefore contented himself with instructing his ambassador, the Lord Howard, who was then at Plessis-les-Tours, with Louis, to watch carefully over the cunning King's proceedings, and report them. For his own part, he said, he refused to doubt his good brother's sincerity.

A more impolitic course could not have been adopted. Heavily bribed by Louis, the ambassadors sent their royal master no further information till the secret treaty for the marriage, of which they were perfectly cognizant, had been concluded at Arras, and the little Princess was on the way to Paris.

Whatever rumours reached him, Edward disregarded them, and smiled incredulously when warned by some of his faithful councillors against the artifices of Louis.

In a large withdrawing-room, belonging to the Queen's apartments in the Castle, hung with cloth of gold arras, and otherwise splendidly furnished, were assembled, one afternoon, all the King's children—namely, two young princes and six princesses; and a more charming collection of young persons, ranging from very tender years to well-nigh sixteen, could not be found.

The Queen had brought her royal husband a numerous family, for three were dead. Of the eight left, all were distinguished for grace and good looks, and some of the princesses were exquisitely beautiful. Elizabeth of York, the eldest of Edward's daughters, who was now, as just intimated, in her sixteenth year, possessed great personal charms, though they were scarcely fully developed, and was extremely amiable in disposition. Her own choice had not been consulted in the important marriage arranged for her by the King her father; but although she had no predilection for the Dauphin, and had not even exchanged a letter with him, she was naturally well pleased with the notion of becoming Queen of France. Eventually, as is well known, she made as great a match, being wedded to Henry VII. of England; but this could not be then foreseen, for Richmond was then held captive in Brittany.

The Princess Elizabeth had a slight and graceful figure, and her features were regular, beautifully moulded, and characterised by great sweetness of expression. She was very richly dressed, as, indeed, were all her sisters, even the youngest of them, who was merely a little girl. Her fair tresses were covered by a caul of gold, and allowed to stream down her back, while her slender waist was spanned by a magnificent girdle. Her coat-harding was of figured satin, and worn so long as almost to hide her pointed shoes.

The young princesses, her sisters, were all equally richly dressed; three of them, Cicely, Anne, and Bridget, in kirtles of cloth of gold and silver; and the two younger, Mary and Catherine, in little gowns of embroidered velvet.

All five were excessively pretty, but perhaps the prettiest of the whole party was the second daughter, Cicely, who bore a marked resemblance to her royal father. She was then promised to the Prince of Scotland, but actually married Lord Wells. The Princess Cicely had lovely features, rich brown tresses, soft blue eyes, and a brilliant complexion.

The Princess Anne resembled her mother, and promised to be quite as beautiful as the Queen was in her younger days. She was to have married into the royal house of Austria, but became Duchess of Norfolk.

Bridget, who, even as a child, had a meek and devout appearance, became a nun. The Princess Mary ought to have been Queen of Denmark, but died too soon.

Edward would fain have married his youngest daughter, Catherine, to the heir to the throne of Portugal, but fate decreed it otherwise, and gave the fair Princess to an English noble, William Courtenay, Earl of Devonshire.

Thus it will be seen that not one of these young princesses hurried according to their royal father's plans. Perhaps they were happier in the alliances they formed. We cannot answer that question. Fortunately, the princes, their brothers, could not foresee the dark fate that awaited them.

Edward, Prince of Wales, then nearly thirteen, was graver and more thoughtful than consorted with his years. He was of a studious turn, and not so fond of sports and exercises as his father had been at his age, but he was not allowed to neglect them. His health was somewhat delicate, and this gave a pale hue to his skin, and, perhaps, imparted a slightly melancholy cast to his countenance. He might have divined that his life would not be long. His eyes were large and black, but lacked fire, and had an almost feminine softness; and his cheeks were not so rounded as they should have been, and wanted bloom. His looks were full of sensibility. His limbs were well proportioned, but extremely slender, and he was tall for his age. His dark-brown hair was cut short over the brow, which was paler than his cheek, and bore traces of great delicacy; but long locks hung down at the sides and at the back.

Very different from the Prince of Wales was Richard Duke of York. He was rather more than three years younger than his brother, was full of health and spirit, having a rosy complexion, bright blue eyes, and long, fair locks.

The young Duke was never happier than when in the saddle. He was constantly in the tilt-yard, and had a little suit of armour made for him and a small lance.

On the present occasion he was attired in a white satin doublet, figured with silver, his surcoat being of blue velvet, ornamented with the royal cognisance. His long hose were of white silk, and his shoes of velvet.

Though different in character, as in appearance, the two brothers were strongly attached to each other, and evinced their regard by a most affectionate manner. As they now stood together in the midst of their fair sisters, the Prince of Wales had his arm over the young Duke's shoulder.

In another part of the room three or four middle-aged dames, who acted as governesses to the young princesses, were seated at a table playing at marteraux—a game in which little ivory balls were placed in the holes of a board—with the two tutors of the young princes. The pages in attendance were amusing themselves with small nine-pins—then called clo-keys, but they had retired into the deep embrasure of a window, and left their charges to themselves. Other attendants in the royal livery were collected at the lower end of the room.

"Madame la Dauphine," said the Prince of Wales to his eldest sister, "I suppose you will soon set out for France, to conclude your marriage with the Dauphin. I hear that the Sire de Beaujeu, with his wife and a brilliant company, are to be sent to meet you at Calais, and conduct you to Paris, where you will have a magnificent reception."

"You know more than I do," replied the Princess Elizabeth. "I have heard nothing about it. But I believe that a messenger from our ambassador, the Lord Howard, is expected to-day. Then, no doubt, I shall learn my fate."

"I wish you would take me with you, Madame la Dauphine," cried the Duke of York. "I should so much like to see Paris. I am told the filles will be splendid—far finer than any we have in London."

"Oh! take us all with you, dear Madame la Dauphine!" cried several small voices, delightedly. "We can go as demoiselles d'honneur."

"You must ask the Queen, and not me," replied the Princess Elizabeth. "If she consents, I shall be delighted to take you."

"I have already petitioned her Majesty," said the Princess Cicely; "and though I almost went down on my knees, she had the cruelty to refuse me."

"Oh, dear! then there is little chance for us!" cried the Princesses Anne and Mary.

"You forget you are both engaged to be married," remarked the Prince of Wales. "What would the King of Denmark say to you, Mary?"

"I don't care for the King of Denmark!" replied the little Princess. "I have never seen him!"

"I have never seen the Dauphin," observed the Princess Elizabeth. "Yet I would not do anything to displease him."

"None of us have seen our intended husbands," said Cicely. "Nor shall we be allowed to do so till our turn comes. I have no wish to visit Edinburgh, where my sweet Prince dwells, but I have a very great desire to go to Paris."

"I thought you were frightened of King Louis?" said the Duke of York.

"So I am; dreadfully frightened of him," rejoined Cicely. "But he won't be at the Louvre. He never leaves Plessis-les-Tours. I wouldn't go there for the world. They say all the habitations near the chateau are pulled down and the trees hung with dead bodies."

"Those are idle stories," remarked the Princess Elizabeth. "I make no doubt Plessis is a very pleasant place, and the old King extremely good-natured."

"Plessis, I am sure, cannot be worse than the Tower," remarked the Duke of York. "I am always melancholy when I go there. Yet the King, our father, likes the place."

"He has not been there of late," observed the Prince of Wales. "I have never liked the Tower since our uncle Clarence died there in that mysterious manner."

"Yes, that was a sad thing," said the Duke of York. Then lowering his voice, he added, "I wish it had been our uncle Gloucester, instead."

"You are an ungrateful boy," said the Princess Elizabeth, gravely. "Your uncle Gloucester is very fond of you."

"His love is feigned," said the little Duke. "I don't like him."

"Neither do I," observed the Prince of Wales. "He is malicious and spiteful."

"You wrong him, Edward," said Elizabeth. "Tis his manner. He has a good heart."

"He has imposed upon you, sweet sister!" rejoined the Prince of Wales. "I am not to be deceived by him."

The Princess made no answer, but, turning to little Bridget, who had hitherto taken no part in the conversation, she said,—

"When I am Queen of France, as I shall be one of these days, Bridget—for the King is growing old—you must come and stay with me at the Louvre."

"That cannot be, Elizabeth!" rejoined the little girl, looking at her fixedly. "I shall be an abbess before you are Queen."

"Bridget doesn't know what she is talking about," cried Cicely.

"Yes, I do," replied the little Princess. "I mean to be a nun, and in time I shall become an abbess; and when I am an abbess, Elizabeth will come to see me, but I shall not go to her."

This reply made the others look rather grave, but the Prince of Wales called out,—

"We have talked quite long enough. Let us amuse ourselves with some game."

"What shall we play at?" cried the Duke of York.

"I am for Prime-Mérimé," said Cicely.

"And I for Queue-Jeu," said Anne.

"I prefer Cache-cache," said Mary.

"My game is Cheval de Bois," said the little Catherine.

"And mine Pinco-sans-rire," added the Prince of Wales. "But what say you, Bridget?"

"I don't mean to play," replied the future Abbess, demurely.

"Since every one has a different choice, I will decide," said the Duke of York. "We will play at fox and geese. You shall all be the geese, and I will be the fox."

And as they all dispersed, except the Princess Elizabeth and little Bridget, who re-remained looking on, the young Prince bent down his head, rounded his shoulders as much as he could, and altered his gait, so as to give a grotesque representation of the Duke of Gloucester.

Though absurd, the likeness was instantly recognised, and the younger girls screamed with laughter, as the little Prince chased them about the room, marching in a very haughty manner, like Gloucester.

Seeing what was going on, the pages joined in the merriment, and the governesses and tutors looked round from the marteau table, at which they were seated, and smiled.

The royal children were in the very midst of the fun, when the arras curtain masking the entrance to the adjoining apartment was suddenly drawn aside, and the King and Queen came in, closely followed by the Duke of Gloucester.

IV.

HOW EDWARD DEEPLY RESENTED THE AFFRONT OFFERED HIM BY LOUIS, AND VOWED TO INVADE FRANCE AGAIN.

So quiet was the entrance of the royal party, and so engrossed were the young Duke of York and the little princesses by their game, that for a few moments they were quite unconscious they were observed by the very person who ought not to have seen them.

Gloucester had, therefore, the mortification of seeing himself mimicked by his youthful nephew; but what was infinitely more annoying, he heard the laughter and jests excited by the representation.

Nevertheless, he preserved his countenance, and would have feigned not to understand what was going on, if Malbouche, who was close behind him, had not called his attention to the little Duke.

"Perdie! his Highness is a rare mimic," he cried. "He has caught me to the life."

"Go to, knave!" rejoined Gloucester. "The mockery is not meant for thee, as thou well know'st."

"For whom, then, can it be intended?" said the jester, innocently. "I cannot suppose the Duke would ridicule your Grace. Yet, now I look again, it may be so."

At this moment the game stopped, and the little actors engaged in it seemed abashed. The principal offender expected to be severely reprimanded, but the King merely said to him,—

"Personal deformities ought never to be derided. You must not do the like again, or you will be corrected. Go and apologize to the Duke, your uncle."

The young Prince instantly obeyed. Assuming a penitential air, he went up to Gloucester, and said,—

"Your pardon, gentle uncle, if I have offended you."

"Nay, I have been highly diverted by your drollery, fair nephew," replied Gloucester. "But 'tis not always safe to mimic people to their face. There are some who might resent it, though I am not one of them."

"I hope you will not bear me malice, gentle uncle," said the little Duke. "They say you are spiteful; but I do not believe it, for I have ever found you good-natured."

"And so I am," rejoined Gloucester. "They who call me spiteful do me great injustice," he added, glancing at the Queen. "I am as inoffensive as a lap-dog—unless provoked."

"And then as savage as a wild boar," muttered Malbouche.

"Methinks my uncle Gloucester is really angry with me," observed the Duke of York in a whisper to the Queen. "He says he is not, but the glance of his eye contradicted his words."

"Rest easy, fair son," she rejoined, in the same tone. "I will make your peace with him anon. But offend him not again; for, as I have often before told you, he is extremely malignant."

"He is watching us now, and guesses what you are saying," whispered the Duke. "Heaven save me from him!"

Among Edward's redeeming qualities was his love for his children, who were all warmly attached to him, though the strict etiquette observed at Court prevented any strong demonstration of their regard.

As soon as they were aware of his presence, they all advanced ceremoniously towards him, attended by their governors and tutors, and each made him a profound obeisance, and another reverence to the Queen.

The King, however, took all his younger children in his arms, and kissed them affectionately.

Little Bridget appeared to be his favourite, for he gazed tenderly into her face, as he held her up before him.

"And so you wish to become a nun, my little darling?" he asked. "What put the notion in thy head?"

"Heaven, sire," she replied, in her childish voice. "The Queen, my mother, has promised to place me in a convent."

"Only for a time," observed her Majesty.

"And I promise to wed thee to a King, my beloved child," said Edward. "Thou may'st therefore choose between a palace and a convent."

"I choose the convent," replied Bridget.

"Then I shall lose thee," observed the King, with a sigh.

"No, sire; you will always know where to find me," she replied. "And I shall always be able to pray for your Majesty and the Queen."

"Heaven bless thee, my sweet child!" exclaimed Edward, kissing her, as he set her down.

He then turned to the Princess Elizabeth, who was standing near, and said,—

"Ah! Madame la Dauphine, you will soon attain the exalted position to which you are destined. Within a week you will set out for Paris, there to seek your husband, the Dauphin. I am in hourly expectation of a messenger from the Lord Howard, our ambassador to the Court of France, and I doubt not I shall receive from King Louis a satisfactory answer to my peremptory demand that your marriage with the Dauphin be forthwith solemnized. I will brook no further delay; and to prevent any more trifling on his part, I have given him to understand that his engagement, made with me at Picquigny, must now be fulfilled, or he must prepare for war."

"I hope this demand may not lead to a rupture between your Majesty and King Louis," observed the Princess. "I should grieve to be the cause of a war."

"Have no fear," replied Edward. "I am obliged to use threats to my good cousin. But you will see how mild his answer will be. As I have just said, you may prepare for your immediate departure for Paris."

"I am ready to obey your Majesty's command in all things," said the Princess. "But I cannot be happier at the French Court than I am here. Possibly I may never see England again, and that thought makes me feel sad, at times."

"Then do not let it trouble you more," said the King. "Be sure the Dauphin will not prevent you from visiting us, should you feel so inclined. But you will become so enamoured of France, that you will have no desire to quit the country. The French Court is far more splendid than our own, and will be far gayer when you are its mistress."

"Wedded to the Dauphin, you will be quite my equal," said the Queen.

"And the King's state of health forbids all chance of long life, so you will soon be Queen," added Edward.

"I hope the Dauphin will like me," said the Princess.

"Be as good a wife to him as the Queen, your mother, has been to me, and he cannot fail to be content," said the King.

"I will strive to imitate her, sire," replied the Princess.

"One piece of counsel I will venture to give you, Madame la Dauphine," said Gloucester. "Meddle with nothing while Louis lives. When he is gone, do what you please."

"Sound advice," cried Edward. "You cannot be too careful with the jealous old King."

Just then, the Lord Chamberlain entered the room with a letter.

"Ha! the messenger has arrived from France!" cried Edward.

"This instant, my liege," replied Hastings; "and he brings this letter from Lord Howard to your Majesty. I trust its contents will please you."

"Have you any doubt?" said the King, looking at him.

"I doubt all that comes from King Louis, sire," replied Hastings.

Edward eagerly broke the seal of the letter, and as he scanned its contents, those who watched him—and almost every eye was upon him—could perceive that he was agitated by suppressed fury.

When he had finished reading the despatch, he crumpled it in his hand, and flinging it from him, gave way to a violent explosion of rage.

"Ah, thou liar and deceiver!" he exclaimed. "Perjured and perfidious as thou art, bitterly shalt thou rue thy treachery! Never will I rest till I have taken vengeance upon thee; never will I forgive the outrageous affront offered me! I swear it by my father's head! Within a month I will invade thy territories with an army doubling in number that which I took with me before; and when I have taken thy kingdom from thee, and made thee and thy son captive, thou wilt regret that thou didst not keep faith with me!"

So furious were the King's looks and gestures as he gave utterance to these menacing words, that the royal children retreated from him in terror, and at a sign from the Queen were hurried out of the room by their governesses and tutors.

Only the Prince of Wales and the Princess Elizabeth were left, and they looked frightened.

No one ventured to address the infuriated monarch till this access of rage had passed by; but when he grew somewhat calmer, the Queen said to him,—

"I comprehend that Louis has broken his engagement; but what hath happened?"

"Madame," replied Edward, "it pains me to the heart to tell you, but I cannot withhold the fact, that our beloved daughter, who has so long borne the title of Dauphine of France, has been outrageously rejected by the double-dealer, Louis. Yes, my sweet love, 'tis even so," he added to the Princess. "Thou, the fairest and best born princess in Europe, hast been shamefully slighted by him."

"In what manner, my liege?" she inquired.

"Lord Howard's letter, which I have just cast from me," replied the King, "informs me that, three days ago, the Dauphin was betrothed at Amboise to Margaret of Austria, daughter of the Duke Maximilian, in the presence of a large crowd of nobles."

"Is thy brilliant dream thus ended?" cried the Princess, unable to repress her emotion.

"Take comfort, my sweet child," cried the Queen, tenderly embracing her. "The King, your father, will make another match for you, better than the one broken off."

"That cannot be," said the Princess.

"I promise you shall be a queen," said Edward. "But my first step shall be to punish the offender. I will immediately return to Westminster, and summon the whole of the nobles, and tell them I have resolved to declare war against the perfidious Louis, to avenge the affront offered to us, to them, and the whole kingdom, in the person of our dearly beloved daughter."

"Every voice will be with you, my liege," said Hastings. "Every sword will be drawn for the Princess."

"I pray your Majesty to take me with you to France," said the Prince of Wales, kneeling to the King. "I will show the Dauphin that he shall not affront my sister!"

"You shall go," replied Edward. "I am well pleased with the request."

"You may become as renowned as the first Prince of Wales, gentle nephew," said Gloucester. "If his Majesty will trust you to my charge, and the campaign lasts long enough, I will teach you the art of war. I trust, my liege, there will be no more treaties."

"Not with Louis," rejoined the King, sternly. "He shall not delude me again. If I sign a peace, it shall be at Paris, and I will dictate my own terms. Come, madame," he added, taking the Queen's hand to lead her forth. "Let us to Westminster. This is a bitter disappointment to us both, but the wrong done shall be requited a hundredfold."

"Sister," said the Prince of Wales to the Princess, as they followed the royal pair out of the room, "my resolution is taken. Either I will slay the Dauphin, or the Dauphin shall slay me."

"I would not check your valour," she replied, smiling through her tears; "but it is Louis who is in fault, not the Dauphin."

"Then I will slay Louis!" rejoined the Prince.

V.

WHAT PASSED IN THE KING'S ANTE-CHAMBER;
AND OF THE SECRET INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN BY GLOUCESTER TO CATSEY.

EDWARD acted with unwonted energy.

On the day after his return to Westminster, he summoned all his nobles, and acquainting them with the galling affront he had received, announced his intention of at once declaring war against Louis. At the same time, he did not neglect to refer to his own pretensions to the throne of France, but stated emphatically that he was now determined to assert them.

The address was responded to with enthusiasm. All the peers present expressed the greatest indignation at the ill-faith and duplicity of Louis, pronounced the war just and necessary, and raising their hands with one accord, vowed to lay down their lives in his Majesty's service.

The Lord Mayor and the citizens, who were next summoned, were equally enthusiastic, and undertook to raise all the money required.

Moreover, the proclamation of a war with France, which immediately followed, caused great satisfaction throughout the kingdom. Thus Edward had every prospect of obtaining the vengeance he desired.

In return for the hearty support the King had experienced, he gave a series of grand banquets; and he indulged so freely at these entertainments, that his health manifestly suffered.

The change in his appearance was so perceptible, that those who loved him became greatly alarmed; while the few who desired his death, from ambitious or other motives, began to think that the crisis was at hand. Among the latter was Gloucester. In his dark breast fresh hopes were kindled by his royal brother's recklessness.

On the morning after one of these grand banquets, at which the King had sat longer than usual, and drank more deeply, several nobles and other important personages were assembled in the ante-room communicating with his Majesty's bed-chamber.

Though the hour was somewhat late, Edward had not yet risen, and some curiosity, not unmingled with uneasiness, was exhibited to learn how his Majesty had passed the night. The only person allowed entrance to the royal chamber was the Marquis of Dorset, the Queen's son by her first marriage. Dorset was Constable of the Tower, and keeper of the King's treasures. The young noble had not yet reappeared.

At length the door opened, and Dorset came forth, looking very grave. In reply to the anxious inquiries addressed to him, he simply said, "His Majesty has passed a bad night, and will not be disturbed."

Among the distinguished personages in the ante-room were the Duke of Buckingham and the Lords Hastings and Stanley; and as they were special favourites of the King, and generally admitted to his presence at all times, they naturally concluded that they could now go in; but the Marquis of Dorset, noticing their design, stopped them, and said,—

"My lords, the King must not be disturbed."

"How is this, my lord?" cried Hastings. "Is his Majesty unwell? 'Tis the first time I have been excluded from his chamber! I will go in!"

"And so will I!" said Buckingham.

"Do as you please, my lords," observed Dorset. "I have repeated his Majesty's injunctions."

And, bowing haughtily, he moved on through the ante-chamber.

A strong feeling of animosity, as we have already mentioned, existed between the old nobility and the Queen's family, of whom Lord Rivers and the Marquis of Dorset were the head. Hastings and the others were, therefore, highly displeased that Dorset should be preferred to them, but they hesitated to disobey the King's express commands.

"If aught happens, that presumptuous upstart's pride shall be lowered!" said Buckingham. "'Tis my belief he has kept us from seeing his Majesty. I hope nothing ails the King."

"Nothing more than a sick headache, caused by last night's excess," said Hastings. "But Dorset would have us believe that his Majesty is really ill."

"And so he is," observed Lord Stanley. "Most assuredly, if he continues in this mad course, he will kill himself."

"He will never be able to conduct the war with France in person," said Hastings.

"No; he must relinquish the command of the army to Gloucester," said Buckingham; "and that will mortify his Majesty greatly. He counted upon entering Paris in triumph."

"His absence will be a great gain to Louis, and render the issue of the contest doubtful."

said Lord Stanley. "Tis almost to be regretted now that the war has been undertaken."

Just then the Duke of Gloucester entered the ante-chamber, attended by Catesby. He directed his steps towards the three nobles, who advanced to salute him.

"Is not the King visible?" he asked.

"No one has seen him but Dorset," replied Hastings. "But your Highness can go in, if you list."

"Is he ill? Is Doctor Lewis with him?" said Gloucester, quickly. "If so, I will see him."

"His Majesty, I trow, will be well enough to join the banquet this evening, and drink more wine of Chalosse," observed Buckingham, significantly.

"Ha! is that all?" cried Gloucester.

"Your Highness should dissuade him from his fatal course," said Hastings. "If he persists in it, there can but be one result."

"I dissuade him!" cried Gloucester. "I have no influence with him, as, you wot well. Get Mistress Shore to advise him. She might check him in this baneful habit. None else can. I am sorry not to see the King—but it matters not. He might not be in the humour to talk to me. I am about to set out to York, as I have some matters to arrange there for his Majesty, before we start for France."

Then, taking Buckingham's arm, he whispered in his ear, "Should aught happen—you understand—should aught happen, I say, send an express to me to York."

"Without an instant's delay," replied the Duke.

"Enough," replied Gloucester. Then, turning to the others, he said aloud, "Farewell, my lords! Tell the King I have been here, but would not disturb him. I will write to his Majesty from York."

With this, he moved off, bowing haughtily to the throng of nobles, as he passed through their midst.

Near the door the room was clear, and halting there, he said to Catesby, by whom he was still attended, "Remain here. Attend the banquet to-night, and write me word how his Majesty looks. Dost heed?"

Catesby bowed assent, and the Duke added, in a low and deeply-significant voice, "The work thou hast to do must be no longer delayed. Thou hast the phial I gave thee?"

"I carry it ever about me, your Highness," repeated the other.

"So it to-night," said Gloucester. "Use it cautiously, as I bade thee. A few drops will suffice. The King drinks nothing but wine of Chalosse. Hand him the cup."

Catesby bowed, and the Duke quitted the ante-chamber.

VI.

NOW THE WARRANT FOR TEN THOUSAND GOLDEN CROWNS BY THE KING TO JANE DISAPPEARED.

EDWARD declined to hold any audience that evening, on the plea of slight indisposition;

but as soon as he had completed his toilette, which occupied him some time—for, as already stated, he was extraordinarily particular about his dress—he repaired to Jane's apartments, which were situated in a wing of the palace, overlooking the gardens and the river, splendidly furnished, and hung with the finest arras.

The fair mistress of these magnificent rooms received him almost ceremoniously, as was her wont; but he looked so exhausted, that she took his hand and led him to a fauteuil, into which he immediately sank.

Seeing his exhausted condition, she caused some refreshments to be brought, and poured him out a cup of hippocras with her own hand. He only ate a few conserves and cates, but the cordial beverage revived him.

At a sign from his Majesty, all the attendants withdrew, and they were left alone together.

"I must have done with these banquets, Jane," said the King. "Were it not that I have invited the Lord Mayor and the chief citizens of London to dine with me to-day, I would forswear revelry altogether. But I cannot disappoint my worthy friends at this juncture. However, to-day's banquet shall be the last. On that I am firmly resolved."

"I have little reliance on your good resolutions, sire," said Jane. "Formed in the morning, they are constantly broken in the evening."

"In sooth, I find it difficult to refrain," said Edward. "This hippocras is very good. Fill my cup again."

Jane shook her head, and said, playfully, "Your Majesty is in my hands now, and I shall take care of you. If I could wait upon you at the banquet this evening, you should not exceed."

"You shall be my cupbearer, if you list," replied Edward, smiling.

"I take you at your word, my liege, and accept the office," she rejoined. "I have still the costume I wore in France."

"Then don it to-night," said the King. "Be isidore again, and place yourself behind my chair. When you bid me hold, I will drink no more."

"Oh! my liege," she exclaimed, "do but act up to the wise resolve you have just formed, and far greater power will be yours than you have ever yet enjoyed. No monarch in Europe is so proudly placed as you are now. Your throne is secured. Your subjects idolize you. Your enemies fear you. You have sons to succeed you—daughters contracted to princes. All that a great king can achieve, you have accomplished. You have fought many battles, and have never been defeated; nor will you ever be defeated in the field. But you have an enemy more to be dreaded than your stoutest adversary—more than Louis himself. That enemy is here," she added, holding up the goblet. "If you conquer not this mortal foe, he will conquer you. 'Tis right you should hear the truth from me, and, however painful it may be to speak it,

I cannot remain silent. Already those who hope to profit by your death have noted the change, and laid their plans. The ambitious and designing Gloucester, against whom I have repeatedly warned your Majesty, has watched you narrowly."

"Gloucester has set out for York this very morn," remarked Edward.

"I am glad of it," she replied. "But he has left many friends behind, in whom your Majesty places confidence. Their schemes, however, will prove futile if you are true to yourself. Be the great Edward whom I first loved, whom I still love, and shall ever love; but who will sacrifice power, life, and love, if he shakes not off the fetters in which he is bound."

For some moments the King seemed buried in thought. At last, he raised his head, and looking earnestly at her, said,—

"You have touched me deeply, Jane. Tomorrow I will wholly refrain from the maddening potion."

"Why not to-night, sire?" she cried. "Oh, be persuaded by me!"

"A revel, more or less, cannot affect me seriously."

"Consult your physician, Doctor Lewis, sire. He will tell you differently."

"You know I eschew physic, and never take advice from Doctor Lewis," replied the King. "Surely, 'tis enough that you will be present to stint me in my cups! Were Alice Fordham here, she might attend you as Claude. What has become of her?"

"She has returned to her husband, my liege; and the gifts I have bestowed upon her have made her welcome to him. But she has deceived me—basely deceived me—and I no longer love her."

"In what manner has she deceived you?" inquired the King. "I am aware you have dismissed her, but I know not her fault."

"I discovered that she has taken bribes from the Duke of Gloucester, sire," replied Jane. "I did not mention the matter to your Majesty, because I thought it would anger you."

"Again Gloucester!" exclaimed the King. "He seems to be plotting everywhere."

"Since he could not induce me to take part in his schemes, sire, he tried Alice Fordham," replied Jane; "and with her he succeeded."

"Ha! this must be inquired into!" cried Edward, fiercely. "'Tis well for himself that he hath gone to York, or I would have sent him at once to the Tower. But I will have him back; and if I find him guilty, he shall—But no, no!" he added, with a sudden change of manner, and speaking in a hollow voice; "I must not have a second brother's blood upon my soul! I have had no peace since Clarence died."

"But Gloucester wrested the warrant for his brother's death from your Majesty," said Jane. "His, therefore, is the guilt. I urge no severe measures against Gloucester, but my love for your Majesty bids me say, 'Be ware of him!'"

In the hope of chasing away the King's gloom, Jane took up her lute, and sang a tender romance of which he had once been very fond. He listened as if entranced. The notes vibrated through his breast, and recalled the days when he had first heard the song.

When she ceased singing, he said, "Do you recollect, Jane, that it was on this very day—now seven years ago—that I first beheld you?"

"I recollect it well, sire," she replied, with something like a sigh. "The past seems like a dream to me."

"A happy dream, I hope?" he said.

"Too happy, sire," she rejoined. "Moments of sadness have occurred, but they have soon passed. 'Tis the waking from this long, blissful dream that I dread. I would fain slumber on to the end. Oh, if I were to lose your Majesty, what would become of me?"

"You will be wealthy, Jane," he rejoined.

"But I shall have lost all I care for—all I love!" she exclaimed. "Wealth will be nothing to me. I have not loved your Majesty for the many rich gifts you have bestowed upon me, but for yourself."

"There is nothing mercenary in your disposition, Jane; that I well know," he replied. "Moreover, I am quite aware you have given away large sums; so that you may not, after all, be so rich as you ought to be—"

"Sire," she interrupted, "I have enough. I want nothing."

"But you may want more than you have," cried Edward. "I may be snatched from you suddenly. 'Tis my business to provide for you, and I will do so at once. Here is an order on the Marquis of Dorset, the keeper of my treasures, already signed and sealed," he added, taking a paper from the richly-ornamented girdle that hung from his girdle. "Fill in the name, and the amount—ten thousand golden crowns."

"Sire, 'tis too much!" she cried.

"Obey my behest," he said.

Unable to refuse, she proceeded to a table, on which writing materials were placed, and wrote as the King had commanded her.

While she was thus occupied, Edward arose; and as soon as she had finished, he took the paper from her, and examined it."

"This sum will be paid you by Dorset," he said, as he gave her back the warrant. "'Tis meant as a provision for you in the event of my death; and I trust you will not yield to the too-generous impulses of your nature, and by giving a portion of it away, defeat my object. Keep it for yourself, I pray you. You may need it."

Jane could make no reply, for emotion stopped her. After a vain effort to speak, she fell into his arms, and shed tears upon his breast.

The scene just described was witnessed by an unseen observer.

A secret door behind the hangings, of the existence of which both the King and Jane were ignorant, had been noiselessly opened, and the person who passed through it slightly raised the arras, and could therefore see and hear what took place.

After a while, Jane recovered from her emotion, and, as she looked up with streaming eyes at the King, he bent down and kissed her brow.

"Adieu, ma mie!" he said. "You will attend upon me at the banquet to-night?"

"Doubt it not, sire," she replied. "Oh, that I could banish these misgivings from my breast!"

He smiled to reassure her, but somewhat sadly; for he was not altogether free from misgiving himself.

They paused for a moment at the door before the King went forth, and she watched his stately figure as he moved slowly along the corridor, attended by a couple of pages. Often had she thus watched him; but she never beheld him take that walk again.

In her agitation, Jane had dropped the warrant given her by the King, nor did she think about it till his Majesty had disappeared. She then looked about for it; but it was gone.

Astonished and alarmed by the circumstance, she summoned an attendant, but could ascertain nothing satisfactory. No one had entered the room. Careful search was made, but the warrant could not be found.

As will have been surmised, it had fallen into the hands of the person concealed behind the hangings.

While the King and Jane stood together near the door, completely occupied with each other, this individual, who was very slightly built, and habited like a page, crept cautiously forth, took up the paper, and regained the hiding-place without being noticed.

On discovering her loss, Jane was in a state of distraction. Her first impulse was to acquaint the King with what had happened; but, on consideration, she resolved to defer all mention of the circumstance till the morrow.

VII.

OF EDWARD'S LAST BANQUET, AND HOW IT ENDED.

In the great banquetting hall of the palace, in the centre of the high table, placed at the upper part of the hall, beneath a gorgeous cloth of estate, embroidered in gold, with the royal badges of the falcon and fetterlock, the rose and sun, and the white hart, sat Edward.

Reserved for the King and his most distinguished guests, this elevated table was covered with perfumed damask, wrought with flowers and figures, and furnished with magnificent vessels of gold and silver.

Two other long tables, covered with finest cloths of diaper and resplendent with plate, ran down the sides of the hall, so as to leave a great space free to the innumerable officers and attendants, cup-bearers, carvers, sewers, and gentlemen waiters, all in the royal livery.

At these lower tables sat the citizens and the general company—the Lord Mayor, who was no other than our old acquaintance, Randal Rubicel, the haberdasher, being assigned a place with the nobles.

Trumpeters, with clarions adorned with fringed cloth of gold, stood in the centre of the hall, and minstrels were placed in a gallery, to enliven the company with their strains during the repast.

The entertainment was conducted with regal state. At the lower tables all were seated; but when the trumpets announced the entrance of the King, the guests immediately arose.

Edward was marshalled to his seat, beneath the cloth of estate, by the Lord Chamberlain and the Vice-Chamberlain, each carrying a white staff. He was attended by several officers in embroidered velvet doublets, all of whom had chains of gold round the neck. Among these was Cateby.

When the King was seated, Isidore, who was attired in precisely the same dress he had worn in France, took his place behind the royal chair. The handsome cupbearer looked remarkably well, and excited general admiration.

Edward was magnificently arrayed, as usual. Over the richly embroidered satin doublet that encased his now portly person, he wore a purple robe, with long hanging sleeves, lined with the most precious furs.

On his right and left sat the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of Hastings, the Marquis of Dorset, and other nobles, all splendidly attired. The Lord Mayor was placed between Buckingham and Hastings, and being clad in his robes, and having the collar of S.S. round his neck, presented a very imposing appearance. Strangely altered was Randal Rubicel, and scarcely recognisable as the gallant young haberdasher of former days. He had been highly prosperous in his calling, and had grown enormously corpulent as well as rich. His features, however, were not so much changed as his person, and he was still good-looking. He was devoted to the King, and had lent his Majesty a large sum for the proposed war with France.

Illumined by great candles, almost as thick as torches, and made of perfumed wax, covered with silver tassels, and occupied by the goodly company, described, the tables looked magnificent. As we have intimated, the body of the hall was thronged with the various officers, belonging to the royal household; and through this crowd—just before the second service began—marched a score of yeomen of the kitchen, bearing great dishes, preceded by the master cook, a very stately personage, clad in damask velvet, with a chain of gold round his neck, and bearing a white wand. Trumpets were blown as these dishes were set upon the table, and the minstrels played while the contents of the dishes were discussed.

Great hilarity prevailed, for though Edward had resolved to practice unwonted moderation that day, his guests had every temptation to excess, for the wines were abundant.

DEATH OF THE WHITE HART. (See page 75.)

and as excellent as the viands, and served in flowing goblets.

According to the taste of the period, many curious and admirably executed devices, representing the King's palaces, tournaments, and even the meeting between Edward and Louis at Picquigny, were placed upon the table. These pretty receptacles were filled with confectionery, comfits, cakes and apices, which were served to those who cared to taste them.

Altogether, the banquet, destined to be his last, was one of the best ever given by the luxurious monarch; and from circumstances connected with it, which we shall presently relate, it was long afterwards remembered.

As the repast proceeded, Edward recovered his spirits, and felt so much better, and in such a mood for enjoyment, that it was with difficulty he could put a constraint upon himself. But though he did not entirely refrain, he was far more temperate than usual.

As Isidore came forward with a silver flagon to fill his cup, he remarked, in a low voice,— "Dost thou not recognise thy former suitor?" He is seated on the right, next to the Duke of Buckingham."

"Why, that is the Lord Mayor, my liege!" exclaimed Isidore.

"Marry, the Lord Mayor was once thy suitor!" observed Edward, laughing. "Look at him again!"

"As I live, 'tis Randal Rubicel!" exclaimed Isidore.

"'Tis not surprising you knew him not at first, since he has waxed so wondrous fat," said Edward. "I need not say he is no longer a bachelor, for there is a Lady Mayoress; but he is a most worthy and liberal man, and I have a great regard for him. The Lord Mayor, however, is not the only one of your former suitors here present. All the others have been invited by my command. You will descry them at the lower tables."

Stepping back, Isidore looked around, and soon discovered that the King was not jesting.

Yes! there they all were! There sat Simon Muttelbury, the grocer; Punchoon, the vintner; Serge, the cloth-worker; Buckram, the mercer; Hide, the skinner, and half a dozen others, whose features Isidore well remembered, though, like Randal Rubicel, they were all much changed. Most of them had grown stout, and all had the easy, comfortable look of married men.

But where was Shore? Was he present on this grand festive occasion? Not as a guest, but he might have come thither uninvited.

So Jane thought; and as her eye wandered over the crowd in the body of the hall, it alighted upon Father Sylvius.

Joyously the feast went on. Fresh dishes were brought in. The sewers and carvers did their devoir. Again and again, the goblets were replenished by the cup-bearers, and with the choicest wines. The minstrels played their liveliest strains. Laughter, scarcely subdued by the King's presence, resounded from the lower tables.

Yet, despite the hilarity and enjoyment everywhere prevailing, Edward became sad. Some thoughts crossed him. With the sound of revelry ringing in his ears—with the spectacle before him of that grand banquet and his joyous guests—he felt as if he could take no part in the general conviviality.

A warning voice, whose low accents were audible amid all the din, seemed to whisper that he had not long to live. He did not dare to raise his eyes, lest he should read in characters of fire that his kingdom would be taken from him. That he almost fancied the terrible writing was there.

Like Jahe, he had descryed Father Sylvius amid the crowd in the hall, and the unlooked-for and unseasonable appearance of the friar awakened a train of gloomy thought, that quickly deepened, as we have described. A mortal sickness seized the King, and he felt he could not shake it off; but, unwilling to alarm the company, he called for wine, hoping a good draught might restore him.

His accents startled Jane, who now for the first time remarked the deathly pallor that had bespread his features. She would have instantly obeyed the command, but the flagon she held was well-nigh empty.

At this moment, Catesby interposed. The opportunity he sought to execute his direful purpose had now arrived. It came suddenly, but he was prepared.

"Here is a goblet of his Majesty's favourite wine of Chalosse," he said.

"Give it me!" cried Jane, almost snatching the cup from him in her anxiety to serve the King.

"Here is that which will revive you, sire," she said, as she handed him the cup.

Edward drank deeply of the poisoned draught; and as Catesby watched him, he saw that the work was done.

For a few minutes the doomed monarch felt better, and those nearest him, who shared Jane's anxiety, thought he had rallied.

But the signs of improvement were fallacious, and, in reality, he was much worse. His pale cheek flushed, and his eye blazed, but it was with an unnatural lustre. He attempted to converse, but his speech was thick, and his voice hoarse, as if from intoxication. Indeed, Buckingham and Hastings, who were well aware of his intemperate habits, attributed his condition to excess.

But Jane knew otherwise. Being close to him, she whispered in his ear,—

"You are unwell, sire—very unwell! I pray you retire from the banquet."

Feeling the advice was good, Edward immediately endeavoured to comply with it.

As he arose from his seat, not without great difficulty—the nobles on either side of him rose likewise, and at this night the utmost consternation prevailed among the assemblage.

The din of revelry instantly ceased, wine-cups raised to the lip were set down un-tasted, and the strains of the minstrels were hushed.

But the alarm was only momentary, the company being quickly reassured by the Duke of Buckingham, who, by Edward's command, called out,—

"His Majesty is compelled, by slight indisposition, to withdraw from the banquet; but it is his royal pleasure that no interruption take place in it. The King hopes to return before the close of the feast. Meanwhile, he drinks to you all."

At this announcement, the whole assemblage arose, and bowing around, the King drained the fatal cup.

Amid the murmurs of applause that followed, Edward retired, leaning on Jane's shoulder, and attended by Hastings and half-a-dozen pages, and proceeded slowly towards his own apartments.

The banquet went on as merrily as before the interruption, but the King did not return.

After an hour or so, gentlemen ushers went round the tables, and, with grave looks, informed the guests that his Majesty was seriously ill. Thereupon, the assemblage immediately dispersed.

Great confusion ensued, but while the guests were departing, Father Sylvius found his way to the corridor, and, without being questioned, proceeded along it to the King's private apartments.

VIII.

WHAT OCCURRED AT THE KING'S DEATH-BED.

IN a magnificent chamber of the palace, hung with finest arras, and lighted by a dim lamp, in a state bed, with tester and ceiling of cloth of gold, having heavy embroidered curtains, and a counterpane furred with ermine, propped up by pillows, lay the royal Edward.

Immediately after the King's seizure at the banquet, Jane had laid aside her disguise, and resumed her own attire, and was now watching by the slumbering monarch's couch.

On his removal to the chamber where we find him, Edward had been seized by violent sickness, after which he seemed somewhat better, and showed a strong disposition to sleep. Dr. Lewis, his physician, regarded this as a good sign, and declared, if he slept well throughout the night, he might recover—otherwise he would never rise from his couch.

Before resigning himself to sleep, the King expressly enjoined that Mistress Shore, and no other, should watch by his couch, and the command was strictly obeyed.

Every precaution being taken to ensure quiet, Edward slept throughout the greater part of the night, not calmly, but heavily, while the groans that occasionally broke from him showed he was troubled by painful dreams. So distressing were these sounds to hear, that Jane almost felt inclined to disobey the physician's orders, and wake him.

It was now the third hour of morn, and Jane was still anxiously watching by the couch—sometimes kneeling and praying for the royal sufferer.

Her thoughts passed through her breast during this long, painful vigil. The end of her happiness seemed come, for she could not persuade herself that the King would recover. Indeed, as she gazed at him, she felt sure he could not live long.

While thus alternately watching and praying, she heard the door softly open, and Doctor Lewis came noiselessly in.

A man of middle age, with a grave cast of countenance, rendered graver than usual by the present circumstances, the physician had a somewhat spare figure, and was clothed in a long, dark gown, edged with fur, above which he wore a furred cape. His long locks were covered by a black velvet skull-cap.

Stopping in the middle of the apartment, he signed Jane to come to him, and a few whispered words passed between them.

"Has my royal patient slept throughout the night?" inquired Doctor Lewis.

"Uninterruptedly, as you see him now," replied Jane.

"That is well!" said the physician. "Let him sleep on. When he awakens, I shall be able to decide."

With this, he stepped towards the couch, and gazed for some minutes on the slumbering monarch.

Apparently, the inspection satisfied him; for he gave Jane a reassuring look, and quitted the room.

Overcome by fatigue and anxiety, Jane soon afterwards fell into a sort of doze, from which she was aroused by a slight touch on the shoulder, and looking up, she perceived Father Sylvius standing beside her.

"You here!—and at this moment!" she exclaimed, in a low voice, so as not to disturb the King, whose heavy breathing could be distinctly heard.

"'Tis the very moment when I might be expected," rejoined Father Sylvius. "I must speak to the King."

"You shall not approach his couch!" she cried, placing herself between him and the sleeping monarch.

"Stand aside, woman!" cried the friar, authoritatively.

Unable to disobey the injunction, she retreated in terror to the side of the room.

Advancing to the couch, Father Sylvius laid his hand on Edward's shoulder.

For a moment, the King did not stir; but at length he opened his eyes, and fixed them upon the intruder.

"Who art thou?" demanded Edward.

"Dost thou not know me?" rejoined the monk.

And throwing back his hood, he disclosed a well-remembered face.

"'Tis Alban Shore!" said the King.

"Ay, 'tis that much-injured man," rejoined the friar.

"I confess I have wronged thee," said Edward, feebly; "but I will make amends."

"Thou canst not make me amends," rejoined Shore. "As David took Bath-Sheba, the wife of Urijah, the Hittite, so thou hast taken my wife from me."

Edward answered with a groan.

"I would thou hadst slain me with the sword, as David slew Urijah," pursued Shore; "then had I been spared many years of misery! Hearken to me, oh, King! In this dread hour, when thy life is drawing to a close, and when nought can save thee, thou repentest thee of the great wrong thou hast done; but thy repentance comes too late."

"No; not too late!" murmured Jane.

"Heaven is always merciful!"

"Who spoke?" said Edward.

"She whom thou hast destroyed," replied Shore. "But neither she nor thou art penitent, and both shall perish!"

"Say what thou wilt to me," cried Jane, "but torment not the King!"

"Back, woman!" exclaimed Shore, fiercely. "Thy place is no longer here. Thy days of sinful pleasure are over. Henceforth thou wilt be shunned; for the arm that has shielded thee will soon be powerless, and those who praised thee will revile thee. Vainly wilt thou flee. Thou canst not escape from the punishment that awaits thee. A curse will cling to thee, and hold thee fast!"

Half-stunned, Jane looked at him in terror but could not speak.

"Call the guard!" cried Edward.

"Ay; call the guard!" said Shore. "Complete thy work, and cause me to be put to death. I care not. I have had my revenge."

"As thou dost hope for mercy thyself, show some mercy to me!" implored Jane.

"My heart is adamant," rejoined Shore. "There is pity in it neither for thee nor for the King."

"Oh," exclaimed Jane, "this is too much!"

And she sank down insensible at the foot of the couch.

"Wretch! thou hast killed her!" cried Edward.

"No; she will revive presently," said Shore. "But it were better for her that she died now than hereafter. She will have to drain the cup of misery to the dregs."

"How knowst thou this, thou prophet of evil?" said the King.

"How do I know it?" cried Shore. "Because I have prayed that it may be so, and my prayer will be granted! She whom thou hast fed with the choicest viands, and clothed with the richest attire, will die of starvation, and almost without regret! A ban will be upon her! No one will aid her!—all will shun her! Thus will the great King's favourite perish!"

"At least, thou shalt perish before her!" cried Edward.

And raising himself with great difficulty, he called out, "Without there! Hoi!"

The effort was too much, and he fell back on the pillows.

IX.

THE KING'S LAST GIFTS TO JANE.

IN answer to the King's summons, Doctor Lewis, accompanied by half a dozen pages, rushed into the room.

"What would your Majesty?" cried the physician.

"Seize on that friar!" said Edward. "Deliver him to the guard."

"No friar is here, my liege," replied the physician, thinking the King was delirious.

"Can he have vanished?" cried Edward, gazing round, and unable to discern his tormentor.

"No one has entered the room, my liege, or gone forth—of that I am certain," said the physician. "I have been in the ante-chamber throughout the night."

"It must have been the fiend in person," said Edward.

"Doubtless, your Majesty has been troubled by a dream," said the physician, confirmed in his notion that the King was light-headed.

"It may be so," said Edward. "Ha! here is the proof that it was real," pointing to Jane, who had been partly concealed by the hangings of the bed. "Get restoratives quickly."

"I have all that is needful with me, sire," replied Dr. Lewis.

And kneeling down beside Jane, he raised her head, and allowing her to breathe at a smelling-bottle which he produced, she quickly regained consciousness. He then assisted her to a seat.

"Clear the room," said Edward, in a low voice, to Doctor Lewis. "I have something to say to you."

And at a sign from the physician, all the pages went forth.

"Shall I go likewise, sire?" said Jane.

"No," replied Edward. "Stay with me a little longer."

It was a dread moment.

The physician's hand was upon the King's pulse. His eye was upon the King's countenance.

Jane watched him with intense anxiety, but she could read nothing in his impassive features.

At length the examination was over, and the King, who had remained perfectly calm, said to the physician,—

"Let me know my fate."

"Sire," replied the physician, gravely, "I will not attempt to conceal from your Majesty that there is great danger—"

"I understand," said Edward, seeing that he hesitated to proceed. "You can give me no hope?"

"I would have your Majesty prepare for the worst," said Doctor Lewis, somewhat evasively.

During the pause that ensued, Jane vainly endeavoured to stifle her sobs.

The silence was broken by the King.

In a firm voice he said,—

"How many hours are left me? Fear not to tell me the truth."

"Sire," replied the physician, "unless some change takes place—of which I despair—you will not see another night."

The tone in which this dread announcement was uttered forbade all hope.

Unable to repress her anguish, Jane buried her face in her hands, and wept aloud.

"Leave me for a few minutes," said Edward to the physician.

"Constrain yourself, I pray you, sire, or you will abridge the little time left you," said Doctor Lewis.

"Jane!" said the King, as soon as they were alone.

She arose instantly, and stood by his side.

Taking her hand, and gazing at her with inexpressible tenderness, Edward said,—

"We must now part for ever, sweetheart."

"Our separation will not be long, sire," she replied, "I shall soon follow you."

"No, sweetheart," he said; "you must live. Be constant to my memory—that is all I ask."

"I cannot live without your Majesty," she cried, despairingly.

"You have never yet disobeyed me, Jane," he said; "and I am well assured you will not disobey my last injunction. Indulge not in unavailing sorrow, but think of the happy hours we have spent together, and of the love I have ever borne you. Methinks I have amply provided for you; but if you desire aught more, it shall be yours."

"You have already done too much for me, sire," she cried.

"Tis well. I signed that order on the Treasury to-day," pursued Edward. "Fail not to present it early in the morn to the Marquis of Dorset, and obtain the money. After my death, some difficulties may be raised. How is this? You look embarrassed!"

"Sire," she replied, "I must not conceal from you that the warrant you gave me is lost."

"Lost!" exclaimed the King. "Impossible!"

"Your Majesty may remember that I attended you to the door," said Jane. "When I came back, the warrant was gone, and I have not been able to find it since. But do not let the matter disturb you. I shall not require the money."

"Jane," cried the King, with a troubled look, "strange misgivings cross me. My designs to benefit you seem unaccountably thwarted. I see not why the warrant should be stolen, save from a mischievous motive, since it is useless to any other than yourself. To-morrow, if I live so long, the Lord Treasurer shall pay you the money. Meantime, take these," he added, giving her a splendid chain set with diamonds, and some other ornaments lying on a small table near the bed. "Take them, I insist," he added, forcing the articles upon her.

Just then the physician entered the room.

"Never wert thou so unwelcome!" cried Edward. "Yet, since you have come, bear witness that I have given these ornaments to Mistress Shore."

"Bear witness, also, that I receive them most reluctantly," said Jane; "and only do so because I would not willingly distress his Majesty."

"I shall not forget what I am told," rejoined the physician.

"Now that the moment for separation has arrived," cried Jane, "I feel I have left much unsaid, that I ought to say to your Majesty. Grant me a few more minutes, I beseech you, good Master Physician!"

"Be brief," then, madame, I implore you," said Doctor Lewis, removing to the further part of the room, so as to be out of hearing.

"If it be possible, sire," said Jane, addressing the King in a low, earnest voice, "to effect a sincere reconciliation between Lord Rivers and the Marquis of Dorset, and the Duke of Buckingham and the Lords Hastings and Stanley, it might prevent future troubles."

"It shall be done," rejoined Edward. "Unluckily, Lord Rivers is at Ludlow Castle with the Prince of Wales, but the Queen will answer for him. I will force the others to become friends."

"I scarce have courage to make the next suggestion, but I must not hesitate. Appoint the Queen Regent during Prince Edward's minority, sire. She will govern wisely and well."

"I doubt it not," rejoined the King. "But Gloucester must be Lord Protector."

"No, sire!" said Jane. "Let Gloucester have no authority!"

"You hate him!" said the King.

"I hate him because he is false to your Majesty, and seeks to mount the throne. Give the Queen full power, and she will be able to guard the Prince against his perfidious uncle—not otherwise."

"It shall be so," replied Edward. "If all this can be accomplished, I shall die in peace; but I feel my strength is fast failing me."

Fearing, from his words, that he was sinking, Jane called to the physician, who flew to the couch. But the King quickly rallied.

"You must not remain with me longer, Jane," he murmured. "Farewell—farewell for ever!"

She felt as if her heart would break; but, restraining herself by a powerful effort, she stooped down, kissed him, and quitted the room.

How she regained her own apartments she knew not, for she seemed to be in a state of stupefaction.

Seeing her condition, her female attendants induced her to lie down, and she soon fell into a profound slumber, from which she did not waken until mid-day.

Her first inquiries were for the King, and she learnt the terrible truth from the looks of her attendants, who vainly strove to conceal it from her.

X.

HOW KING EDWARD'S BODY WAS EXPOSED TO PUBLIC VIEW ON THE DAY OF HIS DEATH, IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

ON a high catafalque, conspicuously placed in the centre of the nave at Westminster Abbey, and covered with a black velvet pall, edged with silver, and embroidered with the royal badges, the falcon and fetterlock, the rose and sun, and the white hart, lay the lifeless body of the King, who had only breathed his last at an early hour on the same day.

Bared to the waist, the nobly-proportioned frame of the deceased monarch looked as if sculptured in whitest marble, and was full of subdued dignity, repose, grace, and resignation, which gave to his features a peculiar charm.

Over the lower part of the person was thrown an ample cover of cloth of silver, and the head rested upon a large pillow of black satin fringed with silver. Even in death, the majestic features of the King retained their proud expression and beautiful outline.

Immense tapers of yellow wax, set in tall silver candlesticks, burnt at the corners of the catafalque. Youthful incense-bearers, swinging heavy censers, continually fumed the body. Dignitaries of the Abbey knelt around, and a solemn requiem was sung by the choir, while the deep tones of the organ ever and anon pealed along the vaulted roof.

From pillar to pillar, along the aisles, and in the transept, magnificent arras was stretched, so that a full view of the royal body could only be obtained from certain points indicated by gentlemen ushers provided with white wands.

Yoomen of the guard were likewise stationed at the entrance to the choir, and at the various chapels, to prevent intrusion; but the deportment of the crowd was singularly quiet and decorous.

Around the catafalque a clear space was kept by halberdiers, stationed some two feet apart, so as not to obstruct the view; the tallest and finest men being selected for the occasion.

Within the circle thus formed, and which was strictly guarded by the halberdiers, who crossed their pikes when needful, several distinguished personages were gathered; the chief among them being Lord Hastings, the Grand Chamberlain, by whom the solemn ceremonial was conducted, the Duke of Buckingham, and Lord Stanley, the Marquis of Dorset, Lord Gray, and the Queen's Chamberlain, Lord Dacre.

Besides these, there were the Lord Mayor, the sheriffs, and aldermen, in their full robes, and several of the important citizens, who had banqueted recently with Edward in the adjacent palace.

Another personage was likewise allowed a place within the circle, although his particular garments seemed out of character with the scene. This was Malbouche. The jester, whose office was gone, wore a most rueful countenance, and perhaps no one among the assemblage more sincerely regretted his royal master than the poor knave.

All the nobles just mentioned were members of the Council—the Marquis of Dorset and Lord Gray, the Queen's sons by her first marriage, holding the chief places; and they had judged it expedient, in consequence of the suddenness of the King's death, that the body should be exposed in the manner described—first, to convince the somewhat incredulous populace that his Majesty was actually dead; and secondly, that he had come fairly by his end.

A like course had been pursued with regard to the unfortunate Henry VI, whose remains were exhibited in St. Paul's; but in that case, the murdered King was placed in a coffin, and covered up, so that the face alone could be distinguished. No requiem was then sang, and no sympathizing spectator was permitted to approach the mingled corpse, from which, it was said, blood burst forth.

On the present occasion every possible honour was paid to the departed monarch. Masses were performed, and dirges sung. Every countenance bespoke sorrow, for those who entertained other feelings did not dare to manifest them. If not deeply mourned, Edward was sincerely regretted. Whatever may have been his faults, he had won the regard of his subjects, and his popularity was at its zenith when he was prematurely cut off. Many a tearful glance was cast at his noble person. Many a prayer was breathed for the repose of his soul. If he had been a slave to his passions, and was sullied by many crimes, he had some redeeming qualities, and these were now remembered, and his evil deeds forgotten. He was thought of as a brave warrior and a magnificent monarch. That he had been cruel and rapacious could not be denied, but he had only slain his enemies, and confiscated their property—venial offences in the opinion of men who had lived during the sanguinary Wars of the Roses.

The regrets felt for the loss of the King were heightened by fears for the future,—great anxiety being felt in regard to the new Government. That the Queen would attempt to rule in the name of her youthful son, the Prince of Wales, no one doubted; but that she would long maintain sovereign sway seemed very questionable. Unfortunately for herself, Elizabeth had no party, except her own relatives, and certain new-made peers, who were detested by the old nobility, and disliked by the people.

While Edward lived, the Queen had been omnipotent, because he granted all her requests, and upheld her family. Deprived of his support, she had little authority. As we just intimated, her brother, the Earl of Rivers, and her son by her first marriage—the Marquis of Dorset and Lord Gray—were prominent members of the Council; but Buckingham, Hastings, and Stanley, three most powerful nobles, were hostile to her, and it was certain she would have to contend with Gloucester, whose partisans were already at work, suggesting that she was not lawfully married to the King, and that her sons, being illegitimate, could not succeed to the Crown.

Such a prospect did not bode future tranquillity.

Another matter, likewise, occupied the crowd, and gave rise to much muttered discussion. The suddenness of the King's death excited suspicion that he had been poisoned at the grand banquet given by him only two days previously; but by whom, or at whose instigation, the deadly potion was administered, none ventured to affirm.

By common consent the Queen was entirely acquitted of any participation in the dark deed; but suspicion attached to Gloucester, who was likely to be the guinea by his royal brother's removal, and who was known to be capable of such an atrocious act.

Amongst those near the catafalque was a Franciscan friar, who had obtained admittance at the same time as Malbouche.

Kneeling down, he appeared to pray fervently for the departed monarch, but was not so much engrossed by his devotions as he seemed. He had contrived to place himself near Buckingham and Hastings, and a good deal of their discourse, though carried on in low tone, reached his ear. This was what he overheard.

"Before this hour to-morrow," said Buckingham, "the express whom I ordered to ride for his life will reach York, and the Duke of Gloucester will be made aware of the King's death. I have written to inform him, but that Rivers, Dorset, and Gray are certain to dispute his claim, inasmuch as the King, in his latest moments, appointed the Queen to be Regent, with full powers. I added that unless he can secure the custody of the young King, who is now at Ludlow Castle with his uncle, Lord Rivers, his Highness's chance of the Protectorship is irretrievably lost. I told him he might depend on our support, and that we can offer him a corps of a thousand soldiers, well armed, and ready to march at a moment's notice."

"His Highness must not lose time," replied Hastings. "I have ascertained that the Queen has despatched a courier to Lord Rivers, with tidings of the King's death, enjoining his lordship to levy troops immediately in Wales, to enable him to conduct his royal nephew safely to London for the Coronation."

"Ere the young King can reach London he must be in Gloucester's hands, or we are lost," observed Buckingham significantly. "But how came Edward to give the Queen uncontrolled authority? He always declared that Gloucester should be Protector."

"And Gloucester would be Protector now," replied Hastings. "had not Mistress Shore induced the dying King to appoint her Majesty Regent."

"By acting thus injudiciously, Mistress Shore will make a mortal enemy of Gloucester, and gain nothing for the Queen," remarked Buckingham.

"To do her justice, I believe her motives were good," said Hastings.

"Now that the King has gone, her power has departed from her," said Buckingham, "But, no doubt, she has enriched herself."

"Tis her own fault if she has not," rejoined Hastings. "But she is really disinterested, and I incline to think she has not availed herself of the many opportunities offered her of becoming wealthy. However, the influence she enjoyed is gone, as she will speedily discover. Suitors will no longer throng her ante-chamber—courtiers will shun her."

"Tis a hard fate, I must own, to be raised to such an eminence, and then cast down," observed Buckingham. "But Mistress Shore can go back to her husband, if he is still in existence."

"No; that is impossible!" said Hastings. "The crazy goldsmith has not been heard of since his wife left him."

Just then, perceiving the Lord Mayor, who had come up in the interim, he said to him,—

"Can your lordship inform me what has become of Alban Shore, the goldsmith?"

"That is a question I cannot answer," replied the other. "Possibly he may now reappear. Should he not do so, we may conclude him dead. But if he still lives he must be poor, for all his money was given away in charities. At one time I envied Shore his good fortune in gaining such a lovely wife, but I have since esteemed myself the luckier man; though had I been in his place I would not have taken her abandonment of me so much to heart."

"Perchance, you loved her not as well as Shore loved her, my lord," remarked Hastings. "But she had many suitors besides yourself, I remember."

"Very true," replied the Lord Mayor. "And strange to say, they were all at the last banquet given by the King—stranger still, they are all here to-day."

"The party would have been complete had Shore been present on the last occasion," observed Buckingham.

"Or were he here now," said the Lord Mayor. "Mistress Shore has lost none of her beauty. I know not how others feel, but for my own part I confess I am as much in love with her as ever."

"I would have been treason to make this avowal two days ago, my lord," said Buckingham. "But you may now succeed the King in her favour."

Before the Lord Mayor could make any reply, the friar, who seemed disturbed by the discourse, arose from his kneeling posture, and without raising his hood, said, in a hollow voice,—

"Alban Shore is not dead!"

"How knowst thou that?" demanded the Lord Mayor.

"No matter how I know it," replied the friar. "I affirm that Alban Shore still lives. But he is not likely to trouble his wife."

"Thou must give me precise information on this point at a more convenient season," observed the Lord Mayor.

"Willingly," replied the monk.

And bowing his head, he moved to a little distance.

Just then, the Marquis of Dorset came up, and without noticing either of the two nobles, who eyed him haughtily, said to the Lord Mayor,—

"It has just been decided by the Council, as no doubt your lordship has been given to understand, that the young King will be proclaimed to-morrow."

"Orders to that effect have already been given, my lord," replied the Lord Mayor; "and I will see them carried out in person. At noon to-morrow, King Edward the Fifth will be proclaimed at Paul's Cross, at the Cross at Cheapside, and at other public places. 'Tis too soon as yet, I suppose, to speak of the Coronation?"

"The Coronation will take place immediately after the arrival of his youthful Majesty in London," replied Dorset. "As soon as a sufficient escort can be provided, he will commence his journey from Ludlow Castle."

"I should have thought a very small escort would be required, my lord," said the Lord Mayor. "Against whom is his youthful Majesty to be defended?"

"Ay, who are his enemies?" demanded Hastings, sternly. "Not his brave and loyal uncle, the Duke of Gloucester; not the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Stanley, or myself, who are all devoted to him, and ready to lay down our lives in his defence. Methinks the guard is required to confirm the power of Lord Rivers, rather than to protect the young King."

"I care not what you think, my lord," rejoined Dorset, haughtily. "No precautionary measures will be neglected. The Queen is well aware that the Duke of Buckingham and yourself are in secret communication with the Duke of Gloucester."

"Does her Majesty distrust us?" demanded Buckingham.

"I do," replied Dorset. "Therefore, the young King will have an army to guard him. Forget not that I hold the Tower, and am head of the Council, in the absence of Lord Rivers. My Lord Mayor," he added to that dignitary, "the Queen counts upon your loyalty and devotion to the King, her son."

"Her Majesty may entirely rely on me, my lord," replied the Lord Mayor.

With a look of defiance at Buckingham and Hastings, the Marquis of Dorset then moved away.

"I thought a reconciliation had taken place between your lordships and the Queen's family," observed the Lord Mayor.

"We shook hands at the King's request, and vowed to be good friends, and this is the result," rejoined Buckingham. "Your lordship shall have a full explanation anon."

"I require no explanation, my lord," said the Lord Mayor. "I can see plainly enough what we may expect. My own course is clear. I shall side with neither party, but uphold King Edward the Fifth."

XI.

HOW KING EDWARD THE FOURTH WAS INTERRED IN SAINT GEORGE'S CHAPEL.

AFTER being exposed for nine hours to public gaze, the royal corpse was removed to a traverse, and robed in a long gown of purple cloth of gold. It was next placed in a large, open coffin, lined with white damask, and laid upon a bier before the high altar.

During the preparation for the latter part of the solemnity, the vast crowd collected within the nave and transepts was constrained to leave the Abbey.

A strange and awful circumstance occurred at the time. Sir William Catesby had been appointed by the Lord Chamberlain to superintend the removal of the royal corpse. The office was distasteful to him, but he could not refuse it. When he approached, the bearers trembled, for they thought that a frown passed over the dead King's countenance.

Appalled by the occurrence, which he himself had noticed, Catesby drew back, whereupon the King's visage resumed its serene expression.

Catesby was standing aloof, unable to shake off this superstitious terror, when Malbouche came up to him and said, "I trow, Sir William, you have heard of the ordeal of touch?"

"Wherefore the question?" demanded Catesby.

"I would fain see you lay your hand upon the King's body," said Malbouche. "Dare you do it?"

"Certes, I dare! What should hinder me? But I shall not do it to please thee."

"Again, I say, you dare not touch the body," cried Malbouche.

"Thou liest, knave!" exclaimed Catesby.

"To the proof, then!" said the jester.

Catesby stepped forward, with feigned boldness, but secret misgiving.

When he came up to the bier, the King's countenance again seemed to change, and the conscience-stricken villain shrank back.

"Said I not you would not touch the body?" cried Malbouche.

Catesby made no reply.

When the bier sustaining the royal coffin had been placed before the altar, which was bedecked up by tall tapers, twenty-four bannerets and knights, in long black gowns and hoods, ranged themselves on either side to keep watch.

A mass of Requiem was then performed by the Abbot of Westminster, while the nobles and gentlemen knelt around. De profundis was likewise said. During the office, Lord Dacre offered for the Queen; the young Earl of Lincoln, son of the Duchess of Suffolk, Edward's sister, likewise offered; and many others, including Dorset, Buckingham, and Hastings.

The whole psalter was recited, and the solemn service lasted till an hour after midnight, when another mass of Requiem was performed.

The coffin was then closed and borne by the bannerets and knights through the choir, to the great porch, where a grand funeral car was waiting to receive it.

While the royal body was placed in the car, the bell of the Abbey began to toll, and a long procession was formed, comprising the monks, the Abbot, the Archbishop of York, who was likewise Chancellor, the chief nobles, with the Lord Mayor, the sheriffs and aldermen.

The funeral train was preceded by a mounted guard of archers, and yeomen of the guard, bearing torches. On either side of the funeral car walked the Marquis of Dorset, and the Lords Gray, Dacre, and Lincoln, holding the pall. A long train of nobles and gentlemen followed, walking two and two.

Seen by the light of the torches, as it shaped its slow course from the Abbey to the Palace stairs, where a barge was in readiness to convey the royal corpse to Windsor, the procession formed a most striking spectacle, and, despite the unseasonableness of the hour, was witnessed by an immense number of spectators, all of whom appeared greatly impressed.

The bell of the Abbey continued to toll throughout, but no trumpets were blown, nor was any other sound heard.

Deposited within the barge, which was draped with black velvet, and decked with the royal arms, the King's coffin was watched throughout its nocturnal transit by the bannerets and knights. Tapers burnt at the head and foot of the bier, and priests recited prayers.

With the conveyance thus assigned to the deceased monarch were five other state barges, all filled with various officials.

In the foremost of these, which preceded the royal body by a bow-shot, trumpeters were stationed, and their clarions were occasionally sounded to keep the river clear. The conduct of the ceremonial was entrusted by the Queen to her Chamberlain, Lord Dacre.

A short halt was made at Shene Palace, where all the royal attendants had come forth, with the seneschal, and loudly expressed their sorrow. But the most genuine manifestation of sorrow was made by Malbouche, who had been allowed by Lord Dacre to accompany the body of his royal master.

In the gray light of dawn, the royal corpse arrived at Windsor, and was at once conveyed to Saint George's Hall, where it lay in state for three days.

Subsequently, the King was interred in Saint George's Chapel, the funeral obsequies being conducted with great pomp.

A lady, attired in deepest mourning, whose features were completely concealed by a thick veil, was conducted by Lord Dacre, to a place within the chapel not far from the royal body.

This lady, who was evidently overwhelmed by affliction, knelt down, and remained in a supplicating posture till the close of the ceremonial, when she was assisted from the chapel, almost in a fainting state, by the Queen's Chamberlain.

THE ABBEY SANCTUARY.

I.

HOW JANE DEVOTED HERSELF TO THE QUEEN.

NEARLY a week had elapsed since Edward the Fourth was interred in Saint George's Chapel at Windsor.

Jane had been present at the funeral, as described; but on her return that night to her apartments in Westminster Palace, she was seized with a violent illness, that threatened to deprive her of life or reason.

Owing to the sedulous care of Doctor Lewis, the late King's physician, she recovered; and on the sixth day, though still feeling very weak, she was able to sit up.

Then, for the first time, she assumed her mourning habits; and these being of black velvet, edged with white silk, and embroidered with silver, contrasted strongly with the unwonted paleness of her complexion. But, though bearing evident traces of deep affliction, her features appeared almost more interesting than they had done before this heavy blow had fallen upon her.

She was alone, and seated in a cabinet, communicating with a larger apartment, in which she had often sat with the King, and was thinking of him, and of the many happy hours they had passed together.

Alas! these happy hours were gone—never to return! Deprived of him she had so deeply loved, she felt that life would henceforth be a blank; and she resolved to bury her woes in a convent, and seek to atone, by penance and prayer, for the faults she had committed.

She was still occupied by sad reflections—still thinking of the King—when a page entered, and said that a Franciscan friar was without, and prayed admittance, as he had somewhat of importance to communicate to her.

A feeling of misgiving crossed her at this announcement, but she ordered that the friar should be admitted.

When he came in, his hood was drawn over his face, so as to conceal his features, but she knew who it was.

As soon as the page had retired, the friar took a parchment from his gown, and placed it on the table beside her.

As he did this, he said to Jane, who watched him in surprise,—

"Here is the warrant for ten thousand marks given you by the King."

Without a word more, he was about to depart, but Jane stopped him.

"My errand is done," he said. "I would rather answer no questions."

"Yet tell me, I pray you, by whom the warrant was taken, and with what design?" she cried.

"I took it not—let that suffice!" rejoined the friar.

"My suspicions alight on Alice Fordham," cried Jane. "Did she take it?"

"Question me not, I repeat!" he said. "Thus much I will tell you freely. It was taken from vindictive motives, and not from desire of gain."

"What you say convinces me it was taken by Alice Fordham," rejoined Jane. "But I am perplexed to understand how the paper came into your hands!"

"No matter how I obtained it!" said the friar. "But for me, the warrant would have been destroyed. If you desire the money—and ten thousand marks is a large sum—I counsel you to apply for it without delay to the Marquis of Dorset, keeper of the late King's treasure, or he may not be able to pay the amount to you. The Duke of Gloucester, who is no friend of yours, may prevent him!"

"The Duke of Gloucester!" exclaimed Jane, in alarm. "Is he in power? I pray you tell me! All news has been kept from me during my illness, so that I really know nothing."

"Gloucester will soon be Lord Protector—rest assured of that!" rejoined the monk. "The young King is in his hands, and he is bringing his royal nephew to London for the Coronation."

Astonished by the intelligence, Jane sank back, and the friar quitted the room.

Shortly afterwards Doctor Lewis came in, and she eagerly questioned him.

"Is it true," she said, "that Lord Rivers has given up the young King to his evil-hearted, treacherous uncle, Gloucester? I cannot believe it!"

"'Tis true, nevertheless," rejoined the physician.

"And where is Buckingham?" cried Jane.

"With the Duke of Gloucester!" was the reply.

"I knew it!" cried Jane. "I knew he would be art and part in the treacherous scheme. And Lord Hastings—where is he?"

"In London, with the Council," replied Doctor Lewis. "But he is hostile to the Queen."

"Ay, he and Buckingham are her Majesty's implacable enemies," said Jane. "Oh, that I could help her in this emergency, when she has such powerful foes to contend with! Father and Lord Gray, with her?"

"Lord Gray was made prisoner by Gloucester at the same time as his uncle, Lord Rivers," replied the physician. "He had been sent to Ludlow Castle with a letter from the Queen to her brother, bidding him dismiss all the young King's guards, and hasten to London with only his usual retinue. Lord Rivers imprudently complied with the injunction. Leaving all his armed men behind him, he set forth with his two nephews, the young King and Lord Gray, and a score of attendants. The hypocritical Gloucester, who had prepared this scheme by writing a submissive letter to the Queen, was waiting for them with a thousand men at Northampton. Lord Rivers and Lord Gray unsuspectingly fell into the snare; and accepting an invitation, brought them by Buckingham from the wily Gloucester, took the young King to Northampton, where they passed the night in festivity. Next morn, the two confiding nobles were arrested by their treacherous host, and sent, under a strong guard, to Pontefract Castle; while Gloucester, having fully succeeded in his design, seized upon his royal nephew."

"Unless the young King can be torn from the clutches of that remorseless tiger, he will be destroyed," cried Jane. "Gloucester has now made one successful step, and will never rest till he has mounted the throne. All hindrances will be swept aside by him. But the crown must be preserved for Edward's sons. Hear me, gracious Heaven!" she ejaculated, falling on her knees before a crucifix placed on one side of the room. "Grant, I implore Thee, that I may be the humble instrument of saving this young Prince from the great peril by which he is threatened! Grant that my efforts, inspired and directed from above, may avail to preserve for him his father's crown, which a usurper would snatch from his brow! Grant, O Heavenly Power! that I may be enabled to accomplish this; and when the task I desire to undertake is finished, I hereby solemnly vow to devote the remainder of my life to Thy service!"

Uttered with an earnestness and fervour that left no doubt of the sincerity of the suppliant, this prayer produced a strong effect upon a person who had entered the cabinet at the very moment when Jane knelt down, but would not come forward, being unwilling to interrupt her.

It was a tall, stately dame, of a very commanding presence, habited in magnificent frowning. On her brow was a white frontlet that covered her beautiful tresses, and on the lower part of her face was a plaited linen covering, called a barbe. Though her noble features looked sorrowful, it was sorrow mingled with pride and anger.

As soon as Jane became aware of the presence of her august visitor, she arose, and made a profound obeisance to her.

"I have come to you in my distress," said the widowed Queen, "and have heard enough to convince me that you will serve me and my sons, so far as lies in your power."

"That I will, gracious madam," replied she, earnestly. "I will lay down my life for you and them!"

"There is no one but yourself with whom I can take counsel, and on whom I can rely," pursued the Queen. "I am deprived of the help of my brother, Lord Rivers, and of my sons, the Marquis of Dorset, and Lord Gray. Rivers and Gray are prisoners, and Dorset cannot quit the Tower at this terrible juncture. Doubtless you are aware of the grave fault I committed in ordering Lord Rivers to dismiss the escort he had provided for the young King. But for that fatal error my son would now be here, and, with him in my own keeping, I should be able to set my enemies at defiance. The step taken by Gloucester is only part of a plan, the end of which is the destruction of all my children."

"Such is my own opinion, madame," observed Jane, mournfully.

"We are not safe within the Palace," pursued the Queen, "since I have no guard to defend me, should an attempt be made—as is most likely—to seize upon my second son, the Duke of York. Whither shall I fly?"

"I have advised her Majesty to take refuge with her children in the Abbey Sanctuary," observed Doctor Lewis. "But she hesitates, lest it should seem she is alarmed."

"The measure, though repugnant to your feelings, is absolutely necessary, gracious madame," urged Jane. "Yourself and your children will then be secure, for even Gloucester will not dare to violate a sacred asylum, the privileges of which have been recognised for centuries by Popes and Kings. Therefore you will be far safer in the Abbey Sanctuary than if you took refuge in the Tower with your son, the Marquis of Dorset, or in any other strong castle, where you might be besieged. Moreover, while you have the young Duke of York with you, the King is safe, for if the elder brother be put to death, the younger becomes King."

"You have convinced me," said the Queen. "I will take all my children at once to the Sanctuary. Nor will I stir thence till this danger be past."

"You have well resolved, madame," said the physician, approvingly.

"If you do not disdain my services, gracious madame, I would offer to accompany you," said Jane, "and I may be able to render you some little assistance. I will bring with me all the money and jewels I possess. They are yours."

"You make a great sacrifice," said the Queen; "and I fully appreciate it. I accept the offer, because I may need money, and I have little, and can obtain none from the Marquis of Dorset."

"Here is a warrant for ten thousand marks," said Jane, pointing to the paper. "Will it avail your Majesty?"

"This useless now," said the Queen; "yet keep it—better days may come."

"For me no better days can come," rejoined Jane, mournfully. "I have no desire left save to see your Majesty and your children righted. When that happens—as, with Heaven's grace it will happen—I shall have done with the world."

"Begin me in the Sanctuary," said the Queen. "Bring with you such attendants as you need, and all matters you require. I will now go and give orders to my own servants to prepare at once for the removal."

"I will attend to your instructions, madame," said Jane, making a profound obeisance to the Queen, as her Majesty withdrew.

Seeing that Jane looked scarcely equal to the effort, the physician promised to return and help her, as soon as he had attended the Queen to her apartments.

II.

HOW THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK BROUGHT THE GREAT SEAL TO THE QUEEN.

"I MAKE IT KNOWN to all generations of the world after me, that, by special commandment of our holy father, Pope Leo, I have renewed and honoured the holy church of the blessed apostle, Saint Peter, at Westminster. And I order and establish for ever, that any person, of what condition or estate soever he be, from wheresoever he come, or for what offence or cause it be, if he shall take refuge in the said holy place, he be assumed of his life, liberty, and limbs. Moreover, I forbid, under pain of everlasting damnation, that any minister of mine, or of my successors, shall intermeddle with any goods, lands, or possessions of the said persons taking the said Sanctuary. For I take their goods and livelihood into my special protection, and, therefore, grant to every and each of them, inasmuch as my terrestrial power may suffice, all manner of freedom and joyous liberty. And whosoever shall presume or do contrary to this my grant, I ordain that he lose his name, worship, dignity, and power. And I will that this my grant, endure as long as there remaineth in England either love or dread of Christian name."

Such were the terms of the charter whereby the great privilege of Sanctuary, originally granted to the Abbey Church of Westminster by Sebert, King of the East Saxons, was confirmed by Edward the Confessor in the middle of the eleventh century.

From that date to the period of our story, the privilege continued in full force, and endured long afterwards, until its gross abuse necessitated entire suppression.

Nor was the privilege of Sanctuary confined merely to the Abbey, but extended to its precincts, within which the Abbot's Palace was included.

In this large monastic mansion, then some three centuries old, the unfortunate Queen was lodged.

Registered, with all her children, according to the customary form, as Sanctuary persons, she was now safe. It was not the first time she had been compelled by adverse circumstances to seek an asylum in the Abbot's Palace. Indeed, the young King, her son, was born there, in 1470, when Edward was driven from the kingdom by Warwick.

Seated in a large, stone hall, panelled at one end with oak, and hung with arras, the Queen was watching her serving-men, who had been busily engaged throughout the night in bringing chests, coffers, and other articles to the Sanctuary.

The torches that illumined the hall showed a great quantity of chests and household stuff piled on the floor, and also revealed the sad figure of the widowed Queen, as she sat there alone.

Neither children nor attendants were with her. The young Duke of York and the five Princesses, his sisters, had long since retired to rest. Jane, also, who had followed the royal lady to the Sanctuary, and had stayed with her to a late hour, rendering all the assistance she could, had at last yielded to fatigue, and was now slumbering in a chair in another part of the hall.

The Queen would not quit her post, but sat there throughout the night, noting each chest as it was brought in and laid down before her.

She was wrapped in a black velvet robe; and her splendid tresses, being unbound, streamed over her shoulders.

On the table near which she sat were a lamp and a missal; but her eyes seldom rested on the book of prayer.

Thus the night had passed—one of the weariest and saddest nights the Queen had ever spent—and dawn was close at hand, when a noise outside roused her from the apathetic state in which she had sunk, and filled her with alarm. Who but an enemy could come there at that hour?

It was not an enemy, however, but a friend. It was the Archbishop of York, who was likewise Lord Chancellor, that entered the hall.

The palace of the Archbishop adjoined the Abbey, so he had not far to come. Short, however, as was the distance, he brought with him several armed attendants, and it was the noise they made, while stationing themselves at the door of the hall, that had alarmed the Queen.

An officer of the Archbishop's household followed his Grace, carrying a purple velvet bag, embroidered with the royal arms.

On recognising her visitor, the Queen arose, and received him with as much dignity as if she had been in her own palace.

"I did not think to see your Grace at this hour," she said. "But you are always welcome, and never more welcome than now, for I am sure you come to me as a friend."

"I bring you news that I trust will give you comfort, madame. Not half an hour ago I was awakened from my sleep by a messenger from Lord Hastings, who told me that your Majesty need be under no apprehension, for all would yet be well. Thereupon, I attired myself in haste, and came hither with the message."

"And does your Grace attach credit to it?" cried the Queen. "I believe nothing that comes from Hastings. He is my deadly enemy, and seeks to destroy me and my children. He thinks by these false messages, sent through a friend so loyal and true-hearted as your Grace, that he will induce me to quit this asylum, and place myself in Gloucester's power, but I will disappoint him. Here I will stay until the King, my son, is crowned, and invites me to come forth from my refuge."

"I do not counsel you to leave the Sanctuary, gracious madame," rejoined the Archbishop. "But I think you judge Lord Hastings harshly. I admit he is not your friend, but he was devoted to the King, your husband, and his zeal and attachment are now transferred to the young King, your son. Rest assured he would not harm your children."

"He is the chief accomplice in this plot with Gloucester to deprive my son of the crown," said the Queen. "He has selected your Grace as his messenger, because he knows the great confidence I have in you, and the great respect in which I hold you. But tell him that I doubt him—nay more, that I know him to be false and treacherous. Bid your attendant retire for a moment, for I have somewhat to say to you in private."

At a sign from the Archbishop, the officer retired to a short distance, so as to be out of hearing.

"What would you say to me, madame?" asked the Archbishop.

"I believe Gloucester will kill the King, my son," she rejoined, in a low, deep voice.

"I cannot penetrate Gloucester's designs, madame," rejoined the Archbishop; "but the dark deed would avail him little. Were the King your son, murdered to-day, to-morrow I would crown his brothers, the Duke of York."

"I see your Grace is truly loyal," cried the Queen.

"Your Majesty shall have unquestionable proof of my fidelity," said the Archbishop.

Then, signing to the officer to come forward, he bade him place the embroidered velvet bag upon the table.

"Lo! there, madame," said his Grace,—"there is the Great Seal of England, the badge of regal power, without which nothing of moment in state affairs can be done. The King, your husband, gave me the seal, and I hereby return it to you. Keep it for King Edward's sons, and secure their right. Could stronger proof of my loyalty and devotion be given, I would give it."

"My lord, you have done enough," replied the Queen, in accents of heartfelt gratitude. "You have raised fresh hopes in my breast. With Heaven's aid I shall yet triumph over my enemies."

"Doubt it not, gracious madame," replied the Archbishop. "It gladdens me that I have brought consolation to your anxious breast. Seek some repose, I entreat you. You need it much. Later on in the day we will confer together again. Till then, farewell."

"I pray your Grace to give me your blessing ere you go," said the Queen.

And as she bent down, the Archbishop stretched his arms over her, and exclaimed fervently,—

"Heaven bless your Majesty, and guard you and your children from all ill!"

As the Queen arose, he quitted the hall with his attendants.

No sooner was he gone than the Queen clapped her hands.

The sound awoke Jane, who sprang from the chair on which she had slept, and flew towards her.

"What would your Majesty?" she cried.

"Bring that bag to my chamber. It contains the Great Seal of England."

"Is the seal for your younger son?" asked Jane.

"Time will show," replied the Queen.

III.

THE ABBOT OF WESTMINSTER.

JANE occupied a small chamber situated in the upper part of the Abbot's Palace, and looking down upon a beautiful little flower garden adjoining the inner court.

Being greatly fatigued, she did not rise till late, and had just attired herself, when, hearing voices beneath, she went to the window, which had been thrown open by her attendant.

On one side of the secluded little garden rose the gray monastic mansion—on the other, the buttresses and pinnacles of the Abbey.

A more charming retreat cannot be conceived, and in it the Abbot was wont to spend many hours in each day, but he now left it to the Queen and her family.

In this little garden, shut round by high stone walls, but still trim, and well kept, the royal children were collected.

Apparently the youthful captives were not much cast down, for their voices sounded cheerfully, and occasionally a light laugh was heard.

On looking forth, Jane perceived the Duke of York playing with his younger sisters, and chasing them along the narrow gravel walks.

Near a sun-dial, placed in the centre of the trim parterre, stood the Princess Elizabeth and the Princess Cicely. The countenances of both these lovely damsels had a sad expression.

All the party were in mourning.

Jane watched the scene with great interest—an interest deepened by the anxiety she felt for the safety of the young Prince, who seemed unconscious of any danger.

After sporting with his younger sisters for some time, the Duke of York came up to the two Princesses standing near the sun-dial, and asked them if they would not play with him.

Both declined, and told him he had had sufficient pastime.

"I would the King, my brother, were here to play with me!" he said.

"I would he were, for then he would be out of the power of our cruel uncle, the Duke of Gloucester," remarked the Princess Elizabeth. "I fear we shall never behold our dear brother again."

"Should Gloucester kill him, I shall be King, and then I will put Gloucester himself to death," cried the young Duke.

"It would be far better if we could find some means of delivering Edward from our uncle's power," said the Princess Cicely.

"Why does not Edward try to escape, and come to us?" cried the Duke of York.

"The attempt would be useless. He is too strictly guarded," replied the Princess Elizabeth. "Take care you never get into our uncle Gloucester's hands, Richard, or he will shut you up in the Tower."

"He cannot force me hence!" said the young Duke. "And the Lord Chancellor has given the Queen the Great Seal, without which nothing can be done."

"Alas! the Lord Chancellor has sent for it back!" said Elizabeth.

"But surely the Queen refused to give it up?" cried the young Duke. "I would not have returned it."

"Her Majesty judged otherwise, and she knows best," said Elizabeth, sadly. "But be it for good or ill, the Great Seal is gone."

This was news to Jane, and it greatly distressed her. She could neither account for the Queen's imprudence, nor understand why the Archbishop of York should have acted thus.

But she was much more alarmed by what presently occurred.

The young Duke and his sisters had resumed their play, when the Abbot of Westminster, attended by three or four monks, entered the garden.

On seeing him, the Duke of York immediately stopped in his sport, and made the Abbot a low reverence.

"I am sent to conduct your Highness to the Queen, your mother," said the Abbot. "The Cardinal Archbishop of Canterbury is with her Majesty."

"My mind misgives me, holy father!" interposed the Princess Elizabeth. "Methinks the Cardinal has come to take away my brother?"

"Tis true, Princess," rejoined the Abbot.

"But I will not go with him," cried the Duke of York, resolutely.

"What the Queen, your mother, enjoins, your Highness will do, knowing it to be for the best. Of that I am firmly persuaded," said the Abbot. "Your royal uncle, the Duke of Gloucester, having been appointed Protector by the Council, and having the care and guardianship of the King, deems it improper that two brothers, hitherto brought up together, should be separated, and he has therefore sent to the Queen demanding that you be delivered up, and brought to the King."

"your brother, who is most wishful to have you with him. Your Highness will then be at liberty, whereas you are now in prison, and the Lord Protector and the Council hold it dishonourable to the King and to yourself that you should continue to remain in this Sanctuary."

"I will answer for my brother, holy father!" said the Princess Elizabeth. "It can be no dishonour to the King or the Duke of York that the Duke should be with his mother, and in an asylum where he is safe from his enemies. Would to heaven the King, my brother, were with us! I should then feel far easier than I do now!"

"My errand, Princess, is to conduct the Duke to the Queen," replied the Abbot. "If you and the Princesses, your sisters, choose to come with us, you will learn her Majesty's decision."

With this he took the young Duke's hand, and led him out of the garden.

The Princess Elizabeth and her sisters followed—all looking very sad, and the three youngest weeping.

The monks brought up the rear of the little procession.

Guessing whither they were going, Jane hurried down a circular stone staircase, and reached the great hall before them.

IV.

HOW THE QUEEN DELIVERED UP THE DUKE OF YORK TO CARDINAL BOURCHIER AND THE LORDS.

At the upper end of the large chamber, which was still encumbered with chests and household goods, sat the Queen.

Her Majesty was conferring with Cardinal Bourchier, Archbishop of Canterbury, who was accompanied by Lord Howard, and several other nobles.

The Cardinal had a very imposing presence, the effect of which was heightened by his rich attire and hat. His person was large, and his features strongly marked and characterized rather by pride than benignity.

A long and angry discussion had taken place between his Eminence and the Queen, in which the Cardinal, partly by persuasion, partly by menace, strove to induce her to deliver up her son.

"Madame," said the Cardinal, finding it impossible to move her, "I am but a messenger, with these lords, to ascertain your pleasure. You have branded us all with disloyalty and treachery, and have imputed a most execrable design to the Lord Protector. For ourselves, we can avouch that we are loyal and true to the young Prince your son; and we dare avouch, also, that the Lord Protector is equally true to his royal nephew, and means him no harm by removing him from this Sanctuary, and placing him with the King, his brother, but much good. Madame, I have done, and pray you to come to a speedy decision."

These words, and the tone in which they were uttered, produced a great effect upon the Queen, and shook her firmness.

She knew not how to act for the best. She did not for a moment believe that the Cardinal and the lords with him, though hostile to herself, would be accessory to the destruction of her son; but she feared the Protector.

Still, if Gloucester were resolved to violate the Sanctuary, and take away the young Duke by force, she could not prevent him; since opposition would be useless, she judged it the wisest course to yield.

At this painful juncture, the Abbot entered the hall with the young Duke, followed by the Princesses.

On beholding her son, the Queen immediately arose, and went to meet him.

Disengaging himself from the Abbot, the Prince flew towards her. She caught him in her arms, and covered him with kisses.

"You will not let them take me away, dearest mother," he said.

She strained him to her breast; and the young Duke, becoming alarmed, repeated the question.

"There is no help. You must go, my sweet son," replied the almost heart-broken mother.

"Were I to keep you here, the Lord Protector would take you hence by force."

"I did not expect this," murmured the Duke.

The younger Princesses had now come up, and hearing what the Queen said, gathered round their brother.

"Since you must go, we will go with you," they said.

"No, no; stay with the Queen, our mother, and comfort her," rejoined the Duke. "Distress not yourself on my account, dearest mother," he added, to the Queen. "Perhaps no harm may happen to me."

"Thy youth and innocence ought to guard thee, my sweet son," said the Queen. "Bid farewell to thy sisters."

The young Duke then tenderly embraced them all; and the scene was so touching, that even the Cardinal and the lords, though well pleased that their mission was accomplished, were moved by it.

"Something tells me we shall not meet again on earth, sweet brother," said little Bridget, as she kissed the Duke; "but we shall meet in heaven."

The Queen had need of all her fortitude to sustain herself at this trying juncture.

Taking her son by the hand, she led him towards those who were waiting for him.

They bowed as he approached; and the young Prince gracefully returned the salutation, bending with especial reverence to the Cardinal.

"My Lord Cardinal, and you, my lords," said the Queen; "I now deliver my son to your keeping. I am confident of your fidelity to him; for I know you will not betray the trust reposed in you by the King, his father."

Before Heaven and man, I shall require my son again at your hands."

Howard and the other lords made no reply to this address, but simply bowed. Cardinal Bouchier, however, who was much moved by it, said, "Rest easy, madame. I will answer for your son's safety."

She then turned towards the young Duke, and after regarding him for a few moments with inexpressible affection, kissed him, and said,—

"Farewell, my beloved son! All good angels guard thee! Let me kiss thee again ere we part, for Heaven only knows when we shall meet again!"

Once more she pressed him to her heart—once more she kissed him, and blessed him fervently.

But the young Prince clung to her, and besought her not to send him away.

Gently detaching his hold, the agonized mother delivered him to Cardinal Bouchier, who advanced to take him from her.

Unconscious that they were conducting the youthful victim to be sacrificed by his blood-thirsty uncle, who was waiting for him in the Star Chamber, the lords rejoiced at their success, and cared nothing for the unhappy Queen's anguish.

Just as he was about to quit the hall, the young Duke of York looked back, and beheld his mother, with her eyes streaming, and hands clasped, and looking the very picture of despair. His sisters were gathered round her.

He bade them farewell in his heart, and it was a last farewell.

V.

HOW THE MARQUIS OF DORSET TOOK REFUGE IN THE SANCTUARY.

THREE days after the removal of the young Duke of York, another event occurred calculated to heighten the unhappy Queen's anxiety.

The Marquis of Dorset, her eldest son by her first husband, who had hitherto filled the high offices of Constable of the Tower and keeper of the royal treasures, sought refuge in the Abbey Sanctuary.

When he presented himself to the Queen, she refused to embrace him, and reproached him bitterly with deserting his post, telling him he ought to have held the Tower to the last.

"So long as that fortress was in our power, there was hope for us," she said. "Now there is none."

"Hear how I have been circumstanced, ere you condemn me, madame!" replied Dorset. "Within the last two days I have lost all control in the Tower. Deprived of my offices by Gloucester, who has seized upon the royal treasures, and appropriated them to his own use, I could not enforce obedience from the men composing the garrison, and had I not been concealed in the Wardrobe Tower, by a servant who contained faithful to me, and who subsequently enabled me to escape, I should have been lodged in a dungeon, and, ere long, brought to the block. Even when I got out of the Tower I was not safe, for the river-swains with barks filled with armed men, on the look-out to arrest our partisans, and prevent any of them from gaining this Sanctuary."

"Ah! dear son, I no longer blame you," cried the Queen. "Heaven be praised, you have escaped! From what you say I conclude Gloucester is now in the Tower?"

"He occupies the Palace with his retainers," replied Dorset, "and acts as if he were invested with supreme authority; as you may judge, when he styles himself, 'Brother and Uncle of Kings, Protector and Defender, Great Chamberlain, Constable, and Lord High Admiral of England.' While I was hidden in the Wardrobe Tower, I learnt that the King, your son, and his brother, the Duke of York, are shut up by the usurper in some private apartments of the Palace, where none are allowed to see them."

"Alas! alas!" exclaimed the Queen. "I much fear they will never come forth again!"

"I can offer you no comfort, madame," said Dorset, "for I share your worst fears. Both your sons are now completely in Gloucester's power, and it is not likely he will part with his prey."

"Have we no friends left to help us in this dire extremity?" cried the Queen. "The King was adored in the City. Will not the citizens rise to defend his sons?"

"Madame, as I understand, the whole city of London has been greatly troubled by these occurrences, and many loyal citizens took up arms, demanding that the young Princes should be shown to them; but they were prevailed upon by Hastings, who has much influence with the Lord Mayor and the aldermen, to retire to their own homes. Thus all hope of assistance from that quarter is at an end."

"Hastings has ever been my enemy," cried the Queen. "Next to Gloucester himself I fear him most."

"And with good reason," said Dorset.

At this juncture, Doctor Lewis entered the hall. He seemed surprised to find the Marquis of Dorset there, and expressed his great satisfaction at his lordship's escape from the Tower.

"I will frankly confess that I never thought to behold you again, my lord!" he said; "for I am well aware that Gloucester intended your destruction, and I marvel you have been able to escape from him. You are more fortunate than your brother, Lord Gray, and your uncle, Lord Rivers."

"What of them?" cried the Queen, anxiously. "Nay, do not hesitate, good doctor. I have had so many griefs of late, that I am able to bear more."

"I thought the sad news must have reached you, madame, or I should not have spoken of

"it," said the physician. "Thus, then, it is. Sir Richard Ratcliffe, whom you know to be a great favourite with Gloucester, and ever ready to execute his master's behests, has entered Pontefract Castle, at the head of a large party of men, and seized upon Lord Rivers, Lord Gray, Sir Thomas Vaughan, and Sir Richard Hawse."

"I guess what follows," said the Queen.

"Without trial, without sentence," pursued the physician, "they were dragged into the outer court, where their heads were stricken off in the presence of a vast number of spectators, who were told they were traitors, and had conspired with the Queen to destroy the Duke of Gloucester and his cousin, the Duke of Buckingham, and the old royal blood of the realm."

"My brother and my uncle slain!" cried Dorset. "Where will this blood-thirsty tyrant stop?"

"Not till he has slain us all!" said the Queen. "My turn may come next, or yours, my son! Heaven only knows! I thought I could bear the weight of any fresh calamity that might fall upon me, but my strength fails me. Support me to my chamber, Dorset, and do you come with me, good Master Physician, for I may need your aid."

She then quitted the hall, leaning upon her son, and attended by Doctor Lewis.

BY WHOM JANE WAS INDUCED TO QUIT THE SANCTUARY.

On the same day, but at a later hour, Jane was in the Abbey cloisters, and was pacing to and fro, with her eyes fixed upon the ground, when she became aware that some one was approaching, and, looking up, she beheld Lord Hastings.

After respectfully accosting her, he said,—

"Till this morning I was not aware you had taken refuge in the Sanctuary. Had you consulted me I should have advised you to remain in your apartments in the Palace. Here you are shut out from all the enjoyments of life, and from all pleasant intercourse with your friends. In effect, you are a prisoner, since you cannot stray far beyond these cloisters. Let me take you hence. I have interest enough with the Lord Protector to shield you from all harm, and save your property from confiscation."

"I doubt not your offer is made in good faith, my lord," she rejoined, "but the Protector can do me little injury. I care not for the confiscation of my goods. I have more money with me than I need. I shall never again take part in the gaieties and pleasures of the world, so that to be shut up here is no punishment to me. As speedily as may be, it is my intention to retire to a convent."

"I might applaud your resolution," said Hastings, "if I thought you were called upon to sacrifice yourself thus. But I see no reason for it. So far from your charms being on the wane, you have not yet reached the meridian of your beauty. When your grief has abated you will reappear, looking more lovely than ever. No, madame, it must not be. The disappearance of a star so brilliant would leave a blank in the firmament."

"My lord," she replied, coldly, "all you can say will fail to move me."

"Yet listen to me!" he said, assuming a more urgent manner. "Circumstances compel me to avow my feelings sooner than I intended. The obloquy you would bury in a convent have produced a great impression upon me. I love you passionately—nay, I have long loved you, though, during the King's lifetime, I controlled my passion. Now I can speak freely. From me you will meet with the same devotion you met with from Edward—more, perhaps—for I will live only for you. Again I pray you, let me take you back to the Palace, which, as I have said, you ought never to have quitted."

"No, my lord," she replied; "I will never leave this place, except, as I have told you, for a convent."

"This is madness!" cried Hastings, unable to control his impatience. "As your friend, I am bound to prevent you from carrying this fatal resolution into effect. You are too young, too fair, too captivating, to retire from the world at present. Come with me."

"Hold, my lord!" said Jane, as if struck by a sudden idea. "Before I consent to return with you to the Palace, I must have your promise that you will act as I desire."

"I will do whatever you enjoin," he replied.

"You pledge your knightly word to this?" she said.

"I do," he replied, earnestly. "Are you now content?"

"I am content to trust you," she rejoined.

"Come, then!" he cried, hurrying her along the cloister.

They had not proceeded far, when the Queen, attended by the Marquis of Dorset and Doctor Lewis, issued from the ambulatory on the right.

For a moment, her Majesty looked as if she doubted the evidence of her senses; but as Jane stopped to address her, she said, in a haughty tone, "Pass on!"

"Grant me a word, madame, ere I depart," said Jane.

"What?" exclaimed the Queen, in increased astonishment. "Are you about to quit the Sanctuary?—and with Lord Hastings?"

"She is, madame," replied Hastings. "She is already wearied of it."

"Dissuade me not unheard, gracious madame," said Jane. "I shall be able to satisfy you."

"I am already satisfied you have deceived me," said the Queen, "and no explanation you can give will induce me to change my mind. With this powerful friend, you have secured an asylum, as you call it, in this asylum. Lord Hastings will protect you."

"I have already promised to do so, madame," said Hastings.

THE KING'S LAST BANQUET. (See page 94.)

"A word will convince you of the injustice you do me, madame," said Jane.

"Hear what she has to say, I beseech you, madame!" said Doctor Lewis, struck by Jane's manner.

"Speak, then!" said the Queen, laughing. On this, the others moved away to a short distance, leaving Jane and the Queen together.

"My motive for leaving this asylum is to serve you, madame," said Jane.

"Serve me! How?" cried the Queen.

"I know not in what way, madame, for I am acting on a sudden impulse; but I am persuaded I can be more useful to you if I am at liberty than here. Should I fail in my endeavours, hold me excused; for you may be sure my heart is with you."

"Enough!" said the Queen. Then, lowering her voice, she added, "If you can win over the Lord Hastings, you will do me infinite service."

"It is in that hope that I leave you, madame," replied Jane. "I have his promise. And now, farewell, madame. You shall soon hear from me, and by some faithful messenger."

With a low reverence to the Queen, she then joined Lord Hastings, who had watched her narrowly during the interview.

From the cloisters they proceeded to the great hall, where Jane found one of her servants, and gave directions that the household goods she had brought with her should be taken back to the Palace.

The outer gate of the Sanctuary was kept constantly closed, and a strong guard placed at it to prevent any attempt to violate the asylum. Lord Hastings had been allowed admittance, but his attendants were compelled to remain outside.

Jane's heart smote her as she passed through the gate, but she felt she must now go on. Fate forced her to quit the Sanctuary, and rush upon her doom.

Followed by his attendants, Lord Hastings conducted her to the Palace.

All had been thrown into confusion by the Queen's sudden flight, but Jane's apartments were undisturbed.

Having put her in possession of them, and given orders that the same attention should be paid to her as heretofore, Lord Hastings retired.

BOOK VI.

LORD HASTINGS.

I.

SHOWING THE PREVIEW OF ALICE FORDHAM.

A few days after her return to the Palace, Jane, to her great surprise, received a visit from her former confidante and companion, Alice Fordham.

Highly indignant, she was about to order the intruder's instant departure; but Alice threw herself on her knees, and made so many protestations of regret for her conduct, that at length Jane forgave her, and allowed her to remain.

"I have behaved infamously to you, Jane," said the distressed friend; "but I know the goodness of your heart, and therefore venture to you. I still hope I may be able to serve you."

"I never wanted a friend more than now, Alice," said Jane; "and if you are sincere in your professions of regard, you can materially assist me."

"I have come with that intent," said Alice. "I hope I shall be able to free you from your worst enemy, the Lord Protector."

"You promise too much, Alice," remarked Jane. "He is beyond your power."

"Tis possible that a mortal blow can be dealt by an unseen hand," said Alice.

"What mean you?" cried Jane, looking at her inquiringly.

"You have heard that a waxen figure can be prepared by certain strong enchantments, in the likeness of an enemy whom we would destroy—so that, as the image melts, our enemy will perish."

"I have heard of such a thing," replied Jane; "but I have no faith in it. Nor, if I believed in the sorcery, would I employ it."

"Here is an image of the Lord Protector," said Alice, producing a small waxen figure. "You may know whom it represents by the high shoulders, and even by the features. I bought it from a witch, by whom it was made, and who assures me it will prove effectual. Pins are stuck to the heart, as you see. Try it."

"No," replied Jane; "I will not resort to witchcraft to rid myself of an enemy."

"You are more scrupulous than the Queen," said Alice. "She and her mother, the Duchess of Bedford, notoriously practised enchantments, and it has even been said that you yourself brewed philters to enthrall the King."

"You could contradict that idle talk, Alice," said Jane.

"Yes; I know the sole magic you practised proceeded from your own fascinations; but I have heard some credulous people affirm that you retained your power over the King by spells. These persons declare you are now employing the same arts upon Lord Hastings. This is a lie to defend yourself. I am well aware that Lord Hastings has been long acquainted with you."

"Lord Hastings never dared to breathe a word of love to me till after the King's death," said Jane; "and he is quite aware that his wife is alive."

"That is true," replied Jane, sceptically. "I have heard the contrary. 'Tis said that Lord Hastings has asked you to quit the Sanctuary, and has offered to defend you against the King's wrath."

"That is true," replied Jane. "Lord Hastings has shown himself a devoted friend, but nothing more. I did not encourage his suit, and he desisted. Since I returned to the palace, I have only seen him twice."

"You will see him to-day," said Alice.

"How know you this?" asked Jane.

Alice smiled significantly.

"You will find I am right," she said. "I perceive you are not inclined to take me into your confidence, and I will not ask it. But I am not to be duped."

"I cannot allow this freedom, Alice," said Jane, coldly. "Our former familiarity must not be renewed. I am not in the mood for idle converse."

"Is that a hint you would have me go?" said the other.

"My spirits are not good. I am best alone," rejoined Jane.

"You expect Lord Hastings, and want to be rid of me," said Alice. "Nay, the remark was made in jest."

"Such jests are not to my taste," said Jane, sharply.

"Certes, you are much changed," rejoined Alice. "But no wonder! The precariousness of your position naturally makes you feel uneasy. We shall meet again sooner than you expect, and then you may regret that you have not been more gracious to me. Adieu!"

During the foregoing colloquy, Alice had contrived to slip the wax figure into a small coffer that was standing on the table.

The treacherous act was unperceived by Jane.

II.

HOW JANE WAS ARRESTED, AND TAKEN TO THE TOWER.

LATER on in the day, Lord Hastings made his appearance.

He looked greatly pre-occupied; and after a greeting had passed between him and Jane, he said to her, "I am sorry I induced you to quit the Sanctuary, and advise you to return thither. I may no longer be able to protect you. If Gloucester persists in his present course, I shall be compelled to declare against him; and Lord Stanley, the Archbishop of York, and the Bishop of Ely have come to a like determination. Not only are we denied access to the young King and the Duke of York, but we find they are allowed very few attendants, while the Lord Protector has an unusual number of retainers, not only at the Tower, but at Crosby House, where he entertains the Lord Mayor and the citizens. The coronation, which ought to take place soon, is again postponed. All this convinces me that the Lord Protector has some ill design."

"Doubt it not, my lord," observed Jane. "He means to seize his nephew's crown."

"That he shall never do, while I can wield a sword," said Hastings. "I will lay down my life in defence of King Edward's sons. If remonstrances fail, I will resort to sterner means. To-morrow, at the meeting of the Council, I shall demand that the two Princes be brought before us; and if the Protector refuses compliance, I will slay him with my own hand. Buckingham, also, must die. Thus only can the safety of the young Princess be secured."

"Have I permission to impart your design to the Queen, my lord?" said Jane.

"Breathe it not to any one!" replied Hastings. "Absolute secrecy is required. Gloucester is excessively vigilant, and has a multitude of spies."

Just then he fancied he heard a sound, and, suddenly starting up, he raised a fold of arras.

But, quick as was the action, the listener was gone, if there had been one there.

"'Twas a false alarm," he said, as he returned. "Had I been overheard, my plan would have been ruined, and I should lose my head. Having explained to you the perilous game I am playing, I will now take my departure. Should success crown my attempt, we shall soon meet again. If not, we part for ever. Meanwhile, follow my advice, and return to the Sanctuary."

For some time after the departure of Lord Hastings, Jane continued occupied in anxious reflection, for she could not disguise from herself the extreme hazard of the attempt.

She then summoned a female attendant, and directed her to pack up a few articles of wearing apparel, and some other matters that she wished to take with her to the Sanctuary.

These preparations were soon made, and the handmaiden had just brought in a little valise containing the articles in question, when the door was thrown open, and, to Jane's great alarm, Sir William Catesby entered with an officer.

Half a dozen halibordiers could be seen standing in the gallery outside.

"Madame," said Catesby, "I have a disagreeable duty to perform. I am sent by the lords of the Council to arrest you, and convey you to the Tower."

"With what offence am I charged, sir?" she demanded.

"With conspiring, by certain magical practices, to injure and destroy the Lord Protector," replied Hastings.

Jane then saw the imprudence she had committed in holding any converse with Alice Fordham, but she unhesitatingly replied, "The charge is false."

"I hope it may turn out so, madame," said Catesby. "My injunctions are to make search for anything tending to prove your criminality."

He then signed to the officer, who proceeded at once to the table, and, after a moment's pretended search, opened the coffer and discovered the wax figure.

Taking it forth, he brought it to his leader.

"Here is proof against you, madame," said Catesby. "There can be no doubt that this is an image of the Lord Protector."

"And equally certain that the object is malevolent," said the officer.

"'Tis a plot against my life, contrived by Alice Fordham," cried Jane.

"You must convince the Council of that," said Catesby.

"I do not expect to convince them," returned Jane, "because they are prejudiced against me, and ready to decide as the Lord Protector may enjoin."

"Such language will not serve you, madame," said Catesby. "You must now to the Tower with me. You are at liberty to take a female attendant with you, and any apparel you may require."

"I am ready to attend you, sir," said Jane. "That trunk contains all I need. You will go with me, Miriam," she added, to her hand-maiden, who was weeping bitterly.

"I will go with you to death, madame," replied Miriam.

"Nay, I trust all will go well," said Jane. "Thou canst prove that I practise no magic arts."

"I can, madame," said the hand-maiden, earnestly.

Jane and her attendant were then conducted by a private way to the palace stairs, where a covered boat was waiting, in which they were conveyed to the Tower.

Arrived there, Jane was at once taken to the large chamber in the White Tower, where the Council was sitting at the time.

III.

HOW JANE WAS BROUGHT BEFORE THE LORD PROTECTOR AND THE COUNCIL.

IN that unrivalled hall, in the uppermost story of the White Tower, where consultations on matters of import to the State were then held, the chief members of the Council were assembled.

From the massive wooden pillars supporting the roof of this vast and lofty apartment, heavy tapestry of a sombre hue was hung, so as completely to surround the Council table, and prevent the discussions there carried on from being overheard by any but privileged officers.

At the head of the Council board sat the Lord Protector, magnificently robed.

On his right was the Cardinal Archbishop of Canterbury; on the left the Archbishop of York. The Duke of Buckingham, the Bishop of Ely, Lord Stanley, and several other nobles, were present, but Lord Hastings did not occupy his customary seat at the table.

Before these personages Jane was brought by Catesby and the officer, after being led through a long gallery filled with armed men; and when she looked around, and saw the stern countenances fixed upon her, her heart sank, and she felt ready to faint.

By a great effort, however, she recovered her composure, and after making a profound reverence to the Council, waited to be interrogated.

"Bring the woman somewhat nearer to me!" cried the Lord Protector, in a stern voice.

And as the order was obeyed, and Jane came forward, he said,—

"Art thou not afraid to look me in the face, after the grievous bodily harm thou hast done me?"

Nothing daunted by his fierce glances, Jane replied,—

"I can regard you steadfastly, my lord, and declare before heaven that I have never injured you."

"Let this sight confound thee, then!" he cried, drawing up the sleeve of his doublet, and displaying his left arm, the skin of which was shrivelled, and yellow as parchment. "This mischief has been done me by thy enchantments, and had I not discovered the cause, my whole body would have been wasted and dried up."

A slight murmur pervaded the assemblage.

"My lord," said Jane, firmly, "the King, your brother, told me that your left arm was thus blighted from your birth, and several here present must be aware of the circumstance. His Grace of Buckingham can testify to it, if he will."

"I have heard the Lord Protector say that his arm had become strangely shrunken of late," observed Buckingham; "and I told his Highness that the injury must be caused by witchcraft."

"Ay, and thou art the witch who hast wrought the mischief!" cried Gloucester, casting a severe look at Jane. "I suspected thee, because I know that by philters and love-potions the King, my brother, was held in thy power."

"Were King Edward living, you had not dared to accuse me thus, my lord," replied Jane, courageously. "He would have defended me from the false charge!"

"Thy effrontery is matchless, but it will not avail thee," said Gloucester. "Proof can be given of thy magic practices."

"It can, my lord," observed Catesby, pressing forward. "This figure of your Highness, evidently prepared by sorcery, and pierced to the heart by pins, as you see, has just been found in a coffer in Mistress Shore's room."

All glances were directed towards the figure, which was laid on the Council table by Catesby.

"This figure, you say, was found in Mistress Shore's room, Sir William?" demanded Gloucester.

"Scarce two hours ago, my lord," replied Catesby.

"They who hide can find," said Jane. "She by whom the figure was fabricated placed it where it could not fail to be discovered. 'Tis a device to destroy me."

"Contrived by whom?" said Buckingham.

"By Alice Fordham," replied Jane.

"Alice Fordham is here?" observed the Duke. "Let her be brought before us."

Alice was introduced, but though she maintained a bold deportment, she did not look towards Jane.

Questioned by the Duke of Buckingham, she denied that she had hidden the magic figure, but asserted that Jane had shown it to her, and declared that by means of it she could destroy the Lord Protector.

By this statement, which was very confidently made, a certain impression was made on the Council.

It must be remembered that at this time a belief in witchcraft was universally entertained, and few were free from superstition.

"You swear to the truth of what you have stated?" said Buckingham.

"Solemnly," replied Alice, "I have long known that Mistress Shore is a sorceress. Moreover, a far greater lady has been her associate in these dark practices."

"Dost hint at the Queen, mistress?" demanded Gloucester. "Speak plainly."

"Your Highness has said it," replied Alice.

"'Tis utterly false," cried Jane. "This monstrous accusation will obtain credit from no one."

"I credit it!" thundered Gloucester. "I believe that thou hast conspired with my brother's wife to destroy me by witchcraft, since she can reach me in no other way. With this wicked intent didst thou join her in the Abbey Sanctuary, and there thy malignant spells were wrought."

"I care not to defend myself, my lord!" said Jane. "Believe me guilty if you will, but I will lift up my voice for the Queen, since none other in this assemblage will speak for her. If she could subtly and certainly have destroyed your Highness, as you assert, would she have delivered up her youngest son to you? Would she not rather have waited the result of the secret blow? The Lord Cardinal, and other lords here present, witnessed her anguish, and know that she never expected to behold her son again. Would she have had this fear if she had felt certain of your destruction? I trow not."

"I'll hear no more!" cried Gloucester, impatiently. "I cannot reach your partner in crime, but I will have you burned as a witch."

"I pray your Highness to suspend your judgment," interposed Lord Stanley. "The witness against this unhappy lady is utterly unworthy of credit. She is actuated by vindictive feelings, and has herself been guilty of criminal practices, as I will show. Bring in that monk who waits without," he added, to the officer.

Immediately afterwards, a Franciscan friar was introduced. His cowl was thrown back, so that his pallid features could be seen.

On his appearance a manifest change was produced in Alice's demeanour, but Jane looked wistfully at him.

"What hast thou to state respecting Alice Fordham, father?" demanded Lord Stanley.

"I could state much as to her falsehood and treachery towards her generous friend," replied the friar. "But it may suffice to say that she stole from Mistress Shore a warrant for ten thousand marks, and intended to appropriate the amount to herself, but I forced her to give up the money, and took it back to its rightful owner."

"'Tis a large sum!" exclaimed Gloucester. "It cannot all have been spent?"

"None of it has been spent by me, my lord," replied Jane, to whom the question was addressed. "The whole sum has been handed over to the Queen."

"My lord," said Lord Stanley, "we are all agreed that no credit can be attached to the evidence of Alice Fordham, and our sentence upon her is imprisonment for the offence she has committed."

"As yet we know not the name of her accuser," said Gloucester. "How art thou called?" he added, to the friar.

"In bygone days I was known as Alban Shore," replied the monk.

The answer caused general astonishment.

"Then thou art this woman's husband!" said Gloucester. "Dost thou not ask for her punishment?"

"No, my lord!" replied Shore.

"But she shall be punished," cried Gloucester; "if not for sorcery, for incontinency! Take her hence," he added, to the officers. "Lodge her in some prison within the Tower, till I see fit to deliver her to the Bishop of London for punishment."

"What is to be done with Alice Fordham, my lord?" inquired Catesby.

"Let her likewise be imprisoned," replied the Lord Protector.

Ere she was removed, Jane looked towards Shore, and found his gaze fixed compassionately upon her.

IV.

PRESAGES OF ILL.

On that day Lord Hastings did not attend the Council at the Tower, but remained in his magnificent mansion on the banks of the Thames, and occupied himself in preparations for the morrow.

He did not retire to rest till late, but about an hour after midnight he was roused from his slumbers by an attendant, who told him Lord Stanley was without, and desired immediate speech with him.

Surprised and alarmed, Hastings sprang from his couch, and, putting on a loose gown, caused his untimely visitor to be introduced.

The expression of Lord Stanley's countenance prepared him for some direful communication.

"I have had a remarkable dream to-night," said Stanley, "and it has produced so strong an effect upon me that I have come to relate it to your lordship. It concerns you as well as myself."

"Methought we were hunting the wild boar in a forest that was entirely strange to me. The huntsman was gone, and the hounds had fled. Both our horses were killed, but we continued the chase on foot. Suddenly the boar turned upon us. We struck him repeatedly with our spears, but he appeared invulnerable. After a short conflict you were trampled beneath the infuriated animal's feet, and I saw his tusks pierce your side. You were baffled in blood. In vain I strove to assist you. I was thrown down likewise, and gored, and, with a sharp pang, I awoke."

"How do you interpret this dream?" remarked Hastings, after a brief pause.

"Thus, my lord," replied Stanley. "The wounds and blood signify danger of life to both of us. The boar is Gloucester's cognizance, and plainly denotes from whom the danger is to be apprehended. I shall not remain within his reach. I have ordered my horses, and shall set out forthwith to join my friends in the North, and I counsel your lordship to come with me and place yourself in safety."

"I thank you for the warning," said Hastings, "and though I own the dream is most surprising, and well calculated to cause alarm, it does not give me much uneasiness, nor will it turn me from my purpose. Instead of goring us, the boar, I hope, may be slain. But if you have any misgiving, I would not have you stay. Take horse as you design, and depart forthwith. You must, however, consider that your sudden flight will rouse suspicion, and unless the boar be struck to the heart he may find means of goring you, even at a distance."

"I cannot shake off my fears," said Stanley. "Nevertheless, I agree with you that flight may not ensure safety, but perhaps endanger it, and I will, therefore, tarry for the Council to-morrow."

"'Tis the best and boldest course," said Hastings. "You may be of infinite service to the young King. Let all your retainers wait for you on Tower Hill; they may be needed."

Stanley then departed, and Hastings returned to his couch; but not to sleep, for he had been made restless by this nocturnal visit.

Next morning, after he had breakfasted, he was preparing to set out for the Tower, and intended to take with him a large party of armed men, and leave them outside the fortress, when Sir Thomas Howard, son of Lord Howard, and a member of Gloucester's cabinet, made his appearance, and interfered with the plan.

On inquiring why Sir Thomas had come at such an early hour, Hastings was told that he had been sent by the Lord Protector.

"His Highness feared that your lordship might not attend the Council to-day, and having important business to despatch, he ordered me to fetch you."

"I will follow shortly," said Hastings.

"Nay, my lord; I will wait," rejoined Sir Thomas. "His Highness bade me bring you."

Finding he could not get rid of his troublesome visitor without causing mistrust, Hastings gave some private orders to his men, and set out on horseback with his enforced companion.

Sir Thomas had two grooms with him, and they appeared extremely watchful. As Lord Hastings rode past Blackfriars, his horse stumbled, and again in Blackchapel, and on the second occasion the rider was nearly thrown.

"Were not your lordship the most fortunate of men, I should say these mischances are unlucky," observed Sir Thomas.

Hastings made no reply; but continued thoughtful till they approached the Tower.

On looking towards the spot where he had enjoined Stanley to station his men, he could not perceive them, nor did he see any concourse of citizens as he had expected. If a crowd had been collected on Tower Hill, it must have been dispersed.

But he was still further discouraged when, on reaching the barbican, he found the guard doubled, while the outer walls were thronged with armed men.

Not without misgiving did he cross the drawbridge, and pass through the gate.

On inquiry, he learned that Lord Stanley had already arrived, and that the Archbishop of York and the Bishop of Ely had just landed at Tower-stairs, and proceeded to the Council chamber.

Every precaution to repress a tumult seemed to have been taken. A company of archers was drawn up in the lower ward, and a large party of arquebussiers was collected in the inner court.

Had any discovery been made? This Hastings wished to know, yet feared to ask. The preparations he beheld convinced him that his project must be abandoned.

Having dismounted near the Garden Tower, Hastings was marching with his companions towards the palace gate, when he was stopped by a Franciscan friar, who besought a word with him in private.

"What would you, holy father?" inquired Hastings.

"Turn back, if it be possible, my son," replied the monk, in a low voice, calculated not to reach the ear of Sir Thomas Howard, who was standing at a little distance. "I would have warned you, but I have not been able to quit the Tower."

"'Tis too late to turn back now, good father, even if there be danger," rejoined Hastings. "But why are these preparations made?"

"The Lord Protector suspects some plot against himself, my lord," replied the monk.

"Ha! Is it so?" cried Hastings.

"Knew you what happened yesterday?" inquired the monk.

"Speak! Keep me not in suspense!" said Hastings.

"Mistress Shore was arrested and imprisoned in the Beauchamp Tower," replied the friar.

"Mistress Shore imprisoned!" exclaimed Hastings. "I thought she had returned to the Sanctuary. With what crime is she charged?"

Before the monk could make any reply, Sir Thomas Howard interposed and said,—

"My lord, I doubt not the Lord Protector is impatiently expecting you. You cannot have much to say to this holy man. You have no occasion for a priest as yet?" he added, significantly.

"Then you think I may need one presently?" observed Hastings.

"Nay, my lord; I said not so," rejoined Sir Thomas.

"Act on the hint, good father, and wait," said Hastings.

V.

HOW LORD HASTINGS WAS BREWHEADED ON TOWER GREEN.

ON entering the Council chamber, Hastings found all the members assembled—the only seat vacant being his own, which was situated at the upper end of the table, on the left of the Lord Protector.

"Soh! you are come at length, my lord?" cried Gloucester, in a fierce tone. "You have kept us waiting!"

"I trust I have caused no needless delay, my lord," replied Hastings. "I learn that the Council has not yet been called upon to deliberate on any matter of import. Before we proceed further, I have a proposition to make, to which, I persuade myself, your Highness will incline a favourable ear. Of late, there have been many disquieting rumours within the City of London, which have produced great agitation among the populace, as your Highness must be aware; but these murmurs can be speedily quelled, if the young King be taken from the Tower, where, methinks, he has been too long shut up, and shown to his loving subjects. I, therefore, propose that such a course, which, for the reasons I have given, I deem highly judicious, be adopted, and that the young King and his brother, the Duke of York, be forthwith exhibited to the citizens."

"We do not deem it expedient to carry out your suggestion, my lord," said Gloucester. "Our royal nephews are safest within the Tower, and we shall not suffer them to go forth, even at your earnest solicitation."

"But will not your Highness listen to the recommendation of the Council?" said Hastings.

"The vote of the Council has not yet been taken, my lord, and would be against you, I am persuaded," rejoined Gloucester. "But why this sudden change of opinion? Till now you have judged it best that the young King should remain secluded, with his brother, till the Coronation. Have you been instigated to make this request by the Queen? If so, I can understand the motive."

"I have held no communication with the Queen, my lord," replied Hastings. "Her Majesty has no liking for me, neither have I any affection for her."

"But you have conspired with Mistress Shore, who is in the Queen's confidence."

"Your Highness wrongs me!" cried Hastings.

"You have conspired, I say, with that sorcerer against my life!" roared Gloucester. "Had not your treasonable design been revealed to me, I should infallibly have been your victim. Your purpose was to stab me where I sit, and next bathing your steel in Buckingham's life-blood, to seize upon the two young Princes. 'Tis useless to deny it, for there is one here who overheard you."

"Who is my accuser?" demanded Hastings.

"I am, my lord," replied Catesby, stepping forward. "Learn, to your confusion, that I was behind the arras when you disclosed your design to Mistress Shore!"

"Now thou seest how I became acquainted with thy villany!" cried Gloucester.

"Your purpose was to slay the Lord Protector and the Duke of Buckingham at the Council table, and then take upon you the government of the young King and the kingdom," pursued Catesby. "But Heaven would not suffer such an evil scheme to prosper."

"Dost thou hear, traitor?—dost thou hear?" cried Gloucester.

At this juncture, several members of the Council, who had hitherto been kept silent by astonishment and alarm, rose to their feet.

Gloucester, however, would allow no interference, but struck his hand violently twice or thrice upon the table.

At this signal, several halberdiers rushed in, and, by the Lord Protector's orders, seized Hastings, who offered no resistance.

Lord Stanley, however, came to the assistance of his friend, but received a severe wound in the head, and fell beneath the table. By the direction of Catesby, who conducted these proceedings, the Archbishop of York and the Bishop of Ely were next arrested, and these measures caused the greatest consternation among the Council.

"What shall be done with this heinous offender, my lord?" said Catesby, pointing to Hastings, who remained in custody of the guard.

"I will not ask my life," said the ill-fated noble, with dignity. "I am well convinced your Highness will not spare me, either for old friendship or for service rendered you."

"Thou hast forfeited all claim upon me," rejoined Gloucester, in an inexorable tone. "Take him forth," he added. "Let him make a short shrift, if he will. By Saint Paul! I will not dine till I have had his head!"

The unfortunate Hastings was then hurried away, lest his looks should excite compassion among the members of the Council.

Dragged by his guards along the gallery at the side of the Council chamber, he was forced down a spiral stone staircase to the guard chamber, whence, without even allowing a momentary halt, he was taken forth upon the green, and led towards Saint Peter's Chapel.

Catesby, with his sword drawn, marched at a little distance behind the doomed man, but not a word passed between them.

Close to the sacred edifice lay a log of wood, intended for repairs. Beside this piece of timber, and showing that some preparations had been made for the execution, re-stood two figures. These were the Franciscan friar with whom Hastings had recently spoken, and the headsmen.

The latter, who was leaning upon his axe, was a strongly-built, savage-looking personage, with brawny arms bared to the shoulder. He wore a buff jerkin and a leather apron, and had a leather cap on his head.

"Make the most of your time, my lord," said Catesby, advancing. "Many minutes cannot be allowed you."

He then retired; and Hastings threw himself at the feet of the monk, who held the crucifix towards him.

"Have you aught to confess to me, my son?" inquired the monk.

"Alas! good father," cried Hastings, "had I as many hours left as I have minutes, I could not enumerate half my sins!"

"Do not despair, my son," replied the monk. "Do you forgive all your enemies, even him who has brought you to this terrible strait?"

"Even him," replied Hastings; "and pray earnestly that all those I have injured may forgive me."

"Since your repentance, though late, is deep and sincere, I grant you absolution," replied the monk. "By the power derived from holy Peter, I will loose and deliver you from all your sins, known and unknown, mortal and venial. Wherefore, raise up your heart to heaven! Accept of the penance of death as due to your sins, and trust in Divine mercy."

"I do so implicitly, father," replied Hastings, fervently. "May heaven be merciful to me, a sinner!"

"Amen!" exclaimed the monk.

"Are you ready, my lord?" observed the headsmen, receiving an impatient sign from Catesby. "Time grows short."

Divesting himself of his richly-embroidered mantle, Hastings threw it on the ground.

"Take that as thy fee, fellow!" he said.

"Kneel down, my lord!" said the grim headsmen, pointing to the rude block.

Hastings obeyed, and his head was stricken off by a single blow.

A cry from a window in the Beauchamp Tower showed that Jane had witnessed the terrible incident.

"Wrap this ghastly relic in a napkin," said Catesby to the headsmen, "and take it to the Lord Protector. He has sworn not to dine till it be brought him!"

BOOK VII.

THE PENANCE.

I.

OF THE ATTEMPT MADE BY DORSET TO DELIVER THE YOUNG PRINCES FROM THE TOWER.

THE DEATH OF HASTINGS, and the imprisonment of Lord Stanley, the Archbishop of York, and the Bishop of Ely, struck such terror into the few remaining adherents of the young Prince, that no farther attempt was made to oppose Gloucester's daring design.

The crown was shortly afterwards publicly offered him by Buckingham, before a large assemblage, at Baynard's Castle, and accepted with feigned reluctance, amid shouts of "Long live Richard the Third!"

The treasures amassed by his royal brother were next seized upon, and appropriated to his own use, or bestowed on his favourites.

The ceremonies prepared for his nephew were destined to serve his own turn, and the usurper's coronation took place, with great splendour, in Westminster Abbey.

But though he had attained the summit of his ambition, he could not feel secure while his nephews lived. Some rising would infallibly be made in their favour that might hurl him from the throne, and set up Edward the Fifth in his stead. Already, Buckingham, who had helped to raise him, was discontented, and no more formidable leader of a rebellion could be found.

The pretext would infallibly be, "King Edward's children." That cry must never be heard. It was useless to shut up his nephews in the Tower. They would escape, or be set free. No: they must be removed by death, as all others who stood in his way had been removed. But the manner of their death must be mysterious and inexplicable. None, save the perpetrators of the deed, must know how they perished.

Having formed his fatal determination, the usurper resolved to carry it out. To this end he deemed it best to absent himself for a while from London, hoping by such means to avoid suspicion; and he therefore set out on a progress to York, and journeyed as far as Gloucester, where he halted, the distance from London being suitable to his wicked design.

Meanwhile, his intended victims continued prisoners in the Tower, and occupied two or three rooms situated at the rear of the palace, and looking upon the Privy Garden.

All their pages and attendants had been dismissed, and only one person, Digton, the warder, was allowed to wait upon them.

Subdued by this harsh treatment, the young King Edward the Fifth, as he had once been styled, almost, it now seemed, in mockery, became very melancholy, and neglected his attire, and, though he uttered few complaints, it was evident he was pining away.

The little Duke of York, however, managed to keep up his spirits, and endeavoured to cheer his brother; but not even his lively sallies could bring a smile to Edward's pale face.

One day, when the unfortunate young Prince was seated in a large arm-chair, in a listless posture, and looking very pensive and very sad, the Duke of York came behind him, and, putting his arms round his neck, said,—

RICHARD ACOT JANE OF NORCERY

"Prithet tell me your thoughts, sweet brother."

"I was thinking how much happier I should be if I had not been born a prince, Richard. Had I not the misfortune to be a King's son, I should be at liberty—able to do as I please, and go where I list. I should provoke no man's jealousy. And thou, sweet brother, art equally unfortunate."

"I would not renounce my birthright if Gloucester would set me free on that condition," rejoined the Duke of York. "Do not despair, brother; you may yet sit upon the throne."

"Never!" replied Edward. "I shall never reign, nor wilt thou! We are doomed. The sins of our fathers will be visited upon us. Listen to me, brother," he continued solemnly.

"All the descendants of Edmond Langley, chief of the House of York, have died a violent or premature death. Our great-grand sire, Edward, Duke of York, was slain at the battle of Azincour. Richard, Earl of Cambridge, his brother, lost his head upon the scaffold. Our grand sire, Richard, Duke of York, and his son, Edmond, Duke of Rutland, perished at Wakefield. Our uncle, the Duke of Clarence, was murdered here, in the Tower. The King, our father, died before his time; and 'tis said," he added, lowering his voice, "that he died by poison. Shall we escape Divine vengeance—we, who belong to the fourth generation? I fear, not, brother I fear not!"

"But we have committed no crime!" said Richard.

"Our fathers have sinned, and we must suffer, as I have just pointed out," rejoined Edward. "We ought not to repine."

"Nevertheless, I find the confinement in these rooms very irksome," observed Richard. "I would get out of the Tower if an opportunity offered. But we are too closely watched by Dighton. He will not even let us take exercise in the Privy Garden, or in the court. He says it is against the King's order. Why, you are the King, brother!"

"Alas! no; I am deposed," said Edward.

"If Gloucester is an instrument of Heaven, he must be a scourge," observed Richard. "But I think he is an agent of the Prince of Darkness. When the King our father lived, Gloucester did not dare raise his hand against us, and now he treats us thus infernally. But we will repay him."

"Peace, brother!" cried Edward.

"I cannot hold my peace. I am too greatly incensed," rejoined Richard. "I would that Gloucester with cruelty and treachery to his face, if he came near us."

"Have a care, brother!" said Edward, as a noise was heard at the door. "Here comes Dighton with our repast."

"Dighton is the tool of a tyrant," cried Richard, determined that the warder should hear him.

But it was not Dighton who entered.

It was a tall young man, habited precisely like the warder, but much taller, and differing in features and manner. He brought with him a basket containing a few eatables and bread, which he placed on the table.

While he was thus occupied, the two young Princes stared at him, as if doubting the evidence of their senses.

At length they both sprang towards him, calling out, "The Dorset—our brother Dorset!" and flung themselves into his welcoming arms.

Yes; it was the Marquis of Dorset in that strange disguise.

"You need not be told that I have ventured here in the hope of liberating you," said Dorset, as soon as he had extricated himself from their embraces. "If Heaven prospers my undertaking, you shall both be out of Gloucester's power to-night."

"So soon!" exclaimed Richard, clapping his hands joyfully.

"Calm yourself, brother!" said Edward. "Let us hear Dorset's plan."

"The attempt would never have been made but for the Queen's entreaties," said the Marquis. "But I could not resist her prayers, and yesterday ventured forth from the Sanctuary on this perilous errand. At the very onset there was danger, for the Sanctuary is now surrounded by armed men, to prevent all egress and ingress; but I escaped. After making all needful arrangements for your flight, I contrived to gain admittance to the Tower, and, by promise of a large reward, purchased the assistance of your attendant, Dighton. I have thus gained access to you. To-night a boat will be outside the Tower wharf, waiting to carry off two fugitives. You will both, I trust, be on the wharf at midnight—will both be placed on board the boat, and conveyed in safety to Westminster—and thence, despite all difficulties, to the Sanctuary, where you will be shrouded to the Queen's anxious breast."

"That thought gives me fresh energy," said Edward. "I never hoped to behold the Queen and my sisters again. But how are we to reach the wharf, my lord?"

"I will conduct you thither," replied Dorset. "Hold yourselves in readiness for my appearance. At the appointed hour I will come to you; and then, if all goes well, you shall be quickly free from constraint, and as quickly restored to the Queen!"

"Heaven deliver us from our uncle Gloucester! That shall be my fervent prayer to—" be careful what they said to the warder visit them, Dorset then took his departure.

II.

As may well be supposed, the intervening hours seemed to pass very slowly with the youthful prisoners—especially with the Duke of York, whose disposition was exceedingly impatient. They did nothing but talk of the Queen and the Princesses, their sisters, and of the expected joyful meeting with them. Alas! it was destined never to take place.

In the evening, Dighton brought them supper, and lighted their lamp, and they thought he regarded them wistfully, but in compliance with Dorset's injunctions, they did not address him, and he soon went away.

Nothing further occurred. After awhile, they grew tired of talking, and Richard fell asleep on his brother's shoulder, and slumbered on thus till near midnight, when Edward, who had counted the hours by the bell, thought it best to wake him.

Scarcely had he done so, when the door opened, and Dorset came in.

"Are you ready?" he asked.

"Quite ready!" they both replied.

After extinguishing the lamp—for Dorset being well acquainted with the place, did not require a light—they went forth, and tracked a long, dark corridor.

No guard appeared to be stationed there, nor could any light be seen, or sound heard. But Dorset easily discovered a short spiral staircase communicating with the Privy Garden.

Taking a hand of each, Dorset then led them noiselessly across the garden. Fortunately, the night was profoundly dark, so there was small chance of discovery.

Presently, they came to a postern constructed in the high stone wall surrounding the garden, and Dorset having cautiously unlocked this door, they issued forth into the outer ward, almost opposite the Cradle Tower.

Again the darkness screened them from the observation of the sentinels, if there were any on the walls.

At that time a vaulted gateway connected with the tower just mentioned, led to a narrow drawbridge, which was defended by a strong iron gate.

Through the instrumentality, doubtless, of Dighton, the little drawbridge was now lowered, and the gate open, and in another minute the youthful Princes and their conductor had crossed the moat, and were standing safely upon the wharf, with the darkling river flowing past them.

At last they were out of the Tower, and escape seemed now certain.

Richard could hardly repress his transports of delight, and even Edward felt elated.

They all flew to the edge of the wharf, resolved not to lose an instant in springing on board; but how dreadfully were their expectations crushed, when no boat could be descried!

Dorset still hoped the boat would come. But the risk of discovery would be infinitely increased by delay, and he looked back in terror, and listened anxiously for any alarming sound from the walls.

Again he plunged his gaze into the darkness—hoping, praying, that the boat might appear. But it came not.

A slight fog hung upon the river, and this added to the obscurity. Sounds were heard in the distance, but nothing could be distinguished.

During this severe trial, the sensations of the unfortunate young Princes almost amounted to agony, but they uttered no reproaches.

Edward stood quite still, though trembling in spite of himself; but Richard seized Dorset's hand, and said,—

"Brother, do not let them take us back to the Tower!"

"What can I do?" rejoined Dorset, distractedly. "What can I do?"

Just then a sound was heard that annihilated all hope, if any had remained.

The alarm bell was rung in the palace, and shouts resounded along the walls.

Almost instantaneously, as it seemed, torches were brought to the summit of the Traitor's Tower, and these cast a lurid light upon the river, and disclosed the youthful fugitives standing upon the wharf, while loud shouts arose from the guard, who were armed with arquebusses. They did not fire, for they had recognised the young Princes; but they ordered them not to stir.

At the same time, armed men, provided with torches, could be seen hurrying through the archway of the Portcullis Tower into the outer ward, and shouts were exchanged between this party and the arquebussiers on Traitor's Tower, from which the former learnt that the fugitives were on the wharf, whereupon Sir Robert Brakenbury, who was with the party, hastened in that direction.

Seeing that capture was inevitable, Dorset consulted for a moment with the young Princes, who approved his design, and bidding them, as it proved, an eternal adieu, he ran to the edge of the wharf, and plunged into the river.

Surprised by this desperate step, the arquebussiers, who took him from his garb to be a warder, instantly fired, but none of the shots took effect, and he swam rapidly down the current.

Next moment, Sir Robert Brakenbury, followed by a dozen halberdiers, appeared on the wharf.

It was a very affecting sight as the young Princes surrendered themselves to the Lieutenant. Brakenbury made few observations at the time, putting no questions to them as to their escape, and forbore even to ask the name of the individual who had plunged into the river.

Very respectfully, and with a sad expression of countenance, he conducted the Princes back to their apartments in the palace, deferring all investigation until the morrow, and only giving orders that the guard should be doubled.

III.

IN WHAT MANNER THE YOUNG PRINCES WERE PUT TO DEATH IN THE GARDEN TOWER.

KING RICHARD THE THIRD was at Warwick Castle when he received intelligence of the attempt to liberate the young Princes, and he resolved no longer to delay their destruction.

Already he had sent a confidential messenger to Brakenbury with a letter enjoining him to make away secretly with the prisoners, but the Lieutenant refused to obey the order.

Richard was therefore obliged to find another agent, and after some consideration, he chose Sir James Tyrrell, one of his retinue, whom he knew to be bold and unscrupulous.

Tempted by the promises of immediate reward and future preferment, Tyrrell accepted the dreadful task without hesitation, and set out at once for the Tower, furnished with an order from the King to the Lieutenant.

On his arrival, he had a private conference with Brakenbury.

The Lieutenant again refused to be accessory to any secret murder, and said,—

"My soul revolts against the deed, and if I could prevent it I would; but I am powerless, as you know. On your head, and not on mine, be the blood of these innocents!"

Tyrrell did not seem to heed the abhorrence with which his fell design was regarded by the Lieutenant, but prepared to execute the King's mandate.

Dighton, the warder, who still attended on the Princes, having contrived to satisfy the Lieutenant that he had no hand in the recent attempt to escape, appeared a fitting instrument for the business, and proved to be pliant.

With him was associated Miles Forrest, who had been concerned in the murder of the Duke of Clarence, and these two miscreants undertook a deed from which all others shrank.

Within the last few days, by an order received from the King, the unfortunate Princes had been removed—for greater security, it was said, but it may be for other reasons—from the palace to the Garden Tower, as the structure was then styled—though it subsequently acquired a far more terrible designation, which still continues attached to it.

Beneath this tower yawns a low-browed archway, once protected by a massive gate at either end, and by a strong portcullis.

Immediately above the arch, and reached by a short circular stone staircase, is a room in which the portcullis is worked; and this gloomy chamber and the ponderous defensive machine—though the latter is no longer used—are still in pretty nearly the same state as heretofore.

It was in the upper part of this structure that the two Princes were confined on their removal from the palace.

A small chamber was assigned them, containing a bed and one or two chairs, with another still smaller room adjoining it.

Nothing could be more dismal than the appearance of these cells—for such they were, in effect. The mullioned windows were strongly grated like those of a dungeon. The massive door of the little bed-chamber was constantly locked and bolted at night by Dighton, and there was another strong door below to shut off the portcullis room, which was reached by a separate staircase.

The bed-chamber window looked upon the inner ward, and upon the White Tower; but it was placed too high up to be easily reached, and the youthful captives never gazed out from it.

Since the failure of their attempt at flight, they had become completely disheartened. Even Richard had lost his spirit. But as calamity pressed upon them, their brotherly love strengthened, and served to support them.

Convinced they had not long to live, they strove to prepare for death. No priest visited them—no one whatever was allowed to come near them, except Dighton, and his manner was now exceedingly morose.

But they had a missal, given to Richard by the Queen, which proved an inexpressible comfort to them. They read it together continually, and while they were thus employed, their hearts seemed lightened. Often did they wish they could pass away quietly while occupied in prayer.

Ever since they had been immured in this cell, a change had gradually taken place in their looks. Their features had now a sweet, resigned, almost angelic expression, which they wore to the last.

Their discourse was no longer of earthly matters, but of celestial joys, in which they hoped to participate.

"Heaven, in its mercy, will soon take us hence," said Edward, "and then we shall be free from all care. Our sufferings, I trust, will serve as an atonement for such sins as we have committed. Do you forgive all our enemies, Richard?"

"All; except our cruel uncle," replied the little Duke of York. "Him I cannot forgive."

"But you must forgive even him!" said Edward, gravely.

"I will try to do whatever you enjoin me, brother," said the Duke. "But this is beyond my power. I have not told you of the dream I had last night."

"I had a dream likewise," said Edward. Let me relate mine first. Methought this prison-chamber opened, and we were wafted away by angels."

"My dream was precisely similar," observed Richard. "What do such visions portend, brother?"

"A speedy death," replied Edward. "Perchance to-night!"

Richard heard the explanation without a tremor.

"I thought so," he said, "and, therefore, I did not mention my dream before."

"I shall lay my head upon the pillow tranquilly," said Edward, "hoping I may awake in heaven."

"And so shall I, brother," said Richard. That night, at a late hour, the door of the cell was opened, and two dark figures could be seen standing outside, one of whom held a lamp.

Despite the noise caused by drawing back the bolts, the gentle sleepers did not wake. They were lying close together, and Richard's arm encircled his brother's neck. From their looks they might be dreaming of Paradise.

Touching as the picture was, it moved not the ruffians who contemplated it.

But as they seemed to pause, a stern voice was heard from the stone staircase, commanding them to proceed with their work.

The foremost ruffian then stepped forward, and plucked the pillow from beneath the heads of the sleepers.

Even then the Princes did not stir, though Richard sighed. It seemed beneficently intended that they should pass away in slumber.

Five minutes later, the dreadful deed was done.

Sir James Tyrrell entered the chamber. The murderers, with their ghastly countenances, were standing beside the couch. The light of the lamp fell upon the victims. The pillow had been removed. The attitude of the brothers was unchanged—their expression placid, even in death.

By Sir James Tyrrell's direction, the unfortunate Princes were buried deep in the ground at the foot of the stone staircase.

Subsequently, however, the bodies were conveyed, by King Richard's order, to another grave in the White Tower, which remained long undiscovered.

But the remains of the royal youths being found in 1674, they were finally interred in Henry the Seventh's Chapel in Westminster Abbey.

Having accomplished his work, Sir James Tyrrell set off for Warwick to claim his reward.

His reward, in the end, was the scaffold.

Dorset was not drowned on the night when he attempted to liberate the Princes from the Tower. He was picked up by a boat, and after running several other risks, contrived to regain the Abbey Sanctuary.

It was his sad office to inform the Queen of the murder of her two sons.

Uttering a piercing shriek, she fell to the ground.

When she recovered her sensibility, she appeared half-frenzied, filled the hall with cries, tore her hair, beat her breast, and reproached herself bitterly with her madness in delivering her youngest son to destruction.

"My Richard, my darling, would he were here now, if I had remained firm!" she cried. "How could I part with him—how could I surrender him to the bloodthirsty Gloucester?"

She then knelt down, and with outstretched hands, invoked Heaven's vengeance.

"O, Lord!" she exclaimed, "remember, I pray thee, the death of these innocents, and avenge them!"

IV.

NOW JANE WAS DELIVERED TO THE MARCH OF LONDON FOR PUNISHMENT.

CONFINED for more than three months in the Beauchamp Tower, Jane had begun to look upon her prison as a haven of rest.

Her captivity had been wholly spent in devotion and acts of penitence, enjoined by her confessor, Father Lambert. Had the good priest been able to obtain a pardon from the vindictive King, he could have procured her admission to the Priory of Saint Helen's, the prioress being willing to receive her. But Richard's resentment was still strong as ever against her. Alice Fordham was set free, but Jane was reserved for punishment.

At length the officers of the Ecclesiastical Court came to the Tower, demanded the body of Jane Shore, and received her from the Lieutenant.

No indignity was spared her. Guarded by half-a-dozen halberdiers, like a common criminal, she was taken across Tower Hill, and through the public streets to the palace of the Bishop of London, which was situated on the north-west side of Saint Paul's.

She was accompanied by Father Lambert, and she had need of the good priest's support. As she passed along Cornhill and Cheapside, she was beset by crowds of curious spectators, but her looks and demeanour were so gentle and resigned, that all who beheld her were filled with compassion.

On arriving at the Bishop's palace, she was lodged in a small cell, and here Father Lambert left her, promising to attend at the court on the morrow.

A miserable pallet was provided, and her fare was bread and water, but she slept well on her wretched couch, and having resolved to fast, the food remained untouched.

Next day she was brought before the court, which was assembled in a large hall of the palace, panelled with black oak, and partially hung with tapestry. At the upper end was a large crucifix.

The Bishop was in full ecclesiastical attire, as were the dignitaries of the cathedral, by whom he was surrounded.

The prelate had an austere expression of countenance, and eyed Jane sternly as she stood before him.

She cast one timid, half-supplicating look at her judges, and then fixed her eyes on the ground.

She was very pale, and her cheeks bore traces of affliction, but her beauty was unimpaired, as all who beheld her acknowledged in their hearts.

Her dress was plain as that of a nun, and consisted of a gown of gray serge, and a wimple. A string of beads hung from her girdle. When she had been compelled to pass through the streets she had worn a hood, but this was now laid aside, and her fair tresses were uncovered.

Very few persons were admitted, or the court would have been inconveniently crowded. Among those present were the Lord Mayor and several important citizens, who had petitioned the King in Jane's favour, but had not yet received an answer, though it was momentarily expected.

This circumstance caused a slight delay in the proceedings, but as no messenger appeared, the Bishop clothed his brow with frowns, and addressing Jane in a stern tone, severely censured her for her conduct—lashing her as with a whip of scorpions.

She attempted no reply, for she had nothing to allege in her defence; but Father Lambert earnestly recommended her to mercy on the score of her deep and sincere penitence, to which he could bear witness.

Doctor Lewis, the late King's physician, made a strong appeal to the Bishop and the court in her behalf, enumerating the many kind actions she had performed, and energetically declaring that if all these she had benefited and served were there to speak for her, the court would be filled with them.

But this eloquent address failed to touch the judges, and the Bishop was preparing to pass sentence, when an officer entered the court with a missive for the Lord Mayor.

The prelate paused while the letter was opened, and a feeling of intense anxiety pervaded the assemblage for a few moments, but it was then seen from the Lord Mayor's looks that the petition had failed.

At this trying juncture Jane manifested no emotion, and did not even raise her eyes.

Perfect silence being again restored, the Bishop sentenced Jane to perform public penance for her sin, the enormity of which he had already characterized, in Saint Paul's Cathedral on the following morning.

But the severe part of the sentence was to come, and for this the majority of the assemblage were wholly unprepared.

"Look at me, wretched woman, while I pronounce thy doom!" said the Bishop, yet more sternly than he had hitherto spoken. "When thou hast publicly declared thy repentance in the manner prescribed, it is the King's command that thou be cast forth into the streets in thy penitent garb, and be thenceforth treated as one excluded from the communion of our holy Church. None shall afford thee shelter, none give thee food or drink, on pain of death, but thou shalt be left to perish miserably! Such is thy sentence, and doubt not it will be rigorously fulfilled. I give thee no hope of pardon!"

A slight cry escaped Jane, but that was all. A couple of halberdiers advanced, and took her back to the cell.

As she quitted the court, she threw a grateful glance at Father Lambert and Doctor Lewis.

V.

HOW THE PENCEANCE WAS PERFORMED.

Next morning, at an early hour, an immense crowd was collected within the area in front of Saint Paul's, it having been rumoured throughout the City that the beautiful Mistress Shere was about to perform public penance on that day.

The greatest curiosity was exhibited to witness the spectacle, and every available spot likely to command a view of it was occupied.

Every window looking upon the court of the Bishop's palace, upon Paul's Cross, and upon the great western porch of the Cathedral, was filled with spectators.

Gloomy weather harmonized with the scene about to be enacted. The vast edifice around which the throng was gathered looked unusually sombre, and its lofty spire could scarcely be distinguished amid heavy overhanging clouds.

Jane's career and extraordinary beauty formed the general theme of conversation. Though her conduct was blamed, some excuses were made for her, and it was universally admitted that her sentence was infinitely too severe. Many, indeed, spoke of it with horror and indignation.

To repress any attempt at tumult, a troop of archers was stationed at the rear of Paul's Cross.

Moreover, two lines of halberdiers extended from the gate of the Bishop's palace to the Cathedral porch.

About nine o'clock, a bell began to toll, and a solemn procession issued from the palace gate, and took its way slowly along the lane formed by the halberdiers.

The procession was headed by a long train of monks, in gowns and scapularies of brown russet. After them followed the chantry priests in their robes, the minor canons, the prebendaries, and the Dean, all in full pontificals.

Next came a priest, with a richly decorated crozier, and then the Bishop himself, wearing a mitre blazing with jewels, and a splendidly embroidered dalmatic.

Marching on with a proud step, the prelate was followed by a cross-bearer, carrying a large silver cross.

Then came the penitent, carrying in her hand a lighted taper.

Her profuse fair tresses were unbound, and streamed down over her shoulders. Her feet were bare, and her only garment was a white kirtle, that scarcely sufficed to conceal the exquisite proportions of her figure.

Exhibited in this guise to thousands of prying observers, she felt a shame amounting to agony, made manifest by her blushing and shrinking deportment.

Yet she walked on, though expecting each moment to sink to the ground. Had not words of sympathy and commiseration reached her ear, and given her strength, she must have fallen.

Never for a moment did she raise her eyes. Behind her came another train of priests and monks.

Presently, the procession reached the porch; and the Dean and Bishop having passed into the fane, she was seen climbing the stone steps with her small white feet.

She was now on the very spot where she beheld the King on her wedding-day; and the thought crossed her, and gave her an additional pang.

Many of the spectators remembered having seen her there on that day, and were forcibly strack with the contrast of the present with the past. Yet some of them declared they had foreseen what would occur.

In another moment she had entered the sacred edifice, and was pacing the cold pavement of the nave, along which moved the procession.

The whole interior of the vast fabric was crowded, and the ordeal to which the penitent had now to submit was quite as trying as that she had previously experienced.

More so, indeed; for the spectators, not being kept back by a guard, now pressed closely upon her.

From observations that reached her, she learnt that the Lord Mayor and several important citizens were present; but she saw them not.

At length she approached the High Altar, around which was collected the priestly train. Kneeling down before the altar, she acknowledged her guilt, in accents that scarcely reached the ear of the Bishop, and declared her profound repentance.

"Some atonement has now been made, daughter," said the prelate; "but your sin is not yet expiated. I have no power to remit the sentence passed upon you by the King. Arise, and depart!"

"Depart! Whither?" she exclaimed, looking as if her senses had left her. "May I not die here?"

The Bishop made no reply.

Two priests then came forward, and bade her follow them. She made no more remonstrances, but obeyed.

Pitying exclamations were heard from the assemblage as she was led through their midst, and these expressions of sympathy soon deepened into threats against her conductors.

What might have happened it is difficult to say, had not a party of halberdiers, headed by an officer, met them, and taken charge of the penitent.

Placing her in their midst, the halberdiers conducted her to a side door, where they detained her for a few moments while the party of archers previously referred to was drawn up.

They then led her to Paul's Cross, so that she could be seen by the entire assemblage.

A trumpet was then sounded, and proclamation made by an officer, in the King's name, that Jane Shore, having been excommunicated for her sins, none were to afford her food or shelter, on pain of death.

A like proclamation was afterwards made at the Cross at Cheapside, and at other places in the City.

Parties of archers were likewise ordered to patrol the streets during the remainder of the day, and throughout the night, to see the injunction strictly obeyed.

Meanwhile, the crowd had been dispersed by the archers, and Jane was left alone, seated on the lowest step of Paul's Cross, with her face covered by her hands.

VI.

EXPIATION.

A ~~flash~~ voice at length aroused her from the state of apathy into which she had sunk, and, looking up, she beheld a mounted archer.

The man had a savage aspect, and seemed wholly unmoved.

"You cannot remain here longer, woman!" he said. "You are in the way."

"I know not where to turn my steps," she replied, despairingly. "I have little strength left. All will soon be over with me. Let me stay here to the last."

"Paul's Cross is not a place of refuge, but a pulpit for preaching," he rejoined, "and good folks will come here anon to listen to a sermon from the Dean. The officers will then drive you hence with stripes, if you go not willingly."

"May I not return to the Cathedral?" she implored.

"The doors of all churches are closed against you. Bring not further trouble on your head, but begone!"

He then rode back slowly to his comrades, two of whom were stationed at the gates of the Bishop's palace.

Three others kept guard on the eastern side of the enclosure, which was now completely deserted, except by a few priests.

Groups of persons, however, were collected at the corners of the streets leading towards the Cathedral, watching the penitent from a distance, and many pitying spectators were gazing at her with tearful eyes from the windows of the surrounding habitations.

But none dared help her—none dared come near her. The few who made the attempt were quickly driven back by the guard.

Father Lambert desired to offer her religious consolation, but was not allowed to approach her.

For several hours she wandered through the streets, scarcely knowing whither she went. The guard followed her at a distance, and forced her to go on. Her feet were cut by the sharp stones, and left marks of blood on the pathways. But the guard allowed her no rest, and suffered no one to assist her.

Completely worn out, at length, she attempted to enter the Hospital of Saint Mary of Bethlehem, in Bishopsgate Street, but was rudely repulsed by the porter, and fell senseless to the ground.

When she fully regained her senses, which was not for a long time, since no means were taken for her recovery, she found herself lying beside a cross in a field, outside the City walls.

The spot was solitary, and she had been taken there to die undisturbed.

For this good office, by whomsoever performed, she felt thankful. That her sufferings would soon be over, she doubted not. Never since she quitted the Tower had food passed her lips. The bread and water in her cell at the Bishop's palace were left untouched. The duration of her punishment was thus bridged.

But she felt not the pains of starvation. Her strength was now nearly gone, and her faintness and exhaustion were such that she could not raise herself, though her desire was very great to kneel down at the foot of the cross.

But she could pray, and she prayed constantly and fervently.

Night had come on, but the pale glimmer of a crescent moon showed her the ancient walls of the City, with a fortified gate in the distance, and a monastic structure close at hand.

From the monastery came the sound of a hymn. She listened to the strains, and they greatly soothed her.

At length the solemn chant ceased, and the lights hitherto visible in the windows of the gray old pile disappeared. The brethren had retired to rest.

No: the gate opened, and a friar came forth, and took his way slowly towards the cross.

A thrill passed through her frame as he stood beside her. His hood was thrown back, and the moonlight revealed the pallid countenance of Alban Shore.

His features wore a pitying expression.

"Do you receive your sufferings as a penance justly inflicted by Heaven for your sin?" he said. "Do you truly and heartily repent?"

"Truly and heartily!" she murmured.

"Then may heaven forgive you, even as I forgive you!" he said.

She pressed his hand to her lips.

Ere many minutes her sorrows were over, and Shore was praying by the lifeless body of the erring woman he had never ceased to love.

THE END.

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

IN defiance of my conscious want of adequate ability to translate a vernacular work into English at least to the partial satisfaction of the intelligent readers I am influenced to undertake the task from a desire of warning the public against the evil of the pleasures of the nuptial enjoyment in the decline of life, as the wife of the age like Satan in the paradise is always, often and invariably found to tempt her husband, despite the superhuman height of his wisdom into every folly or vice, howsoever formidably bad might be its nature.

The wife of the age ought to be dreaded more than the enemy of mankind in the paradise, as the latter notwithstanding his almost almighty power dared not appear before man at first from a thorough conviction of failing altogether in his attempt for ever and anon, so he prudently attempted upon the frailty of the sex, whereas the former does not hesitate at all to fall upon the superior strength of hundreds and hundreds of Adam without failing even in one singular instance.

"A wife is a bosom serpent, a domestic evil
A night invader and a midday devil."

It does not require any proof to illustrate or confirm the fact mentioned above about the evil of the pleasures of the nuptial bed in the decline of life, as it is some thing no less than axiomatic truth.

There is no wrong howsoever wrongful might be its nature, which can possibly intimidate man to venture upon what is suggested by the diabolical advice of the wife of the age.

Every section in each chapter of this book carries along with it the force and proof of the fact as stated above.

Several omissions are made for which the translator expects pardon, as he did it purposely to beguile the tedium of reading over the same monotony in a new or modified form without being able to make the generous readers relish any new delight in a new or modified form.

Something is added also to serve the purposes of notes, not with a view to fatigue the attention, but to enable those who have not the fairest knowledge of the idiom of our vernacular and such indulgence is expected as well to be far-from raising the resisting feelings in some readers of critical turn of mind.

This story is so very pathetic throughout, that those who take delight to pass their time in study, some times for their own good, and at others for the benefit of the pigmy writers by pointing where their errors lie, are particularly requested to read it whole and entire so as to encourage the poor translator, and most of those, who out of a sad want of self-confidence suffer their own natural parts to smother into death in their very embryos.

But as for reconciling the apparent incongruity of a father's inhuman conduct towards his own begotten children I would advise all for satisfaction's sake to peruse that chapter of the Roman history which treats of the inhuman judgment of a father towards his own son, although he was not influenced to run into through the advice of the wife of the age. Whatever might be the reason, the main fact is that sons are occasionally found to fall the unfortunate victims of their father's diabolical anger.

There might be found here and there wrong spellings, as well as other grammatical blunders for which the generous public are requested not to find fault with the translator as he should have been most likely in the chance of deferring, the publication longer and longer, and thereby would have tired the patience of his patrons, friends and others who feel themselves interested in his welfare, and who are never niggard to give him the highest encouragement, whenever he feels any sort of difficulty in respect either of financial matter, or some other want of the similar nature though they expect no other return than the benedictions of gratitude.

The mistakes are to be corrected, altered or amended hereafter in the second or the revised edition.

To acknowledge on the one hand the utter incapacity of executing the task in question, and at the same time to venture upon the same may possibly induce persons of hypercritical predilection to attack the translator with the fury of the wasps, when their hive is set on fire, but on the other hand like burning coal may at once be cooled being dipped into a large basin of water, when they would come to learn, that the desire of the translator is far from making a parade of his attainment of a common place level, but simply "to accustom himself betimes "to carry a calf, if he thinks it at all a glory to him to shoulder an ox in after-life."

To swell the bulk of the preface unnecessarily would be of no other consequence than to tire the patience of the public in general, so I think it better to pray them and the learned author of the original work again and again ere I finish it for two particular reasons and they are these:—

In the first place I would request and continue to insist upon the public to hold every encouragement, although I have failed to retain the beauty of the original and thereby exasperated their feelings to the same extent as one would have done in his endeavours to murder the author.

Secondly or lastly I would pray the author to pity me, as by great many blunders I have injured myself which is tantamount to suicide and he who commits such a crime may assuredly expect greater latitude of indulgence from all around him, though his failing is more of an aggravated nature, than murderers and others, simply because man often and invariably runs into such a misfortune not out of a principle to injure his neighbour or himself but out of despair, at a moment of life when he sees, that a gloom is cast all over the habitable parts of the world and when he thinks that to hope relief then is, "to hope against hope."

In giving me the permission the author has laid me under a debt of obligation which I shall neither be able to clear nor even to cancel a portion of it.

BIJAYA-BASANTA.

A TALE.

. CHAPTER .1.

THERE was a certain hermit in days of yore, who related the following story with a view to convey lessons of morality to the minds of the uneducated masses, who would have been incapable of appreciating its intrinsic importance, had this been attempted (as some imagine it should have been) philosophically.

There was in ancient time a country still in existence named Joypore, so called from the name of the Rajah Joy Sen, who then reigned there. His uncommon might and influence kept all other Indian chiefs in awe. He established schools and colleges for the encouragement of learning, built temples for the worship of the countless pantheon of Hindoo divinities, in order to promote the interests of the country-religion and founded hospitals for the good of the poor in general without distinction of creed, or caste, which made the people so happy, that even the proverbial glory of Ram Chandra* was eclipsed. The name of the queen consort of Rajah Joy Sen was Hembati, who was much in favor with her lord.†

* This Ram Chandra became incarnate in the third epoch or Tretayog, according to the historical authority of the Hindoos. The chief object of his mission on earth according to the Brahminical hierarchy, was to enfranchise man, as well as the inferior deities from the despotic rule of Ravun, the most awful king of Ceylon. It is impossible here to enter into a lengthened description of Ram Chandra's physical proportion and immense strength, as this is apart from our present purpose and would occupy unnecessary space.

† Alluding to her husband.

The gracefulness of her person was no less than the accomplishments of her mind. In point of chastity, she equalled our unrivalled Sabitri.* She was as inseparable a companion of her husband as a shadow to a real living being. She stooped to every thing, howsoever inconsistent it may appear to her dignity as a great queen, if that in any way be beneficial to her people. Consequently we see in her the traces of every virtue, which adorns the whole womankind and by the paramount influence of which a woman may become the object of admiration to her lord and superiors, in defiance of the follies and foibles, which characterise the sex in all ages and climes. As the sky fails to support our sight with transports of joy, with the twinkling light of the myriads of stars in the absence of one emparadising moon, as the trees ache the eyes, notwithstanding their surprising growth with all their tender twigs and branches together with leaves and blossoms without fruits, so was this favourite queen failed to please her lord, without being able to bring forth a child in due time. One evening of the full moon-night in autumn, when the prince was walking at random on the roof of a large hall for the enjoyment of pure air of higher atmosphere in company with his unfortunate lady, when the moon was rising with all her splendour, when the larks of both the sexes were soaring aloft with joy and ecstasy, when the lilies seemed apparently like animated beings

* This Sabitri once went to walk before her marriage. On her way she saw one Satyaban, the beauty of whose person struck her so highly, that she resolved to marry him, though her parents and others seriously objected it, as it was mentioned in the horoscope, that on the seventh day, after his marriage, he shall die. Despite all these drawbacks, she married and according to the scientific precision, he expired, but when Pluto came to take away the dead body, which was then in her lap and which she did not yield up, so was Pluto compelled to push the matter to the notice of Brahma, the chief diety of the Hindoo mythology, who in his turn convened a council, so as to adopt a method to carry away the dead body without touching her, for to touch a chaste woman is to offend her and thereby to incur the resentment of all other dieties. She was told to ask any favours she liked, with the exception of her husband's life. She on her part prayed for a blessing of being the mother of hundred children and her prayer was granted, as the dieties were bound by previous promise and thus she restored the life of her husband by the influence of the power of chastity.

staring at the unrivalled beauty and splendour of the sovereign of the broad firmament, when the reflection of the moon-light over the green leaves of the trees around made a most delightful scene, besides the twigs of the vegetable productions seemed to hail the approach of the spring. This captivating scene suggested an excellent idea in the minds of both the prince and the princess, respecting the infinite mercy and goodness of the providence of God of heaven. Whilst they abandoned themselves into the hallelujahs of that being, whose almighty fiat brought every thing into existence, then was heard a Brahmin lad cry from a little way off the kingdom. His mother pointing her fingers towards the moon, spoke thus. "Cease! My dear son! Cease to cry! Look at the moon, with what accelerated strides is she coming down to take you away from my fond embrace." The boy instead of being afraid, began to cry louder and louder. His mother again after the fashion of the east, proclaimed thus. "Come! Come down! Moon of the firmament, come and give my son a chee.*" When the flirtations of her hand indicative of maternal affection to console her son reached the ears of the king, he at once melted into paternal affection and began to contemplate the effects of sin of not being blessed with a son. But to give vent to his sorrows, he uttered thus. "Ah! what do I hear! What a sweet sound it is! How very agreeable is the voice! It caused my heart to dance with joy. What an infinite fund of mirth does he enjoy, who by the salutary effects of a previous life† is destined to relish such a pleasure, which none can taste from the possession of throne, or from the enjoyment of a pleasure which proceeds from the cultivation of science, or that which comes out of the hands of Muses, as the inarticulate voice sounded so agreeable to me, though not the real father." The bishops and prelates of the East have said it openly in their religious books and tracts, that without a son, a man is to languish into Poonnam.‡ This is the reason, that a Hindoo

* Means in our vernacular a blessing (ei) Come and bless him, so that he may no longer tease any one by yelling noise.

† The natives believe the doctrines of the transmigration of souls.

female, through whom her husband becomes the father of a son, gains entire ascendancy over her lord. A mansion without a child is as useless, as eyes without pupils, as rooms without openings to admit air, or a man without knowledge and its concomitants. As seas and oceans are useless to man in consequence of salt water, though hold the richest and most valuable diamonds, pearls and baubles of all and every description, so is man without a child with the possession of all other blessings; such as the vaunt of pedigree, wealth and some such as may stimulate even the princes and potentates with sentiments of emulation to compete. A barren woman notwithstanding all the peculiar gifts of God, one of which alone might raise us to a higher platform of human bliss, is as much disregarded as Palas.* The king spoke all these without aim or end, with an air significant of mental uneasiness. However, all these expressions touched the queen to the quick, who at once as it were began to sink deeper and deeper into the sea of misery, so went away abruptly from the king without uttering a syllable. The king stood therefore a long while and was thinking of the harsh language, which touched the queen the moment it was emanated from his lips, so at last he entered his bed room with all the oppressive weight of remorse. The queen sat on the dirty floor with neither a velvet nor even a second-hand mat, touching her eye-brow with her left-hand, as is usually the case with mortals under the influence of sorrows and began to contemplate of her wretched lot. Streams of waters dropped from her eyes. The sad and woeful sight of her, then under that posture may persuade us to believe, that fortune herself by the wonderful combination of circumstances having left the delicate bed of the lotus, took her seat out of despair, beneath its thorny part. She felt asleep insensibly in this posture and dreamt a strange dream a little before the break of day. It is to this effect, that a benedictine monk, having stood before her bed, gave out the following in a very mellifluous and harmonious tone. "Daughter! Be not sorry any more. To emancipate you from the life-destroying sorrows and remorse, I have brought thee two fruits, which mortal eye can seldom see without devout pater-noster. Having said this, while extending his right arm to put them in her hands, she suddenly awoke and began to stare on all sides with disconcerted countenance, but could see nothing, except that her person became extremely cold by the refreshing breeze of the dawn and saw her body on the very same floor, where she was brooding over her ill luck, before she slept there. She having risen forth with all the trepidation of hurry, called her pet nurse Santa and related all the particulars of her happy dream. Santa was an old, and sensible woman, so was able to appreciate the promise of the happy omen and addressed the queen with all the demonstrations of joy. "God of Heaven seems to have vouchsafed to supply you with the fruits to realise the effects of dream. Now prostrate thyself before Sustee* and offer your best prayer, so she may not be unsparing in her almost almighty efforts to verify the dream, which promises to make mortals happy both here and hereafter." Whilst the whisperings of such a glad tidings were going on in the Zennanah, some how or other it was pushed to the notice of the Rajah. As misle or a few drops of rain animate the swallows with hopes of larger drops after utter dryness, so was the heart of this king elated with this distant promise of success with joy, though was in a manner despaired of being the father of a son in the winter of life.

Oh ! Children of humanity ! Man is destined neither to enjoy an uninterrupted course of happiness, nor to suffer perpetually, (i.e.) he becomes an object of sport to pleasure and pain alternately. Therefore it behoves us to fight the battles of life with fortitude, the best arms against the evils of life. The tree of patience beareth good fruit is a proverb verified in our Maharajah's case. In the decline of life he obtained a blessing through the sovereign virtue of patience and perseverance. Shortly after the queen became pregnant. A few days elapsed again, when the Ranee was in labor, the Rajah almost in a fit of madness walked at random without end or aim, being ignorant of the result. In the meantime seeing a maid running with the celerity of a wheel, asked her with much concern. "What's the cause ?" "What about the matter?" But she not being able to answer quickly, said this only with difficult breath. "Ah Maharaj!" and paused a little to breathe anew, which of course created a bad impression into the mind of the Rajah, who by virtue of excess of love stared at her face taking all to be an ill omen. The maid after a little rest gladly spoke, that His Majesty has been blessed with a handsome babe. His Majesty being exceedingly pleased with this happy tidings, presented a most valuable chain of gems and jewels to the maid, who brought him the life-giving news and then entered the Zennanah. Having at first observed the face of the new born child, he felt a pleasure, that spontaneously arises into the human breast, on such an occasion. Subsequently he saw the face of his long wished son with fixed attention and nothing could exceed the hilarity of his mind for the time being. Each time he saw the boy with fresher and fresher rapture. The more he saw, the more he wished to see the changing beauty of his tender person with increasing thirst of pleasure. The image of his son began to be engraven in his mind. When the pleasure reached its topmost goal he proclaimed thus, "I relish the same pleasure this day, which mortals eagerly wish to enjoy in the midst of cares and worries of life, which imbitter it, notwithstanding the enjoyment of all other happiness, without a child, in whom owes the salvation of our forefathers from sins of commission as well as omission, according to the dictates of Hindoo religion of course, wherefore I see hardly any man so happy as I am this day. According to the time-honored custom of the country and the established usages of his ancestors, he celebrated every ceremony in due time. From the exquisite beauty together with perfect symmetry of his person, the priest gave him the name of Bijaya Chandra. When the boy grew a little, so as to be capable of receiving instructions, the Rajah ordered his prime minister to erect an educational edifice in the middle of a garden, within the compound of the palace. Agreeably to the royal order, the prime minister sent for engineers to build a splendid school-house. In course of a few days the college-building was completed. At length, the Rajah entrusted a man with the care of his son, whose affability and a disposition to keep up temper always and under every circumstance, whose exemplary conduct, unyielded integrity, under unresisted temptations, in fine, whose sound principles of morality could command respect of his pupils.

All other high and elementary schools were incorporated with it. Learn hence! Children of humanity! To what an awful, extent the character of a tutor is indispensibly required to be pure and uncontaminated. In the absence of these rare gifts of nature, no man could successfully discharge the ennobling duty of a preceptor of a prince. Every feature of a pupil's conduct is or ought to be mere reflections from his teacher. Let me illustrate one instance merely to corroborate the purport of the simile mentioned below. If gold and copper be put together at the same time and at the same place, the former often, always and invariably catches the reflection from the latter, whereas, the latter has never been found to receive the color of the former.

“Seek you to train your favorite boy :

Each caution and every care employ ;”

The University inaugurated under the auspices of Rajah Joy Sen, still revives in our memory. Once I visited the College and saw the boys were attentive to nothing, but to their lessons and the masters were busily engaged to discharge their respective duties. The teachers spoke with utmost courtesy and respect and the students one and all rose to salute me. I bade them with civility mixed with affection to sit down and they did it with an air of obedience. At length I found the boys of every class were attentively engaged in their studies in every branch as literature, philosophy and theology. Science and arts were not neglected in the least. Besides I saw the maps were hung, the pictures of those poets, who have acquired the highest celebrity throughout the world. On the top of the wall were hung the pictures of voracious birds of foreign and native lands in glass cases. On another side the busts or statues of Valmick,* Byas† and Poras-

His own immortal work is referred to for the perusal of those, who are curious to learn, how was he reformed and became so very pious afterwards.

sara* and other great personages of highest note of ancient time. These persons did honor to the country where they were born even at this distance of time. He who would suddenly see them, may unquestionably take them living beings, sat there purposely to teach the children. Were we to cast our eyes towards the library, we see there the world instructing works of those men. At a distance of some paces only from the school premises there was a gymnasium for physical exercise. On the south of the school was situated the museum department and on the north arts were taught systematically. Bijaya within the compass of some years made himself well conversant with all the branches of letters, philosophy and theology. The teachers and professors were pleased to confer on him the highest academical honor. The prince after having left his college life devoted to the discipline of arms and political affairs. After the lapse of a few days more, the Rane: Hembati became pregnant again, she had conceived this time Chittatos† Gandharbo and delivered him in due time. The gracefulness of the person of the new born child lighted over the whole nursery-room, as the rays of the full moon does after eclipse all over the globe. The ceremonies after the delivery were punctually observed. The Raja was as much delighted with this joyful news, as a staggering beggar gets pleased with heaps of gold, at a time, when he could gladly afford to give lots of thanks for a morsel of bread only. This child was named Basanta Coomar from the surpassing beauty of his promising feature. Thus the combination of some favorable events enabled the Rajah to pass for a while very happily without encountering the least draw-backs of life. It has already been said before, O children of humanity ! That man is an object of joy and grief, hope and fear alternately. As night reminds us of the approach of day, so in like manner affliction succeeds prosperity. The Rajah was happily managing the reins of government without anxiety, when all on a sudden the Ranee was attacked with a very serious illness, which baffled the powers of the skill of the most profound doctors and physicians of the time. Day by day it began to grow worse and worse. Her extraordinary beauty began to fade away, and she began to look awkward and more and more emaciated she became every day. Gradually by the increasing violence of the disease, the Ranee losing all her usual beauty and flush of health like the flowers by the heat of the mass of fire was at last unable to get up from her bed. Last of all having felt the pangs of approaching dissolution and having called her sons beside her bed and there holding the hands of her younger son, spoke to the elder, that death itself under the form of a malady assailed me, so there is no remedy to deliver me from its cruel hand, therefore before I leave you I tell you to call me by the name 'mother' and thereby to cheer and calm my troubled breast for ever. No sooner were these words came out from her mouth, than she became speechless and then like the painted picture began to look at her sons—the eldest felt the highest regret on the occasion of hearing the bewailing tenor of his mother's language. He at last burst out into a paroxysm of sorrows and tears, which began to gush out so copiously that they wetted his breast. Basanta being too young to catch the meaning of the cries of others, began afterwards to echo their lamentations, not so much from affection, as from sympathy. At intervals, he heaved deep sighs and with piteous tone called aloud "Mother O dear and beloved mother !"

* He was also a great Muni. It requires greater latitude of time and space to give a fabulous account of these Munis and Rishis, so I must stop here. However, if the readers be anxious to know all the legendary accounts of the births and deaths and other kindred particulars of those Munis and Rishis they may read the vernacular poems and histories.

† This Chittatos had reigned over the Gandharbo race at mount Himalaya, which was the abode of Gandharbo, Kinnur and Upsora and other species of beings higher, than man. Chittatos the chief of the Gandharbo race, had by the curse of a Brahmin to come into this lower region to mingle with man to expiate his crime of offending a Brahmin. As for the other particulars, we must refer to the authority of our Mahavrat to have a correct notion of Gandharbo and others.

Ah what a beautiful instance of filial affection !

Every symptom of death now became obviously visible. She felt the pangs of death indeed, but she did not feel it so much, as she felt in perceiving the sorrows of her two sons, so strange a phenomenon is maternal affection. She called Basanta with tears to fly to her arms once more. "Come ! come my dear son ! Cease to cry ! Be not afraid." At length she addressed her eldest son. "Why do you suffer yourself to be called senseless and mad in behaving like babes.

You should rather have been the support and consolation of your younger brother than losing fortitude in times of misfortune which is the allotted portion of every child of Adam. Fie! Fie to you! Cease to cry, let me die happily in seeing Basanta in your found embrace." In delivering her youngest one into the bosom of her eldest son, she accosted him with words as these. "I yield you up the vital soul of my life, the best treasure on earth. He is your youngest brother and is no doubt entitled to your pity, still I insist upon you to speak with all the assurances of my honor, that you will show no lack of exertion to feed and nurse him with as much care and tenderness, as I myself would have done, if I had lived longer." Bijaya Chandra answered with tears. Mother! "whom do you entrust your Basanta Coomar How could I console him, "when he would cry." Having pronounced these syllables of sorrows mixed with affection, he abandoned himself into an inordinate fit of lamentations and outcries. The Rajah himself could not refrain from shedding tears, when he heard the mournful cries of his sons and the bewailing language of his Ranee. Santa the pet maid hearing the echoes and re-echoes of the sounds of lamentations from a little way off ran to the spot with the speed of a race horse. No sooner did she reach the place, than spoke thus in way of encouragement, so as to keep up their spirit under present calamity. Are all of you become mad. Could none of you call forth fortitude to hold you up. The Ranee is suffering a great deal from the attacks of mortal disease and more furiously from the pangs of the approaching dissolution and you all instead of trying to comfort her under such a painful position, rather aggravating its overwhelming weight to an unbearable extent by sobs and mournings. The children are ever children and may cry. But how could our wise Moharajah join them in acts of folly and madness. Does he under the loss of sense wish to get relapsed into childhood. No wonder, that these children would cry, but it is a wonder of wonders, that our wise Moharajah is acting the part of little boys by losing the presence of mind now in behaving like little boys. "She took up Basanta in her arms with this word in vernacular. Shait Shait." She spoke this also Cease ! My dear boy, Cease ! Your mother would soon get well. At last she caught hold of the hands of Bijaya and said. My dear son ? You have reached the age of discretion. It ill becomes you to cry now, no body could console you, unless you would of yourself be comforted. Just look at the critical position of your mother. 'How very near is death to her' Have courage now, Courage the only consolation—the only remedy—the only cure, nay it is the best arms against all the evils of life. Observe every ceremony as befits you, being the eldest son. Make her thereby happy, both for time and eternity. Thus Santa consoled and stopped every one. The dying Ranee perceiving Santa's approach, before the approach of her death, bade her sit close by. She accordingly sat close to her bedside when she spoke her last in a tone expressive of heart rending sorrows. My much loved maid I am about to be delivered from the concerns of this world. Just pardon me, if ever I gave you any cause of offence and thereby let me depart in peace from this state of probation for ever and anon. To go further would be to make vain formality. My two boys are become yours from this day. There is none on earth but you to see and caress them, with maternal care and to nurse them up as your own. Whilst this conversation was going on, the dying Ranee having turned her face towards her lord, said thus. This maid servant of yours, have through your unbounded acts of liberality enjoyed every ease, which mortals are capable of enjoying, I am about to launch into another world and ere I leave you, let me pray your lordship with all my might and strength to forget, as well as to forgive my past trespasses. You are a most powerful potentate, so can have a paragon of Beauty again after my death, if you will so. My two boys are going to loose their mother for ever. I fear lest something alienate your affection from them. This is our last interview. No more was she able to pronounce a word. Here our Rajah heaved a deep sigh and then burst out into tears. Ah what a most beautiful instance of conjugal love ?

* The beauty of the term is lost in translation, since similar term we cannot find in English to correspond exactly to the original.

Gradually the air we call the very essence of our lives came out of her body and mingled with the air of the sky. The flesh and the bones now remained only. The females of the neighbourhood flocked to the doleful spot to see her for the last. Some of them gazed so earnestly at her corpse and shed tears out of affection no doubt so copiously that they in course of falling down upon the earth, cleansed and washed her body of the dust she was laid on.

What a wonderful instance of natural love ?

Thus when the furnace of sorrows began to blaze forth in all, who were present, Bijaya and Basanta cried aloud with words as these. Mother, O mother ! What would become of us after our final separation. Here the Rajah became a mute spectator of every thing that was passing on by that time. He saw on all sides, vain and hollow in the absence of the loving consort. His Majesty not being able to determine, whether was he dead or alive, in society or in solitude, in sleepy or wakeful state, whether on air or on earth, spoke this only, as in a fit of delirium. Dear ? 'where are you about ? O my dear soul—soul of my soul. Where are you bound for without me ? I can't suffer you to go alone. If you by no means remain here, wait a little so that I may bear you company on your way to journey in a world to come. Occasionally he spoke this also. It would be an act of inhumanity on your part to be away without me, after having given me the ideal, but not the real picture of love.

A most beautiful picture of conjugal love !

"A love so violent, so strong, so sure That neither the name of death nor art can cure."

I knew not the face of any other beauty except your's. All along we lived together in love and harmony, as yoke fellows, notwithstanding which you did not utter a syllable in way of giving last fare-well, as I stand before you in the character of a miserable delinquent and in case of being so in fact, it does not look well on your part as a loving wife towards me as a faithful husband. Besides, if ever I gave you any cause of offence I did it unknowingly for which I expect pardon. Moreover if ever I wronged you for which you remained inexorable, "what cause of provocation your children gave you ?" if nothing, "how could you with justice leave them to the mercy of chance," when they entirely depend upon you. How could you remain inexorable without casting even a kind glance indicative of maternal affection ?

"What a striking instance of madness under the bewitching influence of conjugal love?

Our wise Moharajah pronounced several other similar instances under the sense paralysing influence of blind love. The kingsmen of our Rajah performed all the necessary obsequies after the death of the Ranee. The Rajah slept in the same room, which now became a scene of desolation, though it was prior to the death of the Ranee a paradise. The more he remembered the incidents of their former flirtations, the more poignant became the grief. The Chief ministers and the courtiers prayed His Majesty with join hands not to suffer his cultivated mind to become a prey to uneasy thoughts and to impress their admonition deeply into his heart cited something which corresponds to the following lines of Dr. Young.

"All, all on earth is shadow, all beyond
Is substance, the reverse is folly's creed
How solid all, where change shall be no more."

It betrays our weakness only to abandon ourselves in such sorrows, which we cannot avert of our own accord. Vain all sublunary shows, the world is like a Theatre, where the fools put on the garbs of kings and rulers to captivate the sense of the spectators and no sooner the plays end, than they become the same fools again. Some are destined to sit on the throne, decorated with gems of every hue and description, whilst others pass there lives in perpetual woes and miseries. Some by reason of the premature end of their children, tear their own flesh in despair, others become lunatic on account of the death of their wives in the midst of conjugal enjoyment. Others again taste the pleasure after long intervals of woe, when they have the opportunity of enjoying the company of long lost or absent friends. In this way man passes the journey of their worldly career and in the end, the kings and the subjects, joy and grief all become alike. In right point of view the world is exactly a theatre. Every one is to play his own part, so in like manner we are to vanish after our part is over.

"What then is the good of being sorry or jolly" O wise and sensible Rajah! It is beneath the dignity of philosophy and knowledge to sink under the horrors of misfortune, knowing it being the inevitable lot of humanity. Know thyself that none is for you, neither are you for any one after you leave this tenement of flesh. It is the nature of every thing sublunary to undergo changes and vicissitudes. Consequently the sick and the healthy, people, birds, beasts and the fowls of the air, the animal, mineral and the vegetable productions are all subject to continual changes and revolutions. So if we contemplate about the inconceivable wisdom of that great Being and the harmony of the celestial as well as the terrestrial arrangement by which the whole universe is to continue its existence, through ages unknown, we are sure to relish eternal pleasure. There are very few I confidently affirm, who would not be lost in wonders, if they observe the niceties of the works of nature with the judgment eye of a philosopher. When we walk to and fro in a flower garden early in the morning, we get our sense of smelling satiated with the sweet scent of the best flowers of the season, which the Zephyr carries along with it, when we get enchanted with the mellifluous and shrill voice of the season bird, our mind involuntarily melts itself in deeds and thoughts of praise, benevolence, and gratitude of that immutable being, who is ever the same and whose will subjected every thing to destruction and continual changes. If we look at the radii of the new moon, we would see, that day by day her light grows and continues to shed purer and pure right and longer too, till the time comes again to diminish her light. "Who is so hard and unthankful, that his mind would not glow here with the highest sentiments of gratitude towards the author of all these. If we once take a minute view of the different stages of human existence, we can easily perceive, that nothing is exempted from constant changes. Man in his first stage is quite an ugly deformed and helpless creature, but when arrives at the prime of youth-hood, we fancy that the beauty of the maturity of age shall ever remain the same, or that it shall not fade away, but in the winter of life not even the traces of any of these things are visible. The jet-black hair turns grey or whitish, the skin of our brows get contracted and on the rosy-cheek we see wrinkles only, besides we use sticks when strength fails us and without teeth, we seem to have been deprived of the skill of pronouncing words and syllables correctly and accurately. Thus we see continual changes in animated and inanimated objects. Therefore to mourn over things and persons, that are destined by the divine will to destruction, shows the want of sense and it mocks the wisdom of the wisest. If you, O wise and sensible Moharajah enquire after the reason of the premature death and decay of persons and things, you may arrive at the right conclusion, that God having given us very many mental faculties, which enable us to perceive the nice connection between man and every object in nature around us, seem evidently to have endowed them purposely to make us happy and therefore it become thus to make ourselves so by the right use of those faculties, on which depend indeed our ease of mind and comfort of body. By the right use of those faculties, we can make ourselves happy, by turning some of those objects, that providence is pleased to place naked at our sight for our use and others for our eatables by the regular mixture of the one with the other in the shape of ingredients. As for instance, we defend ourselves from the inclemency of cold weather by the preparation of things from wool and cotton and at every different season, we sow the seeds of different kinds of vegetables which at their maturity reward our toil and thereby make us happy when we relish their sweet carnal and appease our hunger. Through the almost god like influence of our mental faculties, we go up to the hills and other high grounds far above the common level, which would have been inaccessible to man in the absence of all those faculties to bring wood for the purpose of making ships and boats by the help of which we cross the seas and oceans for merchandise, which in its turn enables us to obtain every desirables and thereby make us happy. By the sovereign virtue of our reason only we are enabled to reduce into our subjection the largest and the most furious of the terrestrial animals, that obey our command without even any show of resistance and thereby make us happy. By the privilege of reason, we are also capable of knowing or anticipating the causes productive of both better and worse results. We can know as well the nature of the elements by our reasoning faculty, as to how, when and why to use them sometimes in one way and sometimes in a quite different way, as in their abuse we not only injure our health, but also hasten death. Our health improves or fades according as we use air, water, food, fire and other things temperately or intemperately. When we are ill, if we then and there neglect to administer proper drugs our distemper increases and last of all carries us to the premature grave. But that awful death the very name of which causes man to tremble with fear, affords to give us relief, if we for a while think on the subject with deep attention and it also enables us to learn, that it is assuredly a great blessing in right point of view, for without death, how much more miserable, he must have been, who is labouring under incurable disease and how much dreadful would it have been without the hope of end and how much more aggravating would have been the nature of his pain, who by some or other mishap is drowned into the whirl-pool of a deep water, if he had to continue in that state. Death is purposely intended for our good. It relieves us from the tyranny of infinite number of pangs so it mocks man as a rational being to appear melancholy on the death of our friends and others, or any best on earth. These words in way of lecture served much to console the King. He then called Santa and thus spoke. Santa! My two boys are yours from this day. You took care of them and fed and caressed them hitherto. They are taught from their infancy to call you grand-mother in way of respectful compliment, so better continue to maintain them, as real grand-mother. You would of yourself take charge of them. It is mere a formality on my part to request you to do that. The good old Santa answered. O Moharaj! you need not be anxious on their account in the least. My prayer is that you govern the kingdom well, without suffering groundless sorrows to have access in you. What need is there of being sorry. Every thing comes to pass by the will of God. Both good and evil are the allotted portion of humanity. Santa now took her quarters somewhere out of the Zennanah with Bijaya Chandra and Basanta Cumar, the two princes.

CHAPTER II.

ONE day, when the Rajah was administering justice, a guard of the entrance gate came and stood before His Majesty with join hands and bending head according to the custom of the oriental kingdoms to announce the arrival of the priest, who is waiting the royal permission to come before in order to bless His Majesty. The Rajah forth-with gave the order, when the priest came and lifted up his right-arm agreeably to the custom of the Asiatic priests and ecclesiastics, and then conferred on him the benediction. The Rajah having accepted the flowers as the symbol of blessing spoke to him in a respectful manner to sit on a sofa embroidered with jewels. The Court instantaneously was closed with the sound of a Dundhuvi. * The ministers, members and others including the officials and the menials went home. The priest now took the advantage of this opportunity and accosted thus. "O Great and Excellent Rajah ! Since the death of the queen I deem myself reckoned among the dead. The mishap occurred of course according to the laws ordained of Heaven. Nothing can avert a fraction of it, so in vain we think of the catastrophe. Every species of injustice creeps in a sovereignty, should the kings abandon themselves always in thoughts of past miscarriage. Vain thoughts destroy the peace of mind together with the ease of our body, and moreover paralise our judgement faculty, so they should be eradicated, ere they take deep root in the soil of our mind. But man in his solitary hours after the fatigues and toils of the day becomes the companion of such thoughts in the absence of other friends to solace him, so as to beguile the tediousness of time.

* A sort of bell was in use among the ancients. It is obsolete now.

All other friends fail to make us happy, save and except a wife whose words are the most efficacious antidotes against the distemper of the mind and body. There is no chance of a man's being in the wrong side, should he have a wife, wherefore I advise you to have the hand of another girl.

"All other gifts are by fortune given
A wife is the peculiar gift of heaven ;
Our grand sire Adam ere of Eve possessed Alone and even in Paradise seemed unblessed."
"Can he
Who has a wife ever feel adversity ?
Would men, but follow what the sex advise
All things would prosper, all the world grow wise".

The Rajah said this only, that I have the highest reverence for what you say, but in the decline of life please cease to admonish me to take another wife, who is after all —

"The dear bought curse and lawful plague of life
A bosom serpent, a domestic evil
A night invasion and a midday devil."

The chief object of marriage is to have sons and by the grace of God I am blessed with two, so it is no longer advisable to marry again. The priest being silent for a moment only repeated the sacerdotal order. O Moharaj ! Whatever you say is quite true, but that rule cannot be applied to worldly-men, for a wife is to a man, what the stars are to the sky, what the morning is to the lark, and the night is to the owl. In a word, our home in spite of every comely decorations looks homely without a wife. Fortune herself would forsake us, notwithstanding our domineering submissiveness to pay her divine homage without a wife. If a man be so lucky, as to be blessed with a dutiful wife, he would then be far above the reach of all knots and drawbacks of life. A true and loving wife does not scruple to follow her lord even to the funeral. Besides, a wife is the only relative on earth, who could save her husband from eternal perdition, by the overruling influence of her own stock of virtue. Last of all man loses every right to perform even religious ceremonies without a wife. O, wise Moharaj ! many of the powerful kings are seen to be saved by the golden virtues of their wives. Let me illustrate few instances conformatory of my assertions concerning the virtues of a good wife. "Who could have heard the resurrection of well known Satyaban without the virtues of his wife? Who could have heard the mighty achievements of Ram, the hero of Ramayan without the god-like excellencies of his wife Sita's ennobling virtues." When man labours under a painful and languishing illness, none befriends him except his wife. Friends of prosperity forsake him. His own begotten sons seldom come close to him, daughters sob and utter languages of sorrows from far off, but his wife in spite of every disadvantage arising from the inconvenient position of the victim, which distanced all others comes closer and closer rather with increasing tokens of love and affection to serve her husband with greater zeal and more enthusiastic ardour. She is so much an ornament to man that prosperity herself looks awkward and evidently fails to adorn our home without a wife. In a word wife is the best safeguard against the evils of life's journey. Therefore it is no way advisable to decline to marry, simply on the score of old age.

See, See! Young novice of no experience, the beautiful instances of the fidelity and the chastity of our Indian wives. Our heedless young readers are further requested to observe how the diabolical admonition of the priest triumphed over the determined resolution of the wise and sage—like Moharajah. The advice of the priest struck the Rajah so well, that at last he was agreed to the base suggestion of the priest, who then left the palace for that day. Here Santa, the faithful nurse coming as by guess to know the purport of their private consultation, asked the Rajah one day in seclusion with melancholy air. "Is it in fact that we shall have to see you again to marry in the decrepit old age? Does this, O wise Moharaj! look well on your part? By the blessing of God, your eldest son is almost become marriageable. It would be quite a pleasing sight to see the wedding ceremony of the Rajling and to entrust him with the reins of government and to devote the latter end of your life with prayers, praise and hymns of the Lord of Heaven. Then and there only you look well. What the public would think of you? Fie to you, especially as the model character. May your Lordship be graciously pleased to judge of the propriety and impropriety of my counsel before rejecting it on the score of female advice. The Rajah listened all these with becoming attention, though he failed to follow her advice. A few days after, the priest had come again to the Rajah and accosted him thus. Every thing is ready. Your royal presence only is required. What is the good of being further dilatory about the matter. The bride's country-house is at least two days' journey hence, wherefore little earlier preparations are necessary." Our Rajah having been bound by previous promises, was necessarily forced as it were to put on the habit of a bride-groom against his own will and having ridden on his chariot went to marry with a good procession. The Rajah with his associates and other followers arrived at the place of destination on the appointed day. The Rajah according to the time-honored custom of the country was constrained to enter the scraglio to expose himself in the midst of the gazing multitudes of females. No sooner did they see the bride-groom than they pronounced these words with as much surprise, as one does when something extraordinary falls under her observation. Ah! By what mercy of God is this Reverend octogenarian* come here? Our Durjamayi is tender and quite young and at the same time handsome, whereas on the other hand, one who is decreed by the stamp of fate to have her hand is almost on the pyre and walking hand in hand with the messenger of death flattering to supply him with a fresh lease of life at least for a few days more. Another spoke this ironically in way of jokes, that Durjamayi is to this grand sire of ours, what a grand mamma is to her grand-child and some such jokes of like nature. Amidst these loud acclamations of joys and ridiculous buffetings a third was heard declare thus. In vain do you find fault with the Rajah. In my opinion, he stands acquitted of all obloquy. Wealth must have blinded the parents of the young girl.

"We pant and kiss and cling for gold,"

For gold we love the impotent and the old."

Durjay and Dumamay, the parents of our Durjamayi being weak—weak in respect of withstanding the irresistible temptations, must have run pell mell into such a shameful contract. What else could prevail upon them to yield up their pet daughter to one behind whom the vultures and the birds of prey are constantly on a look out. It being the turn of the fourth to give her judgement on the subject. This one who was modest, young and little more sensible, observed thus. “Why do you vent your spleen against Durjay. Temptation can tempt virtue itself. The priest defaced the face of our religion out of temptation—temptation of gold, through whose authoritative persuasions the parents of the girl were induced to marry their daughter to one, who has reached the maximum height of human existence. I have heard this celebrated maxim of Manu the immortal, from my husband, that the blind, crooked, crippled, mad and the old are forbidden to marry. The kings and monarchs punish those, who venture to act against the laws. How could a medicine cure a disease, when the very medicine itself becomes the procreator by reason of its strong virtue of a new disease? Thus the ladies and the other females left the house after mutual exchange of jokes and satires. The Rajah was wrapped in shame, when it was too late for repentance itself to yield any consolation. He should have thought on the subject before. This consideration enabled him to bear the shock till the wedding was over. Afterwards having returned to his own kingdom took the reins of government again in his own hand and did all precisely as before. Learn hence, young novice, with what potent charms the wife of the age gains entire ascendancy over her husband.

•. Bijaya Chandra, the eldest son of the Rajah, perceiving the sudden change in his father, was sensible enough to conceal his secret. One day whilst walking with his youngest brother on the roof of the palace, his step-mother observing them from the zennanah, asked Santa, the old maid, the cause of their not coming in her department. Since I am come here, they are not found to enter the zennanah even for a day. I wish to feed and nurse them as my own, should you permit me. Santa answered, Madam! They are your own children, you can take care of them, without waiting any one's order. I am merely a servant. Let me go and send them here. Durlatha, the maid of the new Ranee, who came from her father's house, over hearing the conversation between the Ranee and Santa, spoke to the queen secretly. O Durjamayi ! It appears, that there goes good deal of intimacy between you and Santa and it seems that you intend to nurse and caress your step-sons. The Ranee observed in a little angry tone. "Why do you give me such selfish and malicious advice. It pains me to the very core of my heart, so cease I tell you for your goodness' sake to mislead me. Those boys have lost their mother. I am now virtually their parent." Durlatha angrily turned her face and began to meditate, as to the method to be adopted to poison the boys against the new Ranee. After the pause of a short while, she remarked thus. "Think on the subject deliberately. What would become of you, when Bijaya would ascend the thorne ; provided you be blessed with chihreu. Do you wish them to remain as abject factotums of your step-sons ? Moreover dont you know, that though you may cherish a snake in your bosom with parental care, it would by the first opportunity as by decrees of Heaven try to put an end of you by biting you. Secondly, should you suffer a single bramble to grow-up in your garden, the whole of it then within the compass of a considerably short time be filled up with weeds and brambles." She cited all these examples with Satanic skill and stultiloquence purposely to shake the unshaken resolution of a female. It is no wonder, that female virtue would be surrendered, when such diabolical methods can easily disconcert the brain of the wisest of men. Thirdly, the bark of one tree can no way be attached to another, howsoever diligently the gardener may try, so in like manner the step-son can scarcely be expected to treat you with filial affection, although you may fondle and caress them as your own children. The young Ranee with the natural frailty of her sex, being incapable of weighing in the scale of her judgement, the propriety and impropriety of her maid's wicked counsel was at last heard declare, that she was convinced of her sad and lamentable mistakes, when it was little late. Those two boys are not (as you said) my sons, but implacable foes, the sooner they are ruined, the better it is for me. The wicked maid said this in a smiling countenance. "Yes, my dear madam ? You are now a right one in the right place. I never did wrong even to any of my antagonists, my whole life is spent in benefitting all around me indiscriminately."

Here a most beautiful and striking instance of the frailty of the sex on the one hand and their shrewdness of a most shocking character on the other. The maid added further ; " No need of being hurriedly purblind about the matter. Pray hear me and you are sure to succeed very soon. When those boys would come to you with Santa to pay you homage, better show your indifference there, consequently, they would of themselves be away from you when you may put aside your ornaments and lie down on the dust. When the Rajah would come in to enquire after the matter, answer thus with tears. Your too naughty boys beat me so severely, that I think it better not to survive the insult even for only a single jot of time. This would unquestionably cause the all merciful God to vouchsafe to help the helpless." When the Ranee was thinking on the diabolical counsel of her naughty maid, the two brothers come to her with their nurse to prostrate before her. She said nothing, rather betrayed every token of malice not alien to step-mother till they disappeared. Santa perceiving a momentary change in her instantly went away with the boys. After their departure, the Ranee tore her own cloth into pieces, put aside all her ornaments, and made a visible mark on her fore-head and began to cry almost in a leaning posture, when her loose and dishevelled and jet black hair screened the part of her face in the same way, as fragments of clouds do to the sky. She answered none of her maids when they came to know the matter. The Rajah observing the Ranee in such a sad attitude, stood motionless like an idol for a time. Man in general becomes uxorious in case of the disparity of age and our Rajah being old and at the same time of an hen-pecked character, made himself a mere tool in the hands of his young consort. He asked the cause of it with all the trepidation of a mad man. But the Ranee answered nothing, rather began to cry in a louder and louder tone. The Rajah having caught hold of her hand, made her sit on her couch and with one end of her cloth wiped the dust of her body and tears of her eyes. "What happened My dear ! What must have come to take place so unexpectedly What misfortune must have befallen you, or any of your relatives or some one out of folly ventured to offer you any insult ? Lay open your case. I shall make the culprit feel the consequence. Whoever he may be, even my own begotten son may, neither expect exemption, nor remission from condign punishment." The Ranee anticipating the inward workings of her lord's mind answered with a dissembled air of crying tone, "Your two sons having this day abruptly entered in my apartment, showered upon me volleys of opprobrious language and at last beat me so mercilessly, that it requires no interpretations, since every mark on my back is an evident proof of the fact, I wish not to see the light of the sun again. The watery-grave so far I am capable of judging is the best remedy against such a calamity. You may then happily govern the kingdom with your favourite sons. I am no way related to you and what enjoyment could you expect from an alien. This spell-like language like intoxicating liquors at once bamboozled the royal brain. The Rajah immediately sent for the guards and strictly told them to put the two boys in custody for the night and in the morning due punishment is to be inflicted. The guards immediately went away to execute the royal order. Early in the morning next, the Rajah ordered those princes to be bound up. There was none but Santa, the old faithful nurse to pity their case. She stood, behind the Rajah's bedroom with a definite view to overhear the conversation between the Rajah and the Ranee. When she heard the inhuman sentence passed, she fell to the ground in a fit of swoon. A little after having recovered her sense observed thus. O inhuman God! Is this come to pass by the decrees of providence! O virtue art thou fled from this world of injustice. Do you shut also like frail humanity your eyes against the destitute and the helpless. Ah! what a sad thing is this, that my life is at full stake on the shore, after having safely crossed the boisterous waves of the deep ocean. What is the remedy? Neither God of Heaven is in fault. Every thing is owing to my misfortune, otherwise it could not have been my lot to suffer all the days of my life for others, more than I would have felt for my own sons, simply because they to clear the debt of obligation regard me no less than mother. The greatest hope which warranted me to undertake the charge of the Rajahs is at once blighted. Santa then went close to the princes with a very melancholy face. Those two boys were so very young as to ask her the cause of her doleful appearance as they were not till then aware of the matter which threatened them with danger, no less than death itself. "Why do you cry this day." Santa answered. My dear children ! What ails my mind is what exceeds my power to describe before you, so hard a task it is, that the very utterance shows the obduracy of our heart. Your step-mother stung you so secretly and fatally, that I see no antidote against the life-destroying poison. although you yourselves are not aware of the sad catastrophe. I repeatedly forbade your father to marry but still he married that monstress without the least heed of my counsel. The dangerous suspicion I so long anticipated of your lives is this day realised. How very happy must you have been by this time, had he not rejected what I said about the dangerous consequence of getting married in the decline of age on the score of female advice. He did not remonstrate respecting the justice or injustice of her malicious instigations against your conduct towards her. You will be put in custody this night and to-morrow morning you will have to launch into eternity. Ah ! What a sad calamity this must be ! What ill-fated hour must have brought this misfortune ! I see none—none on earth to befriend you in your last hour. Every one from the highest ministers, officials, down to the pampered menials is for the Rajah. They are all a set of flatterers and sycophants. They only echo the sound of the Rajah and quite heedless as to its harmony and dissonancy. They are destitute of the sense of justice. I won't see you any more after this night. No more shall I hear the harmony of your somewhat inarticulate accents. No more have I any chance of holding you in my fond embrace. Come ! Come ! My dear boys. You are to me as valuable as pupils to the eye. Come once more to these arms for the last. Santa pressed both the brothers closer, and closer to her affectionate arms with more and more eagerness. She pronounced the following with unsullied tears of maternal affection. My dear Bijaya, your mother was after all a lucky woman. She survived you all. She must have given me the charge of her sons to avenge the wrongs of a previous life. She enjoyed all the sweets of life. Whilst I alone and single handed have to bear all the oppressive weight of misfortune. After this, she accosted thus to their mother, the late deceased Rani. O visible type of chastity ! Where art thou now. The lives of your two sons are now in inextricable jeopardy. They are now entirely at the mercy of their step-mother. Ah ! How could you now shut up your eyes against them in times of extreme peril.

“ O death? where is thy sting.

O Grave? where is thy victory. ”

I am frequently invoking thy almost almighty power to release me from the cares and worries of this life, but thou remainest inexorable. Is then poverty a crime, so abominably hateful a crime, that even death, which irrespective of any consideration of age and sex carries away all, detests to come to me in spite of my best prayers! O earth! my bosom is burst under the heavy load of calamity of the worst type. Once out of favor open thy breast, that I may enter there for shelter—shelter from the darts and agonies of this world of woes. O lightning! Thy force is sufficient to break the steeple of the highest pinnacle of the mountains into several fragments, but failed to make any impression in my breast, though fell with the greater force. Does time destroy your might likewise? How hard is my lot? What further hope of happiness could induce you to lodge in this iron frame? Ah! How comes this about? The most extravagant dream can seldom conceive even, that Bijaya and his brother would have to encounter so hard a lot! O monstrous step-mother, I could not anticipate your poison like behaviour, with nectar like language. O miserable wretch! You ruined the royal family at once, without casting your eyes to the amiable look of virtue. Whilst Santa was lamenting her fate with those words, the guard appeared with the ferocity of Pluto* himself and stood before the threshold. He was corpulent in proportion to the height and breadth of his body. To add to the fierceness of his stature he had the Ethiopian color of the body, the scarlet color of the eye, and a large and hollow nose, had a piece of red cloth on his waist, a shield on his back, a sword in one hand and a long piece of rope in another to bind the Rajings. All these added so much ferocity to the savage look of his person, that on a sudden, he might be taken to be supernatural. It is no wonder, that such a ferocious appearance would strike terror in human breast, when the wolves and the lions, the most tremendous and powerful of terrestrial beasts forsake their native forests for protection elsewhere. The people of that profession are cruel by virtue of their duty and much more so, when authorised by royal order, so they began to abuse the princes without the least qualms of conscience. Bijaya being bigger, was consequently little more sensible and therefore he began to tremble as he heard of the insolent and upstart tenor of the tone of language of those low people. His two eyes were filled with tears, his voice became thickened and the color of his face began to fade, just as the sun diminishes by the touch of Rahoo.* What misfortune is, he neither knew nor had any idea of it before, consequently his mind was bewildered. Fortitude herself with all her encouraging prospect fails to uphold the best of her votaries under similar circumstance. Bijaya being out of fear, unable to answer the tyrant, stood motionless. The guard without further delay, entered the room with insolent audacity common to the menials and when about to extend his hands to bind the boys, the eldest spoke with trembling tone. "Well Zemaddar!† For what misdemeanor did you come to execute the basest order? We did not knowingly offer you, or any one in the state any wrong, neither did we mean any harm whatever. But if our father being offended without any cause of provocation, have issued the mandate to put us in custody, we are ready without your using force to follow you to the jail. Why do you aggravate our pain by binding us? The ensuing morning we are destined to fall sure victims into your hands. Why do you then kill us a little before? If you think it right you can hasten our death, without aggravating the torture. In that case, we shall not have to suffer the additional pangs of bondage." Nogurpal‡ was far from paying the least heed to the prayers of the princes, he rather called forth all the strength of his muscles to bind the princes. Bijaya Chandra was a prince of a very delicate make so the pangs of hard bindings became quite intolerable. The copious drops of tears soon wetted his bosom and cloth. After this he thought of Basanta Coomar, who was little above the hissing-babe. No sooner did he see the tyrant, than he out of fear became almost lifeless. He then clung closer and closer to his eldest brother and spoke in a trembling voice. "Dada!* Who is he. I am become afraid of him. Take me up into your arms." Bijaya Chandra perceiving the uneasy sensations of his brother's mind, but not being able to render him the desired assistance held him by bonding his body in his fond embrace. He could not take up his brother in his arms, as his hands were bound, but gazed with fixed attention towards his brother and wetted his hair with his tears. Nogurpal was a man of the humblest pedigree, was inhuman by virtue of his birth and training, tried with all his strength to snatch away Basanta from the fond embrace of his eldest brother. Bijaya observing his power fell short of rendering any help, addressed the tyrant with the domineering humility of a slave. "O Nogurpal cease!—cease a little,—I kiss the dust of your feet. Be not hard upon Basanta.† Just see how he out of fear is clung close to me, he is shaking like the leaves of trees by the impulse of the wind. The gracefulness of his face is faded away. The incessant drops of tears are flowing from his eyes. Cannot such a sad scene move you with compassion. "Are you so miserably cruel?" Inhuman Nogurpal still remained inexorable. He rather manifested the greatest zeal to execute the awful mandate. In consequence of excess of fraternal love, he repeated his solicitations with sanguine hope of success and said again and again to the mean scoundrel. "Your hard-bindings ail me to the very core of my heart. Basanta is too tender and delicate, would never be able to suffer such hard treatment and is sure to fall dead. If nothing could prevail upon you to alter your inhuman design, then and there I request you to behead me first with your sharp pointed sword and after my death, you may do anything your whim may dictate, so that I may not be in pain to witness my brother's premature death."

What a beautiful and pathetic instance here of fraternal affection and self-denial?

The prayers of Bijaya notwithstanding its melting character could not reach the ears of the in-human Nogorpal. Basanta being too young, was of course very timid. He spoke to the merciless wretch with shivering tone. "Don't kill me, I am harmless. I shall kiss the dust of your feet, if you release me, so that I may fly to the arms of my nurse again." The town-band* yet remained unkind. Basanta out of juvenile temper was somewhat irritated and spoke thus, as sounds well in the mouth of a prince, in spite of its unbearable audacity. "Be off. O unkind fool! You are too ungrateful. Don't pain my hand. Release me,—if not, I shall bring everything to the notice of my father. You beat my brother and bound him, then you will pay the penalty of your folly." The town-band heard all these, but paid no heed at all. Without the slightest compunction, he bound him with all his strength. Basanta Coomar not being able to bear the pain, broke out into fresh paroxysms of shrieks, and lamentable outcries. The town-band holding the point of the rope, with which he bound the hands of both the princes, was about to snatch them away out of the town, when Santa the nurse being turned pale at the horrid spectacle, stood before the regent with tears and prayed thus, "O miserable niggard? I am grown grey in the Government service, wherefore I expect greater latitude of indulgence, and for the sake of my age and experience, you will be pleased to accede to my humble request. Relieve the princes from the bondage. To see them in such a painful position is heart-rending indeed. I am quite helpless. I entertain great hopes from them. Have the goodness not to pain them and to pain them is to pain the pupils of my eyes. They are born princes necessarily are objects of greater care and are strangers to every species of annoyance and uneasiness. You tied them like the malcontents. How very painful is it to bear this awful sight can easily be conceived than described." Recommendation here for mercy is what the fuel to the furnace of fire. It rather served to heighten the resisting feeling in him more and more and to give vent to his spleen, he caught hold of her without any regard as to age, or sex and pushed her with such strength, as occasioned her to fall to the ground. But he confined the Rajlings in a dark and dismal dungeon. How heart rending is the very memory of the sight at such a critical juncture. Similar was the melting scene of Ram, the king of Oude, the hero of Ramayan when detained in close prison with his pet-brother Luksmun by Mokirabun, the son of Rabun, the mighty king of Ceylon. Bazanta being unable to bear the pain, spoke thus to his eldest brother. "Pada ! No more can I bear, so relieve me of the pain and save my life. Where are you. I could not see any thing. I am quite afraid. Come to me soon and hold me in your affectionate embrace." Bijaya hearing the pitiful yellings of his brother, remarked thus with tears. 'Though there is none to see us God sees us no doubt.

* He sees with equal eye, as god of all,
A hero perish, or a sparrow fall. '

Besides, there is no circumstance so miserable, which providence cannot relieve.

"The wretch, that works and weeps without relief,
Has one to notice his silent grief."

In spite of such hopes, he cried aloud, but his brother said, "what could I do ? I am bound as well. I can't get up. Better offer your best prayers to the supreme Lord of Heaven who is the father of the fatherless and the great help of the helpless. In the midst of his spiritual counsel, he fell to the ground with the loss of sense. The cast became brightened now. It appeared, that the birds pitying the case of the princes were all united to invoke the aid of the Almighty with their sweet and melodious tone. Here the Raja having come to the council room ordered the guard to bring those naughty boys before him. I am the monarch. I punish all according to the measure of their crimes and it must be a bounden duty to me to punish those boys irrespective of any consideration of blood or any thing else.

In the midst of these acclamations of rage, the eyes of His Majesty become crimson red. The wrathful look of the king confounded the courtiers and the members of the king's council. The guards brought the unhappy wretches before their father who cast a frowning look towards his sons. Who with the hard heartedness of a merciless ruffian, ordered them to be taken to the place of execution. He uttered this also in tone declaratory of the topmost of his angry passion. Don't suffer them to stand before me more a second. Their very sight burns me to my very heart. The more I see them, the more gets the fire of passion inflamed. The guard to ingratiate the favour of the king showed all the dexterity to execute the royal order. Bijaya the eldest of the supposed culprits touching the feet of the Raja, questioned with tears. "O Father? What heinous misdeeds are we guilty of? For what failings do you commit us to the charge of the cruel rogue to put an end of our lives, long before the approach of death. He was little recovered, whilst speaking all these. Tears incessantly began to flow with the rapidity of the flood from his eyes. No sooner were the ejaculations of Bijaya Chander ended, than his father was heard declare, not with royal, but with the unkind gravity of a savage. "O impudent guard! Why did you suffer yet these symbols of vice to stand just before me?" Bijaya was shaking with the thundering voice of his father and spoke thus; "Dear father? Take this for granted, that I am a delinquent before your Majesty, my life may be at your mercy. But Basanta did you no harm, therefore spare his life. You can't take away his without the dictates of ~~any~~ recognised rules of the laws. Pray look at him once only with favourable eye. How is he staring at like the lost calf on all sides. By the strong binding, his tender skin is turned out, whence the blood is issuing forth. He ~~is~~ disfigured by the pain, tears like inundations are gushing out from his eyes. How could you (being the father) bear this awful sight? Is mercy fled from you at once? Is your heart petrified? Otherwise, how could you (being the giver), take away his life." When Bijaya was speaking all these with loud tone, his brother coming forward to the king with a mighty cast of countenance, common to juvenile age, observed ~~that~~ with almost lisping accent, but of course with great warmth of filial indulgence. "Papa! O dear Papa! That guard (pointing his finger towards the very same rogue, who had the order to treat them so unfeelingly) bound my hands. Look here ? Dear Papa. How is blood issuing forth from the mark of the lacerated part of my hands. None freed me from the bondage. Loose it quick. See how ferociously does that guard gaze at me. I think he would bind me again. Therefore take me up into your arms, then he can't wrong me any more." When he was about to fly to the Rajah's arms, who mercilessly drove him off and he fell to the ground. When he was so abruptly treated by his father, he cast his eyes towards all indiscriminately. There was none so devoid of feeling, as not to be moved with compassion, neither did any one venture to recommend for mercy in anticipation of ruinous results on his part. Every one secretly wiped his own tears with his own cloth and began to see each other's face almost like mute beings. The chief minister, with becoming courage and fortitude, accosted thus to the king. "Moharaj! Although these boys may have offended you, yet you can't kill them under that pretext. No Shastras can sanction it. To kill a son, is so far a heinous crime, that one guilty of it, can't expect pardon even, from the father of mercy. As

A god of all mercy,
Is a god unjust.'

Besides, the man, who is guilty of it is to subject himself to innumerable difficulties both in this world and the one to come." The Rajah answered. "They are guilty of matricide. I won't see their face again, neither could I allow them to reside in my dominion. From this day, they are my divorced sons. You can do anything with them, you think right and expedient." Having said this, he entered the Atnanah. The prime-minister having by the rare powers of anticipation came to learn, the motive of the Rajah, set himself to unloose the fetters and having brought two horses from the stables, gave them to Bijaya Chundra with the following heart-rending prayer. "Young prince! Be off from the kingdom in company with your brother. Otherwise, there is no safety of your life." Agreeably to the injunctions of the minister, both the brothers departed from the kingdom.

What singular instance of the power of the wife of the age to bamboozle the brain even of the wisest, so as to gleniate the hearts of their husbands even from their own begotten sons

CHAPTER III.

SANTA, the pet nurse having heard the sad tidings of the perpetual banishment of both the princes, went on with possible haste to the public road and spoke thus with tears in her eyes. Ah? what a big hope had I entertained of nursing up Bijaya Chundra with his almost infant wife after their wedding in so early an age. I thought that my long distressed mind would be at once perfectly cheered, when I shall see the eldest of the princes would hold the reins of government in his hand, but contrary to my expectation, that hope is at once nipped up in its bud. The Ram,* who was universally expected to be anointed the king, had by the reverse of circumstances to travel in the character of an exile by paternal command.

A short while after the revival of her sense, she spoke thus as in soliloquy. Ah? How could a boy of so tender an age, as Basanta, who becomes hungry, before the sun becomes powerful, who can't sleep without the tender stroke of the nurse and her sweet lullaby, who can't remain quiet a second's time without her; travel in a foreign country ~~far~~ far off from his home. O. Almighty, omnipresent and merciful providence! How could such a boy be saved from the paws and the jaws of the wild and voracious beasts, who out of natural ignorance jumps with delight to catch his own shadow, who couldn't be awakened easily and who always gets entangled with his own clothes, who gives his own tasted food to his superiors without the least qualms of conscience and who is incapable of observing the lines of demarkation between himself and others. After all these expressions indicative of heart-rending sorrows, Santa, the mother-like nurse made a very short ejaculation to the supreme agent in heaven for the preservation of those two princes in such a perilous position of unparalleled nature. O Lord ! Thou art the father and the king of the beasts of the forests, the fowls of the weather and the supreme Lord of the whole universe vouchsafe to protect both the minors from the inevitable hand of the approaching evil, which menaced them every smallest jot of time with sure death. Santa spoke thus to Bijaya Chundra. When you are going to leave the kingdom, what is the good of my living here with a body without a soul.* I shall accompany you, so be good enough to bear me a companion on the way. Bijaya Chundra answered with tears. Ah ! Dear beloved grand-mother !† You are too old to bear the fatigues of the journey. Our distress would be aggravated, when we shall see you in any sort of difficulty. Better go back to your own home. If our lives be spared, we are sure to see each others face again. Basanta, who was too tender to feel the difficulty yet, said,—O Grand-mother ! why do you cry ? Let us now depart, but we shall be back shortly after. Having said this he affectionately clung to her arms, as is common to children of such tender years, and having alighted from the horse, he wiped off the tears of the pet-nurse with the extreme point of his sheet. The old maid held him as fondly in her bosom for a while, but was subsequently compelled to bid him adieu for fear of incurring the royal resentment, thus both the brothers left the kingdom, but so long, the good old nurse was not entirely disappeared, they at intervals turned their faces towards her. Santa also did the same out of almost motherly affection with fixed eyes. But when the boys were entirely out of sight, the maid broke out

* The original suffers much in translation is a well known fact proved from the above. That sentence is turned a proverb among us, when we see the occurrence of anything contrary to our expectation, we to give vent to our disappointment repeat the phrase. "The Ram, who was universally expected to be the king had to travel as an exile." The Europeans couldn't penetrate into the beauty of this proverb:

* Santa, the nurse was so devotedly attached to those two boys, that she took the separation a calamity no less than death itself on her part.

† They call the maid their grand-mother out of respect for her person, as she fostered them with maternal care. It is customary among us to apply the term mother and grand-mother to old maids out of the highest respect, into loud out-cries, and spoke thus. These two lads are of royal blood. They are never seen to be away from their threshold, they scarcely know where to arrive through which way, so were forced to follow blindly their horses. The horses after having crossed many kingdoms, villages and cities, meadows and gardens, rivers and other streamlets, and very many large tanks entered into the shade of a thick forest just at noon. That forest was the retreat of the ferocious tigers, bears and all sorts of wild beasts. It is so very remote from habitable places, that man scarcely visits it. The very awful sight of the forest struck terror into the minds of both the princes. After 3 O'clock the horses stopped just close to a certain hill. The valley beneath the hill was very beautiful and delightful, as there were no series of herbs and plants, but trees of the largest magnitude being placed there in regular rows, made the place the safest retreat of the wearied and fatigued travellers for rest and the foot of one of these groups of trees was covered with white marbles. It appears from its very sight, that God out of good feelings made that place as cheerful and desirable as a throne itself is. Its chief object was to beguile the tediousness of the present and to make the passengers altogether forget the uneasiness of past labour. There was a streamlet not very large on the side of the hill, which makes it exceedingly captivating and from the top of which, the drops are incessantly falling in the shape of bubbles from the fountain, with constant zingling noise, which soothes the ears, besides the nearest objects seemed as they were ornamented with the colors of various kinds, by the rays of the declining sun. One side of that reservoir being broken, a current of the river had run, through the bushy jungle. On another side, there being a mass of stone stairs, it displayed the highest skill of the artists. Bijaya having observed this delightful scene alighted from his horse in expectation of rest from the labors and fatigues of the long and tiresome journey. He to help his brother to come down held his hand and made him sit on the step of the stone stair. The horses after being disburdened of their riders began to graze upon the tender and green grass of the plain. The two brothers having rolled a little upon the marble bed to alleviate the fatigues of the wearisome journey washed their hands and mouth and with fold hands drank little cold water, which relieved them a great deal. Now the youngest said (Dada) where are we come to. I see here no human face. This spot is surrounded on all sides with jungles. Where is our dwelling house. Where is our old Santa nurse?

I don't see any of those things here, so I am afraid. Take me to our house. Let me see our grand-mamma Santa. I am very hungry. Bijaya having heard these pitiful tones of his brother, answered thus, with tears. My dear brother! we are no longer in the hey-day of prosperity. We being robbed of all the comforts of this world, are at once plunged pell-mell into the sea of affliction. No more think of the pet nurse. We are forced to leave her for ever. Don't cry! Come to my arms. Having said this, he held him in his arms, with tears of affection. But after a short while having suppressed his cries, said. My dear Basanta! Sit here in this place in a calm and quiet posture. I am going to the jungle in search of fruits and I shall be back very soon. Having in this way consoled Basanta, he went into the interior of the thick forest. Listen Dear children! The oft-told precept, that "misfortune never comes alone." One is sure to follow another and the one that follows is sure to be more frightful, than that which preceded. When a man first encounters a calamity, he is sure to meet very soon with series of misfortunes. Like the cloud in the firmament, when it brings rain, it soon brings with it one after the other storms, thunder and lightnings. After the departure of Bijaya, his younger had cast a fixed gaze towards the direction, through which his brother passed. By this time a handsome fruit red as blood, having fallen from a tree, close to the spot, where Basanta sat and by degrees, as by the impulse of the wind, or by the pressure of man's heel came near to in front of Basanta who then being overtaken by hunger and thirst, tasted the fruit, but immediately fell to the ground in a state of insensibility upon a marble bed. His color was instantly changed, he turned pale and his breath was almost stopped. The foams only began to issue out of his mouth. There on the other hand, the eldest was employed to gather edible fruits, but all on a sudden, he felt certain uneasiness, the reason of which, is difficult for one to make out, if he had not previously experienced the similar catastrophe.

His eyes were instantly swelled with tears. The fruit he had in his hand fell down and his mind was suddenly distracted with several anxieties or prognostics, which language is a poor exponent to describe fully. He then thought within himself, that in the midst of these calamities, something must have occurred to fill up the measure of our misfortune. Something worse must not have happened to the state, as every hope of ours has entirely been blighted of being better with its increasing prosperity. Any misfortune, that is susceptible of affecting the interests of the royalty, can seldom create such uneasy sensations in me, when I am deprived of every right of succeeding the throne. Something worse must have befallen our dear Basanta. Having said this, he returned with precipitancy and having seen Basanta from a little way off on the marble bed, uttered thus. Al heart! That which had roused thee with palpitation is actually come to pass to my ill luck. I thought this as well that Basanta being overtaken with hunger and thirst is sleeping on the marble bed and it all becomes me to harbour ominous idea in my heart. With all such cares and worries of mind, he came closer and closer, and called his brother, so as to awake him. Get up. Just get up! Sleep no more. Why are you given up a prey to misfortune. Pity it is, that you didn't take any food throughout the whole day. The beautiful color of thy face has been at once disfigured by the intensity of the heat of the meridian sun, I have brought various sorts of fruits and at the expense of the sweat of my brow. Just hold them, get up, and eat them up. But when he got no answer in return, though he called aloud so repeatedly and when he was about to hold him up in his arms, he saw the mark of the snake-biting and foams are issuing out of his mouth and he is almost breathless. The sight of this unfavourable omen and the mark of the snake-biting made Bijaya think the death of his brother, but to give vent to his passion, which agitated his mind, he cried in a tone expressive of truly fraternal affection. O my dear brother!, My dear Basanta! With this tone of pity, he fell like a plantain tree on the marble stair-case. After a short time, he took up Basanta in his arms and accosted thus. My dear Basanta! It appears, that out of contempt of your own life, by reason of the off-hand treatment of our father, when you very eagerly sought his fond embrace for fear of the town-guard you left this world. The remembrance of that sad repulse and the unkind behaviour of our parent must have prevailed upon you to seek so early a death. I have none—none on earth save and except you. Both the parents have left me. I solely depended upon you, but you also being unkind left me. What would become of me then? Whom shall I look to for relief, when I shall be in distress. Who would cling to my fond arms? Some time after, being deprived of every sense under all such reverses of fortune, he cried again in a tone of remorse. Why are you so unkind. Hav'nt you said just now, that you were hungry. I have brought you fruits after a long and tiresome search. Better hold them and eat up. My life is quite in a perplexed state, my bosom is ever in motion to and fro with all the emotions of grief and sorrow. Extend your arms, and come to me. Call me dada once more and thereby cool my distressed mind. Being silent for some time, he said again in language of sorrow. You are unmindful of me, lay yourself here then. Let me seek my own way. After having gone a little way off, he said again—Basanta! Where am I going, whilst you are alone here. I am very hard hearted and obdurate. Perhaps you are afraid, just come up to my arms, after which having placed Basanta in his bosom called aloud, as in a fit of delirium, their pet nurse Santa, whom he addressed thus in a pathetic tone. He whom you never allowed to come down from your arms, he whom you often fanned with your cloth, when the little bubbles of perspiration made their appearance upon his brow, he for whom you sought the medicinal drugs with maternal cares and on whose recovery you felt yourself quite happy and he who is delicately bred up is now lain on the dusty ground without velvet bed or cushion, nay even without a second-hand mat. Come! Come forthwith and with speed, take up your Basanta and caress and fondle him. Whilst Bijaya was thus bewailing the loss of his brother, he thought within himself, that if Basanta have actually left me, what is the good of my life. I shall launch at once into the deep bed of this sea and die and thereby get rid of all sorts of anxieties, which the flesh is heir to. Having made such an awful reflection, he thought, of plunging into the unfathomable deep where there was then a religious saint, who was walking at random and who being fortunately able to catch the latent and the desperate aim of Bijaya from a little way off cried aloud in a tone of astonishment and horror. "What are you about? What's that?" With this horror stricken voice, he came close to Bijaya and held up his hand and accosted thus. "What sad event must have bamboozled your brain so far, as to get disposed to suicide. Don't you know, that it is the most heinous crime. No atonement is sufficient to expiate even a tinge and atom of this crime."

"What must have obliterated this from your memory, that none is more a sinful being, than one, who commits suicide." Bijaya answered. "Good gods : My soul has ere-long left this world, now I am to bury this life-less body into the watery grave. How could then the charge of suicide come upon me." Being over-whelmed with grief and remorse, whilst he was talking with the saint, he fell insensibly on a stone stair just like the trees by the force of the hurricane. The good saint with all the hurry and whirl of mind held up Bijaya Chandra and consoled him, though with precepts of common place character, but all were fraught with such moral lectures, as had the potency to support Bijaya at least for the time being. The wise saint said this as well, that from the nature of the corpse I am led to believe, that he is not dead as yet. He seems to have taken either any poisonous fruits, or some other sort of food, that was placed on the plate rubbed over with venom, one or the other must have given birth to this sad event. There is chance of its instantaneous remedy. Why are you so impatient. I hope God would forthwith deliver you from the leonine paw of the present danger. Having said this, he departed, but returned very soon with the healing balm of the drugs and applied their juice to the ears and nose of the supposed dead one, who a little after began to breathe. Again sometime after, he rose up and sat precisely in the same way, as man usually rises from sleep and then said (Dada) I slept long. You have been in search of fruits. Where are they? Kindly give me I am very hungry. Bijaya embraced his brother with tears of joy and spoke thus, you were really sleeping eternally, I was also preparing to do the same both for ever and anon, but this godlike * being took pity and saved both of us, otherwise, there was no chance of our mutual interview again. At last Bijaya having fed his brother most of those fruits, he himself ate the remainder. This appeased their hunger to the greatest extent. The wise saint having very minutely observed both the prince capapie, remarked thus, I sanguinely believe, that you two brothers seem to have relinquished the kingdom, but I am altogether incapable of forming any judgement as to the true cause of your desperate intent of coming here in this awful retreat. The sage having heard all the incidents of their lives, placed his hands to his ears and spoke as in soliloquy, that worldly men could run pell-mell into every deed under the satanic influence of passions, howsoever diametrically opposed it may be to the dictates of their inward monitor.—Nay sometimes out of extravagant fondness to gratify their whim raise their impious hands against their own begotten sons, in spite of the filial affection serving the greatest barrier in the way. The Revd. sage after this wise reflection, said. My dear! The approach of night is at hand. The ravenous beasts are sure to come here to drink the water. So it is no longer advisable to stay here. Please pass the night here in my humble mansion.†. Bijaya gladly accepted the offer of his benefactor and held his brother's arm with his right hand and with his left he held the reins of the horses and followed the wise sage, who used to live in the centre of one of the spacious cavities of the mountain. Having arrived at that place, he entered the cavity through the usual

† The original suffers by translation is a well-known fact, specially the above. Its beauty could not be retained, as the custom of entertaining the strangers is altogether out of place in Europe. Whilst here in Asiatic countries, the people gladly feed the strangers, without previous enquiry of their physical capacity or incapacity, as no virtue is so much acceptable in their eye, as the one here quoted, the wise sage was actuated not so much from a desire of benefitting the boys from the paws of the beasts as from a principle of having them at his threshold in the character of beggars. Even the worshipful Brahmins here condescend to render the offices of a menial, if they come thus in their door.

path. The more the world began to be wrapped up in darkness, the more lightsome became the retreat of the sage and the brightness resembled the broad-day-light. Whilst Bijaya was observing on all sides, he was thunderstruck with the view of a single piece of bubble, the lustre of which alone was sufficient to create such a wonder. Having tied the horses in front of the mountain, they all entered into one of its deep recesses. The wise sage offered the princes, various kinds of fruits of good flavour, which he had gathered before. After the repast, Basanta went to the bed, but Bijaya spent the greater part of the night in religious controversy in a fair argumentative model with the sage, ere he went to bed. On the dawn of the day, the two brothers seeing the sun in the east, rose and fell prostrate agreeably to the time honored custom of India. Shortly after having turned round the saint for some ten or fifteen times rode upon their horses and departed else-where. The horses had continually trot on to the east of the path that laid below that mountain. This path was very difficult, necessarily very loan-some. It was bounded with hills and hillocks on the south. On the north vast waste of uninhabitable tract of wild lands, here and there, there fell trees of the largest magnitude and stones of the highest dimensions, which made the way very tiresome to the travellers. The two brothers could neither leave behind them this road, though they worked with unremitted patience till 3 O'clock, nor find any other way on any other side. At length, being overtaken with hunger and thirst, their color was changed and they were disfigured, like the branches, which are separated from the main trunk and by degrees, they fainted and lost their usual strength so much, that they entirely depended upon their horses, as they were incapable of walking even an inch of ground. Thus having gone a pretty good distance, the horses stopped of themselves without finding any proper roads on any side. The place where they stopped was so frightfully dark, that day appeared there as dark as night itself. It was bounded on two sides with brambles and prickly shrubs and in the middle the space was filled up, with bones of men as well as of beasts. Close to that place, there was a mountain, where there was a large opening from one end to the other, which on a sudden view appears to one unaccustomed to a distant journey, the way to the subterranean world. The cave herein mentioned was in days of yore, the abode of Taraka.* In the Tretayuga,† when Ram Chandra of whom so often and so much is heard of in our Ramayan was going to Mithilanagar, was persued by that giantess, and being engaged in skirmishes, which put an end of her life and thereby the victor saved the travellers the troubles of a long and circuitous journey. Thence the passage to that famous city was facilitated. Bijaya having alighted from his horse, said this to his brother so as to rouse his drooping soul. "What made you so impatient? What fear. I am all along and always in company with you." But in defiance of his unremitted industry, he failed in consequence of the extreme darkness to find out the easy road. He then climbed upon a large tree, in order to know the time of the sun's sinking down to the west, but saw, that the brightest luminary, as it were trying to hide in the west behind the mountain, purposely to impose upon him, which made him become red with anger. Having then come down from the tree with all haste, concluded thus within himself. To-day we are sure to lay up our bones here in this horrible retreat, "unnoticed and uncared." How very akin is this sentiment to Robinson Crusoe, who in a similar tone of despair gave out, "I must finish my journey alone." We are, said Bijaya in danger this day either of being devoured by a huge serpent, or some being of extraordinary make may kill us. Whatever might be the case the fate is inevitable, we won't survive the danger. The desire of the malicious step-mother is most likely to be crowned with success this day. Ah! Pity it is, that we can't see any one

* The Mythological account of Taraka runs thus. She used to live in a forest called Kamyakibana. She was always in the habit of killing men and drink their blood. She delighted herself in interrupting the saints and the religionists of their prayers. Ram Chandra, who according to the prediction of the Hindu theology became incarnate in Tretayuga to deliver the Yagis and others from the tyranny of this giantess, killed her on his way to Mithilanagar.

† Tretayuga or the third epoch was the age, which followed immediately after the Dwapar or the second epoch. Ram became incarnate in this age to enfranchise humanity from their sins.

either friends, or acquaintances, relatives or neighbour or countrymen to speak to us anything about the happiness of the world to succeed, so as to console us in this awful hour. How very similar was the expression of late Rajah Ram Mohun Roy, who was afraid on his way to Europe by the dashing waves of the blue Atlantic. I deem it needless to repeat it here, as it has been sung so often and often by the theatrical performers and by the songsters of the common place character. The song is so very pathetic, that however old and hackneyed it may have become, we hear it every time with fresher and fresher delight, so much so that to a man of attentive and contemplative turn, it conveys his immortal and immaterial soul, nearer and nearer to the supreme agent. When he saw, that nothing promises better, he spoke the following in a sorrowful tone. " Ah ! Dear Santa ; where are you now ? We were predestined to die here in this horrible and distant retreat. You could know nothing of the sad catastrophe." Thus he bewailed, but to keep up the spirit of his brother, he didn't express all these. He rather wiped the tears of his eyes clandestinely, so that his younger brother may not know it, as that would make him more and more afraid which like fuel would add to the fire of sorrow, but without any better consequence whatever. But mind, dear readers, that face like glass often and invariably displays the secret workings of our mind. Basanta, having come to learn the shatter from the very countenance of his brother. Said. " Why do you cry (Dada) ? If you are afraid, just call Santa, the nurse to come and help you. No sooner would she hear your voice, than run to relieve you." Bijaya immediately stopped from crying and began to reflect, how to pass this dangerous night safely. It is no way advisable to venture the night here where danger threatens every moment without a heavy mass of blazing fire, as the very sight of it distances the snakes and other beasts, that prey upon man. The next question, that arose in his mind was. " How could the fire be had in this lonesome and solitary recluse." Sometime after, having got two pieces of dry wood, which issued flames of fire from their frisking together and the flames having caught the jungles, he was above all fear for that night, specially from the attempts of the beasts. Thus the place became quite lightsome, when the fire began to blaze forth. Bijaya then made a bed with the saddle and the reins of their horses. Basanta being hungry and tired fell asleep on the same hard bed without interruption. The horses began to feed upon the grass and the tender leaves of the plants here and there. My dear Children! Think on the influence of the alternate rotation of the good and bad turn of time and circumstances. He whose rest was interrupted on a bed of cushion and velvet, is now capable of enjoying a sound sleep on a bed of straw. Bijaya did not sleep himself, but watched his younger whole night in anticipation of any danger. He also fanned his brother with the points of his cloth, when he saw him perspired by the heat of the fire. Thus Basanta enjoyed sound sleep, but a little before the approach of dawn, he rose up and said in a dry throat “(Dada) I am exceedingly hungry and thirsty. I can scarcely speak, get water forth-with.” His elder answered. “My dear Basanta! Where and how could I get water now? Have patience, and I shall fetch it in the dawn of the early morning. After a while nature held a stillness. The beetles and the worms commenced their croaking noise. The little drops of night dews began to shine like pearls on the tops of grass and the east appeared to have worn a deep scarlet cloth resembling blood in color. Gradually the darkness having ceased to mantle over the face of nature, when everything began to appear faintly through the ray of day light, Bijaya without further delay, first held up his brother’s hand in way of helping him to mount up the horse and then he rode himself and on their way hither and thither for search of roads. He suddenly saw one, that directly leads to Mithilanuggur. The youngest being very hungry and thirsty after a journey of some considerable distance, was obliged to fall straight on the back of his horse. It was no wonder at all. In the first place, he was a boy of too tender an age. Secondly, he didn’t receive a morsel of bread throughout the whole day and night to break his fast. He spoke in a faint tone “My Dear Dada! I am quite disabled to stay upon the back of the animal, how could I hold the reins of the horse, when, I out of weakness, arising from total starvation am incapable of standing erect. Please dismount me soon or I am in danger of falling down.

Bijaya forth with alighted from his horse and held up his younger to dismount him, after which he addressed him thus with tears in his eyes, expressive of truly fraternal affection. My dear Basanta! wait till my return and I shall be back with water, with the glance of an eye. Basanta cast a fixed gaze on the side of his brother's return. At intervals he had cried like the confined calves, that low repeatedly in expectation of the quick return of their old dams with this melting tone. Dada! My dear Dada! Where are you? Bijaya had then gone to some distance, but being unable to ascertain, which way to take and which to avoid and where the water to be had, he sat at the foot of a Tamul tree and began to weep. However, he had the good luck to see a she rabbit licking the body of her young ones. The body of some of them were spotted with clay, and others were moistened with water. Bijaya reached a large tank by treading the foot print of the animal and when he was thinking of the means of fetching water, as he had no pot with him then, he suddenly saw a large elephant running with all speed towards him by raising his trunk above his head. Bijaya with fear stood behind a tree. The elephant seeing that from a distance, directed his step towards him, when the animal came near to Bijaya, who being confounded with fear gave out thus in a pitiful tone. "Ah Jove! I am sure to die now by this elephant. My death is not at all a matter of regret, but who would relieve my brother from the unquenchable thirst in so loansome a place, where he is left alone, remote and unfriended. Ah! in what inextricably dangerous position we must have been exposed. On the one hand the elephant is coming to kill me; on the other Basanta is labouring under pangs of death for want of water. What could I do? I don't see even a single one, whom could I recommend for merey upon my brother. O just and merciful God. I pray thee with all my might and strength in my hours of death to save that orphan." Whilst lamenting thus the sad catastrophe of their juvenile career, he had fallen on the ground. The elephant then took him upon his head and went on with haste. Whilst Basanta being exhausted with hunger and thirst had fallen down as dead on the ground without strength to utter any other sound, than this in a very low and pathetic tone indicative of truly fraternal affection. "(Dada) where are you gone to for water and for whom ? I am about to breathe my last. Happily by this time Revd. Saradwaj Muni happened to pass by the very same way and seeing the boy exposed thus, began to think within himself. This lad seems to be a prince from his very appearance, but how is he come here unattended is something, what cannot easily be accounted for. Some one must have accompanied him here, as I see a couple of horses. Let me cither him first with few drops of cold water and then I shall question him about. With this view, he brought a water pot full of water, but began at first to pour water a drop after drop in his dry tongue. The boy being thus ervived a little, himself held the pot and drank the whole water and having cast his eyes towards the Revd. gentleman, questioned thus in a very obliging air. " Who are you ? (Sir) you saved me when I was on the point of dying for want of water. Can you say, what is become of my eldest brother ? Long since he is gone to look after water for me." Hence the Revd. Sire came to know, that his brother is come with him. Most likely, he must have come to similar harm. What else could possibly detain him so long ? However it is a duty incumbent upon me to soothe this boy now. The Revd. Seer to comfort and support him under such an awful position, said in way of encouragement. Dont be afraid of. Your brother is about to be back. I shall wait upon you till then. But let me know in the mean time, what accident must have conveyed you two brothers here in this sad and desolate recluse ? The boy answered I can hardly enterpret it to your satisfaction. (Sir) My brother can fully release you there in that delicate point. Thenc the sage concluded, that there is no chance of knowing all the particulars of the sad event save and except one or two questions to the point. I must have that alternative. In the first place, he put this question. " Whose sons are you and where is your birth place ? Basanta answered, Joy Sen is my father's name, the name of my eldest brether is Bijaya Chandra and my name is Basanta Coomar, Joypore is our country house. Hence the sage concluded, that Joy Sen, the Rajah of Joypore after the death of his wife, took a second. He must have been prevailed upon through the instigation of the wife of his age to be the author of this sad event. I must be little more inquisitive on this nice subject. So he asked thus to Basanta. "Is it that you are compelled to leave your house for the harsh treatment of your step-mother, or for the constant bad behaviour of your father through your step mother's malicious instigation." The boy answered, no no. Our step-mother said nothing about. We were in our own room, when Santa our nurse seemed to have whispered something to my brother. A little after, the town guard came and bound us both with a rope and placed us in a dark and dismal dungeon for the night. Just look here in my hand the visible mark. The Muni was astonished and affected with the very sight of such an inhuman deed. He then further asked, "What followed next?" The boy answered. The following morning, we had to stand in front of our father, who in a fit of diabolical anger gave orders to slay us. My brother holding fast his feet, began to cry, but he still remained inexorable. Then came the Chief minister to unloose the tie. He gave us the horses with instructions to leave the Rajdom without delay. My brother has brought me here. I had requested and insisted upon him to return to our own home, but he paid no heed at all. But (Sir) you told me just now, that my brother would return soon. Why is he not back yet? I am very hungry, whom shall I apply for relief? Description as this enabled the sage to know all the incidents of their lives, in all their bearings and under each of their minutiae. The heart of the holy devotees are naturally susceptible of pity, and the relation of such pathetic circumstances melted him still more easily. He then said. "My darling? Are you hungry? Just sit here for a while and I shall soon get you fruits." The boy burst out in a piteful tone. "Revd. Sire! Are you also going to leave me to the mercy of chance in this critical hour of need. What would become of me then?" His breast was wetted all over with tears, whilst he was pronouncing these words. The wise sage to console him said. "My dear Basanta I wouldn't forsake you. Please cease to harbour such thoughts. If you can't trust, or depend upon my mere words you may for your satisfaction's sake keep with you my beads,* that's the only way to

* Beads are much in use among the Hindus of all castes, specially among the followers of Krishna, who all in a body rise against him, who does not detain me. The wise seer thus set about for fruits. After a long search he had brought good many apples, guavas and some other sweet fruits. The boy ate most of them with good appetite. The sage stopped there for a long while in expectation of Bijaya Chandra's return, but at last being despaired of his return, he spoke to Basanta. " My dear boy ! Most likely your brother's return time is over. If he be alive, sometime or other we are sure to see him. As for the present you better follow me. No sooner did he hear these words, than he began to cry aloud again. The Muni to stop him, spoke thus. Cry no more, cease to cry. Don't you hear the roarings of the tigers ? It is no longer advisable on our part to remain here. Let us leave this place as soon as possible. Basanta immediately stopped through fear. The Muni held up his arms, in order to put him easily on the back of his horse and himself trot on foot with the bridle in his hand, the other horse followed them. The Muni reached his residence by the dusk of evening. The sage had never been blessed with a child, so his wife named Sooduckhina was in the habit of caressing and feeding the children of her neighbour as her own. It baffles the power of description to insinuate into the minds of others, the joys she felt on receiving so tender and lovely a boy as Basanta, the countenance of whose face was so lovely and commanding, that a mother of hundred children would be no less anxious to discharge her duties with maternal care towards him. It is no wonder, that she who had never given birth to any child would with greater delight run to her own abode with the boy in her arms, who is in every respect the delight of mankind.* The next morning, the children of the neighbouring Munis flocked to his door for sport, but Basanta being a stranger, dared not come in front of those boys. He had seen only the wife of Saradwaj Muni in the preceding night, so he sat silent close by her. But during the intervals he remembers his brother, he used to repeat this word in a crying tone. Dada, Dada. The wife of the seer to support and soothe him, in order to make him forget his brother, used to hold him up turn round each of those beads in his lot at least ten thousand times in course of a day. Sometimes they excommunicate him. . . . " in her fond arms, pointing her fingers towards the calves and other objects, that can easily take up the juvenile attention. Thus when he became acquainted with the children of the neighbour and when he was at play with them, the memory of his brother gradually began to fade. Thus a few days having been elapsed, the Muni had prescribed the boy a daily task with all other children of the neighbourhood. At first, he felt as is usually the case with little boys somewhat vexed and disturbed, but when he had relished to a certain extent, the pleasures of education, he devoted his time only in the study of the learning of every thing with indomitable zeal, exemplary diligence and resoluteness. He had the double advantages to make ahead in all the branches of education within the compass of a short time. In the first place, he was born of a royal blood so he must have the acknowledged advantage of a sharp and penetrating understanding and retentive memory.* Secondly, he had the rare benefit of the spiritual and secular instructions of a religionist, consequently in a comparatively short time and with little labour, his mind became a store-house of knowledge of all and every kind. The pleasures that arise from all such rational pursuits smother into death the gratification of simple desires. What other more salutary effects of education are there, which were not found to centre in him? There are lots of people, in whom the consequence of education being counteracted degrade themselves to the level of the brutes. Besides from the very frailty of their nature, they subject themselves to falsehood, chicanery, fraud, hypocrisy, selfishness and affectedness. The religionists are entirely exempted themselves from the stain of all those evils. In society it is hardly possible to meet with persons altogether free from the guilt of the above-mentioned vices. Man imbibes all those vicious habits from their very birth and retain them throughout life, whilst the sentiments of truth, virtue, religious discussions, theological lectures, the principles of the virtue of forgiveness and patience are instilled into the minds of the sages of all orders from the cradle up to the time of pyre, so they easily get rid of these ruinous principles. Basanta made himself critically acquainted with all the branches of scientific, theological and literary learning not long before he reached maturity. The wise sage observing the maturity of his age, questioned him one day in way of colloquial talk, so as to learn, how far is his character immaculately pure. One day, he said. My dear child ! A Brahmin named Manuja used to walk when he was young in a state of mind full of thoughts of various sorts to gratify his lustful appetites, during which a certain mountain fell under his observation the pinnacle of which rose so high, that it seemed to have touched the firmament itself. Manuja coming close to the mountain began to walk faster and faster, but the level not being smooth he was obstructed and put to pain. However by patience and perseverance, he came close to its foot, whence, he saw, that two women* are coming down hastily from the summit of it. Of those two ethereal ladies, one had worn an embroidered cloth and was somewhat of irregular habit, but the other was extremely mild, faithful and of a modest look. She had no ornaments indeed, but her natural beauty arising from unaffected modesty served the purposes of best ornaments. This one first came with celerity and questioned him thus, by the movements of her eyes. What are you about? Manuja ! What's the good of thinking this and that? Better follow me to my straight way. Manuja being in a manner enchanted with the sudden appearance of an unknown being, observed most respectfully. Who art thou? What must be the grand object of thy mission? She answered I am an invisible being. Seeing you here confounded with the branches of two roads of diametrically contrary directions came to show you the shortest cut. The one, who is coming after me is named Sriangana, the path she is to show is so difficult, that the passengers, who follow her, are at last forced to come back with vexation. She is in the habit of holding future prospect in a most transcendent light to strangers. That is a mere

* They are properly aerial beings or fairies.

tantalising hope that is never verified, so the passengers in general wish not to follow her. But the majority knowing the easy access of my path follow me. What more could I say to corroborate my assertion than this, that the whole spacious land is thickly overcrowded with passengers, who follow me. Whilst Priangana was thus engaged to take up the minds of the passengers with false hope. Sriangana came to Monuja with slow motion and proclaimed with smiling tone. My dear Manuja I am come here to point you the road, that would lead you easily to your journey's end. You are at liberty to follow the one or the other, according as you think right and expedient. Priangana said, Manuja ! Don't suffer yourself to be led away by false promise of Sriangana. Her way can seldom yield you that ease, which you so long and so earnestly sought for. If you follow me, you will find the facility of the way I spoke to with ease and without delay. The difficulty of the other way is already described. The happiness attend to those, who follow me, is something that baffles the description even of a recondite speaker. See for instance, the spring itself is a season of perennial joys and hilarity. Besides what a new thought of boundless joys spontaneously arises in human mind from the observation of the fresh and tender leaves of trees and plants. Moreover the very sight of new-bud flowers, whence the bees* extract honey is a scene of indescribable reflection. Independently of those, when a sunburnt man enjoys the cooling breeze of the mount Sumaeru at the foot of shady trees and when he gets his ears cheered with slow and sweet notes of the country birds, how then his mind become a pleasant home of happiness. The worldly wise men having visited the first floor, then the second and the third storied room and last of all the highest rooms covered with soft beds like beds of roses, each of which being the abode of heavenly beauties, who pass their time with such delight, as exceeds the power of description and speaking, engaged in the exercises of dancing and language of jokes and funs. The maximum happiness of Sriangana can scarcely be reckoned here in the category of happiness. Who then is so foolish as to leave this present happiness, in expectation of the one, though of the rarest order, that may follow here after? Sria said in her turn. Whatever Pria has said, My dear, is not far from truth indeed. For he who closes my way is to undergo a difficulty in the first instance, as he who has not previously mastered the lustful passions incapable of relishing the sweets of the journey I lead to. The chief thing here required of man is to conquer his passions. But man adopts duplicity of manners and becomes victim to passions and out of bad nature gets deprived of real and permanent felicity like those trees, that get denuded of blossoms and leaves by the impulse of wind and sometimes storms. Wherefore every one feels difficulty to come to the way I point at, but that great and glorious soul, who forsook the vicious out of fear of the infection of the poison of sin and who by conquering the passions associated the wise men and followed the ever happy path I conduct to, can be happy on sea, on land, in society, in solitude, in the hurry and bustle of the presidency towns, in the dead of night and in the broad day-light under all circumstances, always and at all places can enjoy the pure and unsullied satisfaction, that often and invariably attends my followers. Language can seldom afford a term to express the happiness I have described. Those who have once relished that pleasure, can safely expatiate over all the plain maize of happiness I recommend to. None else can say, what it is. The advisable thing for you now, my dear, is to compare both in the scale of your own judgement. Whatever Pria has said of happiness is mere chimerical and phantasmagorian. That transitory happiness turns afterwards a source of new misery. The description Pria gave of the flowers, which expand of course in time, but fade away immediately after. What a wide difference is there between the expansion and budding of flowers and the charming youthhood of the beauties? Judge then of the felicity of happiness as described by Pria by the dint of examples. The wise Muni having gone so far, questioned Basanta Coomar thus. Let me know! My dear. Which of these two are the safest for man to hold fast? Basanta kept himself silent for a while and then answered. The happiness Pria prescribes glows with greater lustre like common glass for a short while, but the one Sria recommends is like pearl, does not shine so dazzlingly indeed, but shines continually with unfading brightness, so man must as a gifted and superior being adopt Sria's counsel. The wise Muni having got the reply said. True it is, but the majority of people even among the learned and wise follow Pria though they pretend to show themselves in a different light, simply for the good will of the community they move into. The main purport of the latter part of this chapter is, to let us know, that people are not what they pretend to be. If all be so candid and frank, as to lay open their heart then and there a right clue can be had, whereby to decide how far the one or the other is right. Basanta Coomar thus began to grow in age, as well as in knowledge.

* Here the Europeans may vary in their opinions, respecting the bees extracting the honey from the sweet-flowers. They say, that it is not from the sweet, but from the most acrid leaves and petals, the bees extract honey.

CHAPTER IV.

My dear Children ! Basanta Coomar under the paternal roof of Saradwaj Muni made a very creditable progress in all the branches of education in general. On the other hand you have heard so far only, that Bijaya was carried away by the elephant. Let me now relate fully, what became of him afterwards and your particular attention is invited here. The matter is so intricate and nice, that in case of a slight lack of attention, the whole tissue of events may possibly be effaced from your memory. The famous city named Bijoy-nuggur, which is still in existence, was twelve miles north west of the tank square, where Bijaya was carried away by the elephant. It was the capital of Rajah Ramani Mohan. This king had neither an awful name, nor statesman like head to equal his devotional spirit and sincerity of mind.* The name of his chief and pet wife was Susila. She made herself a favorite of her lord, not so much through the charms of her body, as by her surpassing accomplishments of mind. As man is often taken up by the sweet and melodious notes of black birds, without any regard as to the beauty or deformity of her appearance, so was this wise Rajah enamoured with the inward accomplishments of his queen consort, who had all the requisite virtues, that adorn the sexes, despite every visible mark of deformity of their outward appearance. In fine she had not at all the pride common to the princess in general. She was always in the habit of undergoing voluntarily the hardest labor of dressing the food of hundred sorts daily for such a number of people, as can consume them without the least waste. Her kind attention was not confined to man only, but the poultry and even the trees and plants shared her bounty, (i.e.) she used to see them personally every day.* She used likewise to visit personally the dwelling houses of all her neighbours purposely to give alms in different ways, such as hard cash to the needy, healing balm to the sick and lectures in way of admonition to people fond of pleasures, which are ephemeral and titular. Such a benevolent as well as beneficent behaviour drew from all maternal respect for her. She was never found to idle away a second's time in useless chit chat, recreations and frivolities of society. She had spent her leisure in controversial talks of various kinds with her husband on politics and the duty of the kings and potentates towards their subjects. In fact, she was a great help to her earthly lord. She had delivered a daughter in due time. After the celebration of all the necessary rites and ceremonies, agreeably to the custom, then prevalent there, the Rajah gave her the name of Bimala* from her unspotted beauty. She began to grow daily in an uncommon ratio. Her growth may justly be compared with the billows of the seas, as the one swells furiously with the rising of the wind and storm in a slight degree, so was the growth of the other became obviously perceptible with the increase of day. When the girl reached her fifth year, her mother to implant in her the principle of modesty and to create the true spirit of prayerful habit entrusted an worthy professor for her secular and spiritual training. A revolution broke out by this time from all quarters. The Rajah's own viceroys and deputies, were influenced from an impression of his weak position to head the revolution, the flames of which at once broke-out from every side of his dominions. Here the Rajah was frightened and confounded like the elephants, when they seem in danger of being burnt by the fire, in the very same wood, that had hitherto like home sheltered them from every evil and persecution, or like the islanders, who fancy themselves above the reach of all effimies from the secure position of their residence. Instead of rising boldly to make ahead in warlike campaign, he rather thought of finding safety by flight. The Rani knowing well, that to be dis-spirited in times of danger is the sole cause of man's fall, came close to the Rajah to advise him to have patience, but at the same time to show energy and fortitude.

* Here the Europeans may differ in their opinions. They take care of animals as well as inanimate objects out of delicate taste, but the people here in Asiatic countries do so out of fear of god, for to let die or wither those things is actually to become as much guilty before him as in taking away the life of a man, or any living being. The notion of virtue is so very keen here.

* 'Be' according to our vernacular etymology signifies without, mala means dirt, the whole signifies without dirt (e.i.) spotless.

What must have made thee so timid ? Moharaj ! Said she. It is the allotted portion of man in general to enjoy and suffer alternately the happiness of the hey-day of prosperity and the misery of sense paralysing adversity. Without the troubles attending the adversity, who could have felt himself happy, by relishing the cup of prosperity ? As a boat is to man in time of crossing a river, so is courage in times of peril to get rid of its threatened consequences, so whatever comes out of his ever merciful hand, is all for our good, though we are incapable of appreciating its intrinsic value. To confirm the wise admonition of the Rani I shall cite an example from one of the illustrious poets of England. It runs thus.

“ Respecting man whatever wrong we call,
May, must be right as relative to all.”

A man of a dastardly spirit only betrays want of courage in times of peril, whilst the man of sense by the dint of perseverance and not by the satanic, but satan paralysing intrigue get the better of all the drawbacks of life, howsoever appalling may they appear in first sight. The timid people and they only get disconcerted in times of danger. But on the other hand, the heroes or persons of truly noble blood, take that as a point of glory and boldly face the danger. The jackals or the cunning foxes run with fear into the deep retreat of the wild jungle on hearing the tremendous roarings of the elephants, but the lions rather come out of their secluded retreat to engage themselves in war with delight. The Rani further observed, that kings and rulers are ever held in contempt here on earth and are regarded as sinful beings hereafter should they discover a disposition to avoid war through fear of life, or be runnagates for personal safety. If the heroes boldly confront the field and be vanquished, even there the command the respect of all on earth and will have their seats in the world to come, with those, who are honored and respected as virtuous. Therefore O most venerable and excellent sovereign ! Don't shun the war for the dear-bought safety of life. All these counsels of encouragement stirred up the dormant spirit of the Rajah at once who being thus emboldened began to make preparations for war. By royal order, the arsenals and the war implements were made clean and sharpened and the fort was filled up with armies of all classes(c.i.) infantry, horse, artillery and others, besides, it was stored up with amunitions and beasts of burden, such as elephants, horses and mules, with war chariots, carriages and carts and all other necessaries on the occasion. Rajah Romonimohun to show his wisdom on all occasions, according to the requirements of the time and the peculiar aspect of circumstances and the nature of events prudently put the chosen band of his soldiers, in defence of the fort before he marched into the expedition. The faithful Rani followed her lord with a view to encourage him with her better counsel in times of confusion and disorder. The Rajah pitched his tents in a very commanding situation in front of the enemy's forces. But his majesty solely through the prudent counsel of his wise spouse having ranged his armies in a circular row, erected a very strong and impregnable fort. The flames of war at once blazed forth with such unexampled fury that it was not easy to determine, which party would be victorious and which vanquished. Both the parties fought with uncommon valour, stratagems of war, bravery, and resoluteness. The battle rose so high, that the field itself was resounded with the terrific noise of the battle-drums and the rattling sound of the heavy and unwieldy war chariots then in use and the neighing of the horses and &c. Precisely by this time a swift arrow having unexpectedly come from the opposite party pierced the brow of the Rajah, which had thrown him head-long from the war chariot with as much violence, as a tree of the highest magnitude falls being up-rooted by the terrific force of the cycloic storm, or like elephant whose head is ruthlessly torn by the lion's claws.* The drivers instantaneously returned to the camp with the Rajah, who was then in faint, not so much with the loss of blood as with fear.

* This simile can scarcely be applied to a king, who by the very intelligence of the war, was on a look out for safety by flight, by deserting his own hereditary kingdoms and every thing else, he who was excited to take up arms by female advice, would no doubt be a coward. How could then with justice his fall be compared with the heroes of antiquated times. But of course from what we are come to learn of him from the perusal of his life and account, we could easily be prevailed upon to speak high of him, as a prince of

The radical defect of the Indian soldiers is that in case of their chief's death or his receiving a mortal wound, his troops, though superior in number and though there may be many valiant men to head them are sure to take up to their heels with broken heart and confusion. The like confusion prevailed throughout the ranks of the troops of Itajah Romonimohun. The Ranee by her uncommon powers of fortitude was able to march at the head of the rallied troops, without giving the late sad reverses of fortune to plunge her to and fro into the sea of sorrow. Her Majesty's angry, but melancholy look made every one think, that Bhogobutty* herself under a different transformation, was on her wing to destroy the giant races. The worthy Ranee in way of encouraging her men declared thus! I have lost my husband indeed, but I have not lost my sons, I have hundreds and hundreds of children alive as yet.† None of them are of a mixed blood, but all are equally bold in the field, wise and deliberate in council, fertile in forming projects to thwart the views of the opponents and capable of conducting plots, that may elude the grasp of detection by the foes. Ah! Is it at all probable, that I being the mother of a number of heroes would fall into the hands of the implacable enemies? Could my sons suffer themselves to be always in circumstances a model character. He might be compared with Numa Pompilius and other pious princes of antiquity without contradictions in respect of the pacific turn of his mind but to put him in the category of the heroes of any country would be to act the part of a mean sycophant, which raises laughter no less in him, whom we flatter, than others.

* Bhogobutty is the most beautiful and at the same time the most powerful of the Hindoo goddesses. She assumed different forms at different times to serve the end of different purposes. She was formerly worshipped in the month of Choit, but Ram Chandra to hasten the death of Raban, the monarch of Ceylon together with the total demolition of his empire worshipped her in the month of Aushir, but in every third year her worship takes place in the month of Kartir.

As for other legendary accounts of this goddess we should stop here.

† This is neither, improbable, nor the foolery of exaggeration, nor even a matter of wonder, that one should be the mother of so many children, at a period, when man lived thousand years at a minimum calculation. The Bible authority supports this assertion.

of being tortured with the sharp and never ending painful chain which binds the dependants? Is the far-famed city named Bejy-nuggur doomed now to fall after a slight struggle and lose its independency! There was a time, when Indra* himself was afraid to conquer it. Is this far-famed city now to be plundered and sacked! Am I being the mother of a number of heroes and having the leonine awe destined to pass the remainder of my life as the mistress of a cunning fox? The Rancee to fire up the sprit of her soldiers, addressed them thus! The celebrated Ram the son of Dasarath,† was alone able to deliver Sita his wife out of the hands of Raban,‡ the mighty king of Ceylon. The unconquerable Dhananjoy§ without the least assistance of one even was successfully able to snatch away Droupadi|| from the lustful grasp of a countless number of princes and Parushram¶ to revenge the

* Indra was according to the authority of the Hindoo mythology, the chief of the countless number of celestial beings. The only object of his mission on earth was to deliver humanity from the tyranny of the Doityas and other giant races. His original name was Amar Rajah (e. i.) the king of the Amar or immortal beings.

† This Dasarath was so much a factotum to his second or to the wife of his age as to banish Ram his eldest son merely to gratify her whim. In spite of her most ungenerous behaviour and in spite of uxorious Dasarath's idiosyncrasy of judgment Ram was never seen, or heard even to heave a sigh in way of murmuring. What better proofs of true magnanimity, patience under such harsh treatment and spirit of forgiveness could a Christian find in Mesiah? Christ has said it merely as a motto to turn our right cheek, when we get a slap on our left but Ram Chandra practically set the precedent

‡ He was also called Dasanan from his ten heads. He had the misfortune to carry away Sita, the wife of Ram which gave rise to a war, that ultimately ended with the demolition of his long celebrated empire. This was of course to fulfill the prophecy of the Hindoo Shashtra.

§ Dhananjoy's mother was Koontec, who by the consent of her husband Pandoo, held amorous intercourse with Indra and became pregnant and in due time delivered Dhananjoy. In golden days, it was not held criminal.

|| Droupadi was the wife of Dhananjoy. She used to bless the bed of the other four brothers of her husband alternately, according to the custom of the days of yore.

¶ Parushram was the son of a Muni, a brief-account of his career and exploits is already given above.

wrongs offered to his father by the warlike Khettry races was capable of defeating them twenty times and can't you all unitedly each of whom no less than any of those heroes save your mother-like native land ? The open and inveterate foes of your father are yet alive, without being revenged. The soldiers being thus encouraged with the bold and manly admonition of the queen-dowager, entered without any fear, but with the impetuosity of the fury of the wind into the heart of the enemy's ranks, which were ranged in a triangular form. The opposite party being now-unable to withstand the desperate forces of the Rancee fled in all directions with confusion. The victorious party persued the vanquished with the rage of a lion, when he pursues the deer. Now the very sight of the victorious flag excited all to trumpet the drum for public announcement. The soldiers and the generals, taking little rest after the toils of the field entered the camp with a countenance expressive of the modest use of success. After this, they began to bewail the loss of their late king. The queen-dowager holding the corpse of her late deceased lord in her lap began to mourn over the consequence of the late sad event. The incessant gust of tears flowed so copiously, that it bathed the whole body of the late king.

Thus after a short while, the queen to give vent to her grief, spoke thus, O dear ! Where have you gone putting me alone in such a miserable condition ? Without your sweet voice, the world seems to me a mere dark dungeon, on whatever side I cast my eyes. The sorrow, that like fire is continually burning within me, is become more sorrowful, as the fire itself is extinguishable, with whatever force may it blaze forth, whilst the fire, that rises out of sorrow to burn the human breast is beyond our power to put out though we may not add fuel to it. Get up once. Hold talk with me for a time and embrace me once more in your affectionate arms and thereby cheer my fallen heart. Whilst the Rani was addressing her lord in languages of sorrow, she being insensible, through the influence of her late misfortune began to roll on the bare ground with the corpse in her arms. Being in sense at intervals, she said thus again and again. Ah ! My lord on earth. God almighty had entrusted you with the responsibility and safety of the millions and millions of people. At a time, when you were preparing to leave your men entirely at the mercy of your enemies for your individual safety. I to prevent you from standing as a culprit in the sight of god by virtue of your high responsibility advised you to take the field and thereby made myself the author of your premature death. The thought of which like waves is dashing me on the brink of the sea of sorrow. you are become a gainer in falling a victim before the altar of Mars, but I made myself a sport of all the evil thoughts on the subject by escaping the danger of the field and surviving my earthly lord. Whilst all such agitating thoughts were working in her mind, she issued an order to prepare a pile in order to be burnt alive with her lord.* The people immediately gathered together Sandal† wood for a pile. When the faithful Rani was found resolutely bent to be burnt alive with her husband, the generalissimo to stop her, accosted thus. Madam ! The father of the empire has left us and have you intended to forsake us also. Who would then support us as the head of the state, and whom could we run for help and apply for the redress of our grievances ? For whom have we then gained the hard earned victory at the sacrifice of lots of lives. We shall necessarily be compelled after all to become the slaves of others, if you die in this way. We shall feel difficulty in its most aggravated form to bear the yokes of foreigners and strangers, as we are never accustomed to it and as the notion of freedom shall ever be fresh in our memory. If you shut your ears against our prayers, we are sure to be burnt alive here on this pile and in that case, you shall have as a moral and responsible agent to stand in the character of a wretched delinquent before the high tribunal of the 'God of Heaven and earth. The Rani not being melt even here, the general in Chief continued to observe again and again to dissuade her from her

* It was a custom from time immemorial here in India to burn alive, on the same pile with husband. It was not considered as an act of suicide, but the doer held in respect for such an act of clap-trap piety. It was called the suti rite, as none but suti or chaste women, without compulsion ever ventured to burn alive with her husband. Lord William Bentinck abolished this inhuman act, but it was not taken in the light of religious interference.

† To Burn a dead body till it becomes ashes with sandal wood was also considered as an act of piety by the Hindoos.

whimsical and self satisfying scheme, One may follow her husband in the grave without any chance of seeing each others face? Since man is destined to enjoy and suffer according to his own merits and demerits of previous life.* Besides, to accompany the husband on the pile is not the only criterion of fidelity. There are other means as well to show our affection, obedience, constancy and faithfulness. It rather subjects woman to the crime of suicide. There are hundred other ways whereby one can show in the clearest light her really unaffected affection and constancy to her husband and discharge her duty as a truly faithful and loving wife. The discharge of her tender duty without any show of affectedness is a sufficient proof of her fidelity. To act according to the dictates of conscience and religious doctrine is unquestionably far more commanding, than to sacrifice once's life ruthlessly and blindly. All such lectures in argumentative way prevailed upon the queen to alter her self-satisfying plan. After the funeral ceremony of the Rajah being over, a piece of marble stone was raised on the very spot, where His majesty fell, with the inscription of victory. After her return to the palace, she entrusted the prime minister with the whole weight of the Government. Though the whole burden of the reins of Government thus fell into the hands of the minister, the queen dowager was not entirely isolated from its concerns and cares. She used to see with her own vigilant eyes everything right in its way, This is no doubt owing to the salutary effects of liberal education, sharp intellect and deliberate judgement on all and every occasion. A woman of no education can never be expected to distinguish herself in this way and to show superior skill in the administration of a government after the discharge of all the daily functions of royalty. She having formed the true image of her husband in her mind used to offer him divine adoration with a true spirit of veneration and devotion, which in their turn had to answer the purposes of both the flowers and fragrance so much in use among the Hindoos by the time they worship and perform their religious duties in a prayerful way.† She was so entirely given up

* The Hindus believe the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls.

† The best of the Hindoo women of all classes worship the husband's feet to her husband, that she used to pray thus in a fit of prayerful delirium as to the deity. " Lord* when or after the lapse of what period would you vouchsafe to favor me with your company !† The torture of living alone on earth without the enjoyment of the conjugal pleasures is a state of life so tormenting, that no longer could I bear it." After a heart-felt prayer according to the precepts of the Hindoo religion, she was habituated to say this every now and then. " O almighty, omnipresent and omniscient being ! Thou knowest the movements of the utmost recesses of our heart, still I pray thee to grant me the favour of my husband's company after my death." A woman of such remarkable fidelity and strictly monogamistic principle can by no means condescend to give her hand to another, although Porasur† sanctions the custom of remarriage and one of the master-poets of England echoes the same opinion and says thus as follows.

" Better to wed, than to burn."

The power to retain the immaculate purity of conduct in a state of widowhood, though that subjects the sexes to the torments of continual passion, is indeed preferable to the happiness of just in the same way, as they worship their god and goddesses. They never take their meals before their husbands and gladly take the relics of their husbands, as a mark of reverence for them.

* The above means, that the queen dowager delighted so much in the discharge of the conjugal duties, that to retain the memory of her husband always fresh she used to deify him after his demise. This custom is very common here in India for a chaste wife to regard her husband in the light of the deity.

† The Hindoos besides their notion of the transmigration of souls, believe this as well, that no sooner they leave this tenement of flesh, than they according to their merits and demerits go up to the higher or lower platforms of heaven to join their husbands, fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters and cousins of all degrees, friends and acquaintances, relatives and neighbours and etcetra.

‡ This Porasur was the greatest authority of our learned and enlightened Pandit Vidyasagar who quoted very many examples to supercede the arguments of the late clever president of the Hindoo orthodox association about the incongruity and obliquity of judgement of giving a widow in marriage with a member of a different family, after the death of her first husband.

remarriage both in temporal as well as spiritual points of view. Such a modest woman must have the respect not only of man but even some superior order of beings. His Excellency the late Rajah Romoni Mohun had fostered and tendered the young of an elephant from its tender age. He was so very fond of the beast that he used to feed and wash the animal himself. Sometimes he used to roll his hand all over the body of the young elephant solely for its ease and comfort. Love is reciprocal and is sure to show every token of love in return, as is said by Dr. Young “ Love and Love alone is the loan for love.”

Love with obligation makes a bona-fide stranger our own, but malice and antipathy and a disposition to injure render our brothers and sisters worse than strangers in to-to. Even the birds and the beasts become familiar to man through the paramount force of love and affection. The Rajah treated the elephant with paternal care and the animal in return showed filial respect and veneration. The elephant was so fond of his master's company that he followed him like shadow. When this elephant grew in age, he used to stand punctually in front of the bath-room of his gracious master holding his throne embroidered with jewels and pearls upon his long projecting trunk. After the fall of the Rajah in the battle, the elephant had run with the swiftness of motion, that characterises the fawns and the deer kinds, when pursued by the fowlers and huntsmen in general*. The driver exerted his utmost to stop him, but with no success whatever, he at once had run pell-mell into the thick jungle. On his way, he saw Bijaya Chandra behind a tree. The animal out of hurry and whirl of mind on account of the sudden death of his father-like lord, took the boy to be his master alive as yet, so having placed him on his head by the help of his trunk ran straight way towards the city. The people who were then working at home followed the elephant with this belief that

* The sport of hunting is confined here in Bengal to a certain tribe called the Bathay, the lowest of the rif-raff-class in Bengal, even the commonalty take it something beneath their dignity. But in Europe, the gentries and the nobilities and even the royalty gladly engage themselves in sport like this.

Indra* himself is pleased to come upon the back of the elephant. The city women hearing this came to the public thoroughfare with great precipitancy in the same posture and attitude, lest they fail to enjoy the pleasure of such an uncommon wonder. At a time, When the prime minister was hearing the prayers of the subjects and the queen was listening all from behind the screen, the faithful elephant having to the surprise of all arrived there and placed Bijaya Chandra on the throne, (who being a right object in the right place looked as beautiful as the full moon in the cloudless-summer sky) went away directly to the state stable to mingle with all other elephants there. Those who were then present in the court were as much struck with this sight as aquatic animals suddenly start up by the ruffling noise and movements of the water. The prime-minister instantly began to fan Bijaya Chandra, who through the fear of any mishap lost then his consciousness. The menials began to pour forth water on his head and eyes. The state physicians applied healing balm for the instantaneous revival of his senses with the greatest diligence and care. Through the sovereign virtue of the efficacious remedy Bijaya without delay recovered his sense. Questions being put to after the revival of his sense a little, as to who, how and why has he been thus made the sport of fortune or fate? Bijaya having related all the incidents of the circumstances that had brought him there burst out into tears for his brother Basanta Coomar from whom he was separated a little before he was carried there by the elephant. Bijaya was then almost in a state of madness by reason of his having been given up to sense paralysing grief, besides was so weak, that the labor of the movement of a single pace occasioned swoon. Consequently he was unable to undergo the labor to enquire himself after his dear brother. In defiance of all these, the memory of his brother was so fresh and strong in him, that he could not forget him even for a minute's interval. The chief of the state immediately sent multitudes of people some on horse back and others afoot to look after

* Indra was the chief deity of the Hindoos, none can taste the pleasures of the above phraseology and several others here in this book, unless the readers have a fair knowledge of the idiom of our vernacular and more specially of the Mythological account of the countless numbers of the Hindoo deities.

Basanta Cqomar and they all took the route agreeably to the direction of Bijaya Chandra. None being able to find Basanta who was then taken away by the muni named Suradwaj were of course compelled to be back without being able to fulfill the important object of their mission. After their return, they gave every account of their tiresome journey to the head of the state in a melancholy turn of mind. Bijaya Chandra thence concluding the sure death of his brother, began to give vent of expressions and phraseologies indicative of heart-felt grief and sorrow, sobs and sighs. The Rani together with her yoke-maids and others in the seraglio hearing the sad catastrophe, began to shed tears copiously. It was a matter of such regret, that the adjacent trees and plants and the other inanimate objects seem to have assumed a mournful appearance, so as to show, that they are no less affected on the occasion than man. The chief of the state, was always engaged in the kind offices of Bijaya Chandra. The most learned of the pundits were always present to comfort him and divert his mind by their philosophical and theological lectures from the present cares and worries, which like worm canker the vital part of man and thereby hasten their end. Bijaya Chandra made himself more endeared with the increase of his familiarity with those learned lecturers of the Raj Durbour, by the dint of his uncommon powers of eloquence and the almost incredible attainments of knowledge, so they began to treat him with greater respect, than ere while, as a prodigy of genius. As the lamp gets gradually extinguished by the light of the day with the impulse of wind and air, so was the lamp of anxiety began to fade away by the increase of time. "Time is the destroyer of every thing and throws away the illusions of nature." Bijaya Chandra now forgetting his brother a little, chose the flower-gardens and the other promenade of free ventilation to prevent the failure of his health. The princess named Bimala having seen him from the Zeunanah and having been enamoured with the spotless beauty of the physical system of Bijaya and the charms of his mental constitution, without any stain of affectedness was exceedingly desirous to marry him, but out of bashful habit common to the woman-kind in general, she was hitherto incapable of venturing out her secrets. The wise Rani of a singularly penetrating understanding was able to catch easily, the inward workings of her daughter by the outward gestures and movements of her body. She had a mind also to marry her daughter with Bijaya from the very day she saw him ; but she prudently deferred the matter with a view to have patience or time to know how far the young couple are taken up with each other's accomplishments of mind as well as of body for without mutual likings and attachment the happiest result of marriage can very seldom be expected. The friends, relatives and neighbours were all now invited to be unitedly assembled to solemnise the ceremony. The invited parties were all present on the appointed day. The maids showed no lack of skill to embellish the girl with the garlands of flowers and other things which heightened the spotless beauty of the bride-groom so highly, that it benumbed the sense of the bride like the talismanic powers of the Arabian night. After the arrival of the bride and the bride-groom on the appointed place, at the appointed hour of the day, the priests of both the parties repeated the respective duties of both the bride and the bridegroom. The Rani yielded up her daughter to Bijaya Chandra to be his wife, after the religious bindings of both the males and the females. Those that were then present there declared with oneness of mind, that God makes jewels attract other jewels.* The ceremony being thus over, the bride and the bride-groom entered the basur room.† The night was thus spent in unusual mirth and merriment. The women had used their license so innocently, that Bijaya Chandra was perfectly pleased. Thus seemed the happy night to have passed much earlier than usually. In this manner, the marriage and the attendant ceremonies being over, the queen with the full consent of all the people made Bijaya the reigning sovereign. After his coronation, he managed the political diplomacy with unremitted assiduity and care. In his reign, the flames of war were at once put out, which enabled him to devote his time solely to the good and happiness of his subjects. Throughout his dominions, where the people suffered for want of water, he dug there ponds and made reservoirs. He made the roads free from the fear of the highway robbers. The educational, medical and religious institutions and charitable fund establishments were erected by his order, besides arts were introduced from his time into the criminal jails. He used to visit the jails personally in order to inculcate in the minds of the prisoners the principles of the tenets of true religion. The fair and spotless Bimala, the reigning queen gladly participated in the rational labor of her lord. As the tradition is current to the effect, that by the touch of the sparsamani* the iron gets metamorphosed into gold, so precisely in the same way, the wicked and the vicious were prevailed upon to give up their deep rooted sinful habit at once by the religious lectures of the reigning sovereigns. By virtue of their united labor, the number of the prisoners began to fall day by day, and the prison room gradually became empty. The joint labor of both the king and the queen solely for the temporal, as well as the spiritual welfare of their people induced them to offer divine adoration to both the sovereigns. Thus Bijaya being always in company with his learned-wife was able to pass his time pleasantly, sometimes in gossip respecting the manners of mankind of different countries, sometimes indulged in conversation on the utility of the science of geography, and sometimes discussed on the importance of astrological science and sometimes on the usefulness of the science of geometry and at others of the comparative merits and demerits of the lessons on things and last of all used to sing hallelujahs unto him, who sitteth upon the throne of the universe. The chief object of the talks of various kinds, on different subjects of abstruse science is to show, that none, but the educated can know the vanity of enjoyment that arises from the gratification of lower appetites compared with the durable happiness springs from those mentioned above. One day when Bijaya was observing the beauty of the natural scenery, Bimala the queen being very near to him gave out the following in a sweet and melodious tone. Ah Dear ! I am very curious to see the natural beauty of the beasts of the forests and the fowls of the weather.

† The Basur room is a certain room in the house of every respectable native, where the bride and the bridegroom pass the whole night they are married with Platonic love with the females of the relatives and neighbours, who join irrespective of caste distinction, but after the dawn of day, they run away and never come before the bride again, but in case of absolute need, they cause the veil to hang over their face, before they appear in sight but even now they don't speak, but whatever they are to do, they do by guess and gestures like the dumb men. or like the trained domestics, as dogs and monkeys and so on.

If you condescend to accede to my prayers, I may then most likely accomplish my long cherished design by staying a few days with you there in the pleasant haunt of my father, named Chittatose* Bijaya readily complied with the humble requests of his dear and obedient wife. At the dawn of the next day, he together with his dear, in company of a few selected companions set out for the desired end. When Bijaya Chandra was driving his chariot, through a country named Bltheah the inhabitants of the jungle including the birds and the beasts seemed to have come out of natural impression to worship him as a superior order of being. Here Bimala, the queen pointed her fingers towards him and spoke thus in a jocular epigrammatic sort of countenance. See ! My dear See ! The flower trees knowing your arrival are come to pay you the tribute of honor with the scent of their new bud flowers. The peacocks and the peahens are dancing with their expanded plumes and thereby giving mute proofs of their reverence for your Majesty. The stags with their sharp and active look seem to have gazing to offer something in the shape of present, so I pray your Majesty for them all to condescend to accept and comfort them. Bijaya Chandra answered with a smile ! None of them are (as you said just now) faithful and loyal, but all are rogues and scoundrels. As for the validity of my guess see for instance, the pomegranate has taken away the sweets of your rising breath, the she fawn has deprived you of the gracefulness of the eyes of the woman kind, the pea-hen† has robbed your sex the beauty of your dress and the elephant the handsome gait of your motion and thereby disappointed me the pleasures of so many enjoyments unitedly. without their unnecessary interference I could have relished alone the sweets of hundred kinds of enjoyments without envy or even competition. Bimala in her turn answered also in smiling countenance. That's the reason; my dear. I often and always apply the term "Dear exclusively to you only. With all these reciprocal exchange of conjugal love, and jokes, they entered the pleasure haunt. Thus was Bijaya Chandra able to pass his time happily, by observing daily the fresher and fresher kinds of delight. But in the midst of all these enjoyments, one day at noon, all on a sudden, his mind being disordered, he felt himself quite uneasy. When his associates were thus trying to get the clue of such an unexpected change, sleep imperceptibly stole upon his eyes and he felt a sort of unconsciousness for the time being. Here his spouse-consort seeing the apparently meaningless event forthwith placed him in her arms and did every office, as becomes a loving and chaste wife in sanguine hopes of his quick recovery. By degrees, the night approached. The diurnal beings all slept, but the nocturnal with loud and tremendous noise came out of their dens and caves to prowl and roam for food. The whole earth was resounded with the shrill noise of the worms and the firmament was fraught with a countless number of stars, that seemed to have been arranged in as regular a manner, as flowers in a garland. Gradually the darkness made way for day-light. In the dead stillness of the night, Bijaya Chandra dreamt, that Basanta Coomar is suffering much from thirst, so he started up. As every natural object extends through the warmth of heat, so the memory of the past event in like manner melted and diluted the heart of Bijaya Chandra, who forthwith jumped upon the bare ground and turning his face towards the direction, where his brother was left alone, he repeated these pitiable words to give vent of his grief. Ah Basanta! Dear Basanta! On the other hand Bimala, his wife observing the seemingly meaningless occurrence was at first taken by surprise and having got no answer of her questions as to the cause of the matter she at last followed him.

The servants of both the sexes, as well as the animals fell then fast asleep, consequently could not know anything of the sudden occurrence. The dear and faithful Bimala was so deeply engaged in the discharge of the kind offices of her husband, that she scarcely even thought of awaking them for help. Bijaya had entered into the depth of the wood. His wife followed him even there like shadow. Man is naturally strong and robust, but the sex delicate, so blood began to flow from her feet from the tiresome journey through a path of stones and pebbles, necessarily being unable to keep pace with her husband, was compelled to be lagged behind. During this interval Bijaya Chandra having taken a circuitous path was separated and disappeared. The good and excellent Bimala, having lost the sight of her husband, called him constantly with a loud, but welcome tone and at the same time tried to walk faster and faster. The pain of the lost husband having in a manner superseded the pain of a long and tiresome journey tears began to gush out copiously from her eyes, the lustre of which resembled the brightness of the deer kind. However she in this way arrived at the face of a three sided road. The night seemed to have departed purposely to show her the right way. By the impulse of the slow and cold wind, the night dews having fallen upon the leaves of the trees insinuated into our minds the idea, that the inanimate objects being moved with compassion for Bimala pouring abundantly copious drops of water from their eyes. The morning gale plainly appeared to have whispered the sylvan inhabitants, that were then slumbering, to awake, arise, support and help the pious Bimala, who having stood on the face of a certain triangular road, began to think of the side her husband took, so she stood there motionless like the female elephant in the absence of her male. In this attitude, she almost in a fit of sudden derangement of the brain, the necessary consequence of the anxieties of mind occasioned from a sad combination of several adverse circumstances, specially the separation of her husband at such an awful crisis, accosted thus in a fresh paroxysm of madness. O sylvan gods and goddesses, beasts and trees and the inanimate objects and the supernatural agents condescend to point me out of favor the path my husband took. Her husband having trodden the grassy path made a visible mark of his foot print. Notwithstanding which Bimala being disconcerted with the continual reverse of fortune cast her eyes upon the foot print of her husband but not being able to judge aright she took the contrary way, so she had no more chance of finding her husband. At last the noon arrived, when being overtaken with fear and sorrow, she thought of offering her prayer, as the last and the only source of consolations under all such heavy misfortune in a devotional tenor of mind. O Lord ! almighty ! Thou art present on sea and land and air. Thou fillest up all spaces but we out of frailty could'nt see thee any where. Thine merciful hand is upon the head of my husband even here in this terrible, lone and solitary retreat and saving me from all harm, both conceivable, as well as inconceivable still I pray thee, O Lord ! to distance all danger from my husband and let no stain come upon the page of my chastity. Thus on she went forward with prayer. At length, seeing a temple richly adorned with jewels entered there with hopes of finding human face, but was sadly disappointed there as well. She now sat and offered her prayer again and again with more and more enthusiastic feeling ! On the other hand, those who went on with them to the pleasure haunt of Bimala's father, not seeing any of them the next morning were quite astonished. However after a little reflection on the subject, some went to the city and others tried to make every possible enquiry as to the nature of such an wonderful elopement. Dear readers I call your particular attention here, as I shall begin again the story of Basanta Coomar.

CHAPTER V.

One day, when Saradwaja Muni sitting on a costly cushion, was expatiating on the sovereign virtue of the law of chastity, before the females of the neighbouring saintly Brahmins Kumar and the other children of the adjacent Munis and Rishis in order to gladden their hearts with the instructive, as well as entertaining precepts of the wise lecturer, which flowed like honey from his lips, sat around him like Brihaspati† around the constellations of the seven moons. Unexpectedly there came the young of a deer that made reiterated attempts to snatch the ivy from the trunk of a large mango tree around which, it was laid so close and fast, that the deer could not succeed in its efforts to get it away from the body of the mango tree. Having observed this, Brahmata Kumar spoke thus to his yoke-fellows. Look sharp there! My dear friends. By the cogeny of our Rev. Guru's precepts, even the ivy is come to set value on the usefulness of the virtue of chastity. The ivy evidently seems to have hung round the large tree against the renewed efforts of the young deer in the manner a chaste woman does against the temptations of a man of dissolutive character. The more a woman tries with fresher and fresher allurements the more she gives of greater proofs of her fidelity and unyielded integrity. Every new attempt on the part of the besiegers gives new strength to the besieged for resistance. The Muni hearing this, ordered Brahmata in a smiling countenance to keep the deer at some distance otherwise it would tease the ivy* again. There came an ambassador from Anandamaya the king of the city named Anandanagar to the Muni, the dust of whose feet he took first in tokens of respect and then delivered a letter just at the time Basanta was going to tie up the deer at a little distance. He read it instantly with attention and spoke to Basanta in tones, indicative of heart-felt joy. My dear child, His Excellency, the Moharajah invited my attention for consultation on some particular affairs. I am bound by his obliging manners consequently I shall have to set out with as much haste as a father does when he hears of any misfortune, that has befallen his son. I shall have to start by the dawn of the next morning. The capital city named Anandanagar was the ornamental town throughout the empire of the king Ananda Maya. If you like to see this wonderful city, you may bear me a company. Having said this, the Muni after his evening prayer, proceeded to the river side. A little after the ever resting hour, the night approached in the same way, as calm after a storm. Basanta was indeed born a prince, but being bred up from his very infancy in the house of a Muni was necessarily an alien to the manners and customs of society. Now having gone to his bed, he fell fast asleep with many thoughts, in respect of the mode of the city-people, their scope, principles and the plan of Moharajah's life. At the dawn of the day, Basanta, with curiosity, common to the travellers, came to the Muni for permission before he went away with joy to see the city. Precisely at the time of his starting for the city, his eye-brows were alternately risen and fallen in the manner of dancing. Having observed this favorable omen of marriage, he thought within himself, that it looks impossible indeed, that an ivy in a garden should surround a large tree situated in a dwelling house, but nothing is impossible from the fiat of the Almighty. He can make impossibility pass as possibility, without appearing in the least as impossible. Having reached the metropolis, he cast a fixed gaze on both sides of the public thoroughfare. The magnificent houses of the rich capitalists and other wealthy gentlemen and nobility, sacred, useful, and beautiful, for the benefit of the generation, and the world, to be compared to any other city of the previous times, such as the, Anandamaya, Anand, Anand, Anand, Anand, Anand, hospitals, charity fund, erections of fort and ramparts and religious institutions for the performance of the sacred duties actually make the city stand in the light of an ornament to the whole world. There the women are remarkably modest and bashful, chaste, and dutiful. There the water and the air are both congenial to health. There the lands are exceedingly fertile and yield both flowers, as well as fruits of very many kinds. Basanta Kumar observing the uncommon blessings the people enjoy there in all and every respect made this reflection, that the city is all along known by the proud name of Anandanagar. Such a high sounded name is justly applied and it justly deserves. Cities of acknowledged superiority and beauty like it are beyond all controversy very rare indeed. Saradwaj Muni after having arrived at the court of Anandamaya and having seen the palm of his right arm poured blessings upon Narada Neth, the reigning potentate just in similar way Basista Muni did to Ram Chander when he had become an incarnate on earth. The Rajah in his turn, having turned around the Muni agreed to to the custom of the east offered him a cushion to sit with joy and delight, no less than what a man of retired habits, when he unexpectedly sees a long absent friend. The Reverend Muni sat on the same cushion with Basanta. The Rajah first of all asked about the health of all the brother Muni. The Muni after a slight reply put the same question to the Rajah and got the satisfactory answer in return. Then the Rajah having seen Basanta in company to sit on the same cushion with the Muni took him to his most favourite disciple, and the son of a most venerable

According to our vernacular etymology the term Anand, signifies joy and happiness, and the city where joy and happiness dwell. Spring always reigns saint, so he didn't put him any question at all. However the healthy and robust make of the boy's constitutional frame his longmanous arms, his wide and well-defined fore-head, his large and somewhat red spotted eyes, his undaunted courage and commanding look, his simple and unaffected manners, attended with gravity, his uncommon powers of eloquence and accurate pronunciation made the Rajah conclude, that he must have descended from Khetry* race. Whilst he was labouring under a vain delusion, he saw the boy capapie. As the experienced navigator could know the approach of rain, thunder and lightning from the natural aspect of the firmament, so was the Muni able to discover the inward workings of our Rajah from his constant steady gaze upon Basanta Kumar. The Muni had no mind to give a genealogical account of the boy. To prevent the Rajah from asking all these inquisitive questions, he first questioned him about the cause of such a sudden call, so as to divert his attention. The Rajah answered, Reverend Sire! My daughter is arrived at marriageable state of life. It was my long cherished design to yield her up to a fit person, but the chief minister finding fault with me there in that respect discouraged me in a manner. Consequently whether the girl should have her own independent judgment to follow, or should depend upon the choice of the parent is a matter of question not as yet clearly determined. You are therefore called upon and whatever opinion you will be pleased to pass is to be considered the decisively best. The Muni said, that whatever objection the prime-minister has raised is not altogether inconsistent with the principles of our reasoning faculty. As in most cases the course, the guardians adopt, instead of yielding an iota of that case, they naturally expect, rather becomes a source of continual discontent and sometimes discord also. It has been obviously seen almost always, that the parents and guardians following the path of the shrewed and cunning lawgivers give up their daughters in marriage to persons, whom they thought the fittest, before their daughters come up to the age of maturity and before they get their faculty of judgment fully developed. The guardians expect neither any reward, nor even a thank, if the contract eventually be productive of wholesome consequences on the part of both the bride and bridegroom, but in case, through the combination of some or other adverse circumstances, they can't agree with each other, as befits well on their part, then to what endless misery they suffer is beyond our power to dwell at large. The sufferers themselves are the standing proofs of the matter. It has been written by the religionists, that as long the daughters reach not maturity, so long they are incapable of knowing how to serve their husbands rightly and how far they ought to sacrifice their own ease and comfort for the happiness and well-being of their husbands, the wise parents must defer the marriage. If the girls have arrived the age of puberty, so as to know well the happiness of marriage life and if they be educated, then and there they must hold the same privilege with the boasted Damayanti and Sābitri and other princesses of note in Hindoo mythology and legendary tales in respect of choosing their own husbands and this mode assuredly stands in the ascendancy. This mode is not only better and preferable, but is undecidedly the best and the most advisable one. On the other hand, though you may after a fair trial and careful examination of his descent, tenor of conduct, regularity of manners and &c. yield up your daughter, it may not fail still to be attended with pernicious effects hereafter. It has been found often and often among several respectable families, that to marry their girls according to the choice of their parents is to subject them to innumerable difficulties. For instance, sometimes the husbands don't heartily esteem their wives and sometimes the wives don't like and love their husbands and this begets various kinds of mischiefs that do not only hurt the parties, but sap the very foundation of the society. Therefore the best course and the most reasonable one is, Moharaj to allow them to have their own way. The Rajah said, that whatever you said on the subject-matter is quite reasonable and I must follow it. But I further pray you to stop here till the ceremony is over and the compliance here would highly oblige me. The Muni observed, that such an obliging and conciliatory manner could without difficulty extort compliance even from the most hard hearted and obdurate. After this Rajah allowed a free quarter to the Muni. Immediately after the departure of the Muni with Basanta thence to the appointed lodging, the Rajah said to the prime-minister to fix an auspicious day and then to send letters of invitation to the continental kings and learned prelates through Bhauts,* and to engage engineers of unquestionable skill and repute, but at the sametime extensive practice to erect at a little distance from the fort splendid halls and rooms to accommodate the outsiders and others. The prime-minister began to make every necessary preparation in accordance to the royal order. The garden appointed for the abode of Saradwaja Muni was adjacent to the Zenuanah on the north side. It was surrounded on all sides with brick walls. There was an entrance on the east of it and in the middle, there was a large tank. There stood a very handsome two storied building in the centre of the tank which bespeaks the wonderful skill of the artist of the highest repute and on account of its delightful and commanding sight, it looks like the mine of all sorts of pleasures. The situation of the building being in the middle of the tank made it at first view look as beautiful as the painted pinnacle in a large glass frame. Or the beauty observable from the reflection of the building beneath the clear water equals the beauty of the cloudless sky fraught with the wreaths of the countless twinkling stars above. The Rajah after visiting the place, that was assigned for the temporary abode of the venerable Saradwaja used sometimes to pass his time in company with the ladies of his seraglio on talks of various kinds concerning the political affairs such as to the advisability or non-advisability of introducing one law and annulling another and at others about the amelioration of the moral nature and the religious sentiments of his subjects, so as to make them happy both for time and eternity. Occasionally the Rev. Muni used to lecture the ladies on the subject of virtue under various heads and different forms, specially on the important results and the sterling merits of the vow of chastity. This garden was chiefly intended for the purpose of serious consultation on private matters. On the south of this garden, there was a private entrance, through which the pardah women used to come for the purpose of beguiling their leisure, in fairs and frolics of every kind, but always of innocent nature of course.

None else were allowed to visit it without the consent and authority of the Rajah. The surface of the land on all sides of the tank being surrounded with red, blue, green, and the variety of all other beautiful colors of flowers and the trees of most excellent fruits having been planted at the expense of the highest skill of the gardeners and the rectified choice of the persons of enviable taste heightened the beauty of the beautiful scene. Basanta being present there with the Revd. Muni was astonished beyond description in observing the beauty of the scenery occasioned by the erection of the building in the centre of the pond and the plantation of the flower and the fruit trees in wonderfully good order. The Rev. Muni commenced a particular detail of every thing done there and thus passed a few days. Once Sucoomari the daughter of the Rajah Anuudomoy whilst sleeping with her two companions, dreamt a strange dream. She started and got up and awakened Chandrima her associate and communicated thus. My dear! Whatever wonderful events were seen in a fit of dream are at once vanished out of my sight, as suddenly as the bubbles on the surface of the water. Chandrima in a similar fit of wonder answered. My dear Sucoomari! what strange dream is that? If it be not of a private nature, or if there be no objection on your part, please condescend to satisfy my curiosity in its relation. Sucoomari answered. My dear! She who hesitates to lay open her heart to her associate is as much incapable of relishing the unspeakable sweets of the pleasures of friendship, as one, who out of vaunt says, that she knows all the attributes of the almighty, without knowing at all what God is! Did I ever hide anything from you? Chandrima said. No far from it. But there is a tradition among the sexes to the effect, that the relation of what happens course of a dream now and then attends with ill consequences on the part of the relator, that's the reason I dared not request and insist upon you notwithstanding our intimacy. Sukumari added. It is all a foolishness to believe all such hurly-burly of the undomestic woman. Pray pay your best attention and I shall fully relate of every thing what occurred in my dream, without the exclusion of an iota of the fact. Therefore be good enough to hear the story of my late dream. During the interval of sleeping hours I thought myself that I went to the garden in company with you all and you seemed to have sat at the foot of a Madhobilotha* for rest and I went alone to the tank, where I saw a man of superhuman beauty. On a sudden view, he might be taken to be Modan† himself walking in pursuit of a new object for his ever warm embrace. The exquisite beauty of his person specially the gracefulness of his eyes were sufficient inducements to make me go close to him. He also came forward and politely questioned me thus, "Who are you? O beautiful maid! and what must have called you here." Instead of a ready answer I with the bending posture of my head and a look of bashfulness, that characterises the females began to drive away the ground by the pressure of the toe of my left leg. He assumed then a somewhat melancholy look, when he saw me reluctant and not prompt enough to return a verbal reply. But after a pause of some minute's time only, he said again "My dear! Your face is known to me." Hearing this, as I was desirous to ask him something in return, when he was relating without the exception of all the previous occurrences I suddenly awoke. To my amazement, my dear; I couldn't see any more that paragon of beauty, neither could I say, where, how and why is he so abruptly vanished out of my sight. Be you the eye-witness that in his absence drops of waters are like stream flowing from my eyes. What a wonder is that; that my mind involuntarily tends towards him without previous acquaintance. It must be the play of nature. Chandrima spoke now in a little rebuking tone. It is not (as you vainly imagine) the play of nature; but the result of mad thoughts, which you shouldn't indulge at all. Shame to you. Don't you know that dream is ever false and is ever far from being realised? What stain may not possibly blacken your moral conduct if such hurly-burly were to come to the notice of the critical portion of the public? Just cease to think on that subject. Wooma answered. My dear Chandrima! Could you catch the latent and chief view of Sukumari's dream? Chandrima said no. She didn't understand the depth of the dream. Let her learn from you the real meaning of it. Then said Wooma, that Sukumari always thinks of a most beautiful bridegroom, necessarily, the thought of the day becomes the employment of the mind in the night. Sukumari observed again. Dear Wooma. You always think of a new bridegroom in your awakened state in day. Why do you fear then of groundless consequence of blemishes upon your character, when dream itself is false? Dream is not true indeed; but through the combination of some supernatural agency something quite impracticable in nature may become a possible fact. Why should I then like women of no character frequent him!" Shame to me. Had it been compulsory, even there I should'n't have done that, when I hold the privilege of following the independent verdict of my own judgment in respect of marrying any one I like without making myself little in the eyes of the world and falling before religion. Chandrima spoke in her turn. My language is free from all those joints and knots, though you strongly, if not reasonably suspect me there. But mind, we are women have many more imperfections, independently of the frailty common to the nature of mankind. The consequence of our doings often and invariably becomes contrary, therefore it behooves us to judge aright of the anticipated results, ere we undertake a task. See for instance, those women who have not received the blessings of education are easily able to maintain the vow of chastity, more specially, we have acquired knowledge by which we are enabled to judge of the advisability of following the one and the non-advisability of avoiding the other. So if we do wrong, then the education to the sex would altogether be considered as quite useless. It would then be an impression in many, that more a woman is educated, the more she becomes worse in moral point of view. There are several countries yet, where the people are generally of opinion that to educate the females is to act contrary to the dictates of the reasoning faculty, but this betrays only the want of judgment on their part. The woman, who is resolute enough can easily maintain chastity. Or otherwise, if we let them remain in a state of ignorance, they not only become coquets, but also become the inlets of mischiefs in several other ways. Wooma said. My dear ! 'What are you lecturing about to Sukumari ? It is as impossible to please a blind man with the exercise of dancing, or to please a dumb one with hymns, that can take up even the supreme deity, as it is to lead those in the right way, who are continually on a fresh look-out for opportunity to commit new wrongs in a new form merely to gratify their lustful appetites. Chandima spoke. My dear Sukumari ! Don't give heed to that foolish talk of that infatuated fool. But hear now, what has our Guru* said in way of fables concerning the secret workings and plays in the minds of the educated as well as the uneducated masses of women. The mind of the latter like night in the Zenith of her dark domain is ever wrapped up in utter darkness whilst that of the former like the clear sky is always shining transcendently with the refulgent splendour of the day itself. The one out of impressions arising from stolid ignorance, subjects in each step to innumerable kinds of groundless fears, such as the fear of ghosts and apparitions and &c. Whereas the other laughs and slights all these, as something quite impracticable in nature. The uneducated woman is often a prey to temptations, however distant may they be. Many to serve their wicked designs raise the fear of the ghosts and several other invisible beings in their minds and thereby mislead them, † in case they see them withstand the irresistible temptations. On the other hand some under pretence of religious lectures prevail upon them to plunge head-long into such vices as shaming humanity. The educated woman is above the sensations of all fear, save and except the fear of the one almighty, Omniscient and Omnipresent God. So those vicious people, who are ever the slaves of lustful tendency can never succeed in their abominable thoughts and deeds, by raising in them the fear, either of death, or punishment. Neither could they allure them to accede to their base desires by the temptations of the worldly possessions, nor by wrong lectures of false religion or wrong interpretations of even the religion of the scriptures. Had Sita, the wife of Ram Abotar* been uneducated could she then have retained her habitual firmness and constancy, or could have defied the death like fear of punishment of Raban† the most implacable foe of her husband? Those who have read the lives and memoirs of Damayanti and Sabitri are come to learn very well how far are the educated portion of the females morally courageous. The uneducated women out of blind affection and want of common sense do not forbid, their children to run pell-moll into such vices which might cause them to die both for time and eternity. So those children out of wrong impression of wrong notions of religion commit very many misdeeds, which set in defiance the moral precepts themselves to eradicate those impressions hereafter. As a piece of cloth is never found to be wholly wiped off of the mark of the ink so in like manner the fault arises out of a desire of maternal imitation cannot at once be removed by the diligent tuition of an assiduous teacher, though he but the woman do not comply, (as our author asserts) out of ignorance, but out of the frailty of their sex. To support my judgment on this head I would cite Læretia's case, who was not only educated, but an accomplished one in all and every respect.

* Madhobilotha is a creeping plant. It spontaneously grows here every where in the rainy season. It bears red flowers.

* Guru means spiritual guide. They stand on the same rank here in India, as clergy-men in the continent of Europe. The offices of both are alike.

* Abotar means incarnate.

† This, Raban was the mighty king of an island named Ceylon, in the south of Hindoostan. may adopt hundreds and hundreds of methods and though he may apply them in a variety of forms to serve the end.* As the vital air, which is indispensibly essential for the continuance of our lives becomes obnoxious, when it gets contaminated and thereby shortens our lives ; so in similar manner, the mother by reason of her blind affection, through the efficacy of her unfounded zeal, becomes the enemy of her children. The former only injures the constitutional health of man, the latter affects our very immortal souls. The instructions of the educated matrons become the seeds, whence spring up the trees of morality and virtue. The précept of the tutors in after life does the same office to the instructions of the mother in preceeding life, what water does to the trees. Chandrima hearing these argumentations spoke thus to Wooma. My dear ! Cease to say, that the uneducated women abandon themselves in vices and follies, which the educated wisely elude. Every one of those irrespective of any considerations of the educated and the uneducated portion of the females is to sink deeper and deeper into vices, who having come to believe the existence of one true god, keeps no fear of the future state of rewards and punishments. As the sharpened weapon is more to be dreaded by those, against whom it is intended to be raised than the blunted one, so is the vicious among the educated more a tremendous set of beings, than the vicious among the ignorant class. God is not so merciful to the educated sinners, as he is to the uneducated sinners. How far is it true may easily be known to every one, though he may not be a man of deep penetration and rare judgment. Happy is she, who never trod the path of vice, but happier is she and double credit must be her's be she ignorant or educated, who once being tempted to smell the enchanted fragrance of vice, has returned to the holy, but not showy shrine of virtue, as a true worshipper of God. My dear Wooma ! Said Chandrima. I dont gain say the validity of your arguments here in this point, but remember, that the educated set are not so easily allured to vices, as the uneducated masses. In fact, as the major portion of the one is more in everything, that is excellent and noble, so is the majority of the other more in every thing, that is mean and debasing. But the reason, that the public find the greater number of the miscreants among the educated, is simply this, that the very smallest mark on a sheet of a white cloth looks more refulgent and bigger than its real size. Let me to confirm my opinion on the point in question illustrate one instance from a very witty poet of England.

* The author seems to have been highly prepossessed in behalf of female education, without remembering, that a woman with all her accomplishments, is like a dog, walking by the hinder legs. This is Dr. Johnson's opinion.

"In beauty faults conspicuous grow,

The smallest speck is seen on snow"

The ill opinion of the public is taken as a mark of indelible infamy by men of cultivated understanding, where, as the raw ignorant take that in the light of glory on their part. They are shameless to such a ludicrous extent, that "Shame itself is ashamed to sit upon their brow." Chandima having said to Wooma, addressed to Sukumari. Whatever I spoke on this head, I spoke only of the uneducated females, but now your particular attention is called on to the uneducated males, who out of stolid ignorance and out of the highest regard to the caste distinction seriously object the Zennanah education, which clearly drags into light the mean spirit of their nature. If a young man of liberal views raise a talk on the subject of female education, they are sure to hoot after him and get themselves exasperated to a diabolical extent and each hint, in behalf of the female enlightenment, serves to provoke them as much as a drop of oil kindles and inflames the furnace of fire. To give vent to their passion they pronounce the name of their deities such as Ram and Radhamadhuh* respectively. They also shut their ears against such a proposal with the palm of their hands. Some of them utter some other similar phraseologies with an air of contempt towards the rising generation and of those the following one I repeat is more ridiculous and make them become the laughing stock even of their own begotten children in spite of their highest reverence for their fathers and superiors and in defiance of their enlightened acquisition of knowledge. In the first place, they heave a sigh, which is habitual to the conservatives of Bengal before they speak and before they close together their lips. They pronounce this indistinctly, so as to put their tongues in right order, and what they often say is this, Ah ! What more shall we see in progress of time. This being only the beginning of Kaliyug.* In the second place. They maintain that nothing better is to result from the education of the females, than a laughing change. That the females would frequent the court and all other public places to consult the good of the state whilst the males put on the costumes of the females, in order to be cooped within the narrow bounds of their dwelling houses, to dress the rice, dhal and curries and also to sweep the compounds. All such reasonable opponents of female education are quite ignorant of the effects of education. They are out of unfounded impression led to believe, that the definite object of the acquisition of knowledge is to serve the will of others, so as to be able to maintain themselves and their families. Those who acquire learning without knowing the chief end of it and at the same time have the ambition to pass by the name of the learned, may without blame be styled a sort of four legged bookful block-heads. Knowledge is beyond all price. None can out of malice and rancour rob us the smallest jot of it. A man is invulnerable against the assaults of enemies and can withstand every shock by the dint of education alone. Man is capable of judging what is right and what is wrong by the cogency of his learning, and can seek his own, as well as other's real and durable interest through it. Besides he can comprehend also the nature of divine arrangements and thereby can

* The orthodox Hindoos pronounce the names of those two incarnates, when they hear billingsgate or any indecorous language. They also shut their ears against those abominable expressions, with a view to get rid of a vicious stain on their spotless minds. This is no doubt praiseworthy, (if they do not carry it to a ludicrous extent out of prejudice or ignorance,) as it shows their fear of vice to the highest pitch. Radhamadhuh being one of the countless names of Kristo Abotar.

* The Kali yug or the dark age is the last of the four epochs, into which the world is divided. According to the religious authority of the Hindoos, there was no sin in the Satay yug or the age of truth, or golden age but it entered on the world with Dwaper yug, or the second epoch and began to grow in strength in the Treta yug and at length became most powerful in Kali yug, or the fourth epoch, or the age of sin. The Hindoos say, that this age would end with the annihilation of the world.

enjoy the physical and mental ease. The heart of such a man glows with gratitude towards the maker of the universe, but the fools being unable to penetrate into the depth of the object of learning often and always follow the contrary views. In the midst of all such rational dialogues, the night past. The sun having appeared in the east, the darkness, that had hitherto overhung the earth began to be dispelled. The crows now rose up, as in a state of hurry and whirl with their natural sound. Basanta Kumar, after having done with his morning prayer began to walk at random in the flower garden. By this time, Sukumari in company with her comrades came to the foot of a large banyan tree to pluck the flowers. Chandima seeing Basanta from a little way off spoke to Sukumari with her fingers towards Basanta. See? My dear; Your dream may most likely be realised. It appeared on their first interview, they loved each other so highly, that each seemed to be the idol of the eyes of the other. But in consequence of their mutual interview within the space of a short interval, their real intention was not fulfilled. Now the real picture of everything, that occurred in her dream, seemed to have obtained the possession of her bosom. Sukumari being unable to have patience longer, began to follow Basanta closer and closer with the sole intent to ask him of his parentage and other particulars. Wooma touching Sukumari with her fingers spoke as follows: Ah? Princess—What must have at once obliterated from your memory your own exemplary and inimitable virtue? Sukumari out of shame blushed her head, but being unable to follow him returned home with thoughts only of that graceful person. The disappearance of Sukumari like the separation of our constant object of love made Basanta melancholy, who spoke thus within himself. Why is it, that a mere sight of this lady subjected me to such painful thoughts, as are the allotted portion of those females, who are destined to suffer the pangs of perpetual widowhood? This must be the offspring of a crazed imagination. Sukumari having called her associates to the dancing hall spoke thus. Dear Chandima! Dream in spite of its ever-deluding nature may occasionally assume the form of reality, but the attendant results are so utterly false and tantalising so often, that I am curious to learn what they really are. My dear Sukumari, said Wooma. The rising sun dispels darkness, the expansion of the flowers carries away the scent and the fragrance, for that delay is not required. Although this indirect answer silenced Sukumari for a while of course, but the memory of Basanta ever shone afresh in her mind. When, how and where to see the object of her dream became the theme of her night dream and day vision? She was so entirely given up to this thought, that it made her get emaciated. Day by day her health began to decline and she became exceedingly weak. Chudrini having observed the inward movements of Sukumari and perceptible changes in her physical constitution addressed to Wooma. My dear! Our Sukumari is day by day getting emaciated and disfigured with the constant thought of having a husband worthy of her embraces. See for example, she does not mingle with us now as formerly, rather she gets disturbed, if we seek of our own accord her company. Let us try to find the true cause of it. What does she always think of in an almost forgetful and indifferent state of mind? With this intent, they both having proceeded to her, began to see and hear from a little distance what is passing on with her. They saw from behind, that Sukumari with a book in her hand was speaking thus within herself. The nature of the one to ensnare another is the play of the creation, whereas I am the author of my own ill luck.

“We suffer more from folly than fate.”

A little after again, she was heard speak thus to another. You are curiously eager to see the picture of the pious Rajah named NARA of whom you have heard from the swan,* but the beauty of Basanta struck me to such an extent, that I feel myself quite uneasy in his absence although I saw him once only by my own eyes. Whatever difference there might be between you and me regarding our birth. I see every item of the nature of your present case exactly resembles mine. After bewailing for a short while like a mad one, she having brought the picture just close to her again addressed thus. “What are you (Sir) a prince or the son of a prelate.” In case you be the son of a religious saint,

“In days of yore when time was young,
The birds conversed as well as sung.”

"why do you follow contrary principles?" The social beings like iron burn others in way of taking vengeance, when they themselves get burnt with passion which does the same office in them, as fire does to the metals, but the saints never give pain to others, though they may be wronged beyond the powers of forgetfulness and forgiveness as well, rather endeavour to make them happy any how. I shall illustrate one instance of it only, to corroborate my assertion and it runs thus:—

Sindhu Muni, the son of a blind Muni, did not curse Dasaratha,* the king of Oude, though he pierced him with a soundless arrow. The attention of the Christian readers is particularly called forth here. See what god-like spirit of forgiveness the natives have. Some there were and some there are yet in these days of degeneracy, who not only turn their right cheek to a man who gives a slap on their left, but also pat over the palms of the injurers, in case they hurt the joints of their hands in inflicting the blows upon others. What a more beautiful instance of the spirit of forgiveness one could possibly expect in a Christian land? Why do you then put a bonafide innocent girl to pain without cause? Is this the result of the lecture of Saradwaja Muni? or the effects of reading many religious books and tracts? or the wholesome consequence of being always in company with the saints and religionists? You seem to be as inhuman, as those who in course of their hunting excursion discharge their arrows without pity in the least against the deer, that under the influence of fear cast their pitiful eyes to and fro. Such a behaviour on your part proves, that you must not be the son of a religious saint, but a prince no doubt. But again, the costume and the beads in your hands go against this supposition of mine. Would you therefore be pleased to relieve me from all these uncertain conclusions by giving an account of your life &c? For sometime Sukumari madly indulged herself in talks of various kinds of this nature, when Chandrima spoke to her thus from a little distance. Your guess is right! No sooner did this sound reach the ears of Sukumari, than she hurriedly, out of shame of course, concealed the picture in her cloth. Wooma and Chandrima, the two constant companions of Sukumari, after a good deal of remonstrance to calm her afflicted mind, entered the room and accosted thus. Dear and Excellent princess ! Why do you always show the absence of mind and now and then betray the idiosyncrasy of judgment ? What must be the nature of your secrets ? We are your yoke-fellows so lay them open before us without scruples or reserve. The major part of your life is spent, but as for the remainder you may make it happy by marrying any one you like. What's the good of being miserable by harbouring such thoughts as are far from being realised. Chandrima said, Wooma ! What are you asking about ? Every one knows the ache of his or her own mind and none else. Every one has decided so far only and no further, that the forest gets destroyed with its own fire.

none could see now the fire of passion, that continually burns human mind, like elephants that eat away the carnal within the apples, without affecting much their outward forms. So in like manner, the remembrance of past love-matters has pulled down the internal constitution of Sukumari, the princess, though perceptible changes are scarcely observable in her outward appearance. The princess answered in a sort of epigrammatic joocular tone. Yes, the fire of passion (as you imagine) is actually burning me imperceptibly, but the fire that burns you always can never be extinguished, but, with your end. After this, she spoke to Chandrima. My Dear !, I can have the author of all these anxieties in me at command. But it is absolutely requisite to know before the connection is made, whether is he born of royal blood, or is descended from the race of any order of religious sects, or a supernatural being ? Chandrima said. Why do you (Madam) suffer that unfounded thought to canker your heart ? You can have your own way without hesitation. I went once to the hall in the garden for flowers, where I am come to learn from the venerable Saradwaja Muni of his parentage and other matters in connection with his genealogy. The Muni replied, that the object of love is the son of Jay-sen, the Rajah of Jaypore. The answer was quite satisfactory. A magnificent building was erected for the celebration of the Sayambara.* The adjacent kings and sovereigns had flocked in from all quarters, some in the carriages drawn by horses and some on the backs of elephants. Besides the learned pundits had thronged the palace to see the nuptial ceremony. Sukumari the princess putting on marriage apparel reached the appointed place at the appointed hour of the day in company with her favorite companions. All the kings and rulers had cast their eyes solely towards the beautiful bride, who seemed like the lightning in the cloudy sky to have peeped and shone refulgently in the midst of the countless stars and directed her step straight way towards the bridegroom without casting a glance even to any one else. At last, she yielded her hand to Basanta Coomar and then returned home. The other Rajahs, who were then present there knew not who this Basanta Coomar was. Consequently they laughed at the king Anandamaya for such a shameful condescension, which is derogatory to his hereditary excellency. The Reverend Saradwaja, who was then present in the marriage hall, began to welcome those Rajahs and spoke thus to remove their doubts concerning the pedigree of the bridegroom. God Almighty has entrusted you all with the responsibility of thousands of men, whose lives and honor are at your mercy. You are authorised by virtue of your exalted position and divine blessings to judge of what is right and what is wrong, and to reward to the doer of the one and inflict punishment to the other. If you therefore in an indifferent state of mind, inflict punishment upon an innocent one, the most terrific result is sure to attend you. Unfounded suspicion like ivy does not only destroy the plants and the other small trees, but at last destroys the very same tree, that like its mother provided it constantly with its own sap to prolong its existence. In like manner suspicion not only injures the suspected, but ultimately causes death to one, in whose breast it arises. It therefore behoves us to trace its origin first before its pernicious effects be felt, either by the unsuspected, or suspector. However dark and dismal might be the hollow of a tree to others, it is sufficiently lightsome to the owl itself. So is suspicion, however vain and unfounded it may appear in the judgment eyes of others, looks more like reality to him who unreasonably indulges in it. As owl cannot see in the sunshine of broad day-light any object when it comes out of its dark abode, so man becomes blind of any of those imperfections in his neighbour when suspicion ceases to occupy a seat in his breast. So I advise your Majesty to eradicate as soon as possible, the very germ of suspicion from your breast, ere it takes deep root there.

, Therefore O Kings and Lords! You should n't have laughed at Basanta, if you had tried before to learn the cause of your laughter. You are in vain out of prejudice led to believe, that Lily which is concealed by moss, is thereby divested of its scents. Is it possible for the clay pot to diminish the rufulent lustre of the jewels, when placed in it? The moon light appears faint to the cosmopolitan, when she is overshadowed by the clouds, without her light really being diminished. You have by the judgment of mere external appearance put the prince to groundless exposure. There would have been none dunces and vulgar, had neat and better dress been the criterion of wisdom and a proof of high extraction. The clever and accomplished Sukumari gave her hand to one who is fit for her, in all and every respect. The object of your ridicule, is the son of the mighty king of Jaypore, but out of a misfortune quite of an unforeseen nature, he is fallen in such distress. It is quite inconsistent with your honor, (as kings and rulers) to throw insult on others and treat them in an off hand manner ere you know all the incidents of their lives in all their bearings. The Rajahs having come to learn, all these facts from the venerable Muni departed one after the other, in a calm and quiet mode of countenance. Anandamaya, the king of Amundmagur was hitherto very sorry for not being able to know the respectability of the pedigree of his son-in-law, but the short speech of the wise Saradwaja made him exceedingly glad. Hence he came to learn, that a right move in the right direction is the never failing rule of nature. The wedding ceremony was celebrated agreeably to the custom and etiquette of former times. The Reverend Muni said to Rajah Anan:

damaya. I have fostered and reared up the boy with paternal care almost from his infancy, therefore I am exceedingly anxious to go back to my residence with the bride together with the bridegroom. The Rajah on the other hand in course of the short intervals of questions and answers made every necessary, but at the same time such decent preparation, as reflects credit on His Majesty. Sukumari knowing the approach of the appointed hour of departure, began to shed tears of joy. The heart of her mother the seat of unaffected affection began to get distracted by the thought of final separation in the same way as the surface of the ocean gets shaken by the impulse of the wind and waves. A little after this, Basanta bade adieu to the king and queen by saluting them after the fashion of the time-honored custom of India. In due time, they arrived the abode of the Muni. No sooner was this glad tidings spread all over the locality than all the Rishi women came in flock to the spot to pronounce the benedictions of blessings with shouts and acclamations of joy. Sudakshina, the wife of the wise Saradwaja with unspeakable delight held Sukumari in her fond and affectionate arms and gave out thus. Come! Mother Come! My dear mother! and then went straight way to the side of her room. She further added, that by seeing the spotless beauty of the face of her daughter-in-law, her long cherished hope is crowned with success and her ever afflicted mind is at once cooled. Ah! Who could possibly expect, that a princess would come to grace the humble mansion of a poor and almost beggarly lady of a religious saint! Basanta having spent a few days thus with Sukumari in the residence of his foster parents, set out for Anandanagar, the capital city of Anandamaya his father-in-law. The holy thought of devoting the remainder of his life in prayers and meditations of the wonderful mechanism of the creation and the attributes of the creator in a retired state of life solely occupied his attention. One day, he pushed all these secrets of his mind to the notice of his son-in-law and said thus. Hold the diadem and the other ensigns of royalty and by the right administration of justice, enjoy the happiness of a king. I have spent the three fourths of my life's career in the enjoyment of this world, but as for the remainder one-fourth I intended to pass in praise and prayer of the almighty, so as to fulfill the object of our mission on earth under human form. To get entangled even these few days with the cares of this phantasmagorian world and not to think at all of the one to succeed is to act below humanity. Human life in human constitution is what a drop of water on the surface of the leaves of lily, none knows when death precisely like wind, would upset the body and thereby cause the life like a drop of water separated from the body. I am therefore exceedingly desirous to isolate myself from the turmoils, hurry and whirl of the worldly affairs, after having let the burden of the Government devolve upon you. Basanta answered. I think it an act of supererogation on my part to hold the reins of Government according to the royal mandates. But I trust so far I am capable of judging, that the best and the safest way for your Excellency to pass your time in prayerful meditation would be to do that more in a rational way in society, than in recluse solitude. His Majesty replied, that though your argument on the subject is not altogether groundless indeed, but the religionists have unanimously passed their judgment to the effect, that society is compounded of an anomalous nature of good and evil, so that the latter is so nicely ingrafted with the former, that it exceeds the power of the social members to lay aside the venom of the one, before they relish the nectar of the other. Wherefore the saints and the monks choose the hollow of a rock, which is far from the habitable quarters of man for their abode. Sometimes they erect a hut on the shore of a river for the purpose of offering their prayers to God at all times without interruption. This silenced Basanta, who at last gave his consent as to take the whole weight of the state in his own hand. His Majesty, having anointed his son-in-law as a king, retired with the queen, with the consent and general approbation of his subjects. The Rajah having fraved the destined place of worship and devotion, addressed the locality with vehement emotion. Ah! Happy solitude, the nurse of all good thoughts. What an unspeakably charming aspect you hold. It is so far free from every fear, that the insects and the grassophers being the enemies of birds, reside in the same nests with them. without any chance of coming to any harm. The young deer drawing the milk from the teat of the lioness without the least idea of coming to any harm whatever. The shaking of the branches of trees with fruits and leaves, by the impulse of the gentle breeze, induce us to believe, that they out of delight, the offspring of prayers are dancing in way of repeating hymns in praise of the wonderful fiat of the almighty. The feathered tribes are in similar way uttering without anxiety and cessation, but always with their natural voice the wonderful attributes of the Lord of the universe. The inhabitants there of those sacred groves are with the oneness of mind and with the same chorus of hymns singing hallelujahs of one almighty, Omnipresent and Omnipotent God, who rules the day and night and who holds supremacy over the whole visible and invisible creation and whose command the tides of the ocean obey and by whose eternal decree and incomprehensible dispensation, the seasons alternately succeed and precede. His excellency thus reached the abodes of the religionists of all and every order and sect with the sight of perennial joys, that fell under his observation on his way thither.

Here Basanta having had the reins of the sovereignty in his own hand, discharged with univalled applause both the political and domestic affairs. The chief and noble principle of his reign was always to keep a vigilant eye over all, so that he may always be right in awarding just recompense to most deserving and inflicting condign punishment to the wicked. One day, when he was engaged to study a religious book in a certain place alone, after discharging the functions of royalty, Sukuman being present there spoke thus. My sweet heart ! What act of duty have you discharged since you are bound by religious oaths to be my husband ? I have been told by our spiritual guide, that it is a paramount duty of the husbands to instill sound and wholesome lessons with care and diligence in the minds of their wives. It is a duty incumbent upon the husbands to make their consorts the partners of the pleasure they enjoy themselves from the study of the ethical subjects and the unsullied joys, that flow from religious contemplations. If it be found, that a prejudicial notion or bad impression, has out of bad company or wrong education taken a deep root into the mind of a wife, the husband by right direction and by the cogency of his lecture and persuasive admonition should eradicate them from her mind. Prejudice stunts the growth of the virtuous sentiments, as much as brambles affect the growth of the useful trees in a garden. He who gives all such moral instructions to his wife really discharges the duty of a husband, but he, that married a woman out of a desire to gratify his lustful passion, can seldom discharge all those noble and exalted duties that befit a husband, otherwise he shall have to stand in the character of a delinquent before God and religion. Basanta being highly pleased with this beautiful discussion of his clever consort, said. My dear sweet heart! This prayer of yours has filled my breast with unspeakable joys. The woman in general instead of showing zeal to be eternally profited, rather discover a spirit of discontent, when they are called on to attend these lectures. What can afford greater pleasure, than that you are disposed of your own accord to come to the path, that may raise you to a higher platform of human bliss? Pray let me know what subject would be acceptable to you and I shall dwell there at large. Sukumari said, the best lesson and the fittest one for a respectable lady is to learn, what happiness flows from the cultivation of the virtue of chastity and how far a husband is bound to inculcate this lesson to his wife in an impressive way. Basanta having seized affectionately his consort, gave out thus. O pattern of virtue! The more I ruminate on your proposal of female chastity, the more my heart elates with joy. The religious professors of ancient times have given a long description and in various forms, but I shall give a very compendious sketch on the subject matter and I call your particular attention. Husband is no doubt an object of the highest concern in the eyes of his wife and the fountain spring of all delight. None is so much an object of worship to a wife as husband. A woman is not entitled to reap the benefits of religion unless she would receive the moral precepts direct from her husband. This is of course according to the authority of the Hindoo Shashtra. A woman is enjoined to follow her husband like shadow to the real living being and discharge her duties with the diligence of a most interested friend. She is always required to speak mildly and gently to her husband. She is further required to discharge her duties without the least blot on her conduct. She must always be above the reach of grovelling tendency. She is never to do a thing in an indifferent tenor of mind. She is ever forbidden to form the picture of any other man in her mind even in process of a dream. She is strictly forbidden to receive even the religious instructions of others, as many under the disguise of lecturers and preceptors ruin her both for time and eternity. A chaste woman after all must cease to frequent the place, where she is to hear ill of her husband and shouldn't stay even the minutest part of a second's time there, where then go talks of various kinds on indecent and obscene subjects. Whatever thoughts spontaneously arise in her, must immediately be brought to the notice of her husband without the concealment of either the part or the whole. She must not forsake her husband, should he out of a dire misfortune be a valitudinarian, a deformed and ugly chap, or a poor, or a dunce. Should a man be in the habit of committing adultery, his wife even there is forbidden to use harsh language, but she must exert her utmost to entice him to detect his own bad conduct. Man holds the privilege* to divorce his wife in case of adulterous conduct on her part, but a woman falls in the eye of religion, provided she repudiates her lord* on the similar ground. The husband must be the subject of her night dream and day vision. She must take him the sole standard of her judgment, the only criterion of her salvation and he must be considered on her part all in all. In fine, without him, nothing is real on earth. Every thing passes with phantasmagorean light. She must be happy in his happiness, but at the same time must feel miserable in his misery then she may be respected even by her superiors. She can then be happy here on earth and hereafter in heaven. Besides these women, the rest are to languish in hell for ever and anon. Basanta Kumar after all was lucky enough to pass his time with an educated, chaste and accomplished and at the same time a pious and virtuous wife. Every day she afforded him a new source and of fresher kinds of pleasures.

* The Hindoo ladies always apply the high sounded appellation to their husbands.* Even the lower class women do that, if they be chaste of course.

CHAPTER VI.

'My dear children' You have heard me repeat often and often, that prosperity and adversity are the allotted portion of humanity and every one becomes the sport of the one or the other alternately. Basanta Kumar, after having taken the reins of government in his own hand, was governing with the good will and the highest eloquence of the people, when all on a sudden a dreadful famine being attended with desperate diseases carried away many to the premature grave. It sprung out so suddenly, as thunders rage without any sign of previous clouds and storms and like the emission of fire in the wood it spreads its devastations far and wide. In course of a very few days, the whole city became the abode of monkeys and other wild beasts. The loud and noisy sound of the vultures and foxes were fatal to the lives of the survivors. The branches of the tallest banian trees, the pinnacles of the monuments and the other high public buildings, the domes of the town halls and the topmost height of other buildings intended to commemorate the victory of the ancient heroes and kings, fell at once to the level of the ground, without leaving a trace of their previous existence. The city was echoed and re-echoed with the noise of the buds, the cry of the canine tribes and the sounds of perpetual murmurs and heart-rending groanings of man and every other ominous sign, that dogmatically foretells the approach of the utter annihilation of the whole kingdom. Both the aristocratic and democratic portions of the city clandestinely convened a council to ascertain the fatal consequences of the evil that threatened their empire. There was then a custom current to the effect, that in case any unexpected calamity quite of an accidental nature befall a kingdom, the head of the state was required to go to voluntary exile temporarily to step it. It was proposed in the said meeting to apply the same rule to Basanta Kumar, the reigning sovereign, as the dire misfortune has befallen the empire since his ascension on the throne. It was now unanimously thought both advisable and at the same time reasonable to make him at least for a few days away from the kingdom. No sooner was this sad tidings brought to the royal notice, than His Excellency gave all assurances of his abdicating the throne and to go elsewhere, if that be productive of salutary effects on the part of the people. Before he set out, he welcomed one and all frankly and in a smiling tone pronounced these affectionate terms. "My dear people! Whatever memorials have been submitted to me for the good of the state are indeed quite pleasing to you all, though they are not compatible with the dictates of reason. I am glad to comply with the requisition of your memorials. But ere I bid you adieu I shall make some proposals and I confidently trust that you would not hesitate to lay me under obligation in complying with my requests there. In case of any accidental mishap in the state, the wisemen instead of imputing that to the king, rather endeavour to investigate the true cause of it and try their utmost to trace its origin so as to seek its lasting prosperity. You could easily know, that the king is by no means the author of the calamity that threatened the state, with distraction and destruction, if you try to learn the real cause of the diseases, which have baffled the power of unquestionable remedy of the best and the most incontestible medical authority and carried daily thousands and thousands into the premature grave. Try to learn also, why is the violent storm and terrific gales being attended with thunder and lightning cause wreck to the kingdom. All the ancient cities and towns fall in decay in this way, after having reached the plethoric height of their growth in splendour and prosperity. Don't rest yourself assured that the misfortune has left the kingdom with the banishment of the king. It is quite beneath you, (as intelligent beings) to labor under such a vain and deluding impression. That which looks well on your part, as the lord of the creation, is to make strict enquiry as how and where the water and the air are contaminated and whether the confined air of the neighbourhood of some particular streets and lanes, gardens and meadows being contaminated, became the sole cause of devastation and ruin, or the water the essence of life being affected turned the destructive poison of it. Let there be no lack of exertion on your part to remedy these evils and thereby effectually to elude the grasp of premature death and then you will be able to save your country without delay and unnecessary labor." Having harangued the people thus, he took their consent for departure. Here on the other hand, Sukumari being informed of this sad intelligence came close to the king and declared. "For the good of the state you gave your consent of going elsewhere from the kingdom and I shall be the companion on your way." Basanta to dissuade her said. "You are born of royal blood, very delicately bred up and all along enjoyed the ease of prosperity, but never accustomed to suffer the pangs of adversity." Sukumari returned. "Dear idol of my heart! Husband is the only support of the chaste women and the vital essence of her soul, so what's the good of carrying a dead body which ceases to be the abode of life in the absence of the husband? How far am I reasonable here in this request may easily be known to you, if you once turn your eyes towards Sabita, the wife of Suthoban, Sita, the wife of Ram the incarnate and Damayanti the wife of king Nala. They all accompanied their respective lords to the wild. They willingly and gladly bore all the hardships of life only to alleviate the pain of a long and tiresome journey of their husbands, and thereby secured the blessings of gods and angels and carried away the good will of man below, so I pray you not to thwart my aim to equal them, if not to be in the ascendancy. A social being despite his ample possession cannot command the respect of his neighbour in the absence of a wife rather gets exposed in every respect, whereas a man with a wife in obscurity can have the respect of every one. I shall prefer the hardship of a long and tedious journey, if that afford me the constant opportunity to serve my husband to the insipid happiness of an idle life at home without him. If you be so unkind as to go alone I shall then to exonerate my body the burden of misery, commit suicide." Basanta kept himself silent for a while after which ordered his driver to get ready his chariot, as he was on his wing to the wild for the welfare of his people. His Majesty's order was forthwith executed. Having then taken leave for departure from the highest officials to the lowest pampered menials, stood at the gate in expectation of Sukumari, who perceiving the approach of the time for the intended expedition, bade adieu to all her neighbour one after the other and spoke with tears in her eyes to her dear associates. "Dear Wooma! Dear Chandrima! I am going in company with my husband, as a voluntary exile to a far wild, wherefore give me the leave with good heart." They on their part said, with tears of affection. "Where did you intend to go leaving us all behind. The pain of separation would grievously touch us, better take us with you." Sukumari answered. "My dear I am out of an unforeseen event compelled to go to the wild. I am not aware in the least of the difficulties I shall have to encounter, but if I survive them I shall be happy again with your company, but in case of otherwise, this is my last." Flood of tears had flowed from her eyes whilst she was speaking thus and her comrades did the same, when they bade her farewell. Thus after mutual exchange of form and courtesy they mounted the chariot, which was speedily driven towards the wild. Both Wooma and Chandrima had cast their steady gaze towards the chariot, as long as it was in sight precisely in the same way the wild hog does with horror and confusion towards the mass of fire. When even the pinnacles were put out of sight they with dejected mood of mind returned home. The chariot having kept behind, countries and villages, towns and cities at last reached a solitary wild. Basanta having intended to travel on foot, ordered the charioteer to turn back homeward with the intelligence. It exceeds the power of language to describe fully the effects of imagination of that interval. It seemed, that virtue, after their departure from the kingdom under a form perceptible to the eye running away from the empire for fear of the attacks of vice and fortune herself appeared to follow her, leaving behind the splendour of the royalty. Thus Sukumari followed her husband, laying behind her every consideration of the pomp and enjoyment of the empire. The road being uneven, rough and craggy, she was unable to move erect. But lest her husband gets vexed with her slow motion, she bore the pain with exemplary patience and constantly wiped the tears and sweats with her cloth without his knowledge. After proceeding some miles off her body with all its main and branch members gradually became motionless, so she was compelled to fall down, when she was driven and battered by the unsettled blast of contrary wind like the flag of a chariot. But a little before her fall, she called her husband and said. "My Dear, be little slow. I am unable to keep pace with you." Basanta having held her hand spoke thus. "I told you before, that you will feel great difficulty to bear the troubles of a journey. The thought of what might follow next, when we shall have to tread more dreadful lanes and bye-lanes is like arrow piercing my bosom." Having in this way proceeded for some paces, Basanta said again. "See! Dear! See! With what accelerated strides the night is coming to wrap the whole face of nature. It is not far off. Let us with hasty motion reach the residence of some religious devotees. Otherwise we are sure to be torn here by the terrific claws of the lion, or some ravenous animals, or some homivorous giants would drink our blood." Sukumari being afraid here, began to walk faster. Luckily they arrived at the residence of an holy monk. There they passed the night in the character of guests. At the dawn of day, they again stepped forward towards the wild. My dear children! In times of danger, even the educated people lose their sense and being disconcerted take every thing in wrong view, although, he erewhile displayed very keen judgment and extraordinary sense no less than Brihashpati* himself. What else could induce Ram abatar† to pursue the golden deer and thereby gave Raban, his implacable foe, the opportunity to carry away his dear Sita? One day, whilst Basanta was travelling with his wife, a voice seemed to have reached his ears to the effect, as follows. "O dear brother Basanta?" The more he remembered of his brother Bijay Chandra the more his anxieties rose to higher and higher flight. But from which side the sound came he couldn't ascertain. The misfortune operated its influence so far, as to induce him to leave behind his wife alone in a far wild and under such a perilous circumstance. One day, after a travel from morning till noon, they sat under the shade of a large wide spreading banian tree for rest. The sun burnt Sukumari, being disfigured like the sapless tender twigs by the heat of the meridian sun and having placed his head on the lap of her lord laid down on the bare ground. But some how or other, being able to catch the secret working of his mind, said "My Dear! Why are the marks of sorrow visible upon your cheek? the very sight of which was a source of consolation to me before. I never saw such bad prognostics before. Why does the heart of this miserable wretch tend this day constantly to the worst vortex? Why is my heart become a prey of unfavourable omen? What beats my breast or why is the motion of my pulse so quick. Why couldn't I fix my mind even for a second's time? What's the matter with me. Why is my right eye dancing? Why do you, my dear stare at me with tears so often and often and breathe with difficulty? Why do you stop in the midst of conversation? I could not interpret the meaning of all these to any other reason, than the approach of ruin upon me with all its oppressive weight." During the intervals of all such lengthy intercourse, sleep insensibly stole upon her. Basanta thought of deserting her by this time. In course of all such desperate thoughts, he slowly and carefully took the head of his wife and laid upon the dust and went away. Ah! What a strange phenomenon is love? In spite of this seeming act of inhumanity on his part, he at intervals made a side glance towards his wife just in the same way as Chuckrobak* does towards the the Chuckrobaki by the approach of evening, purely out of nuptial love. He then thought within himself that to forsake a respectable zennanah lady without fault is really an act of inhumanity. What an awfully miserable fate would attend her in my absence. Whilst he was reflecting thus misfortune under a visible form approached before him and said. "What are you about? Your elder is quite exhausted. You won't be able to find him, should your wife follow you, better leave her and be quick. Being at once bamboozled with this sense-paralysing hint, he cut the knots and joints of the ties of conjugal love and went away without her. • Here on the other hand, Sukumari continued to sleep alone in the solitary and loansome wild. Some hours after his departure Sukumari awoke, but saw that her husband is no more with her. What a train of desperate thoughts arose then in her. In the first place, she made this reflection, that her lord is purposely concealed himself so as to put her to the cruise of hard-trial. Immediately after, she was troubled with this thought, that her husband must have been carried away by the wolf, or is devoured by the giants, or killed by supernatural beings. In the next place, she thought this also, that considering me merely an useless incumbrance he left me. She had repeatedly called her husband in a loud tone, whilst those deluding thoughts arose in her successively, but having got no answer, she out of despair and fear fell on the ground and began to welter." A little after, as in a fit of actual delirium, she addressed her own eyes in way of reprimanding. Ah Eyes ! I kept you merely to act the part of a guide, but you betrayed me. Ah cunning and ungrateful sight ! You betrayed me, being a chief member of the whole body I must impute the loss of my doll* to your detestable treachery. In his absence, every creek and corner of the habitable world seem in my eyes wrapped up with darkness. Ah perfidious wretch ? I did you every service with superhuman care and the consequence stood thus. It was far distant from my expectation, that the jewel† of my heart shall ever have the chance of being lost in the gloomy depth of the wood. I never wronged any one even in a dream. Who then out of revengeful feeling injured me to this extent ? Ah sad and cruel misfortune ‡ I having relinquished the enjoyments of royalty sought refuge in an unknown dark and loanseme wood with my husband and you didn't spare me even here. Ah! What an awfully sad chance is this? What would become of me now? Where and from whom could I expect relief? Who would shield me now from the impending danger? Ah parents! Ah beloved associates! Wooma and Ohundrima where are you now all? I am recklessly thrown alone in this loanseme and frightful retreat. You just condescend to relieve me. Ah! sylvan gods! Be a help to this poor and helpless wretch. I pray you to assume forms in order to show me the road my husband trod. 'Tis past my power to bear the pain of separation from my husband. Ah fate! There is none here in this distant wood, but thee. So none but thee must have stolen my husband. It is thy province to make one the sport of prosperity and the other the object to be ruthlessly tossed on the bed of adversity. If thou sayest, that my husband is carried away by the wolf, even there I shall find fault with thee as thou under the disguise of a wolf hast killed him, with intent to make me the object of thine fun and joke. But if thou makest this excuse again that my husband out of wrong judgment left me alone here, there I ascribe likewise the fault on thy part, as his judgment was vitiated through thy spell-like influence. Thou art the author of all evils, whatever they may be, or in whatever light may they be considered. Therefore I pray thee with all my might and strength to spare his life, but as for my own, I am willing to surrender it to thy tyrannical will. He is an object of the highest concern, so have mercy upon him. Pray help him in times of distress. Be not niggard to give him instantaneous relief, when he would be tired and exhausted. Gradually the sun began to sink down, when she prayed with her face towards heaven. O just and merciful Lord! Thou art the friend of the friendless and the great help to the helpless. This miserable servant of thine is fallen in great distress, so extend thy helping hand to save her life and preserve her from the scandalising stain on the spotless page of her life. Thus having gone some distance off, she saw the view of a temple made of stones and marbles brightened with the lustre and mild brilliancy of the countless stars in the firmament close to a mountain. She also beheld there a woman with full of ornaments sitting on the step of a stone staircase, crying with the following pathetic tone. Ah dear husband! Ah sweet heart! This wonderful and unexpected sight relieved Sukumari a little. It is natural for humanity to feel somewhat relieved, when one sees another in similar distress and he or she becomes eagerly curious to learn the main cause of his or her neighbour's distress. She thought within herself that the stranger must be the victim of the distress of the same category. She is also bewailing like me the endless pain of separation from husband. At last coming near to her, asked thus. 'Dear Sister! Why do you yell. The stranger said. Why do you so politely address me in way of long and close intimacy? My long afflicted heart is cooled and quieted by your modest enquiry. Sukumari returned again. No I didn't apply the epithet dear to you, but to your misfortune which is exactly like mine and without which I have had not the chance of an easy access to your person; therefore I shall in way of gratitude apply the title dear to none, but to the misfortune wherever and in whomsoever could I find her. For you are travelling here with a murmuring sound akin to my own and the last object of enquiry tends to the same point. The stranger making Sukumari sit close by her, said,—it appears, my dear! from the features of your physiognomy, that you must have been closely and dearly related to me in a previous life. Whatever might be the fact, I simply ask you this. What hand of affliction must have driven you here in this awful solitude. As tears spontaneously flow out from the eyes, when one speaks of the sad reverses of fortune before his or her dear and intimate friend, so Sukumari burst out into loud fit of outcries with constant drops of tears in her eyes, when she was relating the particulars of the sad career of her life. The stranger observed in way of consoling her,—am I not melted with your misery precisely in the same way as the eldest does towards the youngest in distress? The youngest said in return,—that's the reason I am actuated to show you the obedience and submissive affection of the youngest sister. It seems, as I have spent a long time with you, but separated only since a very few days. Whatever may be the matter, I shall behave towards you in the style of a sister. Sukumari said, that the very sight of your's begat in me a desire of veneration towards your person. I felt the same relief, as one does when she gives an account of her mishaps to her own sister. Therefore be you my eldest sister. Both began to converse in this way. At last Sukumari said,—my dear didī !* I am very curious to know the nature of the distress that has exposed you thus here. The stranger answered. Dear Sister ! It requires greater latitude of time to give a detailed account under each of the encyclopedic head of my misfortune. Let us now wash our hands and face and enter the temple. So long we couldn't see our husbands, we would talk together of the nature of our respective calamities. With this word, they entered the temple. The eldest commenced thus. There reigned a king by the name of Ramanimohun. I am his only daughter. My name is Bimala. My father lost his life in a battle, when I was a girl of five years old. This misfortune my mother bore with patience, but as I grew a little I became a source of consolation to her. The functions of royalty were then devolved upon the prime-minister. My mother despite her exemplary assiduity could not succeed in having a fit one to marry me, on condition of passing the whole career of his life under her maternal roof. Subsequently chance herself was able to accomplish, what previous and deliberate scheme failed so often. Of those elephants, which my father had brought, when he had returned from the expedition, of deer hunting, one was highly endeared to him. He used to take almost always that favourite elephant with him, wherever he frequented. The elephant in return used to hold the throne of my father with his trunk during the time of his bath. My father was in the habit of cleansing the body of the animal by his own hand, which made the sagacious animal endeared to him more and more. After the death of my father, the animal went away in a deep jungle out of sorrow no doubt. The chief minister was no way unsparing in his efforts to prevent his going away from the kingdom, but to no avail at all. After the lapse of some years, the elephant unexpectedly came back one day with a boy of a very handsome make, who was afterwards married with me, and whom the animal held by his task. Every one was struck with amazement at the sight. No sooner was this dropped from her mouth, than the other said, My dear sister ! It seems from your own account, that your husband, who did not return with water to quench the thirst of his brother, may no doubt be the brother of my husband. After that, the elephant at once placed the boy, who was held by his tusk on the throne of my deceased father. Being asked of his genealogy, he gave the same account, what was given before by the other man, who went to look after water for his youngest brother. He was compelled to leave his youngest brother alone in that awful retreat. Providentially, the mad elephant all on a sudden brought him to the palace. No sooner did the eldest hear, that his brother was left alone, in that perilous retreat, than his voice thickened with sorrow. Drops of water instantaneously began to flow from his eyes. The chief of the state hearing all these, sent for Basanta from all parts of the empire, some on horse back and some afoot. My dear Sister ! said Bima-la. It appears, from your own accounts, that the venerable Saradwaja Muni, had carried away Basanta before the envoys were sent, consequently they had to return without finding him. This news had at once bambóozled the intellectual faculties of my husband Bijaya Chandra. However his grief gradually began to decay with the progress of his recovery. My mother being struck with the uncommon powers of his understanding and the incredible progress of his learning married me with him on a very lucky and auspicious day. Afterwards he began to govern the empire of my father with the consent of all the subjects. One day, I had told him to go to a far wild, where there was built a magnificent hall by order of my father. It was erected chiefly for the purpose of beguiling the tediousness of leisure in mirth and merriments. If he have no objection, he can go and study there the nature of the feathered tribes. He was agreed to accede to my request. We passed a few days there in varieties of jokes and funs. But one day, he had suddenly burst out into tears with the expression as follows. Ah Basanta ! My dear brother, the vital soul of my life ! Where are you gone now ? I asked him about often and often, but instead of giving any answer, he directed his step like a mad man towards the desolate wood, where I followed him, but being unable to ascertain the place where he went away hastily, I reached here through the secret bower. A few days after having found this convenient abode, I continued to live here alone. Bimala having related all the incidents of her life, said, My dear sister ! The term sister is justly applied to you, as it plainly proves from the concord and agreement of the accounts of both, that your husband is the youngest of my husband. Having said this, both began to weep. The day dawned once again upon the face of nature. Bimala now heard a voice to this effect. Ah ! What is come to pass. After a long and wearied journey I failed to make out the clue of their sudden elopement. Where are they gone to, or what is become of them. Some were whispering thus, that the very thought of what may become of the queen, on receipt of this sad tidings is heart rending. She has only one daughter who is the only means of support and consolation to her on earth. If she couldn't see her daughter and son-in-law for a small jot of time, she starts with horror and amazement on all directions like the lost calf. Let us see there in the temple in view. Having said thus, they all directed their steps towards the temple. Bimala said. Dear sister ! Be no longer afraid of. The Minister himself is coming in company with a large number of troops to search us. Having uttered this they stood at the threshold of the holy shrine. The minister beholding them from a little way off and coming nearer and nearer to them, said. Why do you both husband and wife rove in a wild, that is the abode of ravenous tigers and wolves. If the object of your mission be to visit the holy shrine, why didn't you take some of your associates ? Where now is the Moharaj ? Bimala having related all that had passed began to shed tears. The minister in way of consoling her, said, My dear child ! Cry no more. I shall very soon get him here. But at the same time, his constant stead-fast gaze at Sukumari, enabled Bimala to catch the internal guess of her youngest and she gave every account for her, in the manner of an interpreter, so as to make every one acquainted with each other. All that heard it, were astonished. But the Minister said. My dear Bimala ! It appears from the very homo-geniety of your countenance, that Sukumari is your youngest sister. He then advised all to run to the palace, who accordingly went there unitedly. After their arrival there in the palace, the Rani expressed her deep sorrow for the supposed death of her son-in-law. But to know, what the matter really is, she sent ambassadors all over the empire to look after her son-in-law. But to no effect. So it was at last agreed upon by the general consent of all to spread a rumour for the information of the public, that Bimala and Sukumari are to be married again. If the brothers named Bijaya Chandra and Basanta Kumar be alive, they are sure to make their appearance to Bejaynuggur immediately after they see the advertisement. Envoys were ordered to travel far and near with the advertisement. The Rajahs of distant lands flocked in to the court in a large and numerous body. The Rev. Saradwaja and Rajah Anundomoy together with his Rani expressed their deep regret, when they were told, that Basanta voluntarily had gone an exile for the good and welfare of the state. Amongst others Rajah Joy Sen also went to the place of general rendezvous to satisfy his curiosity. On the other hand, Bijaya Chandra and Basanta Kumar having been informed, that Bimala and Sukumari are to be married again, had come with all speed to Bejaynuggur in a state of worries and cares of mind. They instead of rushing on at once prudently stood out of the palace out of a fear of insult from the guards, simply because they were then highly reduced and disfigured by the rude hand of affliction. Adversity wrought so wonderful a change in them, that they cast their eyes at each other's face, without being able to recognise mutually. They began to converse with each other, as with strangers. Basanta Kumar said. What's the good of thinking this and that without aim. Let us enter into the assembly. Bijaya said, it ill fits us to venture without knowing previously the laws and bye-laws of the community. Basanta without further delay entered first. The guard somehow or other having recognised Bijaya Chandra requested him to go into without scruples, though he was not in fight order then. Bijaya thought, that the guard must have come to recollect his face but out of fear dared not give out the secrets so he entered, but sat just behind the guests.

Bimala having recognised and seen her husband from one of the windows, said by the movements of her fingers. My dear sister! My husband is present, just see there, but without knowing anything as to the arrival of your husband I am exceedingly aggrieved. Sukumari said, he is also come. Both then began to behold their respective lords from a far off. It was previously arranged as to the mode to be adopted for the purpose of receiving those Rajahs, who were invited on the occasion, as well as of giving them farewell in a manner, that may reflect credit both on the inviters and the invited, when they would depart after the ceremony is over. Bimala and Sukumari having enclosed in a long letter all the incidents of the lives of their husbands and the particulars of the life of Rajah Joy Sen up to that date delivered it in the hand of a female punka-puller with order to hand it over to the prime-minister with request to read it in the presence of those in the court. No sooner was it delivered, than the minister read it aloud, and said this also.. You are all in a manner become unconscious under the drowsy influence of sleep. A short while more you are requested to listen with undivided attention, as very little of the letter is left unfinished and I shall soon end it. But if I am required to say of those what are described in the shape of a story by Bimala and Sukumari in respect of all the circumstantial memoirs and accounts of the two brothers named Bijaya and Basanta's life, we are to tire the patience of the audience, as we are to do from the very birth of those princes up to the present date. That would be a mere repetition, so I must avoid that. You better guess about on the matter by meditation. The best thing required of you here is to listen with attention, what I shall say concerning the contents of this letter. The main purport of the letter was so pathetic, that the perusal of a portion of it had melted Joy Sen, Rajah of Joypore so far, as to shed tears, which excited Bijaya to weep and last of all Basanta Kumar, could not refrain from joining. Afterwards, the minister commenced the sorrowful tale of Sukumari, Rajah Anandamoy was unable to withhold tears, although he was then isolated from the concerns of this world. Saradwaj Muni tried to stop him. However his cries served as a right clue for them to know of their connection with each other. Bijaya having held fast the neck of Basanta with his right arm began to weep. Resurrection of long buried thoughts of sorrows was seen in a new form. Basanta began to comfort his brother, by the time, he was engaged to wipe off his own tears. The visitors and others were all affected at first sight with the cries of one of those chiefs, who were present, but having come to learn afterwards the concluding portion of the letter, they all with oneness of mind levelled down their reproaches upon Joy-Sen, the Rajah of Joypore, the author of all the calamities, that befell those princes named Bijay Chunder and Basanta Kumar. After the departure of all, Rajah Joy Sen called both the princes before him and addressed them in a pitiable tone, that though the parents may highly be guilty before their offsprings, in various shapes yet it does not behove the children to forsake their parents on any plea however reasonable may it really be. The two brothers having comforted their parent had gone with the venerable Muni to kneel down before Rajah Anundomoy to pay him due homage. They together with their respective consorts came to the Zennah of Rajah Romoumohun. Here unexpectedly those two ladies named Bimala and Sukumari having seen their father-in-law and and mother-in-law, began to shed tears of joy. Thus they happily passed the day during the intervals of their mutual talks, as to the names of their respective countries and the family they descended from and several other subjects of kindred nature. The resurrection of long buried thoughts of sorrows of by gone times, began to dash like billows to tear the bosom of Bimala and Sukumari when they saw their husbands in the night. But both of them having confessed their past folly and having entreated in a very exceedingly obliging tone to be forgiven, were able to reconcile their wives. The Reverend Saradwaj and Rajah Anundomoy after a rest for a few days at Bejoypore took their fare well. Bijaya and Basanta being curiously eager to see after a long tedious time Santha, their pet and old nurse proceeded to Joypur with their wives. On the other hand Santha the mother like nurse was as much delighted at the happy intelligence of the return of those two princes, as the poor, humble and the destitute beggars in expectation of a sure gain of heaps of gold, or like the blind man at the recovery of his long-lost sight. At that time, she reached the maximum age of life, and was worn out and pulled down more with cares and diseases of various kinds, than with age, had scarcely strength enough to move some paces only, without the helping rod of the age, but the sanguine hope of seeing her fostered children, who were long before believed to have been consigned to the grave, gave a strength, which youth-hood itself, in defiance of its energy and vigour, can successfully compete with. Both the husbands and the wives having alighted from their chariots bowed down before her, with every mark of motherlike respect and then went to the Zennanah to do homage to their step-mother, who poured forth upon them every-blessing and after making her daughters-in-law sit close by her, began to ask, how the connections are made and other circumstances appertaining to it, in all their bearings. The two brothers stopped for a while at Jaypore and then proceeded up to their fathers-in-law. After the death of Rajah Jay Sen, they included the kingdoms of their fathers-in-law, which came to them by right of inheritance with their paternal empire. After a glorious reign of some years, when the effects of curse ceased to operate their pernicious influence upon them, they happily launched into the world to come, or the region of eternal bliss. Here the venerable Saradwaj Muni having thus finished the story, proclaimed thus. "My dear children! You must have heard it from the religionists, that in consequence of curse even the divinities* suffer a great deal. So if a member of the rif-raf class being offended pronounces curse even upon a Brahmin, the effects can never fail to operate on the score of his being a member of the worshipful class." The definite object of the whole thread of this long story is to forewarn the readers against hurting the feelings even of those who are below us. In case they curse we can by no means get rid of

* Means here celestial beings, who in consequence of some misdeeds and having been cursed thereof must be born under human form to expiate every thing and atone of their sins and then go up to the higher, or lower heaven, whence they came down. its pernicious effects, without condign atonement either in this or after life. If any were to ignore the fact, he can for satisfaction's sake turn his eyes towards Bijaya and Basanta, who had suffered so much for some or other misdeeds of previous life no doubt.

TARAVATI:

A TALE,

PREFACE.

YEARS ago the following legendary tale was written by my-revered mother. From motives of filial piety, I undertook the translation of the work ; and now present the reader with the following pages.

TÁRÁVATÍ.

A TALE.

ON the east of India lay the extensive kingdom of Magadha. In it lived a very wealthy man, named Dayásindhu, a spice merchant. In consideration of his immense wealth, he also went by the name of Dhanapati, or the lord of wealth. He had a wife divinely beautiful and crowned with every virtue. Her name was Táravatí. The merchant and his consort pined for want of a son, for which they unceasingly prayed to God in heaviness of heart, and celebrated many religious ceremonies. Of a night, as Táravatí lay alone on a fresh bed, after having, during the day, observed the *Astamí Vrata and worshipped Chandiká, she dreamt that a surpassingly beautiful girl of eight, decked from head to foot, and wearing a piece of red silk cloth, sat on Táravatí's bed, and with a smiling countenance and in mellow tones, addressed the sleeping fair one thus, "Táravatí! thou art a virtuous lady. I am well pleased with thy devotions. Listen to me! Go to the asvattha tree, which stands on the east of the village. On the north-eastern side of it, under about two yards of ground, thou wilt find a pot made of eight metals, and an image of the Lion-riding goddess.* Before the day breaks, go to the place, with thy husband, and unearthing the pot and the image, take them out. Then raising a large temple on the site, establish the image in it, and worship it with all the sanctimonious rites. By this means, thou wilt soon be blest with a son, bearing all the marks of future greatness, as well as with a daughter, graced with every virtue." Filled with delight at this dream, as Tárávatí stretched out her arms to hug in the damsel to her bosom, she smiled and "was no more. Tárávatí awoke. She looked around, but saw nothing. She was then lost in thought, when lo! a divine voice said, "Tárávatí! tarry no more. Up and go to the place with thy husband. At break of day, it will be filled with people." Hearing this extra-mundane sound, she hied to the couch of her lord, and seeing him asleep, thought, that to awaken him was wrong; but then the divine behest must be obeyed. She decided for the latter. Thinking this, as she laid her hand upon the feet of Dayásindhu, he awoke, and rising up, said to his wife, "My love, is it morning?" Tárávatí said, "Light of my eye, it is hardly day—it is near day-break. Love, I have dreamt a wonderful dream to-night, and heard a divine voice, which I have hastened here to tell you." Dayásindhu became curious. Tárávatí related all. Having heard it, her husband said, "My love, you are perfection itself; and I am blest with the possession of such a treasure!" Then Dayásindhu and his wife, accompanied with their servants, went to the asvattha tree. The merchant-prince sang a hymn in praise of Mahámáyá, and directed his men to dig the ground for about two yards. They fell to digging the place, until they came to the pot composed of eight metals. Dhanapati took it up reverentially with his own hands, and gave it to his partner. Táravatí placed it on her head, and stood there. Then Dhanapati took up the image of the Lion-riding goddess. Táravatí placed the pot before the goddess and bowed down to the deity, with her husband. They then went back to their house, to bring the necessary things for worship. It waxed late, and folks began to gather round the place where the goddess was found, and there was noise and bustle. The merchant pitched a camp on a cleaned spot and established the image in it. The people of the village and the friends and acquaintances of Dhanapati extolled him and bestirred themselves to bring the priest and to procure the necessary things, such as flowers. In time the people came with the family priest and other Brahmins versed in the Vedas, as well as with the necessary articles. The merchant welcomed the Brahmins and spread cushions for them. They sat down and applauded and blessed him. Dhanapati in all humility paid his reverence to the Brahmins and said, "Sires, favor me with worshipping the goddess, in due form." "Very well, sir," returned they, and set about the business. Táravatí now came there in a palankeen, guarded by a body of men. When the Brahmins had done, Táravatí and her husband were engaged in worshipping and hymning the image. When they had finished their devotions, they fed the Brahmins sumptuously, and gave them ḍakhindā;* then they fed the poor people. After having discharged every duty, Dhanapati returned to his palace with his wife. Afterwards, he erected an alabaster temple for the goddess, with a theatre and a garden and tank adjoining, the last being furnished with four sets of stairs. The place gradually became a place of trade, and people flocked there, to pray the image, for having their desires. The place thus obtained the name of Chandítalá."

After some time, through the blessings of Chandíká, Táravatí was with child. When it was full ten months, Táravatí fell in throes and gave birth to a son and a daughter bearing all the auspicious marks. Dhanapati now considered himself the happiest of men and distributed money and alms to Brahmins and the poor. When the time for Annaprásana† came, he celebrated the ceremony and named the twins, Srimanta and Ketakí, the former for the male, the latter for the female child. In time, Srimanta shone out like the summer sun in his meridian glory, and the daughter beamed like the autumnal moon. And this made the hearts of their parents glad. In a short time the boy and the girl became proficient in many sciences and arts. Hearing the praises of Srimanta and Ketakí, match-makers* from various countries began to flock into Magadhá. Dhanapati married with great pomp and splendour his son to the daughter of Vadra Sen, Raja of Rámnagar, and his daughter, to Rámnáth, son of Sankara Dutt of Rájnagar. The marriage of Ketakí was celebrated the day following that of the marriage of Srimanta. Dhanapati kept his son-in-law at his own residence. When Srimanta and Rámnáth came of age, he initiated them into the mysteries of his profession, and said, "I will reward each of you according to his deserts, in his line." Encouraged by their governor, both the young men shone in business, and riches began to pour into the treasury. Gratified with their success, Dhanapati gave each of them a precious diamond ring. The young people were delighted, and addressed themselves to their duties with increased vigour.

Of a certain night in summer, Srimanta woke during the small hours and said to Rámnáth, "Ho Rám ! I am very much oppressed with heat. Let us walk out into the garden and refresh ourselves with the cool breeze blowing over the tank." They thereupon came to the place, and began to eye the beauty of the garden. The moon was beaming mild ; the fish were gliding in rows by the bank; the vernal gale was blowing on all sides, laden with fragrance from the blooming blossoms; the cuckoo was pouring forth its throat melodiously; various trees in rows beautified the grove; the night-birds were screaming over ripe juicy fruits, the stones of which dropped to the bottom of the trees. The east gradually began to blush and brighten—the luminary of night was about to ‘hide his diminished head.’ Seeing all this, Rāmnāth said to his companion, “See! see! my friend, how the Moon is dancing in the liquid mirror!” Srimanta replied, “Nay, not so; the Moon is agitated for grief of Kumudini, who has veiled herself, seeing that her beloved was about to depart.”*

They were talking thus, when a stalwart ascetic appeared before them with a smile. The personage had long whiskers, his hair was matted and hung down behind his head. His body was covered with ashes, he had a rudrāksha rosary on his neck, and he bore a trident in his hand. Srimanta rose up, paid his reverence to the holy man, and stood before him. The ascetic blessed Srimanta and asked, “Srimanta, can you recognise me now?” The young man replied, “I think I have seen you somewhere, sir; I don’t remember it clearly.” “Nandīkeswar,”† rejoined the figure, “has sent me here, to bring you in mind of your former life. Hark!" Saying this, he narrated all the facts in detail, and gave a flute to Srimanta. "Hie you to the Sandal wood, and deliver Promodini." The ascetic said this and vanished. When the holy man had disappeared, the mind of Srimanta became highly agitated. He said to his companion, "My friend, bear tidings of my leaving my home, for a distant country, to my dear parents. Farewell!" "It is not proper for you to go to a distant land alone, leaving me behind," replied his companion. "I shall be able to help you in time of trouble, if I be by you. I shall therefore join you." Youth is the season of curiosity; but seeing the eagerness of Rámnáth, Srimanta said, "If both of us were to go, we should acquaint father of this, by letter, and then go away privately." Having determined on this, they gave a letter to a warder of their house and departed. When the man delivered the note to Dhanapati, he read it and hastened with the tidings to his wife. On hearing this, Táravati's eyes filled with tears; she said, "My love, at once despatch men in search of them. I shall go to the temple of the goddess and fast for three nights. Should good news reach in the meantime, I will live—else I will put an end to this existence." Dhanapati despatched men in different directions. Táravati became disconsolate for the absence of her son, and became engaged in prayers to the goddess.

On the other hand, Srimanta and Rámnáth travelled through various countries, and at last arrived at the country, called Udra where they spent a night at the house of the court pandit of Vijay Singha, prince of the place. Táravatí having fasted full three nights, the goddess was well pleased with her and said in an aerial voice, "Táravatí, fear not! Rise up. I am always protecting thy child. This day two weeks, thy Srimanta will come to thee, with his new bride and Rámnáth." Comforted thus, Táravatí rose up and paid her obeisance to the image. She then returned to her home with a cheerful heart, and related all to her husband. "No need of anxiety now!" said she, "let us prepare dress and ornaments for the bride." The merchant and his consort made the preparations, and remained expecting the pair.

When Srimanta and Rámnáth awoke at the house of the court pandit of Udra, they saw that the Moon was about to set and that the King of day was coming, 'rejoicing in the east.' The birds were tuning their throats. They rose, and after having finished their morning devotions, went in the direction of the Sandal wood. After proceeding some way, they met with some husbandmen, tilling the ground. The young men came up to them and asked, "My friends, how far is it to the Sandal wood?" Hearing this interrogatory, the men replied, "From what country do your honors come? And why do you enquire for the Sandal wood?" "We are bound for that wood," answered Srimanta. At this, a hoary-headed swain said, "So please your honors, listen to the mystery of the place. Formerly, there was a city, named Uddípaní, by the forest, laved by the river Sálí. In it lived a wealthy merchant, named Priyamvada Sen. He had two wives. Priyamvada was a voluptuous person. One day, he was sporting with his second wife in the water, when a devotee faced him. The soft king was so intoxicated with the sport, that he did not break it even at the sight of the sage. Incensed at the complete self-abandonment of the king to Paphian pleasures, the holy man said, 'Wretch, darest thou slight me, because of thy wealth?' For this, thy paramour shall live a bird in this wood. Thou shalt die on the instant; and this teeming city shall be a wilderness.' In virtue of this curse, Priyamvada met his end then and there, and his love was converted into a bird of the Sandal wood. Thereafter a tiger began to commit havoc on the inhabitants. Seeing this, the citizens began to desert the city. Since then, I have been living at this place, leaving Uddípaní. The wood is not far off. There is a mountain two miles distant. Ascending to the top of it, you will see the Sálí river. The forest on the other side is the forest you seek. Now it goes by the name of the Frightful forest. If any man chance to go there, he dies out of hand. Only the fishermen fish in the river. I have heard from their lips that no sound is heard of any living soul, save that a female bird sings on a bough of a tree on the river. Sirs, from your appearances, I ween that you come of respectable and rich parents. For some cause or other, you have come to a far country, in grief. I am a clown, and it ill beseems me to advise men like you. Still, I beseech you with clasped hands, not to go to the Sandal wood, by any means. Should you go there, slighting my warning, you will most probably lose your lives." "Never fear, friend," said Śrīmanta, "pray, show us the right way and tell us how to cross the river and come to the wood." The swain said, "Excuse me, but I look upon you as doomed. If you must go to that fatal place, that's the way. After passing the forest in front, you will come upon a mountain, ascending which, you will see the Sandal wood, on the other side of the river. Fishermen fish there in boats. They will ferry you over, for a trifle."

Agreeably to this direction, Śrīmanta crossed the forest in front and came to the mountain in question; whereupon his joy knew no bounds. He ascended the mountain, and found that what the husbandman had said, was true. But as the day had waxed late, the fishermen had gone home, after fishing. So the travellers were obliged to stay there for the night. "Now came still evening on"—Śrīmanta looked at the wished-for wood, and stayed in the mountain for the night. Rāmnāth brought fruits; when the female bird began to sing thus:—

Song.

"My love—my love ! where is he gone ?
 For him I pine a bird alone.
 I've lost my love through Fortune's frown ;
 The Morrow brings my wronger down."

Srimanta was enraptured and astonished at this song, and said to his companion, "Hark! hark! my friend. You have never heard a bird sing more sweetly." So they both listened intently to the strains. When the bird ceased, Srimanta and Rāmnāth fed on the fruits, and reposed in the mountain. When the day broke, the sun looked like a heap of Javá-flowers. The bird, seeing no signs of her beloved on the appointed day, began to think, "It is strange! Will the word even of the ascetic prove untrue, for my bad luck? Then, there is no use of dragging on this miserable life." Having determined on self-destruction, she perched on a vakul tree by the stream.

On the other hand, Srimanta and Rāmnāth stood expecting a boat. When a boat came, Rāmnāth went to the men and said, "Ho fishermen, we intend to cross the stream. Pray, ferry us over." Hearing this, the fishermen laughed and said, "From what country do you come, sirs? Don't you know that the entrance into the Sandal forest is death? We shan't be able to row you over." Saying this, they departed. Then Rāmnāth said to an old fisherman, with misgivings, "Friend, do ferry us over, and you shall have a hundred coins." At this tempting offer, the Triton thought, "I have never seen one hundred coins together, in my life. I have not long to live; and this sum would maintain my wife and sons easily." The man consented. The young man delivered the money to the fisherman, and entering into the boat, they were about to leave the shore, when the wife of the man appeared on the scene and ejaculated, "Halloa! what for are you bound for the Sandal wood? I have never given you one hard word. Why then are you bent on self-destruction? When you are gone, who would maintain us?" The woman began to weep and wail. "Carry home the sum," replied her husband, "which these gentlemen have given me. I will just ferry their honors over and return." At this, the woman said, "For this trifling sum, I shan't be able to risk your life. If they give a thousand coins, I shall fasten a rope to your boat, and sit in another, on this side of the stream. As soon as the gentlemen alight, I will pull your boat off the shore. If they agree to this, I can give my consent." Srimanta agreed, and taking out a diamond ring from his finger, gave it to the fisherwoman. She laughed at this, and said, "Is this your thousand coins. Why? This is a bit of glass. I don't require this." "Good wife," said her husband, "do not slight these gentlemen. This ring must be of high price—no doubt of that. I well know the value of this ring. Once on a time, such a gem belonging to our Prince had fallen into the water. I rescued it, and received a handsome reward for it. The minister said that the price of the ring was a thousand coins. This ring is not inferior to the other one. We shall get a thousand coins for it, if we sell it to a merchant." Then the fisherwoman tied a rope to her husband's boat, and sat in another, of larger dimensions. The fisherman launched his smaller skiff with Srimanta and Rámnáth. The female bird, in the meantime, had wept bitterly, and plunging in the tide, was trying to make away with herself, when she saw two boats appearing in the middle of the stream, one of which was comparatively large. Seeing this, she thought, "Perhaps the word of the prophet will prove true, after all. Let me see which way the boats take." Thereupon, she watched their course eagerly. When the smaller boat neared, she saw in it two young men, and an old boatman; in the other, and larger one, sat an old woman, holding fast a rope. When the skiff neared the shore, she saw a young person, resembling her paramour in form and features. "Ah!" exclaimed she, "will it again be given to me, to bless my eyes with the sight of that beloved countenance? O God! what more shall I suffer?" Looking steadfastly at the young man, she observed a mark on his person, and knew it to be certain that he was her own lost love, beyond the shadow of a doubt. She thought, "Let me now sit amidst the foliage, and see where they direct their steps." When the boat had well nigh reached the shore, the fisherwoman pulled the rope and cried, "For God's sake, do not go further near the shore. Tell them to go out on land. Should they not heed you, throw them into the water." "What, man?" exclaimed Rámnáth, "if we have to swim from here to the shore, we shall do it, after drowning both of you, husband and wife, with the boats." The fisherman trembled, and said, "Sirs, I haven't told you anything. Why then are you wroth with me? Pray, be at ease. I will anon land you on the shore." He immediately landed his skiff. Srimanta and Rámnáth jumped on land, and entered the forest. The fisherman, with his wife, went home.

On entering the wood, Srimanta said, "My friend, how beautiful are these trees bending beneath their weight of fruits. The fragrance of blowing flowers, mingling with the scent of the Sandal trees, is being perpetually wafted by the breeze, throughout the wood. Seeing all this, meseems this sylvan scene is the haunt of some god." Talking thus, they came to a tank, dejected at not finding the expected female bird. The air was eloquent with the hum of bees, feeding on liquid sweets from lotuses that bloomed on the breast of the tank. Viewing the scene, it appeared to Srimanta, as if all this were not new to him, as if he had seen the place before. Cogitating thus, he saw some pieces of red cloth, hanging from a Kadamva tree. On a stone at its bottom, were placed things necessary for ablution. At sight of these, the son of Dhana-pati recollected the word of the ascetic. He thereupon began to play on the flúte given by the holy sage. On hearing the sound, immediately the female bird descended from her perch, and sat on the shoulder of Srimanta. As the young man touched her with his hand for catching her, she fell to the ground, and lo! was converted into an exceedingly beautiful and shining lady, with flowing locks, wearing wet clothes; and in this form she stood before the astonished youth. Srimanta gazed steadfastly for a while, like a statue. He then recognized her, and addressing her, "My love!" hugged her to his bosom. Rámnáth was the very image of wonder. "What's this!" exclaimed he. "Did Párvatí live as a bird, for some purpose, to resume her proper form now?" The fair one, reposing on the breast of her charmer, thought, "Even as Rati found new life on the bosom of her restored lord, so have I, on that of my own dear love." She bathed her beloved with tears. "My soul," said her lover, "your tears are withering my bosom,—pray, do you cool it with the ambrosia of your speech."

The damsel was delighted with this speech of her lover, but she could not speak from shame. "I beseech you," went on Srimanta, "do you forgive all my faults." The lady opened her lips, "Soul of my soul, I am ashamed because of the presence of your companion." Srimanta said, "Dear, he is no other than my sister's husband. His name is Rámnáth. He is my best friend. But for his infinite pains on my behalf, it would have been hard for me to regain you. As he is nearly connected with me, you should leave off shame in his presence." Learning this, Pramodá was glad. Then Srimanta asked her, "My love, why are your clothes wet?" "Honey," returned the fair one, "have you forgotten the past? I will remind you of it. We had our home here. Not far from the forest, stands a beautiful brick-built mansion. We lived in it; and passed our days happily. We drank of the pure waters of this river—we sported in it. We knew no harm. Once, taking the necessary things, you came with me to bathe in this tank. You loosened my bound braid, and threw lotuses on my person, by way of dalliance. I drew you by main force, and splashed water and threw lotuses on your lovely person. Gradually we became lost to everything, save the consciousness of ecstasy in each other's embrace. At this point of time, came an ascetic stark naked, and stood on the bank, smiling at the sight of us. Suddenly my gaze fell on him. On seeing him, I hung down my head, and stood in the water mute and motionless. Seeing this alteration in my manner, you took my hand sadly and said, 'My dear love, of what fault have I been suddenly guilty, that you should be at once annoyed with me? If I have, pray, forgive me. Why has the eclipse of indignation darkened that moon of a countenance of yours. My mental light it darkens, dear. If you do not prove kind, I will die.' Touched at your plaintive appeal, I said bashfully, 'Lord, it is not displeasure that has changed me. Look at the cause. A shameless man stark naked, like any beast of the field or bird of the air, with a matted head of hair, is overlooking our sport and laughing. It is this which has made me hang down my head.' 'Where is that villain?' you exclaimed. 'Look there,' said I, 'he is standing there.' Seeing your wrath, and hearing the abuse you applied to him, he shook all over, and roared out, 'Abandoned wretch! you have dared slight me. Die, slave, for this!' No sooner had this curse escaped his lips, than my lord shook like an aspen leaf and fell down dead. The sage then eyed me and said, 'Since you have compared me profanely to the beasts and the fowls, you shall live in the Sandal wood as a bird.' I fell down at his feet and implored mercy. He relented and said with a smile, 'My word will not go for nothing. You will live in this state for some time; after which you shall leave the feathered form, and regain a human shape.' I then rejoined, 'Sire, how shall I meet again with my lord?' 'Your dead lord,' returned the sage, 'shall regain you in his next life.' I then enquired, 'Vouchsafe to inform me where he will take his birth, and how I shall regain him.' The anchorit remarked, 'Your husband shall be born as the son of Dayásindhu, the spice-merchant of Magadha. After he has completed his eighteenth year, he shall hear your tidings from an ascetic, and come in search of you.' 'Sire,' said I, 'how, in his next life, shall I be able to recognise him? And what if I could? Although I shall regain my human form, still I shall then be old, my husband will be a young man. Further, on account of his change of life, the hearts of both of us will alter. And, even if he took me back, I should suffer blame, for communion with a man to whom I was not joined in holy wedlock. So that, holy sage, your blessing is useless to me. I don't require your favor. Permit me to follow my lord. I don't wish to live.' At my lamentation, that best of ascetics said, 'Child, do not fear. Your husband shall appear before you in his present form, so that you will recognize him at once. When he comes to this forest, you shall sit on his shoulder; when he will touch you with his hand, you shall regain your present lovely form, and be blest in the enjoyment of your lord's company.' Saying this, he vanished. Lord, since then I have been living as a bird in this wood. I have been counting days. Through my good fortune, you have come here to-day and freed me from my feathered existence. I am now completely blest. But, love, let me ask of you one thing—What's the cause of your coming here? Did you remember the past?" "Beloved," replied Srimanta, "I have no other motive of coming here; it is only to regain you that I am here, after travelling many countries. I didn't remember an iota of the facts of my former life. I learned the facts relating to this Sandal wood from an ascetic, and have come here to regain you, and I have received you back." "Will you kindly satisfy my curiosity," asked the damsel, "by relating in detail what the ascetic told you?" Srimanta began, "A nude anchoret appeared before me and said, 'Ho youth, in former life you were the son of a wealthy Vaisya. Your name was Priyamvada. Your parents departed this life while you were yet a child. You were brought up by your maternal aunt, who educated you in various branches of learning, and married you to a girl, named Gandhinī. Gandhinī was not a very fair-looking girl, and was disliked by you. For this reason, after much search, your aunt married you for the second time to a girl named Pramodā. Having obtained Pramodā, you became exceedingly enamoured of her, and always remained at her side. One day, you went to sport in the waters with Pramodā, when a nude anchorēt came there; and being slighted by you, cursed you in wrath. In virtue of this curse, you met your end. Then you have taken your birth as the son of Dhana-pati.' After relating all this, he handed me a flute. He then added, 'Go to the Sandal wood, with this pipe. On hearing its notes, a female bird will alight on your shoulder. At the touch of your hand, she will leave off her bird-like form, and regain her own. You will thus regain your Pramodā.' Then the sage narrated what had befallen Gandhinī, and after this, vanished." Pramodā said, "My dearest love, if you do not feel weary, oblige me by detailing what befell Gandhinī." "I will," answered Srimanta, "tell you what I have heard from the hermit. When the ascetic I have told you of, had vanished, after having cursed us, Gandhinī came to the tank in search of us. On finding my dead body, and not finding you at all, she broke out into lamentations. Melted by her tears, the ascetic again appeared on the scene, and acquainted her with the calamity that had crushed us. Gandhinī fell at the feet of the hermit, and supplicated, 'Sire, I am helpless. As I am an ugly thing, I have never been beloved of my lord. Whenever my lord had expressed his dissatisfaction with me, I have never taken it to heart. I was always engaged in serving my lord. I have never looked with dissatisfaction on anything which my lord held dear. Since I could distinguish right from wrong, I have never looked on any other man with impure thoughts. Lord, I am perpetually wretched; for what sin have you inflicted on me the terrible penalty of widowhood? I am not conscious of any transgression towards you; do you, lord, grant my prayer that I may regain my lord in this life; or else, I will hang myself outright; and you shall bear on your head the sin of having killed a woman.' The sage complacently said, 'With whatever prayer you will resign your life at the junction of the Ganges with the ocean, shall be granted you in next life.' On hearing this, the girl took farewell of the ascetic, and going to the place to which she was directed, prayed that in her next state of existence she might be a surpassingly beautiful woman, remembering her former life, that she might regain her late husband, and that she might gain his affections. Praying thus, she gave up the ghost. Gandhiní was born as the daughter of Vadra Sen Ráy, of Rámnagar. Her name is Naliní. Lately I have wedded her. All this I have learnt from the ascetic."

On hearing this relation, Pramodá dropped down to the ground in a trance. Srimanta took her up in his lap and found that she was certainly dead. At this Srimanta began to cry. Rámnáth at once came up to him and asked, "Why do you weep, eh?" "Satisfy yourself as to the cause, with your own eyes," said his companion, "What shall I say?" Having heard the strange incidents, Rámnáth said, "Probably you have told her the history of Gandhiní. And her trance is owing to that." "Excuse me," cried Srimanta. "I see that my days are numbered here. You are my best of friends. Do you prepare without delay a funeral pyre. I will plunge into it and put a stop to all my miseries. Afterwards, go to my dear parents, and conveying my infinite reverence to their hallowed feet, say, 'Your Srimanta has bidden you an everlasting adieu, and has entered the funeral pyre.' Do you then console them. Let my dear sister be always at their side, so that their grief may be partially assuaged. Henceforth you are their only stay; pray see that they do not come to trouble. O God! is it to get this luckless wretch of a son that they fasted and prayed? I am a great sinner. It is for my sin in coming here without seeing them, that this has befallen me. O mother! O father! O my dear sister! I shall die without seeing you—I name you for the last time. Farewell!" Rámnáth's eyes filled with tears at the lamentations of his friend. Unable to contain himself, he said, "Forbear, my friend. It ill becomes you to put an end to your life, for a bird. If you die, don't think that I will ever return to our country. I will put a question to you. Do you answer it and do what you like." "Pray, out with it," said Srimanta. "I have not long to live, my voice is being choked." Rámnáth rejoined, "When we were coming to this place, the husbandmen and the fishermen told us that those who went to the Sandal forest never returned. This is about to be verified now. Probably this fatal bird destroys incomers, sometimes as a tigress, at others as a woman, at others again, as a female bird. Whatever it be, it ill seems sensible men to abandon themselves to grief. Resigning all affection for the mother who has borne you for ten months in her womb, and for the father, who has brought you up with affection, you certainly deserve censure for this impatience. You should now return to your parents and make them happy." Srimanta fell down to the ground in a trance. Seeing this state of his friend, Rámnáth thought, "This is not so very bad, after all. At this opportunity, I will burn the body of this syren; and then, consoling Srimanta for what is past and buried, take him home to his house." Thinking thus, he prepared a pyre, and no sooner had he thrown the corpse in it, than Padmavatí, the maid of the goddess, Mahámáyá, who was passing by that place, and who had seen this action of Rámnáth, said, as a dreadful aerial voice, with great wrath and gnashing of teeth, "Villain, dost thou attempt to consume the body of the innocent Promodá, and thereby heap on thy head the crime of killing a woman? Dost thou not fear to commit this crime?" As Rámnáth went into a trance on hearing this dread voice, Srimanta and Promodá sat up, like persons on awaking. Finding Promodá revived, her formerly disconsolate husband was ready to die for very joy. "Life of life," exclaimed he, "the sight of your moon-like countenance has brought life into my dead body." He was thus giving vent to his feelings, when he saw Rámnáth insensible on the ground, at some distance. Taking him to be dead, he said with tears in his eyes, "Friend of my bosom ! have you put an end to your existence, because I did not accept your word. If I happened to be guilty through ignorance, pray, do you forgive and answer me. Else I will make away with myself." Saying this, he took up a log of wood, and was going to strike it at his head, when Promodá snatched it away from him and cast it at a distance. Then Srimanta began to laugh, weep, dance, call Rámnáth aloud like a maniac. Seeing the plight of her husband, Promodá said, "O God ! dost thou not relent, even after afflicting this wretch of a woman in innumerable ways ? If it would be no better, it were far better for me to pass my days as a bird in this wilderness." She then took hold of Srimanta's hand and said in softly sweet accents, "Husband, if Rámnáth do not recover, it behoves us to resign our lives. But first let us offer up prayers to the Deity, for everything may be compassed through Divine grace. Let us bathe in this tank, and address ourselves to our devotions. If Rámnáth do not then recover, we will throw ourselves in this blazing pyre." Srimanta consented and said, "My mother has got me by worshipping Kátyáyani. Let us worship even her. If my friend do not revive by this, we shall sacrifice ourselves in the pyre."

Then they made a clay image, and gathering wild flowers and blown lotuses, worshipped the goddess with them. Seeing all unavailing, they took rounds about the pyre, when, lo! a tottering old woman with a load of Sandal wood, supporting herself upon a staff, appeared before them, weeping loudly, and drawing near to Rámnáth, said, "I have left my home for a long time to go upon pilgrimages. I had my house here. Perhaps, it has been ruined for want of a protector. Where shall I shelter my head in this old age?" Then addressing Rámnáth, she said, "Who are you, fellow? Why do you obstruct my way by lying here? Have you no other place to lie down?" Saying this, as she struck the body of Rámnáth with her staff, lo! the young man sat up, and the old woman vanished. Having seen this marvel, Srimanta and Promodá said, "My Rámnáth, we were going to plunge into the pyre, taking you for lost, when an old woman, with loud wail, struck you with her staff. You have revived, and the old woman has vanished. Now, we should not tarry here a moment. We shall relate all, when we shall have removed ourselves to some other place." "For these days," replied Rámnáth, "we have not touched a morsel. Let me therefore procure some fruits from this forest. Remain here for some time." "Nay, you should not go alone," said his friend, "let us all go together." Promodá said "Let us first slake our thirst by drinking of this tank, and then think of going elsewhere, in search of food." Then thy descended to the tank, and slaked their thirst, by drinking water, each with his or her joined palms. After this, as they were going through the forest, they saw a beautiful building. Promodá said, "There's our residence."

Rámnáth was curious to enter in, but Srimanta objected to it, saying, "We have met with many misfortunes here. No need of seeing anything here." But his friend was importunate. So they entered the place, and went up to the first and second floors, and feasted their eyes with seeing the richly furnished apartments. They took it to be the residence of some god, for such odour was impossible in any human residence. They saw a quantity of various fruits in one chamber, as also savoury dishes of diverse kinds, the plates, in number three, and engraved each with a name, being of gold. At sight of these dishes, they looked around to see any human beings; but none was to be found. With apprehension, Srimanta said, "Without doubt, this place belongs to some god. We shall come to grief, if we tarry here." "Lord," said Promodá, "seeing this strange sight, my mind is swelling with thoughts, which I fear to tell you. If you believe, I will tell. Formerly, when we lived here, your wife Gándhiní used to prepare such dishes for us, daily. Probably, the day on which the anchoret cursed us, the girl had prepared these dishes for us, which have providentially remained in the same state. But "this idea is wild, and you need place no faith in it. But the sight of the plates engraved with names convinces me of it." Then they examined them, and said, "All is possible to the Divine agency. However, we should make all haste to leave this place." Thereupon, as they were preparing to leave the house, an ærial voice said, "Ho ! Where are you going, leaving ready food ? If you reject this, you will fare ill." Hearing this superhuman speech suddenly, they knew not what to do,—when, lo ! some person appeared before them, and said, "Friends, you need not fear: fall to." Then Śrīmanta said, "When repeated divine commands are heard, desiring us to eat, we should not hesitate." Then the three sat down to eat. When in the act of eating the wonderful dishes, it struck Śrīmanta that he had eaten such somewhere before. "Gāndhinī used to cook so," said Promodā. Having finished, they washed their hands and faces, and chewed betels. They then came to the tank in the house, and were talking of departure, when they perceived a light in the sky, and were alarmed. The light neared, and now they could clearly see a stately fiery figure in a golden car. Seeing this, all trembled from fear. The fiery form alighted, and taking hold of all the three, took them into his car. Then he soared with his car to the sky. Śrīmanta spoke to the person in fear, "Sir, harm us not. We throw ourselves on your mercy." "No fear," answered the person. "All of you are dear to me. You needn't apprehend any danger from me." He then alighted at a golden palace, and entered in with his companions. The very touch of the ground filled Srimanta with delight; he thought that, perhaps, it was heaven itself; where else could such buildings be found? Then the blazing personage brought the three before the Gandarva, Puspa-danta, (flower-teeth), who was hearing music. Coming to him, he said, "My Lord, I have brought them from the Sandal forest; and they await your commands." Hearing this intelligence, the prince was excited, and said, "Where? Where is that youth? Hand him to me first." At this, Srimanta concluded that, it was no heaven, as he had falsely surmised; but Lanká, and that this man was its king. "He will eat me up, no doubt; otherwise, why should he be so eager to take hold of me, on hearing that we were come?" As the king extended his arms, the messenger handed Srimanta to him. The young man was terribly affrighted, and said with tears in his eyes, "O Lord of Rákshasas, pray do not devour me. I am the only son of my mother. I throw myself upon your mercy. I have not committed any wrong in your sight; save that we three had eaten the dishes that we found ready at the house in the Sandal forest. But that was not done by our own free will. The divine voice first enjoined us to eat, still we held out: the voice said a second time, 'If you neglect my word, you will fare ill.' We ate, in obedience to that behest. If we have erred in that, I beseech you to forgive us for our unconscious offence." The king of Gandarvas laughed at the piteous appeal of Srimanta, and said, "Why do you weep from fear? You have not transgressed, neither is there any cause of fear. You think that I am a Rákshasa, and that I will eat you up. It is not so. My name is Puspadanta. I am your maternal grandfather. I have not seen you long, and it is for this reason, that I have brought you here. But do you first touch my eyes with your hand; then I shall tell you all." Then, as Srimanta touched the Gandarva's eyes with his hand, he received his sight, and eying the court around, and having rendered thanks to the Father of mercies, he took up the youth, and danced for joy. Then Srimantā, Rāmnāth and Promodā paid their obeisance to the feet of the Prince and asked his grace. The court said, on the restoration of the prince's sight, "We consider ourselves blest at the removal of the curse, and the restoration of Your Highness' sight." Then the king took his three guests into the inner apartment. The queen could not contain her joy at the happy event; and said in tones thrilling with emotion, "Your Majesty, my happiness knows no bounds on your cure, and I can expect no higher joy than I feel at the sight of my grandchild. Now, may it please Your Majesty to point me out the child of my Sukeshā." "Does not Your Majesty remember?" said the king. "Our Sukesha is a human being now; her name is Tāravatī. This is her son, Srimanta. This girl, named Promodá is his wife, and this youth is the husband of Srimanta's sister." The king having explained this, they all three paid their reverence to the royal pair. The Queen stretched forth her arms, and embraced Srimanta. After pronouncing blessings on Promodá and Rámnáth, they enquired of the good news of Táravatí. Srimanta informed his grandmother in detail of all the circumstances, and said to the king, "Your Majesty, I belong to the human race. I am quite ignorant of the manners and customs of the Gandharvas. I don't know which word gives offence, and which not. If you forgive me, I will ask Your Majesty some questions." The king was pleased with the humility of the young man, and said "Child, you are always at liberty to speak out your mind without reserve. Pray don't fear to do so. Whatever you may have to ask, I will answer." Then Srimanta asked, "O lord of Gandharvas! you say that my mother is your daughter. Then why did you curse her? Why again were you blind? I am extremely curious to know all this. May it please your Majesty to satisfy my curiosity in detail on all these points."

"My child," returned the king, "your mother was borne by my queen, and went by the name of Sukeshá. She daily paid her devotions to Kátyáyani in the Vindya Mountains. Once, as she was going to worship, I called her on some business. She, however, went out without obeying me. This put me into a rage and I said, 'You have disobeyed my call. For this offence, you shall take a human form.' Then Sukchá burst into tears and said, 'Father, it ill beseems a parent to punish his child more than is adequate. In virtue of your word, I shall have to be born among mortals. But do you confer this blessing on me, that the goddess Kátyáyani may be always propitious to me.' When Sukeshá thus prayed to me, I said, 'Be it so.' Then while I sat speechless in grief on account of my child, the ascetic, Garga, came in. On account of my absorption, I did not notice him. At this unconscious slight, the holy man flew into a rage, and exclaimed, 'O! hard-hearted Gandharva, you have cursed your unoffending daughter, and puffed up with the pride of wealth, has now slighted me, without deigning even to cast a glance at me! For this reason, you shall be struck blind.' At this terrible calamity, I rose up, and with fear and trembling threw myself down at the feet of the sage. At that time I could just see his feet. Afterwards losing sight of them, I took hold of the sage's feet and lamented loud. Seeing that I was disconsolate, the great man relented. He said, 'My word needs must take effect. But to console you, I will say this. When the daughter whom you have cursed will take her birth in the nether world, she shall bring forth a son, the touch of whose hand on your eyes will restore your divine sight.' Then in all humility I asked that best of sages 'O merciful sage! what personage will take his birth in the womb of my daughter; and how shall I come by him? Tell me this, holy sage.' 'You will learn every thing,' replied the anchorite 'if you worship the god of gods, Mahádeva, for a year, in the Kailásha mountains.' Saying this, the sage vanished. Then I began my austerities in the Kailásha mountains. At the end of a year, the god of gods, with Nadikeshwar, appeared before me, and said, 'O king of Gandharvas ! I am pleased with your prayers. Do you ask for a boon.' 'Lord !' said I, 'if thou hast been pleased with thy servant, then first restore his sight.' Mahádeva said, 'The word of a Rishi is infallible. You shall afterwards receive your sight, according to his promise.' Then I asked, 'God, by virtue of my curse, my daughter, Sukeshá, is now a human being. What great man will take his birth in her womb, the touch of whom is to cure my blindness ? And how will he, being a human being, come to the world of the Gandharvas ? Vouchsafe to tell this to thy devotee ?' 'Lord of the Gandharvas,' replied the worshipper-loving God, 'Listen ! Once before this, in order to worship me, Kuvera brought flowers, garlands, Sandal-paste, and other articles necessary for worship, and went away to bring a quantity of Ganges water. In the meantime Ballika, the son of the Jaksha, Isu, came there strolling with his two wives. Seeing the fresh garlands, he took them up, and hung them on his own neck and those of his wives. On coming there, Nandikeshwar found that the articles of Kuvera had been desecrated ; and enraged at this, said, 'Impious wretches, as you have despoiled the articles set apart for worship, so you shall be born on earth.'

Then Ballika took hold of Nandikeshwara's feet, and wept. Nandikeswar said, 'You shall regain your native seat at the Gandharva heaven, after two births.' So the cursed souls were reduced to ashes. That Jakhya is now the son of a merchant in Uddīpanī, named Chitrasena. His present name is Prīyamvada, and his two wives were born in the family of another merchant, and have become his partners. The way in which Prīyamvada, taking his birth in the womb of your daughter, will cure you of blindness, Nandikeshwar will reveal to you." Therefore, my child, through the grace of Nandikeshwar, I was kept informed of all that had befallen you. Then when you were cursed at Uddīpanī, I gave you the supremacy of the Saṇḍal forest and all that pertained thereto.' All the things that you have seen there, belong to you. I have brought you here for my own sake."

All the circumstances that Srimanta had heard of from the ascetic, pertaining to the Sandal-wood, were detailed anew by the king of Gandharvas. Having heard all this, Srimantā began to hymn his grandfather. Being pleased with his humility and reverence, the king said, "My child, after so long, to-day has seen my troubles crowned with success. Now, whatever blessings you will ask at my hands, I will give you." Whatever blessings Srimanta asked were rendered him. Then he enquired, "Your Majesty, I was formerly the son of a Jakhya ;—I am greatly curious to see my former parents. If you will, you can make me see them." In accordance with this request of his grandson, the king ordered a servant to call in the Jakha, Isu. The man immediately brought him in. On coming before the throne, Isu asked, "May it please Your Majesty to tell me why you have called me." Then pointing to Srimanta, the king said, "O Jaksha, do you recognise this gentleman?" "No, Your Majesty," replied the person, "I can't." Then the king of Gandharvas explained the relation between the two. Srimanta bowed down his head at the feet of his Jakhya father, and took the dust of his feet. The Jakhya took Srimanta in his lap, kissed and smelled his son's crown, and enquired for his good news. "My son, where are my two daughters-in-law now?" Srimanta hung down his head and answered, "Father, of my two wives, this lady is called Pramodá. She is my second wife; my first wife is at home." Then Pramodá worshipped the feet of her father-in-law, and related all the circumstances of her life. All rejoiced. Afterwards, Srimanta said to the king of the Gandharvas, in all humility, "I consider myself blest in seeing you, Sir. Now I am extremely anxious to see my mother. May it please Your Majesty to fulfil my wish." "Ho Jaksha," said His Majesty, "take Srimanta to your home, and satisfy him." Hearing this, the Jaksha said, "I will, Sire. I was only waiting for Your Majesty's command. Let me then take Srimanta with me." He thereupon took all three, and calling in his wife, said, "The son for whom you always weep, and who has gone to the nether world for the curse of Nandikeswar, is now before you." At this, the Jakshinī grew mad for joy, and seeing two men and a woman said, "Lord, which of the two is my Ballika?" The Jaksha said, "This is your Ballika. He has received a human shape, and is called Srimanta. The other young man is Srimanta's brother-in-law. The lady you see is the younger wife of your son. The elder is at her house." When the Jaksha had given this information, they all three paid their reverence at the feet of the lady. She took Srimanta in her lap, kissed him and asked, "O son, how do you fare in your human form?" Srimanta related every thing in detail. Then the Jakshinī said, "O son, do you once call me mother, and suck at my breast. I will confer this blessing on you. When you shall be hungry, on remembering me, your stomach shall be filled with mother's milk; and you shall get such an accession of strength that the most laborious work will not fatigue you. You shall be always victorious in war. You shall never grow old. Further I will give you a ring. In virtue of this, whatever you desire, you will have. In short, you will be equal to the gods in power. If anybody shall steal this ring, he will not be able to keep it; it will return to your finger. I will further tell you this. She in whose womb you have taken your birth, was formerly the daughter of a Gandharva. I used to worship Kātyāyanī with her in the Vindya mountains. For some cause she is now a mortal." Then Srimanta said with clasped hands, "Mother, tell me how you have obtained the ring you have favoured me with.”

“List, my child,” said the dama. “In days of yore, at the churning of the Ocean, when rose Laksmí from the milky deep Ocean, presented the dámsel to Náráyana, and offered this ring to him as dower. Náráyana gladly wore it on his finger. Afterwards, as he was worshipping the god of gods, with ten millions of lotuses, in order to test the reverence of his worshipper, Mahádeva stole away a lotus. Knowing this, Náráyana plucked out the eye that graced his forehead, and offered it to the feet of the god. The god was pleased, and gave him a lotus eye instead. Since then Hari goes by the name of the ‘Lotus-eyed.’ Náráyana also offered this ring at the feet of Mahádeva. At this, the great god conferred the wished-for blessing and vanished. Then the lord of Umá gave this ring to his spouse. When Bhagabatí was preparing to go to her father, Dakha’s ceremony, my father Kuvera decked out the damsel in jewels and gold, and among other ornaments, put this ring on her finger. My father gave it to me as my dower. Now I give it to you as a token of affection.”

Hearing this strange adventure of the ring, Srimanta was proud in possessing it; and said to his mother, with clasped hands, “Mother, I have a wish. If you permit, I will disclose it to you.”

“A son,” replied the mother, “can demand anything of his mother. If the thing lie in my power, you shall have it, child.”

Then Srimanta said, “Mother, I am extremely anxious to see your father.”

“My child,” returned the dame, "my father was angry with you. Therefore I cannot take you before him without knowing his mind. First, I shall acquaint him with your intention; then as he says, we shall do. Therefore stay here a little," She then went to Kuvera, and having gained his permission, brought Srimanta before him. Srimanta paid his reverence at the feet of his grandfather, and stood before him with clasped hands. Kuvera asked his daughter, "My child, is this your son, Ballika?" "Yes, Sire," returned the daughter. "He is my son." Then the king of Jakshas embraced Srimanta, and having enquired of his good news, said, "O child, I was in grief for your curse. To-day the sight of you makes up for all that. The blessings which have been showered upon you by the king of Gandharvas, and more especially the ring given to you by your mother, have well compensated your troubles; so that, although a mortal, you are equal to us in power." "Sire," replied the youth, "in your satisfaction is my best reward. Now I wish to wash off my sins, by seeing Nandikeshwar." Then the king of Jakshas appeared before Nandikeshwar with Srimanta, and after paying his reverence to the god, began to pray to him. Nandikeshwar was pleased with his devotee's prayer, and said, "Srimanta, you are blest. In your next life, you shall see Mahádeva." In the meantime, the ascetic, who formerly had appeared before Srimanta, came in with a smile. "What! Srimanta," said he, "do you know me?" Srimanta bowed at the feet of the sage, and said, "Sire, I have all my desires through your grace; nay, being a human being, I have seen heaven itself. What more can I expect?" Then the lord of Jakshas took farewell of Nandikeshwar, and returning to his own house with Srimanta, presented a loadstone to his grandson. "Your treasury," he said, "will always be full by the charm of this gem." In the meantime a messenger had come. He said, "Sirs, the king of Gandharvas is expecting your return. Pray, do not delay any more. Come there at once." Hearing this, the Jakshini took her daughter-in-law in her lap, with tearful eyes, and blessed her, "My child, may you enjoy the perpetual spring of youth and be loved by your husband!" Then Srimanta, Rámnáth and Promodá bowed at the feet of the Jaksha couple, and asked their permission to go. The prince of Jakshas loaded them with presents, and they took their farewell. Then, on arriving at the house of the Gandharva king, Srimanta related all that had happened. The king said, "Srimanta, you have never seen a Gandharva court. To-day a court is to be held; come and see." Saying this, he took Srimanta and Rámnáth and came to the court. As they entered, the guests rose up, and welcomed them with every mark of respect. The king sat on his throne. Srimanta and Rámnáth sat on his left, on lower seats. The guests sat on their respective seats. Seeing the wonder of the company in seeing two human beings, the king, addressing the multitude, said, "Ethereal virtues! Of these two, this is my maternal grandchild. He was formerly a Jaksha, named Ballika. He has taken this form, by the curse of Nandikeshwar. He is no man. His touch has cured my blindness. It is to entertain him that we are assembled here." Hearing this, the guests were exceedingly glad. Then began music. Seeing and hearing things and sounds not seen by human eyes or heard by human ears, Srimanta and Rámnáth thought, "Is this divine enchantment or a glorious dream?" They wondered at it every moment. Then the meeting broke, and each wended to his own place.

The king of Gandharvas with Srimanta and Rámnáth, returned to his quarters, and they rested for the night. While asleep, Srimanta dreamed a dream, the purport of which was, that his mother Táravatí, disconsolate for her son, was going into trances frequently. Seeing this, Srimanta cried from excess of grief. It awakened the people: They rushed in and saw that the youth was crying. The king of the Gandharvas took him into his lap, and with words of encouragement, asked, "Child, pray, why are you weeping?" Encouraged by the words of his grandfather, he told him of his dream. The king then said, "What fear for that? You shall go to your home this very night. Soothe yourself. I am going to make the arrangements." Pacifying him thus, the king went out.

On the other hand, Padmavatí was painting another dream on Táravatí's mind. She dreamed that a Brahminí, who had her husband, came to her and said, "Táravati, up! Your Srimanta is coming with his bride, accompanied with Rámnáth. Do you prepare the things necessary for receiving the pair auspiciously." Táravati started up in surprise, and related her dream to Dhanapati, whose joy knew no bounds. He immediately called his officers, and said, "Do you prepare the articles for worship, clean the temple, unfurl the flags, place pitchers with mango leaves, at intervals, and plantain trunks on each side." On receiving this order, the officers went about carrying it out. The women were engaged in procuring articles for auspicious rites. Then they, with the Brahmin ladies, remained gazing at the direction from which Srimanta was expected to come. The joy of Ketakí and Naliní was boundless;—every one knows the happiness that results from meeting with one we love. Ketakí said, "To-day we shall see the new bride." "Yes, my girl," said Naliní, "for a long time we have not seen our Prámódá." "Were you," replied Ketakí, "acquainted with her formerly; else how could you know her name to be Prámódá?" Naliní said with a smile, "I shall say nothing now; you will know all afterwards." From this, Ketakí could not know whether her companion's word was true or otherwise.

On the other hand, the king of the Gandharvas came to Srimanta and said, "All things are in readiness for your departure. Now, learn a bit of Gandharva lore." He then imparted some incantations to his grandchild. At this juncture, the Jakhya,

Isu, appeared with his wife, and affectionately taught his son many things. Then Srimanta bowed to the ground before the king of Gandharvas and that of Jakshas, and, after paying his reverence to his grandmother and mother, took farewell. The Gandharva king directed his retainers to conduct the three safely. Thereupon they told them to sit on a stone and close their eyes. "When we shall tell you to re-open your eyes, open them." When the three sat on the stone, the servants took the stone on their heads, and began their aerial journey. By order of the Jaksha king, fourteen jewelled barks stood ready in the king's harbour. The servants of the Gandharva placed the three on board one of the barks, and said, "Pray, re-open your eyes. You have arrived in your country." Then they did as they were asked, and saw that they were actually in their own country. At this they marvelled greatly. "How could we come here in a twinkling?" said Srimanta. "A little before this, we were on the heads of the servants. Wherefrom is this bark! We never came by the sea! How could all this befall?" Reading his thoughts, the men, with clasped hands, said, "All these jewelled barks have been presented to you by the Jaksha prince. They are yours." "This is true," said the servants of the Gandharva. "It is for this that we have placed you here." Hearing this, Srimanta thought, "Should the fame of all this wealth reach the ears of our king, he will surely not be able to resist the temptation. So let me call the king of Gandharvas." Upon this, he recited the eftsoons;—I burn to see you for the nonce."

• Anon the Gandharva appeared and asked Srimanta,
 "Why have you remembered me in so short a time?
 Tell me. If you are in danger, I will arrest it in no time." Srimanta said, "Lord, the riches wherewith you have graciously enriched me are unattainable on earth. Our king may appropriate them by force.
 It is from this fear that I have called you." "Child," replied the Gandharva, "in virtue of your Gandharva lore, you can conquer the three worlds,—you know every illusion. I am always by you, on remembrance; so that there breathes not a soul in all the three worlds who can defeat or injure you. No fear.
 Now it behoves you to see all the riches that the Jaksha king and I have given you." Thereupon, the king showed him all the wealth, and related the virtues of every article. He then said, "It is about daybreak. See! see! the hare-spotted luminary is about to bid adieu; the sages are on their way to the river-side; the sun is advancing, swallowing the ocean of darkness, like Agastya of yore. The birds are leaving their nests, and with sweet notes are going in different directions." Saying this, the king vanished. When the day broke, the officers of the Gandharva fired guns.
 Hearing the reports, the keeper of the prince's harbour came, and enquired, "Wherefrom are you?
 Don't you know that nobody can come in without the permission of our prince? When you have dared fire guns and beat drums, you must be a hostile party. But see, yonder are fifteen ships furnished with guns. If you wish to live, fly away; else prepare to give battle. If you come for commerce, you should first obtain a letter patent from His Majesty, or else we shall not allow you to put your vessels in harbour. If you should belong to this country, let us know who you are, for your good." "Friends," replied Srimanta, "we are no foes, or foreign merchants. I am the son of the Srestí, Dhanapati. My name is Srimanta. I went for commerce. Now I have returned to my country. Do you convey intelligence of this to my father." On this the guards ran off to Dhanapati and reported the matter to him. Hearing this, Dhanapati, accompanied with his friends and priests, came to the shore. Seeing him, Srimanta and Rámnáth both alighted on shore, and paid their reverence to him. "O father," exclaimed Srimanta, "I am your worthless son. You have suffered greatly on my account. Do you forgive my transgressions?" Then Dayásindhu took Srimanta in his lap and consoled him with affectionate words. He then consoled Rámnáth, and seeing the many wonderful things that they had brought, said, "Far from seeing these things, my boy, I have not even heard their names." Some stood like statues at sight of the articles. Some said, "Srimanta is no common man, and why should not this be so? He who is blest by the goddess Mshámáyá can compass everything." All said, “Let us all pray that Srimanta and Rámnáth may live long; and that they may revere Mahámáyá always. Then Dayásindhu placed her daughter-in-law in a litter, and went home. .

Táravatí, Ketakí and Naliní were expecting the entrance of Srimanta in the hall of Chándí, when Dayásindhu entered with his son, new daughter-in-law and son-in-law, and they all paid their reverence to the goddess. When Srimanta and Rámnáth bowed at the feet of Táravatí, she, with tearful eyes, took her son in her lap, smelled his head, kissed him, and enquired for his good news. She then entered her house with her new daughter-in-law. All the citizens were loud in their praises of Táravatí's fortune. Then she performed the Stri-áchára ceremony, as observed by her class. She then addressed her son, thus, “O son, I am blest with you. Pray do you eat a little now.” When Srimanta had eaten, he sat by his mother and related his adventures. After listening him out, his mother said, “My Srimanta, how do I wish to see my father, the king of Gandharvas now! If you can make me see him, I then attain my desire.” “Very well, mother,” answered Srimanta, “you will see the prince tomorrow night.” On the other hand, Ketakí was talking with her two sisters-in-law. Naliní said to Pramodá, “Sister, I cannot express my joy on seeing your moon-like face, after many a day.” Then Pramodá laid the hanging end of her cloth around her neck, and bowing to the ground said, with tears, “Do you recognise me ?” “Sister,” replied Pramodá, “I am your servant for ever and a day. I have always thought on your feet. But owing to the malice of Fortune, you came by griefs for a time at my hands. Pray, excuse the past and smile on me.” “The fortunes of both of us,” rejoined Naliní, “are equal. How are you to blame ? I have reaped but what Fortune had decreed. But tell me, tell me, how you have regained your husband.” Then Pramodá began, “In virtue of the sage’s curse, I lived a bird at the place, for the length of eighteen years. The day after that on which the curse had ended, our husband appeared at the place, and delivered me. The spot now goes by the name of the ‘Sandal-forest, and is desolate now. But what is the wonder, the dishes you had prepared for us, had not been spoiled, but were fresh till that day. We fed on them. All this speaks of your greatness.” She then narrated the incidents at the world of Gandharvas, and asked Naliní for a description of the way in which she had regained her husband. Naliní said, “Listen ! When you had been changed into a bird, I appeared on the spot, and found our love a corpse. A person irradiating with fiery lustre, stood there. I took hold of the feet of the sage, and began to wail, when he related all that had befallen you two. He then said, ‘Child, do not grieve more. You also are a virtuous girl. You shall regain your husband.’ I then asked him, ‘Lord, by what means shall I regain my lost lord ?’ Thereupon that best of ascetics said, ‘With whatever desire you will resign your life at the junction of the Ganges with the ocean, shall be attained.' Accordingly I went to the place, and with the desire of regaining my husband, resigned my life ; and having been born as the daughter of Vakra Sen, have regained our lord."

The girls were talking thus, when Srimanta entered and greeted them. They were thus engaged in sweet converse, when a maid-servant entered and said, "Sir, a messenger from the prince is at our place. The governor desires your presence." Hearing this, Srimanta went to Dhanapati, who said, "My son, the prince desires to see you ; do you therefore go to the Presence with Rám. Present His Highness with whatever jewels you like." Having bowed at his father's feet, Srimanta took some precious jewels, and went to the king with Rámnáth. When they came to the gate, a warder went to the Presence, with this news. The king gave his permission for the entrance of the comers. The warder brought Srimanta and Rámnáth before the king. The king was on his throne, his unmarried daughter at his side ; the officers were engaged in work. The king was struck with the beauty of Srimanta, and blessed God, for the delight at seeing a youth so transcendantly beautiful. "If he were of royal blood," thought he, "I would have married him to my lovely lily of a daughter." The courtiers were also affected ; the daughter of the king gazed at Srimanta steadfastly. Seeing this, her maid-servant took her away into the inner apartment. Then when the king asked him to sit down, Srimanta sat and began to talk with the king. When Srimanta presented him the jewels, he thought, "Such gems are not to be found ever in my treasury. I will ask him, how he has come by these. Well, Srimanta," said he, addressing the youth, "tell me how you have come by such a priceless treasure?" Hearing this, Srimanta thought within himself, "Concealing the actual truth, I should tell the king that I have got them through superhuman agency." Thereupon he began, "May it please Your Highness, I went from Dravira to the Punjab for the purpose of commerce, and stayed there for three months. When I had acquired a sum of money there, I went to Ceylon. I prospered there, and at last embarked for home. On the fourth day of our voyage, the evening brought with it such a violent tempest, that the sailors were unable to save the ship. I was terribly frightened. Seeing no other means of saving my life, I tied together some gourds with a rope, and resigning myself to the mercy of Heaven, plunged into the boisterous deep. Your Majesty, the recollection of that day still fills me with fear. I can't say whether the ship weathered it or not. I went on floating, but could not say whither. The next day, about noon, I descried a sandy island. I went in that direction and reached land. But I could not walk from fatigue. For preserving myself, I fell on the ground on my knees. When I had dried in the sun, I looked around and found a child. 'How,' thought I, 'could this child come here. Perhaps, it has met with a like calamity with myself.' I came up to the child, and found that he was digging the ground and taking up heaps of gems. When I neared, he said with a smile, 'Do you once take me in your lap.' My lord, the sweet music of his lips made my heart glad. Anon, I took him up, when lo! all my bodily and mental uneasiness vanished. Then I asked him, 'Little thing! how came you to live here alone? Where are your parents?' He smiled and said, 'My parents are under these waters. I am digging up these gems for you. Do you take these away to your father and mother.' I again asked the boy, 'Do you once call your parents; I wish to see them.' 'My father,' said the child, 'lives sometimes in water, sometimes within the earth, at others in the air. See! See! My father is sailing through the air!' Saying this, he played with the dust, and taking out a fruit, gave it to me to eat. I gave half of it to the boy, who began to eat it with relish. I ate the other half, and it seemed to me as if I had eaten nectar. This world furnishes nothing like that sensation. Now the sun was sinking down to the west. The moon rose and spread his silver net.* At sight of this the boy was filled with glee, and began to play. When the noon of night had gone by, the boy told me, 'Look, your ships are coming.' I looked, and saw some ships. I took them to be some merchantmen, belonging to others. 'I am entirely at the mercy of God; if these men come in this direction, they will take pity upon me and take me into a ship.'

* * The moon is a male in the Sanskrit literature.

I was thinking thus, when the boy said, 'What you are thinking is not the case. These are your own ships. At daybreak, you will go in and away to your home.' At morning, the ships landed. Now I saw that these were actually my ships. When the mariners saw me, they said, 'Sir, ever since you had leaped into the ocean, we had been searching you. Pray, get in.' Then when I asked farewell of the boy, he said, 'Do you fill your ships with the gems that I have collected.' In accordance with this, I ordered the sailors to do so, and they did it. Then when the boy entered the ship with me, the ships sailed. Both of us lay down on a bed, and when we felt inclined to sleep, the ships landed at your Majesty's harbour. The sailors sounded the drum, and we woke up. Seeing all these strange things, I was going to hymn the boy, when he said, 'Do you protect your fourteen ships. I go to my own place. Whenever any danger impend over you, I shall protect you.' Saying this, he vanished. As I was wailing his loss, the policemen of Your Majesty came to me and enquired of my name and lineage. Having furnished them with the information, I went home. Then as I was about to set out to see Your Majesty, in came Your Majesty's envoy. 'Father desired me to come to the Presence at once. I consider myself blest with the sight of Your Majesty. Having heard Srimanta out, the king eyed his minister askance, and said to Srimanta, 'Now you may go. We shall see you again at another time.'"

Seeing the delay of Srimanta in returning from the palace, both Naliní and Pramodá became anxious. On the other hand, when Srimanta had taken his departure, the king said to his minister, "The story of the merchant's son strikes me as untrue. He may have gained the gems from various countries; and from fear lest others should know of it, he has accounted for his acquisition by calling in the aid of supernatural events. However, my merchant is richer than those of other princes, every way." Then the minister said, with clasped hands, "Sire, I have not yet said anything from fear. Now I will deliver my mind." "Tell me," replied the king, "in detail." "Your Majesty," said the minister, "I am sure, the merchant's son is very cunning. He went to an island, as a trader, and having murdered the king, has appropriated all this wealth." "Nay, this doesn't stand to reason," replied the prince. "For had he done so, should none have heard of it? Would the king live alone? Would he not be attended by guards and chamberlains? Having regard to this immense wealth, the king should be possessed of great influence; and herein your opinion is falsified. But let me know your motive; whatever be the means whereby Srimanta has acquired this wealth!" "Sire," answered the minister, "All that Your Majesty says is true. But vouchsafe to lend your ear to what I say. Mansingha, Prince of Sindhu, was a powerful, famous, kind-hearted and merciful prince. He was always intent on increasing the happiness of his subjects. He did not even at intervals realise taxes from his people. For this, many became immensely rich in his dominions. There lived in his kingdom a man named Bhima Singha, who had acquired immense wealth, but who, notwithstanding, passed his days like a poor man. He had a son named Bejoy, who, from his childhood, had showed a superior intelligence and physical prowess. Once the boy went to his father and said, 'Father, to-day, I wish to see the prince ; but I can't go without your permission.' Bhima Singha said, 'Why do you wish to see the prince, boy ?' 'Without being known to the king,' replied the youth, 'a man has slender chance of increasing his wealth or fame.' 'Go, then,' said the father. Thinking that it was improper to go to the Presence, without presents, Bhima Singha prepared and gave him some. Then the youth said, 'Sire, pray give me some presents more ; for if I do not please the minister first, he may speak evil of me to his master. But if I tie his tongue down by a golden chain, he will be a friend to me.' Hearing this, the father internally praised the good sense of his son, and adopted his suggestion. Accordingly he prepared other presents and sent his son with the things, with his servants and retainers. Bejoy arrived at the capital with his men, and after having secured his lodgings, and bathed and taken his meal, he saw the minister, and giving him the presents, expressed his wish to see His Majesty. 'To-morrow morning,' said the minister, pleased, 'I will take you to the court. I will introduce you to His Majesty; and if you have any suit, I will assist you in the matter.' 'Sir,' replied Bejoy, 'I depend entirely on you. Do you, Sir, make me acquainted with the prince.' He returned to his quarters, and having passed the night there, next day went to the Presence with the minister. After having bowed and offered the presents, he stood before the prince, when the minister began to give all the necessary information of the youth to the prince. 'May it please Your Majesty,' began the officer, 'Bhim Singha, a subject of Your Majesty, is very rich. This youth is his son. His name is Bejoy Singha. He is proficient in many branches of learning. Now he has come to pay his homage to Your Majesty.' Having been informed thus, the king examined the features and demeanour of Bejoy, and told him to sit. When he had sat, the king asked, 'Have you any suit? You may have your desire, if you express it.' Then, with clasped hands, Bejoy said, 'Sire, there are certain villages adjacent to the house of your servant. If it please Your Majesty to lease them to me, on condition of my paying a rent, Your Majesty will confer a boon on your servant.' 'You shall,' answered the prince, 'get the villages.' Then he told his minister to draw the lease, which being done, the minister had it signed by the king, and delivered it to Bejoy. Then Bejoy took farewell of the king, and having reached home, told everything to his parents, who were glad. Henceforth, Bejoy began to rule these villages, and paid the due annually. The clever Bejoy increased his wealth and attained influence over his subjects. Then he began to collect troops. When, in a short time, he had levied a force of twenty thousand men, Bejoy thought, 'Now I can obtain possession of the kingdom of Sindhu, for the king numbers only sixteen thousand troops; so that my force is superior to the royal army. Further, I am a strategist; so that in no respect is the king my equal. Should the king conclude peace, and give me half his kingdom, good and well; otherwise, I will beat him and take possession of the whole.' With this determination, he sent an ambassador to the prince. The man appeared before the prince, and after having paid his respects, began, as directed by his master, 'Bejoy Singha has sent me to Your Majesty. Sire, if you give half your territory to Bejoy Singha, and conclude peace, it will be well; else twenty thousand men, armed cap-à-pie, will fight against you desperately. Your Majesty may adopt the course you think best.' At intelligence of this, the king flamed with anger, and said, 'What! Being a jackal, Bejoy wishes to be a lion! For this, he shall have his reward ere long. Do you tell him to prepare for war. I will send him to hell, without delay.' When the messenger had left the place, the king ordered out his sixteen thousand, and marched.

On the other hand, Bejoy, hearing of the royal preparations from the envoy, stood ready with his army. Then the two belligerents met and began a dreadful conflict. When the fight had continued for a week, Bejoy Singha lost three thousand men; of the royal forces, some were wounded, some took to flight. Seeing the hopeless state of his fortunes, the ruler of Sinde, with his sword and buckler, began a single combat with Bejoy. Both fought skilfully; at length the king of Sinde became enfeebled. 'Your Majesty,' exclaimed Bejoy, 'you would not have been reduced to this pass, had you concluded a treaty then. Now it is for your good to render submission, unless you will lose your throne.' The king could return no reply from shame. 'Your Majesty,' again rejoined Bejoy Singha, 'I will show consideration by consenting to take one-half of your kingdom;—you may pass your days with the rest. But you must promise, that if any rebellion should break out in my dominions or should I be attacked by a foreign enemy, you would assist me. Conclude such a peace, and return to your capital.' The king concluded a peace to this effect, and returned to his home. From this, Sire, it is evident that it is extremely impolitic for a prince to allow any of his subjects to grow wealthy. I advise Your Majesty to secure the fourteen ships of the young man. Pray don't regard the merchant's soft lightly. From his appearance and intelligence, I have entertained shrewd doubts."

"Yes," replied the king; "I should try to secure all his wealth." "Your Majesty," replied the minister, "unless you imprison Srimanta, you can by no means secure the wealth in the ships. Should he come there, he will render material obstruction by his intelligence and wealth;—so that, if Your Majesty permit, we will imprison him.” The king consenting, the minister sent a man to bring back Srimanta. The man came to Srimanta in hot haste, and said, “Sir, the minister calls you on some urgent business. Pray, come there instantly.” At this, the young man thought, “I have just reached the end of the palace, after taking farewell of the king and minister; so that this call startles me. The minister must entertain some evil designs. But I have no fear, by the blessings of the Gandharva king.” Thinking this, he went with the envoy. When Srimanta and Rāmnāth entered the hall, the wicked minister, who was expecting them every moment, made a sign to the warder, who arrested the young man, and took them to prison. At this Srimanta laughed. Then the minister sent a message to the king, saying, “If Your Majesty permit, I will go myself and bring the jewels.” Having obtained the king’s permission, as the minister was going towards the ships, he thought, “I will first despatch all the most precious gems to my house. By this, I shall be more wealthy than the king.”

On the other hand, Srimanta said to Rāmnāth in prison, “The king’s thoughts are evil; since he wishes to appropriate all my wealth, by imprisoning me. Now let me remember the king of Gandharvas.” Srimanta remembered the Gandharva Prince, who instantly appeared and asked, “Child! Why have you remembered me?" "Lord," answered Srimanta, "desiring to appropriate all the gems bestowed on me by Your Majesty, the king has imprisoned us, through the machinations of his wicked minister. It is for this reason that I have remembered you." "What is impossible to the gods," answered the king, "can never be possible to men. Now go home; I will adequately punish the king." According to the injunction of the Gandharva Prince, Srimanta and Rāmnāth went home invisibly. The retainers of the Gandharva Prince (having received the necessary orders) immediately paralysed the hands and feet of the minister, and destroyed the motion of the guards; and they began to rain flesh and blood all round. They set up dreadful yells, and wearing frightful forms and dealing blows and slaps, disappeared like lightning. They caused instant stars to shoot in the city, and this frightened the people greatly. Seeing all these wonderful appearances, the king, trembling, called a council. He said, "All this is owing to my having imprisoned the merchant's son. Now if we release him, we can escape these dangers." Deciding this, they went to the prison and saw that the minister lay senseless on the floor—he only retained his power of speech. On seeing the king, the minister burst out into tears and said, "Your Majesty, the son of Sādhu is no common man. For as soon as I had imprisoned the captives, they vanished, I know not where. My hands and feet are benumbed. Your Majesty, I have lost the power to get up. This is the fruit of my machinations." "Whatever it be," replied the king, "let us now ascertain the means of deliverance." They then concluded, "It is nothing else than divine agency ;—we should therefore ask for forgiveness of our transgressions." They thereupon fell to praying to the gods. After a while, a divine voice said, "Thou hard-hearted villain—thou worst of monarchs ! Thou imprisonedest the innocent son of Sádhu. It is for this sin that I have reduced thee to this plight. If thou canst install Srimanta as thy heir to the throne, and give him thy daughter in marriage, then only wilt thou find mercy ; else thou art doomed." Hearing this, the king tremblingly said, "I bow to the divine behest ; I will do as I am bid." As soon as the king had spoken thus, the servants of the Gandharva desisted from committing any further havoc. Then the king sat at court with his minister, and decided "to send an envoy to Dhanapati ; and that should he decline, the king should go there in person."

On the other hand, the king of Gandharvas, having inflicted punishment on the king, appeared before Srimanta and said, "My child, I have punished your enemies. Now the King will give you his daughter in marriage and install you as his heir in the kingdom ; for which an envoy is coming here. He will request you to go to the palace. If you decline to go, the king will himself come here. You should not therefore go with the envoy." "Lord," returned Srimanta, "I shall have my desire, if a palace be built with a forts at the extremity of the city." "Be it so," said the royal Gandharva, and calling Vishwakarmá, he issued orders for building the house, and then departed. The divine architect in a single night completed a palace with seven apartments, surrounded with a moat containing vessels upon the waters. The canal opened through sluices into the ocean, so that the supply of water would never fail. Valuable gems were set on the silver and golden walls, and the rooms were all the brighter for them. On the highways, he built brick houses, to serve for lighting the roads. When the palace had been built, Srimanta took the permission of the king of Gandharvas, and with his parents, friends and acquaintances, began to live in it.

On the other hand, the king having consulted with his ministers, wrote a letter and despatched with it a wise courtier to Dhanapati. The ambassador came to the gate of Dhanapati and sent the news by a warder. Dhanapati and Srimanta agreed to see the ambassador, and told the man to shew him in. The man went; and after having passed through the seven apartments, brought the envoy to Dhanapati. The envoy paid his respects to Dhanapati, who received him kindly. He then enquired for the good news of the king, and asked to know the occasion of the visit. The envoy thereupon handed the king's letter to Dhanapati, who read as follows :—

"I wish to bind my dearest child,
In wedlock with thy boy ;—
My name to save, if thou dost come,
My mind will swim in joy.

Thro' force of Fate, I did thee wrong ;
What's past is past for e'er ;—
Thy suppliant I,—forgive me, pray,
And up thy spirits cheer.

What pang was mine, when I thy boy
Kept fast in 'durance vile !"
Come here, Good Sir, with Srimanta,
To make my darling smile."

After reading the letter, Dhanapati remained silent ;— at which the ambassador thought, " Perhaps, he has got angry with me and is silent." " I am infinitely obliged by His Majesty's letter," began Dhanapati, " since he has wished to give his daughter in marriage to my boy. But I can't believe it ; for His Majesty can't do anything without the consent of his minister, since His Majesty imprisoned my innocent son by the advice of his minister. So that I think if we, father and son, go there, the king can easily take our lives. From this fear, I do not venture to go to the king, who is advised by so wicked a minister." Hearing the speech of Dhanapati, the royal envoy said with clasped hands, " Sir, whatever you have said is true. His Majesty imprisoned your son by the advice of the minister. For this he suffered great troubles ; and prayed to the gods for deliverance. At last, a divine voice said, ' All this has befallen thee for having imprisoned the innocent son of Sádhu. If thou canst marry thy daughter to Srimanta, and install him thy heir, then only will thy troubles cease; else thy destruction is probably at hand. The minister has been put in chains for life.' Agreeing to this, His Majesty has sent me to you, gentle Sir. May it please you to go to the palace with your son, and thus save the empire. You may destroy the kingdom if you like, because your son, Srimanta, is no common man. He is a very god; he is ranging the earth in a human form." When the courtier had ended, Dhanapati said, "Do you remain here for to-day: to-morrow we shall do what we think best."

Here and there, there were various machines (instruments?) in which were beautiful palaces of gold, shining with various gems. The king was unable to ascertain them fully,—he only understood that some rooms were made of lead and stone; some were made of white, red or blue marble. At intervals were crystal pillars. The gates, doors, &c., were made of ivory, silver or gold. The windows were decked with gems, and studded with pearls, corals, diamonds, rubies, moon-stones and sapphires. There were nine doors. Within the hall sat on a sapphire throne a red person; on both sides stood two others,—one white, the other red. One bore a sword; the other a buckler. From four springs fragrant waters flew upwards, and as they touched the ground, lo! they were changed into a chain of pearls. Anon issued two crystal damsels to take the chain; but they were demanded by the warders to desist. On this one fled; the other hung the chain on the neck of the personage on the throne, and went out. Then the chain melted. This process was then repeated.

In another room sat some monkeys. A cat was playing on an instrument—the mice were singing and dancing. At times, the monkeys with their black faces made various gesticulations, and showing their teeth in a laugh, fell down on the ground, and displayed many ludicrous expressions. Who could restrain his laughter at sight of this? Such a sight would dispel even deep grief. In another room, the air was dark with clouds, and it rumbled loud and deep; now and then the lightning flashed, and the thunder roared. Now, it seemed as if it were all daylight; anon it rained and hailed. In another room, a woman, who sat in the midst of flames, beckoned to all to come to her.

The king was seeing these wonderful sights, when a gate-keeper came to Dhanapati and informed him that the king with his courtiers was seeing the beauty of the palace. Hearing this, Dhanapati took Srimanta, and, seeing from a distance the pale countenance of the king, thought that nothing was impossible to the Divine agency. "He of whom thousands and thousands of kings are in fear, has come to my house without invitation. O God! thou canst do everything." Appearing before the Prince in this sad state of mind, father and son bowed at his feet; they craved his forgiveness for the past. After mutual embraces, Srimanta said, "Sire, I am the cause of your sorrow. But should you judge rightly, I am not to blame. First I had made known to you the supernatural events. But you didn't believe me, through the evil advice of your minister." "No more of that, my child," replied the Prince. "Now, if you marry my daughter, Bhubana Mohini, and consent to be installed as heir to the throne, then my dearest wish is attained." "Those feet which are unattainable by long prayer," said Dhanapati, "I have received easily. What more can I expect! Now, my prayer is, do you deign, Sire, to grace my house with your presence." Seeing the sincerity and kindness of Dayásindhu, the king thought, "I didn't expect such kindness at the hands of those with whom I had behaved very cruelly. I should go to Srimanta's house." Dhanapati took the Prince to his house, and conducted him to a gemmed throne. The Prince sat upon it, and Dhanapati worshipped the royal feet. He then entertained the king sumptuously, and said humbly, "Sire, may it please Your Majesty to stay here to-day, and to go to the town to-morrow, early in the morning." At the sincere request of Dhanapati, the King consented, for his own interest. Táravati and other ladies began to see royalty through the windows. Dhanapati entertained his guests splendidly, and led the king to a milk-white bed. When it was late, the King rose and said, "What's the use of delaying more? Bring my Srimanta, and order my charioteer to get my car ready. I have determined to give my daughter to Srimanta to-day—no more delay." Dhanapati rose and went into the inner apartment. When he communicated the intelligence to Tárávatí, she said, "How can the marriage be celebrated to-day? More specially, as we have to ask the opinion of my father, the Gandharva king, and must act accordingly." Pleased at this advice, the merchant communicated it to his son, who said, "Then let His Majesty pass this night here. I shall request the Gandharva king to come over, and let me have his advice. We shall go together to the royal palace to-morrow morning." Agreeing to this, Dhanapati came to the king, and said, "Sire, I have no power to disobey the commands of Your Majesty; but may it please Your Majesty to comply with my request. I request you to pass the night here. I beseech you to do this." The king consented for his own interest. Srimanta went to Tárávatí and said, "Mother, to-day, your father, the Gandharva king, will come here. If you wish to see him, pray get ready." When it was night, as Srimanta remembered the royal Gandharva, he appeared, and asked Srimanta, "Wherefore have you remembered me?" Srimanta answered, "Lord! may it please you to suffer yourself to be seen by my mother. Another word. According to your orders, the King has come here, and proposed the alliance. Now I await your decision." "Child," asked the king of Gandharvas, "where is your mother? I will first see her, and then express my views."

Then as the King of Gandharvas was approaching Tárávatí with Srimanta, she was suddenly struck with brightness as of the sun, and thought, "What's this? The sun never shines so in a room; more especially, as it is night." Reading the thought of Táravatí, the King of Gandharvas said, "My darling! I am your father, the King of Gandharvas. I have come to see you." And the lady, with tearful eyes, fell at the feet of her father, who took hold of her hands, raised her up, and wiped her face with his sheet. Srimanta led the king to a gemmed throne. Táravatí stood at the feet of the Prince, and began to cast liquid glances on her father's face, and on the ground alternately. The royal Gandharva moistened his daughter with blissful tears. The ecstasy of joy at the happy union after so long a separation deprived both of speech—both remained mute for a while. Then the king said, "My love! No need of weeping more. I am always wishing for your weal. I have been unhappy ever since I cursed you. I had become blind, by virtue of a sage's curse, for having cursed you without reason. Your Srimanta has relieved me from blindness. Therefore I shall ever remember him." "Child," he went on, "you will never come by evil, by the grace of Kátyáyani." "Father," answered Táravatí, in tones thrilling with emotion, "you are full of kindness. That you have deigned to show yourself to me has delighted me beyond measure. But the measure of my happiness will not be full so long as I do not see my mother. Father, how is my mother dear? Does she remember this forlorn wretch? Are my companions well? Is all well with the Jaksha world? Father! father! how do I wish to see them!" "Child," said the Gandharva, "it is also the wish of your mother that you may soon go back to our house. But my wish is that your Srimanta may be monarch of this terraqueous world, and be the crown of kings, with his sons and grandsons enlightening the world with his fame and glory, and so making it more glorious than heaven itself. After this, when he will go to the Gandharva world, I will bequeath the empire to him, and go to the Himalaya to meditate on the God of gods. Therefore, my dear, do you enjoy earthly comforts for a length of time." After thus consoling Táravati, he gave his advice as regards the marriage of Srimanta with the king's daughter, and departed.

The next day Dhanapati came to the king of Magadha, and said, agreeably to the instructions of the Gandharva Prince, "Your Majesty, I have no objection to the match. But I am a merchant; Your Majesty is a Kshetriya. If you give your Kshetriya daughter to the son of a merchant, the other princes may prove hostile to you, and bring disgrace upon your hitherto unblemished line. Your Majesty should therefore act with the consent of the Kshetrias. Your Majesty should go to your capital and invite all the subordinate Princes. When they shall have arrived, I will come to you with Srimanta."

The king consented to the advice of Dhanapati, and on the eve of leaving the place said, "What you have said is good. But should the princes object to the match, and take up arms, how should I defeat them?" "Your Majesty," replied Dhanapati, "need not fear on that score. Bless my Srimanta. He alone will do everything." Thereupon the king went to his house. On reaching home, he sent invitation letters to the kings of Anga, Baṅga, Kalinga, Tāṭilaṅga, Saurāṣṭra, Drāvira, Magadha; Andra, Kāśī, Kāncī and Abantī.

Durjoy Singha, king of Andra, got wroth in receiving the letter, and said to his counsellors, "Ho! Sirs! what do you think is here? The prince of Magadha is going to give his daughter in marriage to the son of a merchant. What do you advise?" Then the counsellors said, with clasped hands, "Sire, Your Majesty is a king. You can do anything you like. It would be better on the part of Your Majesty to consult other princes as to the propriety of going there or not." "We should expel the king of Magadha," said the prince, "and taking his daughter by force, bestow her on a Kshetriya; else the Kshetrias will come to disgrace by this mésalliance. Do you therefore make known my mind to all the other princes, that they may at once come with their armies." Agreeably to this injunction, the minister wrote to the princes. They soon came with their forces, and meeting with Durjoy Singha, marched to Magadha. Having encamped there, they sent an ambassador to the king of Magadha. The messenger came to the prince and said, "May it please Your Majesty! Durjoy Singha has come here with the princes of various countries. If Your Majesty wishes to save your country, you should pay tribute to Durjoy Singha, and give him your daughter; else the fight would take place to-morrow, early in the morning." The king of Magadha was frightened, and calling in Srimanta, acquainted him with the message. Srimanta said to the messenger, "Tell your king to prepare for battle to-morrow, early in the morning." Having done this, he went to his own house, and remembered the servants of the Gandharva king, who immediately appeared. "Of those who will come to fight to-morrow," said Srimanta, "do you benumb the hands and feet of all, excepting the kings." Then he called the general of Magadha and said, "To-morrow do you lead your forces to the field, and be present there." The general accordingly spread a proclamation in the army regarding the coming fight. The men, amounting to sixty thousand, well equipped, appeared on the field before daybreak. Then Durjoy Singha came to the field with the princes, surrounded by the forces. First the word-fight, then the arms-fight—there was great uproar. Then Srimanta entered the field on horseback, and saw that the Magadha forces were being beaten. He remembered the Gandharvas, who came invisibly and sent such shouts that the hostile forces fainted on hearing them. At this opportunity, the Gandharvas fell to benumbing their hands and feet, and depriving them of their weapons. After a while they recovered, but had no motion. The kings saw the condition of the troops, and despaired; when the Gandharvas chained Durjoy Singha, the king of Udra, and having conveyed him through the air, imprisoned him in the jail of Udra, and liberated the prisoners. Seeing these wonderful things, and the pitiable condition of the king, the guards hastened to the minister, who came to the prison with the king's son. They wept on seeing the king. Then they called a blacksmith, whose hands became themselves fast shackled as soon as he tried to cut off the king's chains. As many persons as tried to cut the chains became enchained themselves. The rumour spread that all the inhabitants were being imprisoned; so that thinking it expedient to leave the country, the inhabitants began to desert it. Seeing this, the minister thought that it was nothing else than the might of Srimanta. "So that unless I go to that great man with the king's son, there is no hope of saving His Majesty." Learning this, Durjoy Singha advised his son to go to Srimanta with the minister. On the other side, witnessing the deplorable plight of the troops, the assembled kings began to ask Srimanta to have mercy, and agreed to pay tribute to him. Srimanta said with a smile, "You needn't be apprehensive; the armies will be restored to their natural condition. Pray, do you dismiss your troops, and remain here some time." As soon as he had said this, the host was restored to its natural condition. The kings sent their respective armies to their countries, and remained behind. When the banner of Srimanta's victory floated in the air, the king of Magadha said to his minister, "To-day will take place the nuptials of Srimanta and my daughter; so do you prepare for the ceremony; and making ready for the assembly, bring Srimanta and Dhanapati. Invite also all the princes to the assembly." Having received the orders of His Majesty, the officers prepared everything. In the evening, Dhanapati arrived at the court with Srimanta. When the princes were assembled, the king of Magadha gave his daughter, Bhuvanamahinī, to Srimanta, according to all the sanctimonious rites. Srimanta entered the bridal chamber with the princess. The king entertained Dhanapati in a richly furnished apartment. He entertained the princes with banquets; and then they retired to their appointed quarters.

Next day, on Srimanta expressing his desire to go home, the king called the priests and courtiers, and at an auspicious hour invested Srimanta with the insignia of royalty.

Then, when the princes had met to pay tribute to the new king, Cheit Sing, son of Durjoy Singha, came before Srimanta with his father's minister, and said with clasped hands, "Sire, save Durjoy Singha, our king." "I am a merchant," said Srimanta; "Durjoy Singha is a Kshetraya—a puissant prince. How can I save him? If you can in all humility crave the forgiveness of the king of Magadha before all the princes, then only can you find relief. Else there is no hope." Cheit Sing said, "Whoever touches my father is involved in his fate! How then can we bring him here?" * Saying this, he fell down at the feet of Srimanta, and began to cry. Srimanta was naturally kind-hearted; he was touched with the grief of Cheit Sing, and said, "Do you stay a little. Your father will be here presently." Then Srimanta called the servants of the Gandharva, and said, "Do you bring Durjoy Singha through the air, and place him at the feet of His Majesty of Magadha." They brought Durjoy Singha in a short time, and placed him at the feet of the king of Magadha. The kings were awe-struck with the sight of this, and fell to praying. Srimanta told them to be of good cheer, and said, "Your Majesty, this person is called Durjoy Singha. It is he who was the head of all these princes. He is very proud. If he has offended you through error, pray forgive him. If you permit, I will release him." "The great should regard the honor of honorable men," answered the king. Then at a signal from Srimanta, Durjoy Singha was released by the Gandharvas, and he thereupon began to pray. Then the king of Magadha embraced Durjoy Singha, and made him sit by him. "Princes," said he, "I have given my daughter to Srimanta, and have invested him with the offices of royalty; you should pay him tribute; I retire from this government." Hearing this, the kings paid Srimanta tribute. The heavens now rained blossoms. Then, when the princes asked farewell of king Srimanta, he said,

"You have suffered no end of troubles at my hands. Do you therefore deign to come to my house and dine." The princes consented. The young king then took farewell of his royal father-in-law, and went to the inner apartment. The ladies decked out Bhubanamohini, and performed the siri-dhāra ceremony. Srimanta thought, "Since I shall have to go home with the princes, I should have a divine car." Having decided thus, he expressed his intention to the servants of the Gandharva. They fetched a divine car. Having ascended the wonderful car, as the astonished princes were extolling Srimanta, Durjoy Singha thought, "Where else shall I get such a good bridegroom? Therefore I will also give my daughter to Srimanta." He then with clasped hands expressed his desire to Srimanta. The latter said, "Sir, I will let you know my mind to-morrow." Having beguiled the way by such talk, they arrived at Srimanta's house.

The inmates took the bride into the inner apartment. Rāmnāth appointed servants to wait on the princes. There were no bounds to the joy of Tārāvatī. Nalinī and Promodā* made merry with the princess. The princes dined. They admired the wealth of Srimanta, and extolled his 'mighty magic.' When it had got late, Srimanta remembered the Gandharva king, and said, "Sir, I wish to show the Gandharva court to these assembled princes. But how can I do so without your permission?"

Her other name is Promodini.

“What’s the wonder?” answered the Gandharva. He thereupon called his servant and said, “Do you bring my theatre and court from the Gandharva world to the house of Srimanta within three hours, and invite the Jakhas and Gandharvas. Bring the dancing girls of heaven to sing and dance. Never disobey any orders which Srimanta may issue.” Having given these directions, the Gandharva went to his own place. Then the servants brought down the Gandharva court. The Jakhas and Gandharvas came. The Kinnaris began to sing and dance. It is not possible for any human pen to describe the beauties of the court; for having heard of it, Indra himself came and sojourned there. Then when the servants informed Srimanta of the establishment of the Gandharva court, Srimanta sent a heavenly car to Kisarilál Singha for his conveyance. The king arrived at Srimanta’s place and learnt all. Then Srimanta informed the princes who came before him. He said, “I have prepared a court for the entertainment of Your Highnesses. Pray, deign to grace it with your presence. I have also got some royal robes, by supernatural means; I shall feel obliged by your accepting them.” Saying this, he made a signal to the servants, who immediately fetched some robes, glittering with gems. The princes took them, and considered themselves as above human nature.

The king of Magadha came with Dhanapati, and surveyed the splendour of the court. The kings thought, “Have we come to Heaven! Have the ethereal substances of the gods become visible to mortal sight! What a wonder! But how can we enter into the fiery splendour?" Knowing their surprise, Srimanta said, "This is no fire; this is the lustre of the court, and the flaming glory of the Gandharvas and Jakhas. You need not be apprehensive. Pray, enter the court without fear."

When Srimanta entered the court with the princes, the king of Magadha and Dhanapati were led to the higher seats. Srimanta sat by them on a lower seat. The princes sat on their respective seats. Now the Apsaras began to sing and dance. Their music charms the gods themselves—not to say of men. Indra saw the assembly from the sky, and rained blossoms. All the guests, excepting Dhanapati, Srimanta and the princes, had eyes which had no twinkling, and bodies without their shadows. They had never before touched the earth. Seeing all these supernatural things, the kings thought themselves blest. The court broke with the dawn; and each wended to his own place.

The next day Srimanta called the king of Andra and said, "To Your Highness' proposal of yesterday, I have no objection. But I won't marry again. If you wish to enter into relationship with myself, do you then give your daughter to my first wife's brother, Kirti Chandra Roy. He is no common man; he is the son of the noble Vadra Sen Roy of Rámnagar. He is in my house. If you permit, I will call him." Then Srimanta ordered a servant to call Kirti Chandra to the court. Durjoy Singha saw the young man, and said to Srimanta, "If I have to give my daughter to any other than Your Majesty, I will give her to him." The match was settled, and the minister was sent to bring the damsel. At an auspicious hour, Durjoy Singha gave his daughter to Kirti Chandra. Then Srimanta bade farewell to the princes, appointed Rámnáth as his minister, and began to reign happily.

During the reign of Srimanta, the earth yielded abundant harvests; the kine were filled with nectar, the highways were safe, and the subjects were virtuous. After some time, both wives of Srimanta were in the family way. When it was full ten months, they gave birth to two sons, bearing all the auspicious marks. The palace overflowed with joy. The delight of Dhanapati and his consort on seeing their grand-children may well be conceived. Then the annaprásana and other ceremonies were celebrated. The boys grew up like the moon and increased the happiness of their parents. When they reached the age of five, they were placed under the tuition of a good teacher. Afterwards the two wives of Srimanta brought forth two daughters. Rámnáth had a son. The sons of Srimanta in a short time became versed in the arts and sciences. When the sons and daughters became marriageable, Srimanta married them. After enjoying the throne, he made over the sceptre to his eldest son, Vírbáhu. Then Táravátí began to pray :—

“ O Bhagabati, thou hast been pleased to confer royalty on my Srimanta. May thy kindness always last ! ”

“ In the meantime a messenger had come from the Gandharva world and said, “ Your Majesty, the king of Gandharvas has expressed his intention of going to the Himalayas for devotion. He has therefore desired you to go to him, with your friends and relatives ; so that he may make over to you the charge of the kingdom.” Srimanta dismissed the emissary by intimating that he should meet with the Gandharva prince in a fortnight. He then consulted with his parents and the ex-king of Magadha, and called the dependant princes. “ Your Highnesses,” said Srimanta, “ I shall now go to the Gandharva world, with my friends and relatives, to rule there. If you render the same homage to my son, that you have done to me, I hope you will reign in peace.” He then imparted the Gandharva incantations to Rāmnāth and said, “ Do you now remain here for sometime. Whenever necessary, you will be able to go to the Gandharva world, by virtue of the incantations.” Next he called his two sons, embraced them and smelled their crowns. “ You will reign in perfect happiness,” said he. “ Show your affection for His Highness, Durjoy Singha. You must also regard the honor of these princes.” He was speaking thus, when a glorious car descended from heaven, when Srimanta said, “ Farewell to all ! If I have been guilty of any offence, pray excuse me.” At this, all began to weep.

Then Srimanta entered the car with Dhanapati, Tárávatí, the ex-king of Magadha and his consort, and Srimanta's two wives ; and began to go through the air. Seeing this wonderful sight, all stood like statues. In a short time the car disappeared, when the spectators felt sad. They then began to go to their quarters, praising the glory and might of Srimanta.

The Monastery.

INTRODUCTION—(1886.)

It would be difficult to assign any good reason why the author of Ivanhoe, after using, in that work, all the art he possessed to remove the personages, action, and manners of the tale, to a distance from his own country, should choose for the scene of his next attempt the celebrated ruins of Melrose, in the immediate neighbourhood of his own residence. But the reason, or caprice, which dictated his change of system, has entirely escaped his recollection, nor is it worth while to attempt recalling what must be a matter of very little consequence.

The general plan of the story was, to conjoin two characters in that bustling and contentious age, who, thrown into situations which gave them different views on the subject of the Reformation, should, with the same sincerity and purity of intention, dedicate themselves, the one to the support of the sinking fabric of the Catholic Church, the other to the establishment of the Reformed doctrines. It was supposed that some interesting subjects for narrative might be derived from opposing two such enthusiasts to each other in the path of life, and contrasting the real worth of both with their passions and prejudices. The localities of Melrose suited well the scenery of the proposed story; the ruins themselves form a splendid theatre for any tragic incident which might be brought forward; joined to the vicinity of the fine river, with all its tributary streams, flowing through a country which has been the scene of so much fierce fighting, and is rich with so many recollections of former times, and lying almost under the immediate eye of the author, by whom they were to be used in composition.

The situation possessed farther recommendations. On the opposite bank of the Tweed might be seen the remains of ancient enclosures, surrounded by sycamores and ash-trees of considerable size. These had once formed the courts or arable ground of a village, now reduced to a single hut, the abode of a fisherman, who also manages a ferry. The cottages, even the church which once existed there, have sunk into vestiges hardly to be traced without visiting the spot, the inhabitants having gradually withdrawn to the more prosperous town of Gala-shiele, which has risen into consideration, within two miles of their neighbourhood. Superstitious old, however, has tenanted the deserted groves with aerial beings, to supply the want of the mortal tenants who have deserted it. The ruined and abandoned churchyard, of Boldside has been long believed to be haunted by the Fairies, and the deep broad current of the Tweed, wheeling in moonlight round the foot of the steep bank, with the number of trees originally planted for shelter round the field of the cottagers, but now presenting the effect of scattered and detached groves, fill up the idea which one would form in imagination for a scene that Oberon and Queen Mab might love to revel in. There are evenings when the spectators might believe, with Father Chaucer, that the — "Queen of Faery,

With harp, and pipe, and symphony,
Were dwelling in the place."

"Another, and even a more familiar refuge of the elfin race, (if tradition is to be trusted,) is the glen of the river, or rather brook, named the Allen, which falls into the Tweed from the northward, about a quarter of a mile above the present bridge. As the streamlet finds its way behind Lord Somerville's hunting-seat, called the Pavilion, its valley has been popularly termed the Fairy Dean, or rather the Nameless Dean, because of the supposed ill luck attached by the popular faith of ancient times, to any one who might name or allude to the race, whom our fathers distinguished as the Good Neighbours, and the Highlanders called Dacine Shie, or Men of Peace; rather by way of compliment, than on account of any particular idea of friendship or pacific relation which either Highlander or Borderer entertained towards the invisible beings whom they thus distinguished, or supposed them to bear to humanity."

in evidence of the actual operations of the fairy people even at this time, little pieces of calcareous matter are found in the glen after a flood, which either the labours of those tiny artists, or the eddies of the brook among the stones, have formed into a fantastic resemblance of cups, saucers, basins, and the like, in which children who gather them pretend to discern fairy utensils.

Besides these circumstances of romantic locality, mon pauperis regna (as Captain Dalgetty denominates his territory of Drumthwacket) are bounded by a small but deep lake, from which eyes that yet look on the light are said to have seen the water-bull ascend, and shake the hills with his roar.

Indeed, the country around Melrose, if possessing less of romantic beauty than some other scenes in Scotland, is connected with so many associations of a fanciful nature, in which the imagination takes delight, as might well induce one even less attached to the spot than the author, to accommodate, after a general manner, the imaginary scenes he was framing to the localities to which he was partial. But it would be a misapprehension to suppose that, because Melrose may in general pass for Kenilworth, or because it agrees with scenes of the Monastery in the circumstances of the drawbridge, the mill-dam, and other points of resemblance, that therefore an accurate or perfect local similitude is to be found in all the particulars of the picture. It was not the purpose of the author to present a landscape copied from nature, but a piece of composition, in which a real scene, with which he is familiar, had afforded him some leading outlines. Thus the resemblance of the imaginary Glendearg with the real vale of the Allen, is far from being minute, nor did the author aim at identifying them. This must appear plain to all who know the actual character of the Glen of Allen, and have taken the trouble to read the account of the imaginary Glendearg. The stream in the latter case is described as wandering down a romantic little valley, shifting itself, after the fashion of such a brook, from one side to the other, as it can most easily find its passage, and touching nothing in its progress that gives token of cultivation. It rises near a solitary tower, the abode of a supposed church vassal, and the scene of several incidents in the Romance.

The real Allen, on the contrary, after traversing the romantic ravine called the Nameless Dean, thrown off from side to side alternately, like a billiard ball repelled by the sides of the table on which it has been played, and in that part of its course resembling the stream which pours down Glendearg, may be traced upwards into a more open country, where the banks retreat farther from each other, and the vale exhibits a good deal of dry ground, which has not been neglected by the active cultivators of the district. It arrives, too, at a sort of termination, striking in itself, but totally irreconcilable with the narrative of the Romance. Instead of a single peel-house, or border tower of defence, such as Dame Glendinning is supposed to have inhabited, the head of the Allen, about five miles above its junction with the Tweed, shews three ruins of Border houses, belonging to different proprietors, and each, from the desire of mutual support so natural to troublesome times, situated at the extremity of the property of which it is the principal message. One of these is the ruinous mansion-house of Hillslap, formerly the property of the Cairncrosses, and now of Mr Innes of Stow; a second the tower of Colmachie, an ancient inheritance of the Borthwick family, as is testified by their crest, the Goat's Head, which exists on the ruin; a third, the house of Langshaw, also ruinous, but near which the proprietor, Mr Baillie of Jerviswood and Mellerstain, has built a small shooting box.

All these ruins, so strangely huddled together in a very solitary spot, have recollections and traditions of their own, but none of them bear the most distant resemblance to the descriptions in the Romance of the Monastery; and as the author could hardly have erred so grossly regarding a spot within a morning's ride of his own house, the inference is, that no resemblance was intended. Hillslap is remembered by the humours of the last inhabitants, two or three elderly ladies, of the class of Miss Raylands, in the Old Manor House, though less important by birth and fortune. Colmachie is commemorated in song:—

Colmachie stands on Colmachie hill,
The water it flows round Colmachie mill;
The mill and the kiln gang homely,
And it's up with the whippers of Colmachie!

Langshaw, although larger than the other mansions assembled at the head of the supposed Glendearg, has nothing about it more remarkable than the inscription of the present proprietor on the shooting lodge—Utinam hanc etiam viris inanis—a modest wish, which I know not more capable of attaining upon an extended scale than the gentleman who has expressed it upon a limited one.

Having thus shewn that I could say something of these desolated towers, which the desire of social intercourse, or the facility of mutual defence, had drawn together at the head of this Glen, I need not add any farther reason to shew, that there is no resemblance between them and the solitary habitation of Dame Elspeth Glendinning. Beyond these dwellings are some remains of natural wood, and a considerable portion of morass and bog; but I would not advise any who may be curious in localities, to spend time in looking for the fountain and holly-tree of the White Lady.

While I am on the subject I may add, that Captain Clutterbuck, the imaginary editor of the Monastery, has no real prototype in the village of Melrose or neighbourhood, that ever I saw or heard of. To give some individuality to this personage, he is described as a character which sometimes occurs in actual society—a person who, having spent his life within the necessary duties of a technical profession, from which he has been at length emancipated, finds himself without any occupation whatever, and is apt to become the prey of ennui, until he discerns some petty subject of investigation commensurate to his talents, the study of which gives him employment in solitude; while the conscious possession of information peculiar to himself, adds to his consequence in society. I have often observed, that the lighter and trivial branches of antiquarian study are singularly useful in relieving vacuity of such a kind, and have known them serve many a Captain Clutterbuck to retreat upon; I was therefore a good deal surprised, when I found the antiquarian Captain identified with a neighbour and friend of my own, who could never have been confounded with him by any one who had read the book, and seen the party alluded to. This erroneous identification occurs in a work entitled, "Illustrations of the Author of Waverley, being Notices and Anecdotes of real Characters, Scenes, and Incidents, supposed to be described in his works, by Robert Chambers." This work was, of course, liable to many errors, as any one of the kind must be, whatever may be the ingenuity of the author, which takes the task of explaining what can be only known to another person. Mistakes of place or inanimate things referred to, are of very little moment; but the ingenious author ought to have been more cautious of attaching real names to fictitious characters. I think it is in the Spectator we read of a rustic wag, who, in a copy of "The Whole Duty of Man," wrote opposite to every vice the name of some individual in the neighbourhood, and thus converted that excellent work into a libel on a whole parish.

The scenery being thus ready at the author's hand, the reminiscences of the country were equally favourable. In a land where the horses remained almost constantly saddled, and the sword seldom quitted the warrior's side—where war was the natural and constant state of the inhabitants, and peace only existed in the shape of brief and feverish truces—there could be no want of the means to complicate and extricate the incidents of his narrative at pleasure. There was a disadvantage, notwithstanding, in treading this Border district, for it had been already ransacked by the author himself, as well as others; and unless presented under a new light, was likely to afford ground to the objection of Cremate bis cocta.

To attain the indispensable quality of novelty, something, it was thought, might be gained by contrasting the character of the vassals of the church with those of the dependants of the lay barons, by whom they were surrounded. But much advantage could not be derived from this. There were, indeed, differences betwixt the two classes, but, like tribes in the mineral and vegetable world, which, resembling each other to common eyes, can be sufficiently well discriminated by naturalists, they were yet too similar, upon the whole, to be placed in marked contrast with each other.

Machinery remained—the introduction of the supernatural and marvellous; the resort of distressed authors since the days of Horace, but whose privileges as a sanctuary have been disputed in the present age, and well-nigh exploded. The popular belief no longer allows the possibility of existence to the race of mysterious beings which hovered betwixt this world and that which is invisible. The fairies have abandoned their moonlight turf; the witch no longer holds her black orgies in the heathen dell; and "Even the last lingering phantom of the brain,

The churchyard ghost, is now at rest again."

From the discredit attached to the vulgar and more common modes in which the Scottish superstition displays itself, the author was induced to have recourse to the beautiful, though almost forgotten, theory of astral spirits, or creatures of the elements, surpassing human beings in knowledge and power, but inferior to them, as being subject, after a certain space of years, to a death which is to them annihilation, as they have no share in the promise made to the sons of Adam. These spirits are supposed to be of four distinct kinds, as the elements from which they have their origin, and are known, to those who have studied the cabalistical philosophy, by the names of Sylphs, Gnomes, Salamanders, and Nainds, as they belong to the elements of Air, Earth, Fire, or Water. The general reader will find an entertaining account of these elementary spirits in the French book, entitled, "Entretiens de Compté du Gabalais." The ingenious Compte de la Motte Fongus composed, in German, one of the most successful productions of his fertile brain, where a beautiful and even afflicting effect is produced by the introduction of a water-nymph, who loses the privilege of immortality, by consenting to become accessible to human feelings, and uniting her lot with that of a mortal, who treats her with ingratitude.

In imitation of an example so successful, the White Lady of Avenel was introduced into the following sheets. She is represented as connected with the family of Avenel by one of those mystic ties, which, in ancient times, were supposed to exist, in certain circumstances, between the creatures of the elements and the children of men. Such instances of mysterious union are recognized in Ireland, in the real Milesian families, who are possessed of a Banshee; and they are known among the traditions of the Highlands, which, in many cases, attached an immortal being or spirit to the service of particular families or tribes. These demons, if they are to be called so, announced good or evil fortune to the families connected with them; and though some only condescended to meddle with matters of importance, others, like the May Mollach, or Maid of the Ilairy Arms, condescended to mingle in ordinary sports, and even to direct the Chief how to play at draughts.

There was, therefore, no great violence in supposing such a being as this to have existed, while the elementary spirits were believed in; but it was more difficult to describe or imagine its attributes and principles of action. Shakspeare, the first of authorities in such a case, has painted Ariel, that beautiful creature of his fancy, as 'only approaching so near to humanity as to know the nature of that sympathy which the creatures of clay felt for each other, as we learn from the expression—"Mine would, if I were human." The inferences from this are singular, but seem capable of regular deduction. A being, however superior to man in length of life—in power over the elements—in certain perceptions respecting the present, the past, and the future, yet still incapable of human passions, of sentiments of moral good and evil, of meriting future rewards or punishments, belongs rather to the class of animals, than of human creatures, and must therefore be presumed to act more from temporary benevolence or caprice, than from any thing approaching to feeling or reasoning. Such a being's superiority in power can only be compared to that of the elephant or lion, who are greater in strength than man, though inferior in the scale of creation. The partialities which we suppose such spirits to entertain must be like those of the dog; their sudden starts of passion, or the indulgence of a frolic, or mischief, may be compared to those of the numerous varieties of the cat. All these propensities are, however, controlled by the laws which render the elementary race subordinate to the command of man—liable to be subjected by his science, (so the sect of Gnostics believed, and on this turned the Rosicrucian philosophy,) or to be overpowered by his superior courage and daring, when it set their illusions at defiance.

It is with reference to this idea of the supposed spirits of the elements, that the White Lady of Avenel is represented as acting a varying, capricious, and inconsistent part in the pages assigned to her in the narrative; manifesting interest and attachment to the family with whom her destinies are associated, but evincing whim, and even a species of malevolence, towards other mortals, as the Sacristan and the Border robber, whose incorrect life subjected them to receive petty mortifications at her hand. The White Lady is scarcely supposed, however, to have possessed either the power or the inclination to do more than inflict terror or create embarrassment, and is always subjected by those mortals, who, by virtuous resolution, and mental energy, could assert superiority over her. In these particulars she seems to constitute a being of a middle class, between the esprit follet who places its pleasure in misleading and tormenting mortals, and the benevolent Fairy of the East, who uniformly guides, aids, and supports them.

Either, however, the author executed his purpose indifferently, or the public did not approve of it; for the White Lady of Avenel was far from being popular. He does not now make the present statement, in the view of arguing readers into a more favourable opinion on the subject, but merely with the purpose of exculpating himself from the charge of having wantonly intruded into the narrative a being of inconsistent powers and propensities.

In the delineation of another character, the author of the Monastery failed, where he hoped for some success. As nothing is so successful a subject of ridicule as the fashionable follies of the time, it occurred to him that the more serious scenes of his narrative might be relieved by the humour of a cavaliero of the age of Queen Elizabeth. In every period, the attempt to gain and maintain the highest rank of society, has depended on the power of assuming and supporting a certain fashionable kind of affectation, usually connected with some vivacity of talent and energy of character, but distinguished at the same time by a transcendent flight, beyond sound reason and common sense; both faculties too vulgar to be admitted into the estimate of one who claims to be esteemed "a choice spirit of the age." These, in their different phases, constitute the gallants of the day, whose boast it is to drive the whims of fashion to extremity.

On all occasions, the manners of the sovereign, the court, and the time, must give the tone to the peculiar description of qualities by which those who would attain the height of fashion must seek to distinguish themselves. The reign of Elizabeth, being that of a maiden queen, was distinguished by the decorum of the courtiers, and especially the affectation of the deepest deference to the sovereign. After the acknowledgment of the Queen's matchless perfections, the same devotion was extended to beauty as it existed among the lesser stars in her court, who sparkled, as it was the mode to say, by her reflected lustre. It is true, that gallant knights no longer vowed to Heaven, the peacock, and the ladies, to perform some feat of extravagant chivalry, in which they endangered the lives of others as well as their own; but although their chivalrous displays of personal gallantry seldom went farther in Elizabeth's days than the tilt-yard, where barricades, called barriers, prevented the shock of the horses, and limited the display of the cavaliers' skill to the comparatively safe encounter of their lances, the language of the lovers to their ladies was still in the exalted terms which Amadis would have addressed to Oriana, before encountering a dragon for her sake. This tone of romantic gallantry found a clever but conceited author, to reduce it to a species of constitution and form, and lay down the courtly manner of conversation in a pedantic book, called Euphuus and his England. Of this, a brief account is given in the text, to which it may now be proper to make some additions.

The extravagance of Euphuism, or a symbolical jargon of the same class, predominates in the romances of Calprenade and Scuderi, which were read for the amusement of the fair sex of France during the long reign of Louis XIV., and were supposed to contain the only legitimate language of love and gallantry. In this reign they encountered the satire of Molière and Boileau. A similar disorder, spreading into private society, formed the ground of the affected dialogue of the Précieuses, as they were styled, who formed the coterie of the Hotel de Rambouillet, and afforded Molière matter for his admirable comedy, Les Précieuses Ridicules. In England, the humour does not seem to have long survived the accession of James I.

The author had the vanity to think that a character, whose peculiarities should turn on extravagances which were once universally fashionable, might be read in a fictitious story with a good chance of affording amusement to the existing generation, who, fond as they are of looking back on the actions and manners of their ancestors, might be also supposed to be sensible of their absurdities. He must fairly acknowledge that he was disappointed, and that the Euphuist, far from being accounted a well drawn and humorous character of the period, was condemned as unnatural and absurd.

It would be easy to account for this failure, by supposing the defect to arise from the author's want of skill, and, probably, many readers may not be inclined to look farther. But, as the author himself can scarcely be supposed willing to acquiesce in this final cause, if any other can be alleged, he has been led to suspect, that, contrary to what he originally supposed, his subject was injudiciously chosen, in which, and not in his mode of treating it, lay the source of the want of success.

The manners of a rude people are always founded on nature, and therefore the feelings of a more polished generation immediately sympathize with them. We need no numerous notes, no antiquarian dissertations, to enable the most ignorant to recognize the sentiments and diction of the characters of Homer; we have but, as Lear says, to strip off our lendings—to set aside the factitious principles and adornments which we have received from our comparatively artificial system of society, and our natural feelings are in unison with those of the bard of Chios and the heroes who live in his verses. It is the same with a great part of the narratives of my friend Mr Cooper. We sympathize with his Indian chiefs and back-woodsmen, and acknowledge, in the characters which he presents to us, the same truth of human nature by which we should feel ourselves influenced if placed in the same condition. So much is this the case, that though it is difficult, or almost impossible, to reclaim a savage, bred from his youth to war and the chase, to the restraints and the duties of civilized life, nothing is more easy or common, than to find men who have been educated in all the habits and comforts of improved society, willing to exchange them for the wild labours of the hunter and the fisher. The very amusements most pursued and relished by men of all ranks, whose constitutions permit active exercise, are hunting, fishing, and in some instances, war, the natural and necessary business of the savage of Dryden, where his hero talks of being “As free as nature first made man,

When wild in woods the noble savage ran.”

But although these occupations, and even the sentiments, of barbarian beings in a primitive state, find access and interest in the minds of the more civilized part of the species, it does not therefore follow, that the national tastes, opinions, and follies, of one civilized period, should afford either the same interest or the same amusement to those of another. These generally, when driven to extravagance, are founded, not upon any natural taste proper to the species, but upon the growth of some peculiar cast of affection, with which mankind in general, and succeeding generations in particular, feel no common interest or sympathy. The extravagances of coquetry in manners and apparel are indeed the legitimate, and often the successful objects of satire, during the time when they exist. In evidence of this, theatrical critics may observe how many dramatic jeux d'esprit are well received every season, because the satirist levels at some well known or fashionable absurdity; or, in the dramatic phrase, “shoots folly as it flies.” But when the peculiar kind of folly keeps the wing no longer, it is reckoned but waste of powder to pour a discharge of ridicule on what has ceased to exist; and the pieces in which such forgotten absurdities are made the subject of ridicule, fall quietly into oblivion with the follies which gave them fashion, or only continue to exist on the scene, because they contain some other more permanent interest than that which connects them with manners and follies of a temporary character.

This, perhaps, affords a reason why the comedies of Ben Jonson, founded upon system, or what the age termed humours,—by which was meant factitious and affected characters, superinduced on that which was common to the rest of their race,—in spite of acute satire, deep scholarship, and strong sense, do not now afford general pleasure, but are confined to the closet of the antiquary, whose studies have assured him that the personages of the dramatist were once, though they are now no longer, portraits of existing nature.

Let us take another example of our hypothesis from Shakespeare himself, who, of all authors, drew his portraits for all ages. With the whole sum of the idolatry which affects us at his name, the mass of readers peruse, without amusement, the characters formed on the extravagances of temporary fashion; and the Euphuist Don Armado, the pedant Holofernes, even Nym and Pistol, are read with little pleasure by the mass of the public, being portraits of which we cannot recognize the humour, because the originals no longer exist. In like manner, while the distresses of Romeo and Juliet continue to interest every bosom, Mercutio, drawn as an accurate representation of the finished fine gentleman of the period, and as such received by the unanimous approbation of contemporaries, has so little to interest the present age, that, stripped of all his puns and quirks of verbal wit, he only retains his place in the scene, in virtue of his fine and fanciful speech upon dreaming, which belongs to no particular age, and because he is a personage whose presence is indispensable to the plot.

We have already prosecuted perhaps too far an argument, the tendency of which is to prove, that the introduction of an humorist, acting like Sir Piercie Shafton, upon some forgotten and obsolete model of folly, once fashionable, is rather likely to awaken the disgust of the reader, as unnatural, than find him food for laughter. Whether owing to this theory, or whether to the more simple and probable cause of the author's failure in the delineation of the subject he had proposed to himself, the formidable objection of incredulus odi was applied to the Euphuist, as well as to the White Lady of Avondale; and the one was denounced as unnatural, while the other was rejected as impossible.

There was little in the story to atone for these failures in two principal points. The incidents were inartificially huddled together. There was no part of the intrigue to which deep interest was found to apply; and the conclusion was brought about, not by incidents arising out of the story itself, but in consequence of public transactions, with which the narrative has little connection, and which the reader had little opportunity to become acquainted with.

This, if not a positive fault, was yet a great defect in the Romance. It is true, that not only the practice of some great authors in this department, but even the general course of human life itself, may be quoted in favour of this more obvious, and less artificial practice, of arranging a narrative. It is seldom that the same circle of personages who have surrounded an individual at his first outset in life, continue to have an interest in his career till his fate comes to a crisis. On the contrary, and more especially if the events of his life be of a varied character, and worth communicating to others, or to the world, the hero's later connections are usually totally separated from those with whom he began the voyage, but whom the individual has outlived; or who have drifted astray, or foundered on the passage. This hackneyed comparison holds good in another point. The numerous vessels of so many different sorts, and destined for such different purposes, which are launched in the same mighty ocean, although each endeavours to pursue its own course, are in every case more influenced by the winds and tides, which are common to the element which they all navigate, than by their own separate exertions. And it is thus in the world, that, when human prudence has done its best, some general, perhaps national, event, destroys the schemes of the individual, as the casual touch of a more powerful being sweeps away the web of the spider.

Many excellent romances have been composed in this view of human life, where the hero is conducted through a variety of detached scenes, in which various agents appear and disappear, without, perhaps, having any permanent influence on the progress of the story. Such is the structure of Gil Blas, Roderick Random, and the lives and adventures of many other heroes, who are described as running through different stations of life, and encountering various adventures, which are only connected with each other by having happened to be witnessed by the same individual, whose identity unites them together, as the string of a necklace links the beads, which are otherwise detached.

But though such an unconnected course of adventures is what most frequently occurs in nature, yet the province of the romance writer being artificial, there is more required from him than a mere compliance with the simplicity of reality,—just as we demand from the scientific gardener, that he shall arrange, in curious knots and artificial parterres, the flowers which “nature boon” distributes freely on hill and dale. Fielding, accordingly, in most of his novels, but especially in Tom Jones, his chiefest care, has set the distinguished example of a story regularly built and consistent in all its parts, in which nothing occurs, and scarce a personage is introduced, that has not some share in tending to advance the catastrophe.

To demand equal correctness and felicity in those who may follow in the track of that illustrious novelist, would be to fetter too much the power of giving pleasure, by surrounding it with penal rules; since of this sort of light literature it may be especially said—tout genre est permis, hors le genre ennuyeux. Still, however, the more closely and happily the story is combined, and the more natural and felicitous the catastrophe, the nearer such a composition will approach the perfection of the novelist's art; nor can an author neglect this branch of his profession, without incurring proportional censure.

For such censure the Monastery gave but too much occasion. The intrigue of the Romance, neither very interesting in itself, nor very happily detailed, is at length finally disentangled by the breaking out of national hostilities between England and Scotland, and the as sudden renewal of the truce. Instances of this kind, it is true, cannot be reality have been uncommon, but the resorting to such, in order to accomplish the catastrophe, as by a tour de force, was objected to as inartificial, and not perfectly intelligible to the general reader.

Still the Monastery, though exposed to severe and just criticism, did not fail, judging from the extent of its circulation, to have some interest for the public. And this, too, was according to the ordinary course of such matters; for it very seldom happens that literary reputation is gained by a single effort, and still more rarely is it lost by a solitary miscarriage.

The author, therefore, had his days of grace allowed him, and time, if he pleased, to comfort himself with the burden of the old Scots song,

"If it lma weel bobbit, We'll bob it again."

INTRODUCTORY EPISTLE

FROM

CAPTAIN CLUTTERBUCK,

LATE OF HIS MAJESTY'S — REGIMENT OF INFANTRY,

TO

SIR,

ALTHOUGH I do not pretend to the pleasure of your personal acquaintance, like many whom I believe to be equally strangers to you, I am nevertheless interested in your publications, and desire their continuance;—not that I pretend to much taste in fictitious composition, or that I am apt to be interested in your grave scenes, or amused by those which are meant to be lively. I will not dispute from you, that I have yawned over the last interview of Maelvor and his sister, and fell fairly asleep while the schoolmaster was reading the humours of Dandie Dinmont. You see, sir, that I scorn to solicit your favour in a way to which you are no stranger. If the papers I enclose you are worth nothing, I will not endeavour to recommend them by personal flattery, as a bad cook pours rancid butter upon stale fish. No, sir! what I respect in you, is the light you have occasionally thrown on national antiquities, a study which I have commenced rather late in life, but to which I am attached with the devotion of a first love, because it is the only study I ever cared a farthing for.

You shall have my history, sir, (it will not reach to three volumes,) before that of my manuscript; and as you usually throw out a few lines of verse (by way of skirmishers, I suppose) at the head of each division of prose, I have had the luck to light upon a stanza in the schoolmaster's copy of Burns which describes me exactly. I love it the better, because it was originally designed for Captain Grose, an excellent antiquary, though, like yourself, some what too apt to treat with levity his own pursuits:

"Tha said he was a soldier bred,
And aye wad rather ta'en than fled;
But now he's quit the spurrie blade,
And dog-ahn walleet,
And ta'en the—antiquarian trade,
I think they call it."

I never could conceive what influenced me, when a boy, in the choice of a profession. Military zeal and ardour it was not, which made me stand out for a commission in the Scots Fusiliers, when my tutors and curators wished to bind me apprentice to old David Stiles, Clerk to his Majesty's Signet. I say, military zeal it was not; for I was no fighting boy in my own person, and cared not a penny to read the history of the heroes who turned the world upside down in former ages. As for courage, I had, as I have since discovered, just as much of it as served my turn, and not one grain of surplus. I soon found out, indeed, that in action there was more danger in running away, than in standing fast; and besides, I could not afford to lose my commission, which was my chief means of support. But, as for that overboiling valetur, which I have heard many of ours talk of, though I seldom observed that it influenced them in the actual affair — that exuberant zeal, which courts Danger as a bride, — truly my courage was of a complexion much less ecstasial.

Again, the love of a red coat, which, in default of all other aptitudes to the profession, has made many a bad soldier and some good ones, was an utter stranger to my disposition. I cared not a "boddy" for the company of the misses: Nay, though there was a boarding-school in the village, and though we used to meet with its fair inmates at Simon Lightfoot's weekly Practising, I cannot recollect any strong emotions being excited on these occasions, excepting the infinite regret with which I went through the polite ceremonial of presenting my partner with an orange, thrust into my pocket by my aunt for this special purpose, but which, had I dared, I certainly would have secreted for my own personal use. As for vanity, or love of finery for itself, I was such a stranger to it, that the difficulty was great to make me brush my coat, and appear in proper trim upon parade. I shall never forget the rebuke of my old Colonel on a morning when the King reviewed a brigade of which ours made part. "I am no friend to extravagance," Ensign Clutterbuck," said he; "but, on the day when we are to pass before the Sovereign of the kingdom, in the name of God I would have at least shew a him an inch of clean linen."

Thus, a stranger to the ordinary motives which lead young men to make the army their choice, and without the least desire to become either a hero or a dandy, I really do not know what determined my thoughts that way, unless it were the happy state of half-pay indolence, enjoyed by Captain Doolittle, who had set up his staff of rest in my native village. Every other person had, or seemed to have, something to do, less or more. They did not, indeed, precisely go to school and learn tasks, that last of evils in my estimation; but it did not escape my boyish observation, that they were all bothered with something or other like duty or labour — all but the happy Captain Doolittle. The minister had his parish to visit, and his preaching to prepare, though perhaps he made more fuss than he heeded about both. The laird had his farming and improving operations to superintend; and, besides, he had to attend trustee meetings, and lieutenancy meetings, and head-courts, and meetings of justices, and what not — was as early up, (that I detested,) and as much in the open air, wet and dry, as his own grieve. The shopkeeper (the village boasted but one of eminence) stood indeed pretty much at his ease behind his counter, for his custom was by no means overburdensome; but still he enjoyed his status, as the Pacific calls it, upon condition of supplying all the wares in his booth over and over, when any one chose to want a yard of muslin, a mousetrap, an ounce of caraway, a paper of pins, the Sermons of Mr Preen, or the Life of Jack the Giant-Killer, (not Killer, as usually erroneously written and pronounced. — See my essay on the true history of this worthy, where real facts have in a peculiar degree been obscured by fable.) In short, all in the village were under the necessity of doing something which they would rather have left undone, excepting Captain Doolittle, who walked every morning in the open street, which formed the high mall of our village, in a blue coat with a red neck, and played at whist the whole evening, when he could make up a party. This happy vacuity of all employment appeared to me so delicious, that it became the primary hint, which, according to the system of Helvetius, as the minister says, determined my infant talents towards the profession I was destined to illustrate.

But who, alas! can form a just estimate of their future prospects in this deceitful world! I was not long engaged in my new profession, before I discovered, that if the independent indolence of half-pay was a paradise, the officer must pass through the purgatory of duty and service in order to gain admission to it. Captain Doolittle might brush his blue coat with the red neck, or leave it unbrushed, at his pleasure: but Ensign Clutterbuck had no such option. Captain Doolittle might go to bed at ten o'clock, if he had a mind; but the Ensign must make the rounds in his turn. What was worse, the Captain might repose under the tester of his tent-bed until noon, if he was so pleased; but the Ensign, God help him, had to appear upon parade at peep of day. As for duty, I made that as easy as I could, had the sergeant to whisper to me the words of command and bustled through as other folks did. Of service, I saw enough for an indolent man — was buffeted up and down the world, and visited both the East and West Indies, Egypt, and other distant places, which my youth had scarce dreamed of. The French I saw, and felt too; witness two fingers on my right hand, which one of their curved humans took off with his sabre as neatly as an hospital surgeon. At length the death of an old aunt, who left me some fifteen hundred pounds, snugly vested in the three per cents, gave me the long-wished-for opportunity of retiring, with the prospect of enjoying a clean shirt and a guinea four times a week at least.

For the purpose of commencing my new way of life, I selected for my residence the village of Kennasquhair, in the south of Scotland, celebrated for the ruins of its magnificent Monastery, intending there to lead my future life in the eterna own dignitate of half-pay and annuity. I was not long, however, in making the grand discovery, that in order to enjoy leisure, it is absolutely necessary it should be preceded by occupation. For some time, it was delightful to wake at daybreak, dreaming of the revels — then to recollect my happy emancipation from the slavery that doomed me to start at a piece of clattering parchment, turn on my other side, damn the parade, and go to sleep again. But even this enjoyment had its termination; and time, when it became a stock entirely at my own disposal, began to hang heavy on my hand.

I angled for two days, during which time I lost twenty hooks, and several scores of yards of gut and line, and caught not even a minnow. Hunting was out of the question, for the stomach of a horse by no means agrees with the half-pay establishment. When I shot, the shepherds and ploughmen, and my very dog, quizzed me every time that I missed, which was, generally speaking, every time I fired. Besides, the country gentlemen in this quarter like their game, and began to talk of prosecutions and interdicts. I did not give up fighting the French to commence a domestic war with the "pleasant men of Teviotdale," as the song calls them; so I've spent three days (very agreeably) in cleaning my gun, and disposing it upon two hooks over my chimney-piece.

The success of this accidental experiment set me on trying my skill in the mechanical arts. Accordingly, I took down and cleaned my landlady's cuckoo-clock, and in so doing, silenced that companion of the spring for ever and a day. I mounted a turning-lathe, and in attempting to use it, I very nearly cribbed off, with an inch-and-half former, one of the fingers which the hussar had left me.

Books I tried, both those of the little circulating library, and of the more rational subscription collection maintained by this intellectual people. But neither the light reading of the one, nor the heavy artillery of the other, suited my purpose. I always fell asleep at the fourth or fifth page of history or disquisition; and it took me a month's hard reading to wade through a half-bound trashy novel, during which I was pestered with applications to return the volumes, by every half-bred milliner's wairess about the place. In short, during the hours when all the town besides had something to do, I had nothing for it, but to walk in the churchyard, and whistle till it was dinner-time.

During these promenades, the Rains necessarily forced themselves on my attention, and, by degrees, I found myself engaged in studying the more minute ornaments, and at length the general plan, of this noble structure. The old sexton added my labours, and gave me his portion of traditional lore. Every day added something to my stock of knowledge respecting the ancient state of the building; and at length I made discoveries concerning the purpose of several detached and very ruinous portions of it, the use of which had hitherto been either unknown altogether or erroneously explained.

The knowledge which I thus acquired I had frequent opportunities of retailing to those visitors whom the progress of a Scottish tour brought to visit this celebrated spot. Without encroaching on the privilege of my friend the sexton, I became gradually an assistant Clerone in the task of description and explanation, and often (seeing a fresh party of visitors arrive) has he turned over to me those to whom he had told half his story, with the flattering observation, "What needs I say any more about it! There's the Captain kens mair anent it than I do, or any man in the town." Then would I salute the strangers courteously, and expatiate to their astonished minds upon crypts and chancels, and nave, arches, Gothic and Saxon architraves, mullions and flying buttresses. It not unfrequently happened, that an acquaintance which commenced in the Abbey concluded in the inn, which served to relieve the solitude as well as the monotony of my landlady's shoulder of mutton, whether roast, cold, or hashed.

By degrees my mind became enlarged; I found a book or two which enlightened me on the subject of Gothic architecture, and I read now with pleasure, because I was interested in what I read about. Even my character began to dilate and expand. I spoke with more authority at the club, and was listened to with deference, because on one subject, at least, I possessed more information than any of its members. Indeed, I found that even my stories about Egypt, which, to say truth, were somewhat thread-bare, were now listened to with more respect than formerly. "The Captain," they said, "had something in him after a'—there were few folk kend see muckle about the Abbey."

With this general approbation waxed my own sense of self-importance, and my feeling of general comfort. I ate with more appetite, I digested with more ease, I lay down at night with joy, and slept sound till morning, when I arose with a sense of busy importance, and bled me to measure, to examine, and to compare the various parts of this interesting structure. I lost all sense and consciousness of certain unpleasant sensations of a non-descript nature, about my head and stomach, to which I had been in the habit of attending, more for the benefit of the village apothecary than my own, for the pure want of something else to think about. I had found out an occupation unwittingly, and was happy because I had something to do. In a word, I had commenced local antiquary, and was not unworthy of the name.

Whilst I was in this pleasing career of busy idleness, far so it might at best be called, it happened that I was one night sitting in my little parlour, adjacent to the closet which my landlady calls my bedroom, in the act of preparing for an early retreat to the realms of Morpheus. Dugdale's Monasticon, borrowed from the library at A——, was lying on the table before me, flanked by some excellent Cheshire cheese, (a present, by the way, from an honest London citizen, to whom I had explained the difference betwixt a Gothic and a Saxon arch,) and a glass of Vanderhagen's best ale. Thus armed at all points against my old enemy

Time, I was leisurely and deliciously preparing for bed—now reading a line of old Dugdale—now sipping my ale, or munching my bread and cheese—now undoing the strings at my breeches' knees, or a button or two of my waistcoat, until the village clock should strike ten, before which time I make it a rule never to go to bed. A loud knocking, however, interrupted my ordinary process on this occasion, and the voice of my honest landlord of the George was heard vociferating, "What the deevil, Mrs Grimalaes, the Captain is no in his bed! and a gentleman at our house has ordered a fowl and minced collops, and a bottle of sherry, and has sent to ask him to supper, to tell him all about the Abbey."

"Na," answered Luckie Grimalaes, in the true sleepy tone of a Scottish matron when ten o'clock is going to strike, "he's no in his bed, but I'ae warrant him no gae out at this time o' night to keep folks sitting up waiting for him—the Captain's a decent man."

I plainly perceived this last compliment was made for my hearing, by way both of indicating and of recommending the course of conduct which Mrs Grimalaes desired I should pursue. But I had not been knocked about the world for thirty years and odd, and lived a bluff bachelor all the while, to come home and be put under petticoat government by my landlady. Accordingly I opened my chamber door, and desired my old friend David to walk up stairs.

"Captain," said he, as he entered, "I am as glad to find you up as if I had hooked a twenty pound saumon. There's a gentleman up yonder that will not sleep sound in his bed this blessed night, unless he has the pleasure to drink a glass of wine with you."

"You know, David," I replied, with becoming dignity, "that I cannot with propriety go out to visit strangers at this time of night; or accept of invitations from people of whom I know nothing."

David swore a round oath, and added, "Was ever the like heard of! He has ordered a fowl and egg sauce, a pancake and minced collops, and a bottle of sherry—D'ye think I was come and ask you to go to keep company with any hit English rider, that sups on toasted cheese, and a cheerer of rum-toddy! This is a gentleman every inch of him, and a virtuoso, a clean virtuoso—a sad-coloured stand of claithes, and a wig like the curled back of a mug-ewe. The very first question he speered was about the auld drawbrig that has been at the bottom of the water these twal score years—I have seen the foundations when we were sticking saumon—And how the deevil suld he ken any thing about the old drawbrig, unless he were a virtuoso!"

David being a virtuoso in his own way, and moreover a landholder and baritor, was a qualified judge of all who frequented his house, and therefore I could not avoid again tying the strings of my knees.

"That's right, Captain," vociferated David, "you twa will be as thick as three in a bed an anen ye forgather. I haena seen the like o' him, my very self since I saw the great Doctor Samuel Johnson on his tower through Scotland, whilk tower is lying in my back-parlour for the amusement of my guests, wi' the twa boards torn aff."

"Then the gentleman is a scholar, David?"

"I'ae uphaud him a scholar," answered David "he has a black coat on, or a brown ane, at orv fate."

"Is he a clergyman?"

"I am thinking no, for he looked after his horse's supper before he spoke o' his ain," replied my host.

"Has he a servant?" demanded I.

"Nae servant," answered David; "but a grand face he has o' his ain, that wad gar any body be willing to serve him that looks upon him."

"And what makes him think of disturbing me."

Ah, David, this has been some of your chattering; you are perpetually bringing your guests on my shoulders, as if it were my business to entertain every man who comes to the George."

"What the deil wad ye hae me do, Captain?" answered mine host; "a gentleman lights down, and asks me in a most earnest manner, what man of sense and learning there is about our town, that can tell him about the antiquities of the place, and specially about the auld Abbey—ye wadna hae me tell the gentleman a lee! and ye ken weel enough there is naeboddy in the town can say a reasonable word about it, be it no yourself, except the bodral, and he is as fou as a piper by this time. So, says I; there's Captain Clutterbuck, that's a very civil gentleman, and has little to do forby telling a' the auld cracks about the Abbey, and dwells just hard by. Then says the gentleman to me, 'Sir,' says he, very civilly, 'have the goodness to step to Captain Clutterbuck with my compliments, and say I am a stranger, who have been led to these parts chiefly by the fame of these Ruins; and that I would call upon him, but the hour is late.' And mair he said—that I have forgotten, but I weel remember it ended—'And, landlord, get a bottle of your best sherry, and supper for twa.'—Ye wadna have had me refuse to do the gentleman's bidding, and me a publican?"

¹ The George was, and is, the principal inn in the village of Kennaquhair, or Melrose. But the landlord of the period was not the same civil and quiet person by whom the inn is now kept. David Kyle, a Melrose proprietor of no little importance, a first-rate person of consequence in whatever belonged to the business of the town, was the original owner and landlord of the inn. Poor David! like many other busy men, took so much care of public affairs, as in some degree to neglect his own. There are persons still alive at Kennaquhair who can recognise him and his peculiarities in the following sketch of mine Host of the George.

² There is more to be said about this old bridge hereafter. See Note C.

"Well, David," said I, "I wish your virtuoso had taken a fitter hour — but as you say he is a gentleman —"

"I've upbraid him that — the order speaks for itself — a bottle of sherry — minced collops and a fowl — that's speaking like a gentleman, I trow! — That's right, Captain, button weel up, the night's raw — but the water's clearing for a' that; we'll be on 't neist night wi' my Lord's boats, and we'll hae ill luck if I dinna send you a kipper to relish your ale at e'en."

In five minutes after this dialogue, I found myself in the parlour of the George, and in the presence of the stranger.

He was a grave personage, about my own age, (which we shall call about fifty,) and really had, as my friend David expressed it, something in his face that inclined men to oblige and to serve him. Yet this expression of authority was not at all of the cast which I have seen in the countenance of a general of brigade, neither was the stranger's dress at all martial. It consisted of a uniform suit of iron-gray clothes, cut in rather an old-fashioned form. His legs were defended with strong leathern gambadoes, which, according to an antiquarian contrivance, opened at the sides, and were secured by steel clasps. His countenance was worn as much by toil and sorrow as by age, for it intimated that he had seen and endured much. His address was singularly pleasing and gentlemanlike, and the apology which he made for disturbing me at such an hour, and in such a manner, was so well and handsomely expressed, that I could not reply otherwise than by declaring my willingness to be of service to him.

"I have been a traveller to-day, sir," said he, "and I would willingly defer the little I have to say till after supper, for which I feel rather more appetized than usual."

We gate down to table, and notwithstanding the stranger's alleged appetite, as well as the gentle preparation of cheese and ale which I had already laid aboard, I really believe that I of the two did the greater honour to my friend David's fowl and minced collops.

When the cloth was removed, and we had each made a tumbler of negus, of that liquor which hosts call Sherry, and guests call Lisbon, I perceived that the stranger seemed pensive, silent, and somewhat embarrassed, as if he had something to communicate which he knew not well how to introduce. To pave the way for him, I spoke of the ancient ruins of the Monastery, and of their history. But, to my great surprise, I found I had met my match with a witness. The stranger not only knew all that I could tell him, but a great deal more; and, what was still more mortifying, he was able, by reference to dates, charters, and other evidence of facts, that, as Burns says, "down he disputed," to correct many of the vague tales which I had adopted on doose and vulgar tradition, as well as to confute more than one of my favourite theories on the subject of the old monks and their dwellings, which I had sported freely in all the presumption of superior information. And here I cannot but remark, that much of the stranger's arguments and inductions rested upon the authority of Mr Deputy Register of Scotland,* and his lucubrations; a gentleman whose indefatigable research into the national records is like to destroy my trade, and that of all local antiquaries, by substituting truth instead of legend and romance. Alas! would the learned gentleman did but know how difficult it is for us dealers in petty wares of antiquity to —

Pluck from our memories a rooted "legend," Raze out the written records of our brain,
Or cleanse our bosoms of that perilous stuff — and so forth. It would, I am sure, move his pity to think how many old dogs he hath set to learn new tricks, how many venerable parrots he hath taught to sing a new song, how many gray heads he hath addled by vain attempts to exchange their old Mumpsimus for his new Sumpsimus. But let it pass. Humana perpesi sumus — All changes round us, past, present, and to come; that which was history yesterday becomes fable to-day, and the truth of to-day is hatched into a lie by to-morrow.

Finding myself life to be overpowered in the Monastery, which I had hitherto regarded as my citadel, I began, like a skillful general, to evacuate that place of defence, and fight my way through the adjacent country. I had recourse to my acquaintance with the families and antiquities of the neighbourhood, ground on which I thought I might skirmish at large without its being possible for the stranger to meet me with advantage. But I was mistaken.

The man in the iron-gray suit shewed a much more minute knowledge of these particulars than I had the least pretension to. He could tell the very year in which the family of De Haga first settled on their ancient barony.† Not a Thane within reach but he knew his family and connections, how many of his ancestors had fallen by the sword of the English, how many in domestic brawl, and how many by the hand of the executioner for march-treason. "Their castles he was acquainted with from turret to foundation-stone; and as for the miscel-

Heik, heik, watter brids,
Hag shall be Hag of Bemer-shire.

† The nobleman whose hosts are mentioned in the text, is the late kind and amiable Lord Somersville, an intimate friend of the author. antiquities scattered about the country, he knew every one of them, from a crowleek to a cairn, and could give as good an account of each as if he had lived in the time of the Danes or Druids.

I was now in the mortifying predicament of one who suddenly finds himself a scholar when he came to teach, and nothing was left for me but to pick up as much of his conversation as I could, for the benefit of the next company. I told, indeed, Allan Ramsay's story of the Monk and Miller's Wife, in order to retreat with some honour under cover of a parting volley. Here, however, my flank was again turned by the eternal stranger.

"You are pleased to be facetious, sir," said he; "but you cannot be ignorant, that the ludicrous incident you mentioned is the subject of a tale much older than that of Allan Ramsay."

I nodded, unwilling to acknowledge my ignorance, though, in fact, I knew no more what he meant than did one of my friend David's posthorses.

"I do not allude," continued my omniscient companion, "to the curious poem published by Pinkerton from the Maitland Manuscript, called the Eryars of Berwick, although it presents a very ruinous and amusing picture of Scottish manners during the reign of James V.; but rather to the Italian novelist, by whom, so far as I know, the story was first printed, although unquestionably he first took his original from some ancient fabliau."

"It is not to be doubted," answered I, not very well understanding, however, the proposition to which I gave such unqualified assent.

"Yet," continued my companion, "I question much, had you known my situation and profession, whether you would have pitched upon this precise anecdote for my amusement."

This observation he made in a tone of perfect good-humour. I pricked up my ears at the hint, and answered as politely as I could, that my ignorance of his condition and rank could be the only cause of my having stumbled on any thing disagreeable; and that I was most willing to apologize for my unintentional offence, as soon as I should know wherein it consisted.

"Nay, no offence, sir," he replied; "offence can only exist where it is taken. I have been too long accustomed to more severe and cruel misconstructions, to be offended at a popular jest, though directed at my profession."

"Am I to understand, then," I answered, "that I am speaking with a Catholic clergyman?"

"An unworthy monk of the order of Saint Benedict," said the stranger, "belonging to a community of your own countrymen, long established in France, and scattered unhappily by the events of the Revolution."

It is curious to remark at how little expense of invention successive ages are content to receive amusement. The same story which Ramsay and Dunbar have successively handled, forms also the subject of the modern tale, No Song, no

"Then," said I, "you are a native Scotchman, and from this neighbourhood?"

"Not so," answered the monk; "I am a Scotchman by extraction only, and never was in this neighbourhood during my whole life."

"Never in this neighbourhood, and yet so minutely acquainted with its history, its traditions, and even its external scenery! You surprise me, sir," I replied.

"It is not surprising," he said, "that I should have that sort of local information, when it is considered, that my uncle, an excellent man, as well as a good Scotchman, the head also of our religious community, employed much of his leisure in making me acquainted with these particulars; and that I myself, disgusted with what has been passing around me, have for many years amused myself, by digesting and arranging the various scraps of information which I derived from my worthy relative, and other aged brethren of our order."

"I presume, sir," said I, "though I would by no means intrude the question, that you are now returned to Scotland with a view to settle amongst your countrymen, since the great political catastrophes of our time has reduced your corps?"

"No, sir," replied the Benedictine, "such is not my intention. A European potentate, who still cherishes the Catholic faith, has offered us a retreat within his dominions, where a few of my scattered brethren are already assembled, to pray to God for blessings on their protector, and pardon to their enemies. No one, I believe, will be able to object to us under our new establishment, that the extent of our revenues will be inconsistent with our vows of poverty and abstinence; but, let us strive to be thankful to God, that the snare of temporal abundance is removed from us."

"Many of your convents abroad, sir," said I, "enjoyed very handsome incomes—and yet, allowing for times, I question if any were better provided for than the Monastery of this village. It is said to have possessed nearly two thousand pounds in yearly money-rent, fourteen chalders and nine bolls of wheat, fifty-six chalders five bolls barley, forty-four chalders and ten bolls oats, capons and poultry, butter, salt, carriage and arriage, peas and kine, wool and ale."

"Even too much of all these temporal goods, sir," said my companion, "which, though well intended by the pious donors, served only to make the establishment the envy and the prey of those by whom it was finally devoured."

"In the meanwhile, however," I observed, "the monks had an easy life of it, and, as the old song goes,

—made gods kail
On Fridays when they fasted."

"I understand you, sir," said the Benedictine; "it is difficult, and, as the proverb is, to carry a full cup without spilling. Unquestionably the wealth of the community, as it endangered the safety of the establishment by exciting the cupidity of others, was also in frequent instances a snare to the brethren themselves. And yet we have seen the revenues of convents expended, not only in acts of beneficence and hospitality to individuals, but in works of general and permanent advantage to the world at large. The noble folio collection of French historians, commenced in 1737, under the inspection and at the expense of the community of Saint Maur, will long show that the revenues of the Benedictines were not always spent in self-indulgence; and that the members of that order did not uniformly slumber in sloth and indolence when they had discharged the formal duties of their rule."

As I knew nothing earthly at the time about the community of Saint Maur and their learned labours, I could only return a mumbling assent to this proposition. I have since seen this noble work in the library of a distinguished family, and I must own I am ashamed to reflect, that in so wealthy a country as ours, a similar digest of our historians should not be undertaken, under the patronage of the noble and the learned, in rivalry of that which the Benedictines of Paris executed at the expense of their own conventual funds.

"I perceive," said the ex-Benedictine, smiling, "that your heretical prejudices are too strong to allow us poor brethren any merit, whether literary or spiritual."

"Far from it, sir," said I; "I assure you I have been much obliged to monks in my time. When I was quartered in a Monastery in Flanders, in the campaign of 1798, I never lived more comfortably in my life. They were jolly fellows the Flemish Canons, and right sorry was I to leave my good quarters, and to know that my honest hosts were to be at the mercy of the Sans-Culottes. But fortune de la guerre!"

The poor Benedictine looked down and was silent. "had unwittingly awakened a train of bitter reflections, or rather I had touched somewhat rudely upon a thorn which seldom ceased to vibrate of itself. But he was too much accustomed to this sorrowful train of ideas to suffer it to overcome him. On my part, I hastened to atone for my blunder. "If there was any object of his journey to this country in which I could, with propriety, assist him, I begged to offer him my best services." I own I laid some little emphasis on the words "with propriety," as I felt it would ill become me, a sound Protestant, and a servant of government so far as my half-pay was concerned, to implicate myself in any recruiting which my companion might have undertaken in behalf of foreign seminaries, or in any similar design for the advancement of Popery, which, whether the Pope be actually the old lady of Babylon or no, it did not become me in any manner to advance or countenance.

My new friend hastened to relieve my indecision. "I was about to request your assistance, sir," he said, "in a matter which cannot but interest you as an antiquary, and a person of research. But I assure you it relates entirely to events and persons removed to the distance of two centuries and a half. I have experienced too much evil from the violent unsettlement of the country in which I was born, to be a rash labourer in the work of innovation in that of my ancestors."

I again assured him of my willingness to assist him in any thing that was not contrary to my allegiance or religion.

"My proposal," he replied, "affects neither. — May God bless the reigning family in Britain! They are not, indeed, of that dynasty to restore which my ancestors struggled and suffered in vain; but the Providence who has conducted his present Majesty to the throne, has given him the virtues necessary to his time — firmness and intrepidity — a true love of his country, and an enlightened view of the dangers by which she is surrounded. — For the religion of these realms, I am contented to hope that the great Power, whose mysterious dispensation has rent them from the bosom of the church, will, in his own good time and manner, restore them to its holy pale. The efforts of an individual obscure and humble as myself, might well retard, but could never advance, a work so mighty."

"May I then inquire, sir," said I, "with what purpose you seek this country?"

Ere my companion replied, he took from his pocket a clasped paper book, about the size of a regimental orderly-book, full, as it seemed, of memoranda; and drawing one of the candles close to him, (for David, as a strong proof of his respect for the stranger, had indulged us with two,) he seemed to peruse the contents very earnestly.

"There is among the ruins of the western end of the Abbey church," said he, looking up to me, yet keeping the memorandum-book half open, and occasionally glancing at it, as if to refresh his memory, "a sort of recess or chapel beneath a broken arch, and in the immediate vicinity of one of those shattered Gothic columns which once supported the magnificent roof, whose fall has now encumbered that part of the building with its ruins."

"I think," said I, "that I know whereabouts you are. Is there not in the side wall of the chapel, or recess which you mention, a large carved stone, bearing a coat of arms, which no one hitherto has been able to decipher?"

"You are right," answered the Benedictine; and again consulting his memorandum, he added, "the arms on the dexter side are those of Glenginning, being a cross parted by a cross-indented and countercharged of the same; and on the sinister three spurrows for those of Arscot; they are two ancient families, now almost extinct in this country — the same part, y. per pale."

"I think," said I, "there is no part of this ancient structure with which you are not as well acquainted as was the mason who built it. But if your information be correct, he who made out these hearings must have had better eyes than mine."

"His eyes," said the Benedictine, "have long been closed in death; probably when he inspected the monument it was in a more perfect state, or he may have derived his information from the tradition of the place."

"I assure you," said I, "that no such tradition now exists. I have made several reconnaissances among the old people, in hopes to learn something of the armorial bearings, but I never heard of such a circumstance. It seems odd that you should have acquired it in a foreign land."

"These trifling particulars," he replied, "were formerly looked upon as more important, and they were sanctified to the exiles who retained recollection of them, because they related to a place dear indeed to memory, but which their eyes could never again behold. It is possible, in like manner, that on the Potomac or Susquehanna, you may find traditions current concerning places in England, which are utterly forgotten in the neighbourhood where they originated. But to my purpose. In this recess, marked by the armorial bearings, lies buried a treasure, and it is in order to remove it that I have undertaken my present journey."

"A treasure!" echoed I, in astonishment.

"Yes," replied the monk, "an inestimable treasure, for those who know how to use it rightly."

I own my ears did tingle a little at the word treasure, and that a handsome tilbury, with a neat groom in blue and scarlet livery, having a smart cockade on his glazed hat, seemed as it were to glide across the room before my eyes, while a voice, as of a crier, pronounced in my ear, "Captain Clutterbuck's tilbury—drive up." But I resisted the devil, and he fled from me.

"I believe," said I, "all hidden treasure belongs either to the king or the lord of the soil; and as I have served his majesty, I cannot concern myself in any adventure which may have an end in the Court of Exchequer."

"The treasure I seek," said the stranger, smiling, "will not be envied by princes or nobles,—it is simply the heart of an upright man."

"Ah! I understand you," I answered; "some relic, forgotten in the confusion of the Reformation. I know the value which men of your persuasion put upon the bodies and limbs of saints. I have seen the Three Kings of Cologne."

"The relics which I seek, however," said the Benedictine, "are not precisely of that nature. The excellent relative whom I have already mentioned, amused his leisure hours with putting into shape the traditions of his family, particularly some remarkable circumstances which took place about the first breaking out of the schism of the church in Scotland. He became so much interested in his own labours, that at length he resolved that the heart of one individual, the hero of his tale, should rest no longer in a land of heresy, now deserted by all his kindred. As he knew where it was deposited, he formed the resolution to visit his native country for the purpose of recovering this valued relic. But age, and at length disease, interfered with his resolution, and it was on his deathbed that he charged me to undertake the task in his stead. The various important events which have crowded upon each other, our ruin and our exile, have for many years obliged me to postpone this delegated duty. Why, indeed, transfer the relics of a holy and worthy man to a country, where religion and virtue are become the mockery of the scorner? I have now a home, which I trust may be permanent, if any thing in this earth can be termed so. Thither will I transport the heart of the good father, and beside the shrine, which it shall occupy, I will construct my own grave."

"He must, indeed, have been an excellent man," replied I, "whose memory, at so distant a period, calls forth such strong marks of regard."

"He was, as you justly term him," said the ecclesiastic, "indeed excellent—excellent in his life and doctrine—excellent, above all, in his self-denial and disinterested sacrifice of all that life holds dear to principle and to friendship. But you shall read his history. I shall be happy at once to gratify your curiosity, and to shew my sense of your kindness, if you will have the goodness to procure me the means of accomplishing my object."

I replied to the Benedictine, that, as the rubbish amongst which he proposed to search was no part of the ordinary burial-ground, and as I was on the best terms with the sexton, I had little doubt that I could procure him the means of executing his pious purpose.

With this promise we parted for the night; and on the ensuing morning I made it my business to see the sexton, who, for a small gratuity, readily granted permission of search, on condition, however, that he should be present himself, to see that the stranger removed nothing of intrinsic value.

"To bones, and skulls, and hearts, if he can find any, he shall be welcome," said this guardian of the ruined Monastery, "there's plenty a' about, an he's curious of them; but if there be any picts" (meaning perhaps pyres) "or chalices, or the like of such Popish vessels of gold and silver, dail hae me an I connieve at their being removed."

The sexton also stipulated, that our researches should take place at night, being unwilling to excite observation, or give rise to scandal.

My new acquaintance and I spent the day as became lovers of hoar antiquity. We visited every corner of these magnificent ruins again and again during the forenoon; and, having made a comfortable dinner at David's, we walked in the afternoon to such places in the neighbourhood as ancient tradition or modern conjecture had rendered mark-worthy. Night found us in the interior of the ruins, attended by the sexton, who carried a dark lantern, and stumbling alternately over the graves of the dead, and the fragments of that architecture, "which they doubtless trusted would have canopied their bones till doomsday."

I am by no means particularly superstitious, and yet there was that in the present service which I did not very much like. There was something awful in the resolution of disturbing, at such an hour, and in such a place, the still and mute sanctity of the grave. My companions were free from this impression—the stranger from his energetic desire to execute the purpose for which he came—and the sexton from habitual indifference. We soon stood in the aisle, which, by the account of the Benedictine, contained the bones of the family of Glendinning, and were busily employed in removing the rubbish from a corner which the stranger pointed out. If a half-pay Captain could have represented an ancient Border-knight, or an ex-Benedictine of the nineteenth century a wizard monk of the sixteenth, we might have aptly enough personified the search after Michael Scott's lamp and book of magic power. But the sexton would have been de trop in the group.¹

Ere the stranger, assisted by the sexton in his task, had been long at work, they came to some hewn stones, which seemed to have made part of a small shrine, though now displaced and destroyed.

"Let us remove these with caution, my friend," said the stranger, "lest we injure that which I come to seek."

"They are prime stones," said the sexton, "picked free every one of them;—warer than the best wad never serve the monks, I see warrant."

A minute after he had made this observation, he exclaimed, "I hae fund something now that stands again the spade, as if it were neither earth nor stane."

The stranger stooped eagerly to assist him.

"Na, na, halli o' my ain," said the sexton; "nae halves or quarters."—and he lifted from amongst the ruins a small leaden box.

"You will be disappointed, my friend," said the Benedictine, "if you expect any thing there but the mouldering dust of a human heart, closed in an inner case of porphyry."

I interrupted as a neutral party, and taking the box from the sexton, reminded him, that if there were treasure concealed in it, still it could not become the property of the finder. I then proposed, that as the place was too dark to examine the contents of the leaden casket, we should adjourn to David's, where we might have the advantage of light and fire while carrying on our investigation. The stranger requested us to go before, assuring us that he would follow in a few minutes.

I fancy, that old Mattocks suspected these few minutes might be employed in effecting farther discoveries amongst the tombs, for he glided back through a side-aisle to watch the Benedictine's motions, but presently returned, and told me in a whisper, that "the gentleman was on his knees among the cauld stanes, praying like ony saint."

I stole back, and beheld the old man actually employed as Mattocks had informed me. The language seemed to be Latin; and as the whispered, yet solemn accent, glided away through the ruined aisles, I could not help reflecting how long it was since they had heard the forms of that religion; for the exercise of which they had been reared at such cost of time, taste, labour, and expense. "Come away, come away," said I; "let us leave him to himself, Mattocks; this is no business of ours."

"My certes, no, Captain," said Mattocks; "ne'ertheless, it winna be amiss to keep an ee on him. My father, rest his soul, was a horse-couper, and used to say he never was cheated in a naig in his life, saving by a west-country whig frae Kilmarnock, that said a grace over a dram o' whisky. But this gentleman will be a Roman, I see warrant!"

"You are perfectly right in that, Saunders," said I.

"Ay, I have seen twa or three of their priests that were chased over here some score o' years syne. They just danced like mad when they looked on the friars' heads, and the nuns' heads, in the cloister yonder; they took to them like auld acquaintance like.—Od, he is not stirring yet, mair than he were a through-stane! I never kend a Roman, to say kend him, but aye—mair by token, he was the only aye in the town to ken—and that was auld Jock of the Pend. It wad ha been lang ere ye fand Jock praying in the Abbey in a thick night, wi' his knees on a cauld stane. Jock likt a kirk wi' a chimley in't. Mony a merry play I hae had wi' him down at the inn yonder; and, when he died, decently I wad hae carded him; but, or I gat his grave weel bowld, some of the quality, that were o' his ain unhappy persuasion, had the corpses whirled away up the water, and buried him after their ain pleasure, doubtless—theyland best. I wad hae made nae great charge. I wadna hae excused Johnnie, dead or alive.—Stay, ere—the strange gentleman is coming."

"Hold the lantern to make him, Mattocks," said I.—"This is rough walking, sir."

¹ This is one of those passages which must now read awkwardly, since every one knows that the Novelist and the author of the Lay of the Minstrel is the same person. But before the avowal was made, the author was forced into this and similar allusions against good taste, to resist an argument, often repeated, that there was something very mysterious in the Author of Waverley's manner concerning the Walter Scott, an author sufficiently well-known at least. I had a great mind to remove the passages from this edition, but the more candid way is to explain how they came there.

"Yes," replied the Benedictine; "I may say with a poet, who is doubtless familiar to you——"
I should be surprised if he were, thought I internally.

The stranger continued :

"Saint Francis be my speed ! how off to-right
Have my old feet stumbled at graves !"

"We are now clear of the churchyard," said I, "and have but a short walk to David's, where I hope we shall find a cheerful fire to enliven us after our night's work."

We entered, accordingly, the little parlour, into which Mattocks was also about to push himself with sufficient offrontery, when David, with a most astounding oath, expelled him by head and shoulders, d—ning his curiosity, that would not let gentlemen be private in their own inn. Apparently mine host considered his own presence as no intrusion, for he crowded up to the table on which I had laid down the leaden box. It was frail and wasted, as might be guessed, from having lain so many years in the ground. On opening it, we found deposited within, a case made of porphyry, as the stranger had announced to us.

"I fancy," he said, "gentlemen, your curiosity will not be satisfied,—perhaps I should say that your suspicions will not be removed,—unless 'I undo this casket; yet it only contains the mouldering remains of a heart, once the seat of the noblest thoughts."

He undid the box with great caution; but the shrivelled substance which it contained bore now no resemblance to what it might once have been, the means used having been apparently unequal to preserve its shape and colour, although they were adequate to prevent its total decay. We were quite satisfied, notwithstanding, that it was, what the stranger asserted, the remains of a human heart; and David readily promised his influence in the village, which was almost co-ordinate with that of the baillie himself, to silence all idle rumours. He was, moreover, pleased to favour us with his company to supper; and having taken the lion's share of two bottles of sherry, he not only sanctioned with his plenary authority the stranger's removal of the heart, but, I believe, would have authorized the removal of the Abbey itself, were it not that it happens considerably to advantage the worthy publican's own custom.

The object of the Benedictine's visit to the land of his forefathers being now accomplished, he announced his intention of leaving us early in the ensuing day, but requested my company to breakfast with him before his departure. I came accordingly, and when we had finished our morning's meal, the priest took me apart, and pulling from his pocket a large bundle of papers, he put them into my hands. "These," said he, "Captain Clutterbuck, our genuine Memoirs of the sixteenth century, and exhibit in a singular, and, as I think, an interesting point of view, the manners of that period. I am induced to believe that their publication will not be an unacceptable present to the British public; and willingly make over to you any profit that may accrue from such a transaction."

I stared a little at this announcement, and observed, that the hand seemed too modern for the date he assigned to the manuscript.

"Do not mistake me, sir," said the Benedictine; "I did not mean to say the Memoirs were written in the sixteenth century, but only, that they were compiled from authentic materials of that period, but written in the taste and language of the present day. My uncle commenced this book; and I partly to improve my habit of English composition, partly to divert melancholy thoughts, amused my leisure hours with continuing and concluding it. You will see the period of the story where my uncle leaves off his narrative, and I commence mine. In fact, they relate in a great measure to different persons, as well as to a different period.

Retaining this paper in my hand, I proceeded to state to him my doubts, whether, as a good Protestant, I could undertake or superintend a publication written probably in the spirit of Popery.

"You will find," he said, "no matter of controversy in these sheets, nor any sentiments stated, with which, I trust, the good in all persuasions will not be willing to join. I remembered I was writing for a land unhappily divided from the Catholic faith; and I have taken care to say nothing which, justly interpreted, could give ground for accusing me of partiality. But if, upon collating my narrative with the proofs to which I refer you—for you will find copies of many of the original papers in that parcel—you are of opinion that I have been partial to my own faith, I freely give you leave to correct my errors in that respect. I own, however, I am not conscious of this defect, and have rather to fear that the Catholics may be of opinion, that I have mentioned circumstances respecting the decay of discipline which preceded, and partly occasioned, the great schism, called by you the Reformation, over which I ought to have drawn a veil. And indeed, this is one reason why I choose the papers should appear in a foreign land, and pass to the press through the hands of a stranger."

"To this I had nothing to reply, unless to object my own incompetency to the task the good father was desirous to impose upon me. On this subject he was pleased to say more, I fear, than his knowledge of me fully warranted—more, at any rate, than my modesty will permit me to record. At length he ended, with advising me, if I continued to feel the diffidence which I stated, to apply to some veteran of literature, whose experience might supply my deficiencies. Upon these terms we parted, with mutual expressions of regard, and I have never since heard of him."

After several attempts to peruse the quires of paper thus singularly conferred on me, in which I was interrupted by the most insupportable fits of yawning, I at length, in a sort of despair, communicated them to our village club, from whom they found a more favourable reception than the unlucky conformation of my nerves had been able to afford them. They unanimously pronounced the work to be exceedingly good, and assured me I would be guilty of the greatest possible injury to our flourishing village, if I should suppress what threw such an interesting and radiant light upon the history of the ancient Monastery of Saint Mary.

At length, by dint of listening to their opinion, I became dubious of my own; and, indeed, when I heard passages read forth by the sonorous voice of our worthy pastor, I was scarce more tired than
I have felt myself at some of his own sermons.
Such, and so great is the difference betwixt reading a thing one's self, making toilsome way through all the difficulties of manuscript, and, as the man says in the play, "having the same read to you;"
— it is positively like being wafted over a creek in a boat, or wading through it off your feet, with the mud up to your knees. Still, however, there remained the great difficulty of finding some one who could act as editor, corrector at once of the press and of the language, which, according to the schoolmaster, was absolutely necessary.

Since the trees walked forth to choose themselves a king, never was an honour so handled about. The parson would not leave the quiet of his chimney-corner—the bailie pleaded the dignity of his situation, and the approach of the great annual fair, as reasons against going to Edinburgh to make arrangements for printing the Benedictine's manuscript. The schoolmaster alone seemed of malleable stuff; and, desirous perhaps of emulating the fame of Jedediah Cleishbotham, evinced a wish to undertake this momentous commission.

But a remonstrance from three opulent farmers, whose sons he had at bed, board, and schooling, for twenty pounds per annum a-head, came like a frost over the blossoms of his literary ambition, and he was compelled to decline the service.

In these circumstances, sir, I apply to you, by the advice of our little council of war, nothing doubting you will not be disinclined to take the duty upon you, as it is much connected with that in which you have distinguished yourself. What I request is, that you will review, or rather revise and correct, the enclosed packet, and prepare it for the press, by such alterations, additions, and cor-tailments, as you think necessary. Forgive my hinting to you, that the deepest well may be exhausted,—the best corps of grenadiers, as our old general of brigade expressed himself, may be used up. A few hints can do you no harm; and, for the prize-money, let the battle be first won, and it shall be parted at the drum-head. I hope you will take nothing amiss that I have said. I am a plain soldier, and little accustomed to compliments. I may add, that I should be well contented to march in the front with you—that is, to put my name with yours on the title-page. I have the honour to be

SIR,

Your unknown humble servant,

CUTHBERT CLUTTERBUCK.

VILLAGE OF KENNAQUHAIK, — of April, 18—

For the Author of "Waverley," &c. care of Mr John Ballantyne, Hanover Street, Edinburgh.

ANSWER BY "THE AUTHOR OF WAVERLEY;

TO THE FOREGOING

LETTER FROM CAPTAIN CLUTTERBUCK.

DEAR CAPTAIN,

Do not admire, that, notwithstanding the distance and ceremony of your address, I return an answer in the terms of familiarity. The truth is, your origin and native country are better known to me than even to yourself. You derive your respectable parentage, if I am not greatly mistaken, from a land which has afforded much pleasure, as well as profit, to those who have traded to it successfully.
— I mean that part of the terra incognita which is called the province of Utopia. Its productions, though censured by many (and some who use tea and tobacco without scruple) as idle and unsubstantial luxuries, have nevertheless, like many other luxuries, a general acceptance, and are secretly enjoyed even by those who express the greatest scorn and dislike of them in public. The dram-drinker is often the first to be shocked at the smell of spirits—it is not unusual to hear old maiden ladies declaim against scandal—the private bookcases of some grave-seeming men would not brook decent eyes—and many, I say not of the wise and learned, but of those most anxious to seem such, when the spring-lock of their library is drawn, their velvet cap pulled over their ears, their feet insinuated into their turkey slippers, are to be found, were their retreats suddenly intruded upon, busily engaged with the last new novel.

I have said: the truly wise and learned disdain these shifts, and will open the said novel as avowedly as they would the lid of their snuff-box. I will only quote one instance, though I know a hundred. Did you know the celebrated Watt of Birmingham, Captain Clutterbuck? I believe not, though, from what I am about to state, he would not have failed to have sought an acquaintance with you. It was only once my fortune to meet him, whether in body or in spirit it matters not. 'There were assembled about half-a-score of our Northern Lights, who had amongst them, Heaven knows how, a well known character of your country, Jedediah Cleishbotham. This worthy person, having come to Edinburgh during the Christmas vacation, had become a sort of lion in the place, and was led in leash from house to house along with the guards, the stone-eater, and other amusements of the season, which "exhibited their unparalleled feats to private family-parties, if required." Amidst this company stood Mr Watt, the man whose genius discovered the means of multiplying out national resources to a degree perhaps even beyond his own stupendous powers of calculation and combination; bringing the treasures of the abyss to the summit of the earth—giving the feeble arm of man the momentum of an Afrite—commanding manufactures to arise, as the rod of the prophet produced water in the desert—affording the means of dispensing with that time and tide which wait for no man, and of sailing without that wind which defied the commands and threats of Xerxes himself! This potent commander of the elements—this abridger of time and space—this magician, whose cloudy machinery has produced a change on the world, the effects of which, extraordinary as they are, are perhaps only now beginning to be felt—was not only the most profound man of science, the most successful combiner of powers and calculator of numbers as adapted to practical purposes,—was not only one of the most generally well-informed,—but one of the best and kindest of human beings.

There he stood, surrounded by the little band I have mentioned of Northern literati, men not less tenacious, generally speaking, of their own fame and their own opinions, than the national regiments are supposed to be jealous of the high character which they have won upon service. Me thinks I yet see and hear what I shall never see or hear again. 'In his eighty-fifth year, the alert, kind, benevolent old man, had his attention alive to every one's question, his information at every one's command.

His talents and fancy overflowed on every subject. One gentleman was a deep philologist,—he talked with him on the origin of the alphabet as if he had been coeval with Cadmus; another a celebrated critic,—you would have said the old man had studied political economy and belles-lettres all his life,—of science it is unnecessary to speak, it was his own distinguished walk. And yet, Captain Clutterbuck, when he spoke with your countryman Jedediah Cleishbotham, you would have sworn he had been coeval with Claverhoe and Burley, with the persecutors and persecuted, and could number every shot the dragoons had fired at the fugitive Covenanters. In fact, we discovered, that no novel of the least celebrity escaped his perusal, and that the gifted man of science was as much addicted to the productions of your native country, (the land of Utopia aforesaid,) in other words, as shameless and obstinate a peruser of novels, as if he had been a very milliner's apprentice of eighteen. I know little apology for troubling you with these things, excepting the desire to commemorate a delightful evening, and a wish to encourage you to shake off that modest diffidence which makes you afraid of being supposed connected with the fairy-land of delusive fiction. I will requite your tag of verse, from Horace himself, with a paraphrase for your own use, my dear Captain, and for that of your country club, excepting in reverence the clergyman and schoolmaster:—

Ne sit ancilla tibi amor pudor, &c.
Take thou no scorn,
Of fiction born,
Fair fiction's muse to woo:
Old Homer's theme
Was but a dream,
Himself a fiction too.

Having told you your country, I must next, my dear Captain Clutterbuck, make free to mention your own immediate descent. You are not to suppose your land of prodigies so little known to us as the careful concealment of your origin would seem to imply. But you have it in common with many of your country, studiously and anxiously to hide any connection with it. There is this difference, indeed, betwixt your countrymen and those of our more material world, that many of the most estimable of them, such as an old Highland gentleman called Ossian, a monk of Bristol called Rowley and others, are inclined to gaze themselves off as denizens of the land of reality, whereas most of our fellow-citizens who deny their country are such as that country would be very willing to disclaim. The special circumstances you mention relating to your life and services, impose not upon us. We know

Probably the ingenious author alludes to the national defect:

*The thing said ill,
But the what said no.*

Our characteristick (who is also a land-surveyor) thinks this whole passage refers to Mr Watt's improvements on the steam-engine.—Not by Captain Clutterbuck.

the versatility of the unsubstantial species to which you belong permits them to assume all manner of disguises; we have seen them apparelled in the caftan of a Persian, and the silken robe of a Chinese,¹ and are prepared to suspect their real character under every disguise. But how can we be ignorant of your country and manners, or deceived by the evasion of its inhabitants, when the voyages of discovery which have been made to it rival in number those recorded by Purchas or by Hackluyt?² And to shew the skill and perseverance of your navigators and travellers, we have only to name Sindbad, Aboulfouaris, and Robinson Crusoe. These were the men for discoveries. Could we have sent Captain Greenland to look out for the north-west passage, or Peter Wilkins to examine Baffin's Bay, what discoveries might we not have expected! But there are feats, and these both numerous and extraordinary, performed by the inhabitants of your country, which we read without once attempting to emulate.

I wander from my purpose, which was to assure you, that I know you as well as the mother who did not bear you, for MacDuff's peculiarity sticks to your whole race. You are not born of woman, unless, indeed, in that figurative sense, in which the celebrated Maria Edgeworth may, in her state of single blessedness, be termed mother of the finest family in England. You belong, sir, to the Editors of the land of Utopia, a sort of persons for whom I have the highest esteem. How is it possible it should be otherwise, when you reckon among your corporation the sage Cid Hamet Benengeli, the short-faced president of the Spectator's Club, poor Ben Siltou, and many others, who have acted as gentlemen-usurers to works which have cheered our heaviest, and added wings to our lightest hours!

What I have remarked as peculiar to Editors of the class in which I venture to enrol you, is the happy combination of fortuitous circumstances, which usually put you in possession of the works which you have the goodness to bring into public notice. One walks on the sea-shore, and a wave casts on land a small cylindrical trunk or casket, containing a manuscript much damaged with seawater, which is with difficulty deciphered, and so forth.³ Another steps into a chandler's shop, to purchase a pound of butter, and, behold! the waste-paper on which it is laid is the manuscript of a cabalist.⁴ A third is so fortunate as to obtain from a woman who lets lodgings, the curious contents of an antique bureau, the property of a deceased lodger.⁵ All these are certainly possible occurrences; but I know not how, they seldom occur to any Editors save those of your country. At least I can answer for myself, that in my solitary walks by the sea, I never saw it cast ashore any thing but dulce and tangle, and now and then a deceased star-fish; my landlady never presented me with any manuscript save her cursed bill; and the most interesting of my discoveries in the way of waste-paper, was finding a favourite passage of one of my own novels wrapt round an ounce of snuff.⁶ No, Captain, the funds from which I have drawn my power of amusing the public, have been bought otherwise than by fortuitous adventure. I have buried myself in libraries, to extract from the nonsense of ancient days new nonsense of my own. I have turned over volumes, which, from the pot-hooks I was obliged to decipher, might have been the cabalistic manuscripts of Cornelius Agrippa, although I never saw "the door open and the devil come in."⁷ But all the domestic inhabitants of the libraries were disturbed by the vehemence of my studies;—

From my research the boldest spider fled,
And moths, retreating, trembled as I read.

From this learned sepulchre I emerged like the Magician in the Persian Tales, from his twelve-month's residence in the mountain, not ~~but~~ him to soar over the heads of the multitude, but to mingle in the crowd, and to elbow amongst the throng, making my way from the highest society to the lowest, undergoing the scorn, or, what is harder to brook, the patronizing condescension of the one, and enduring the vulgar familiarity of the other,—and all, you will say, for what!—to collect materials for one of those manuscripts with which mere chance so often accommodates your countrymen; in other words, to write a successful novel.—"O Athenians, how hard we labour to deserve your praise!"

I might stop here, my dear Clutterbuck; it would have a touching effect, and the air of proper deference to our dear Public. But I will not be false with you,—(though falsehood is—excuse the observation—the current coin of your country,) the truth is, I have studied and lived for the purpose of gratifying my own curiosity, and passing my own time; and though the result has been, that, in one shape or other, I have been frequently before the Public, perhaps more frequently than prudence warranted, yet I cannot claim from them the favour due to those who have dedicated their ease and leisure to the improvement and entertainment of others.

Having communicated thus freely with you, my dear Captain, it follows, of course, that I will gratefully accept of your communication, which, as your Benedictine observed, divides itself both by subject, manner, and age, into two parts. But I am sorry I cannot gratify your literary ambition, by suffering your name to appear upon the title-page; and I will candidly tell you the reason.

The Editors of your country are of such a soft-and passive disposition, that they have frequently done themselves great disgrace, by giving up the conductors who first brought them into public notice and public favour, and suffering their names to be used by those quacks and impostors who live upon the ideas of others. Thus I shame to tell how the sage Cid Hamet Benengeli was induced by one Juan Avellaneda to play the Turk with the ingenious Miguel Cervantes, and to publish a Second Part of the adventures of his hero the renowned Don Quixote, without the knowledge or co-operation of his principal aforesaid. It is true, the Arabian sage returned to his allegiance, and thereafter composed a genuine continuation of the Knight of La Mancha, in which the said Avellaneda of Tordesillas is severely chastised. For in this you pseudo-editors resemble the juggler's disciplined ape, to which a sly old Scotsman likened James I., "if you have Jackoo in your hand, you can make him bite me; if I have Jackoo in my hand, I can make him bite you." Yet, notwithstanding the amende honorable thus made by Cid Hamet Benengeli, his temporary defection did not the less occasion the decease of the ingenious Hidalgo Don Quixote, if he can be said to die, whose memory is immortal. Cervantes¹ put him to death, lest he should again fall into bad hands. Awful, yet just consequence of Cid Hamet's defection!

To quote a more modern and much less important instance. I am sorry to observe my old acquaintance Jedediah Cloishbotham has misbehaved himself so far as to desert his original patron, and set up for himself. I am afraid the poor pedagogue will make little by his new allies, unless the pleasure of entertaining the public, and, for aught I know, the gentlemen of the long robe, with disputes about his identity.² Observe, therefore, Captain Clutterbuck, that, wise by those great examples, I receive you as a partner, but a sleeping partner only. As I give you no title to employ or use the firm of the copartnery we are about to form, I will announce my property in my title-page, and put my own mark on my own chattels, which the attorney tells me it will be a crime to counterfeit, as much as it would to imitate the autograph of any other empire—a crime amounting, as advertisements upon little vials assure to us, to nothing short of felony. If, therefore, my dear friend, your name should hereafter appear in any title-page without mine, readers will know what to think of you. I scorn to use either arguments or threats; but you cannot but be sensible, that, as you owe your literary existence to me on the one hand, so, on the other, your very all is at my disposal. I can at pleasure cut off your annuity, strike your name from the half-pay establishment, nay, actually put you to death, without being answerable to any one. These are plain words to a gentleman who has served during the whole war; but, I am aware, you will take nothing amiss at my hands.

And now, my good sir, let us address ourselves to our task, and arrange as we best can the manuscript of your Benedicite, so as to suit the taste of this critical age. You will find I have made very liberal use of his permission, to alter whatever seemed too favourable to the Church of Rome, which I abominate, were it but for her fasts and penances.

Our reader is doubtless impatient, and we must own, with John Bunyan,

We have too long detain'd him in the porch,
And kept him from the sunshine with a torch

Adieu, therefore, my dear Captain—remember me respectfully to the parson, the schoolmaster, and the battle, and all friends of the happy club in the village of Kennaquhair. I have never seen, and never shall see, one of their faces; and notwithstanding, I believe that as yet I am better acquainted with them than any other man who lives.—I shall soon introduce you to my second friend, Mr. John Ballantyne of Trinity Grove, whom you will find warm from his match at single-stick with a brother Publisher.³ Peace to their differences! It is a wrathful trade, and the irritabile genus comprehends the bookselling as well as the book-writing species.—Once more adieu!

THE AUTHOR OF WAVERLEY.

¹ I am since more correctly informed, that Mr. Cloishbotham died some months since at Ganderclough, and that the person assuming his name is an impostor. The real Jedediah made a most Christian and edifying end; and, as I am credibly informed, having sent for a Cameroonian clergyman when he was in extremis, was so fortunate as to convince the good man, that, after all, he had no wish to bring down on the scattered remnant of Mountain folk, "the bonnets of Bonny Dundee." Had that the speculators in print and paper will not allow a good man to rest quiet in his grave.

² This note, and the passages in the text, were occasioned by a London bookseller having printed, as a speculation, an additional collection of Tales of My Landlord, which was not so fortunate as to succeed in passing on the world as genuine.

³ In consequence of the pseudo Tales of My Landlord printed in London, as already mentioned, the late Mr. John Ballantyne, the author's publisher, had a controversy with the intruding bibliophile, each insisting that his Jedediah Cloishbotham was the real Simon Pure.

The Monastery.

CHAPTER I.

O ay! the Monks, the Monks they did the mischief!
 Theirs all the goodness, all the superstition
 Of a most gross and superstitious age—
 May He be praised that sent the healthful tempest
 And scatter'd all these pestilential vapours?
 But that we owed them all to yonder Harlot
 Throned on the seven hills with her cup of gold,
 I will as soon believe, with kind Sir Roger,
 That old Moll White took wing with cat and broomstick,
 And raised the last night's thunder.

— Old Play.

THE village described in the Benedictine's manuscript by the name of Kennaquhair, bears the same Celtic termination which occurs in Traquhair, Caquhair, and other compounds. The learned Chalmers derives this word Quhair, from the winding course of a stream; a definition which coincides, in a remarkable degree, with the serpentine turns of the river Tweed near the village of which we speak. It has been long famous for the splendid Monastery of Saint Mary, founded by David the First of Scotland, in whose reign were formed, in the same county, the no less splendid establishments of Melrose, Jedburgh, and Kelso. The donations of land with which the King endowed these wealthy fraternities procured him from the Monkish historians the epithet of Saint, and from one of his impoverished descendants the splenetic censure, "that he had been a sore saint for the Crown."

It seems probable, notwithstanding, that David, who was a wise as well as a pious monarch, was not moved solely by religious motives to those great acts of munificence to the church, but annexed political views to his pious generosity. His possessions in Northumberland and Cumberland became precarious after the loss of the Battle of the Standard; and since the comparatively fertile valley of Teviotdale was likely to become the frontier of his kingdom, it is probable he wished to secure at least a part of these valuable possessions by placing them in the hands of the monks, whose property was for a long time respected, even amidst the rage of a frontier war. In this manner alone had the King some chance of ensuring protection and security to the cultivators of the soil; and, in fact, for several ages the possessions of these Abbeys were each a sort of Goshen, enjoying the calm light of peace and immunity, while the rest of the country, occupied by wild clans and marauding barons, was not dark some of confusion, blood, and unrelenting outrage.

But these immunities did not continue down to the union of the crowns. Long before that period the wars between England and Scotland had lost their original character of international hostilities, and had become on the part of the English a struggle for subjugation, on that of the Scots a desperate and infuriated defence of their liberties. This introduced on both sides a degree of fury and animosity unknown to the earlier period of their history; and as religious scruples soon gave way to national hatred spurred by a love of plunder, the patrimony of the Church was no longer sacred from incursions on either side. Still, however, the tenants and vassals of the great Abbeys had many advantages over those of the lay barons, who were harassed by constant military duty, until they became desperate, and lost all relish for the arts of peace. The vassals of the church, on the other hand, were only liable to be called to arms on general occasions, and at other times were permitted in comparative quiet to possess their farms and fens.¹ They of course exhibited superior skill in every thing that related to the cultivation of the soil, and were therefore both wealthier and better informed than the military retainers of the restless chiefs and nobles in their neighbourhood.

The residence of these church vassals was usually in a small village or hamlet, where, for the sake of mutual aid and protection, some thirty or forty families dwelt together. This was called the Town, and the land belonging to the various families by whom the Town was inhabited, was called the Township. They usually possessed the land in common, though in various proportions, according to their several grants. The part of the Township properly arable, and kept as such continually under the plough, was called in-field. Here the use of quantities of manure supplied in some degree the exhaustion of the soil, and the fens raised tolerable oats and bear,² usually sowed on alternate ridges, on which the labour of the whole community was bestowed without distinction, the produce being divided after harvest, agreeably to their respective interests.

There was, besides, out-field land, from which it was thought possible to extract a crop now and then, after which it was abandoned to the "skely influences," until the exhausted powers of vegetation were restored. These out-field spots were selected by any tenant at his own choice, amongst the sheep-walks and hills which were always annexed to the Township, to serve as pasture for the community.

¹ Small possessions conferred upon vassals and their heirs, held for a small quit-rent, or a moderate proportion of the produce. This was a favourite manner, by which the churches peopled the patrimony of their convents; and many donations of such tenures, as they are called, are still to be found in possession of their family descendants in the neighbourhood of the great Monasteries of Scotland.
² Or hags, a Scotch kind of barley.

The trouble of cultivating these patches of out-field and the precarious chance that the crop would pay the labour, were considered as giving a right to any fœnar, who chose to undertake the adventure, to the produce which might result from it.

There remained the pasturage of extensive moors, where the valleys often afforded good grass, and upon which the whole cattle belonging to the community fed indiscriminately during the summer, under the charge of the Town-hord, who regularly drove them out to pasture in the morning, and brought them back at night, without which precaution they would have fallen a speedy prey to some of the Snatchers in the neighbourhood. These are things to make modern agriculturists hold up their hands and stare; but the same mode of cultivation is not yet entirely in desuetude in some distant parts of North Britain, and may be witherssed in full force and exercise in the Zeland Archipelago.

The habitations of the church-fœnars were not so primitive than their agriculture. In each village or Town were several small towers, having battlements projecting over the side-walls, and usually an advanced angle or two with shot-holes for flanking the door-way, which was always defended by a strong door of oak, studded with nails, and often by an exterior grated door of iron. These snail-shell-houses were ordinarily inhabited by the principal fœnars and their families; but, upon the alarm of approaching danger, the whole inhabitants thronged from their own miserable cottages, which were situated around, to garrison these points of defense. It was then no easy matter for a hostile party to penetrate into the village, for the men were habituated to the use of bows and fire-arms, and the towers being generally so placed, that the discharge from one crossed that of another, it was impossible to assault any of them individually.

The interior of these houses was usually sufficiently wretched, for it would have been folly to have furnished them in a manner which could excite the avarice of their lawless neighbours. Yet the families themselves exhibited in their appearance a degree of comfort, information, and independence, which could hardly have been expected. Their in-field supplied them with bread and home-brewed ale, their herds and flocks with beef and mutton, (the extravagance of killing lambs or calves was never thought of.) Each family killed a mart, or fat bullock, in November, which was salted up for winter use, to which the goodwife could, upon great occasions, add a dish of pigeons or a fat capon, — the ill-cultivated garden afforded “lang-cals,” — and the river gave salmon to serve as a relish during the season of Lent.

Of fuel they had plenty, for the bogs afforded turf; and the remains of the abused woods continued to give them logs for burning, as well as timber for the usual domestic purposes. In addition to these comforts, the Goodman would now and then rally forth to the greenwood, and mark down a buck of season with his gun or his cross-bow; and the Father Confessor seldom refused him absolution for the trespass if duly invited to take his share of the smoking haunch. Some, still bolder, made, either with their own domestics, or by associating themselves with the moss-troopers, in the language of sheepherds, “a start and overtook” the golden ornaments and silken head-dresses by the families of one of two families of note, were vividously traced by their neighbours to such successful excursions. This, however, was a more inexpressible crime in the eyes of the Abbot and Community of Saint Mary's, than the borrowing one of the “gude king's deer,” and they failed not to discomfitance and punish, by every means in their power, offences which were sure to lead to severe retaliation upon the property of the church, and which tended to alter the character of their peaceful vassalage.

As for the information possessed by those dependents of the Abbacies, they might have been truly said to be better fed than taught, even though their fare had been worse than it was. Still, however, they enjoyed opportunities of knowledge from which others were excluded. The Monks were in general well acquainted with their vassals and tenants, and familiar in the families of the better class among them, where they were sure to be received with the respect due to their twofold character of spiritual father and secular landlord. Thus it often happened, when a boy displayed talents and inclination for study, one of the brethren, with a view to his being bred to the church, or out of good-nature, in order to pass away his own idle time, if he had no better motive, initiated him into the mysteries of reading and writing, and imparted to him such other knowledge as he himself possessed. And the heads of these allied families, having more time for reflection, and more skill, as well as stronger motives for improving their small properties, bore amongst their neighbours the character of shrewd, intelligent men, who claimed respect on account of their comparative wealth, even while they were despised for a less warlike and enterprising turn than the other Borderers. They lived as much as they well could amongst themselves, avoiding the company of others, and dreading nothing more than to be involved in the deadly feuds and ceaseless contentions of the secular land-holders.

Such is a general picture of these communities. During the fatal wars in the commencement of Queen Mary's reign, they had suffered dreadfully by the hostile invasions. For the English, now a Protestant people, were so far from sparing the church-lands, that they forayed them with more unrelenting severity than even the possessions of the laity. But the peace of 1550 had restored some degree of tranquillity to these distracted and harassed regions, and matters began again gradually to settle upon their former footing. The monks repaired their ravaged shrines — the fœnar again roofed his small fortalice which the enemy had ruined — the poor labourer rebuilt his cottage — an easy task, where a few sods, stones, and some pieces of wood from the next copse, furnished all the materials necessary. The cattle, lastly, were driven out of the wastes and thickets in which the remnant of them had been secreted; and the mighty hall moved at the head of his seraglio and their followers, to take possession of their wonted pastures. There ensued peace and quiet, the state of the age and nation considered, to the Monastery of Saint Mary, and its dependents, for several tranquil years.

CHAPTER II.

In yon lone vale his early youth was led,
 Not solitary then — the temple-bells
 Of full Alcock often waiked its windings,
 From where the brook joins the majestic river.
 To the wild northern bog, the carlew's haunt,
 Where oases foeth its first and feeble streamlet.
Old Play.

We have said, that most of the feuars dwelt in the village belonging to their townships. This was not, however, universally the case. A lonely tower, to which the reader must now be introduced, was at least one exception to the general rule.

It was of small dimensions, yet larger than those which occurred in the village, as intimating that, in case of assault, the proprietor would have to rely upon his own unassisted strength. Two or three miserable huts, at the foot of the fortalice, held the bondsmen and tenants of the feuar. The site was a beautiful green knoll, which started up suddenly in the very throat of a wild and narrow glen, and which, being surrounded, except on one side, by the winding of a small stream, afforded a position of considerable strength.

But the great security of Glendearg, for so the place was called, lay in its secluded, and almost hidden situation. To reach the tower, it was necessary to travel three miles up the glen, crossing about twenty times the little stream, which, winding through the narrow valley, encountered at every hundred yards the opposition of a rock or precipitous bank on the one side, which altered its course, and caused it to shoot off in an oblique direction to the other. The hills which ascend on each side of this glen are very steep, and rise boldly over the stream, which is thus imprisoned within their barriers. The sides of the glen are impracticable for horse, and are only to be traversed by means of the sheep-paths which lie along their sides. It would not be readily supposed that a road so hopeless and so difficult could lead to any habitation more important than the summer shealing of a shepherd.

Yet the glen, though lonely, nearly inaccessible, and sterile, was not then absolutely void of beauty. The turf which covered the small portion of level ground on the sides of the stream, was as close and verdant as if it had occupied the scythes of a hundred gardeners once a fortnight; and it was garnished with an embroidery of daisies and wild flowers, which the scythes would certainly have destroyed. The little brook, now confined between closer limits, now left at large to choose its course through the narrow valley, danced carelessly on from stream to pool, light and unturbid, as that better class of spirits who pass their way through life, yielding to innumerable obstacles, but as far from being subdued by them as the sailor who meets by chance with an unfavourable wind, and shapes his course so as to be driven back as little as possible.

The mountains, as they would have been called in England, Scottish the steep trees, rose abruptly over the little glen, here presenting the gray face of a rock, from which the turf had been pecked by the torrents, and there displaying patches of wood and heath, which had escaped the waste of the cattle and the mow of the feuars, and which, feathering rapidly up the beds of empty torrents, or occupying the concave recesses of the bank, gave at once beauty and variety to the landscape. Above these scattered woods rose the hill, in barren, but purple majesty; the dark rich hue, particularly in autumn, contrasting beautifully with the thickets of oak and birch, the mountain ashes and thorns, the alder and quivering aspens, which chaquered off varied the descent, and not less with the dark-green, and velvet turf, which composed the level part of the narrow glen.

Yet, though thus embellished, the scene could neither be strictly termed sublime nor beautiful, and scarcely even picturesque or striking. But its extreme solitude pressed on the heart; the traveller felt that uncertainty whether he was going, or in what so wild a path was to terminate, which, at times, strikes more on the imagination than the grand features of a show-scene, when you know the exact distance of the inn where your dinner is bespoke, and at the moment preparing. These are ideas, however, of a far later age; for at the time we treat of, the picturesque, the beautiful, the sublime, and all their intermediate shades, were ideas absolutely unknown to the inhabitants and occasional visitors of Glendearg.

Those had, however, attached to the scene feelings fitting the time. Its name, signifying the Red Valley, seems to have been derived, not only from the purple colour of the heath, with which the upper part of the rising banks was profusely clothed, but also from the dark red colour of the rocks, and of the precipitous earthen banks, which in that country are called scourgs. Another glen, about the head of Ettrick, has acquired the same name from similar circumstances; and there are probably more in Scotland to which it has been given.

As our Glendearg did not abound in mortal visitants, superstition, that it might not be absolutely destitute of inhabitants, had peopled its recesses with beings belonging to another world. The savage and capricious Brown Man of the Moors, a being which seems the genuine descendant of the northern dwarfs, was supposed to be seen there frequently, especially after the autumnal equinox, when the fogs were thick, and objects not easily distinguished. The Scottish fairies, too, a whimsical, irritable, and mischievous tribe, who, though at times capriciously benevolent, were more frequently adverse to mortals, were also supposed to have formed a residence in a particularly wild recess of the glen, of which the real name was, in allusion to that circumstance, Corrie nan Shian, which, in corrupted Celtic, signifies the Hollow of the Fairies. But the neighbours were more cautious in speaking about this place, and avoided giving it a name, from an idea common then throughout all the British and Celtic provinces of Scotland, and still retained in many places, that to speak either good or ill of this capricious race of imaginary beings, is to provoke their resentment, and that secrecy and silence is what they chiefly desire from those who may intrude upon their revels, or discover their haunts.

A mysterious terror was thus attached to the dale, which afforded access from the broad valley of the Tweed, up the little glen we have described, to the fortalice called the Tower of Glendearg. Beyond the knoll, where, as we have said, the tower was situated, the hills grew more steep, and narrowed on the slender brook, so as scarce to leave a footpath; and there the glen terminated in a wild waterfall, where a slender thread of water dashed in a precipitous fine of foam over two or three precipices. Yet farther in the same direction, and above these successive cataracts, lay a wild and extensive morass, frequented only by waterfowl, wide, waste, apparently almost interminable, and serving in a great measure to separate the inhabitants of the glen from those who lived to the northward.

To restless and indefatigable moss-troopers, indeed, these morasses were well known, and sometimes afforded a retreat. They often rode down the glen—called at this tower—asked and received hospitality—but still with a sort of reserve on the part of its more peaceful inhabitants, who entertained them as a party of North-American Indians might be received by a new European settler, as much out of fear as hospitality, while the uppermost wish of the landlord is the speedy departure of the savage guests.

This had not always been the current of feeling in the little valley and its tower. Simon Glendinning, its former inhabitant, boasted his connection by blood to that ancient family of Glendonwyne, on the western border. He used to narrate, at his fireside, in the autumn evenings, the feats of the family to which he belonged, one of whom fell by the side of the brave Earl of Douglas at Otterbourne. On these occasions Simon usually held upon his knee an ancient broadsword, which had belonged to his ancestors before any of the family had consented to accept a shelter under the peaceful dominion of the monks of Saint Mary's. In modern days, Simon might have lived at ease on his own estate, and quietly murmured against the fate that had doomed him to dwell there, and cut off his access to martial renown. But so many opportunities, nay, so many calls there were for him, who in those days spoke big, to make good his words by his actions, that Simon Glendinning was soon under the necessity of marching with the men of the Halidome, as it was called, of Saint Mary's, in that disastrous campaign which was concluded by the battle of Pinkie.

The Catholic clergy were deeply interested in that national quarrel, the principal object of which was, to prevent the union of the infant Queen Mary with the son of the heretical Henry VIII. The Monks had called out their vassals, under an experienced leader. Many of themselves had taken arms, and marched to the field, under a banner representing a female, supposed to personify the Scottish Church, kneeling in the attitude of prayer, with the legend, Afflicta Sponsa se obliuiscit.

The Scots, however, in all their wars, had more occasion for good and cautious generals, than for excitation, whether political or enthusiastic. Their headlong and impatient courage uniformly induced them to rush into action without duly weighing either their own situation, or that of their enemies, and the inevitable consequence was frequent defeat. With the dolorous slaughter of Pinkie we have nothing to do, excepting that among ten thousand men of low and high degree, Simon Glendinning, of the Tower of Glendearg, hit the dust, no way deserving in his death that ancient name from which he derived his descent.

When the doleful news, which spread terror and mourning through the whole of Scotland, reached the Tower of Glendearg, the widow of Simon, Elspeth Brydone by her family name, was alone in that desolate habitation, excepting a hind or two, alike past martial and agricultural labour, and the helpless widows and families of those who had fallen with their master. The feeling of desolation was universal;—but what availed it! The monks, their patrons and protectors, were driven from their Abbey by the English forces, who now overran the country, and enforced at least an appearance of submission on the part of the inhabitants. The Protector, Somerset, formed a strong camp among the ruins of the ancient Castle of Roxburgh, and compelled the neighbouring country to come in, pay tribute, and take assurance from him, as the phrase then went. Indeed, there was no power of resistance remaining; and the few barons, whose high spirit disdained even the appearance of surrender, could only retreat into the wildest fastnesses of the country, leaving their houses and property to the wrath of the English, who detached parties every where to distress, by military exaction, those whose chiefs had not made their submission. The Abbot and his community having retreated beyond the Forth, their lands were severely forayed, as their sentiments were held peculiarly inimical to the alliance with England.

Amongst the troops detached on this service was a small party, commanded by Stawarth Bolton, a captain in the English army, and full of the blunt and unpretending gallantry and generosity which has so often distinguished that nation. Resistance was in vain. Elspeth Brydone, when she descried a dozen of horsemen threading their way up the glen, with a man at their head, whose scarlet cloak, bright armour, and dancing plume, proclaimed him a leader, saw no better protection for herself than to issue from the iron grate, covered with a long mourning veil, and holding one of her two sons in each hand, to meet the Englishman—state her deserted condition—place the little tower at his command—and beg for his mercy. She stated, in a few brief words, her intention, and added, "I submit, because I have no means of resistance."

"And I do not ask your submission, mistress, for the same reason," replied the Englishman. "To be satisfied of your peaceful intentions is all I ask; and, from what you tell me, there is no reason to doubt them."

"At least, sir," said Elspeth Brydone, "take share of what our spend and our garners afford. Your horses are tired—your folk want refreshment."

"Not a whit—not a whit," answered the honest Englishman; "I shall never be said we disturbed by carousal the widow of a brave soldier, while she was mourning for her husband.—Comrade, thou about.—Yet, stay," he added, checking his war-horse, "my parties are out in every direction; they must have some token that your family are under my assurance of safety.—Here, my little fellow," said he, speaking to the eldest boy, who might be about nine or ten years old, "lead me thy homestead."

The child, saddest, looked milky, and hesitated, while the mother, with many a fervent prayer, and such earnest shillings as under mothers give to spoiled children, at length succeeded in snatching the bonnet from him, and handing it to the English leader.

Stawarth Bolton took his embroidered red cross from his barret-cap, and putting it into the loop of the boy's bonnet, said to the mistress, (for the title of lady was not given to dames of her degree,) "By this token, which all my people will respect, you will be freed from any importunity on the part of our forayers." He placed it on the boy's head; but it was no sooner there, than the little fellow, his veins swelling, and his eyes shooting fire through tears, snatched the bonnet from his head, and, ere his mother could interfere, skinned it into the brook. The other boy ran instantly to fish it out again, threw it back to his brother, first taking out the cross, which, with great veneration, he kissed and put into his bosom. The Englishman was half diverted, half surprised, with the scene.

"What mean ye by throwing away Saint George's red cross?" said he to the elder boy, in a tone betwixt jest and earnest.

"Because Saint George is a southern saint," said the child, sulkily.

"Good"—said Stawarth Bolton.—"And what did you mean by taking it out of the brook again—my little fellow?" he demanded of the younger.

"Because the priest says it is the common sign of salvation to all good Christians."

"Why, good again!" said the honest soldier. "I protest unto you, mistress, I envy you these boys. Are they both yours?"

Stawarth Bolton had reason to put the question, for Halbert Glendinning, the elder of the two, had hair as dark as the raven's plumage, black eyes, large, bold, and sparkling, that glittered under eyebrows of the same complexion; a skin deep embrowned, though it could not be termed swarthy, and an air of activity, frankness, and determination, far beyond his age. On the other hand, Edward, the younger brother, was light-haired, blue-eyed, and of fairer complexion, in countenance rather pale, and not exhibiting that rosy hue which colours the sanguine cheek of robust health. Yet the boy had nothing sickly or ill-conditioned in his look, but was, on the contrary, a fair and handsome child, with a smiling face, and mild, yet cheerful eye.

The mother glanced a proud motherly glance, first at the one, and then at the other, ere she answered the Englishman, "Surely, sir, they are both my children."

"And by the same father, mistress?" said Stawarth; but, seeing a blush of displeasure strike on her brow, he instantly added, "Nay, I mean no offence; I would have asked the same question at any of my gossips in merry Lincoln.—Well, dame, you have two fair boys; I would I could borrow one, for Dame Bolton and I live childless in our old hall.—Come, little fellows, which of you will go with me?"

The trembling mother, half-fearing as he spoke, drew the children towards her, one with either hand, while they both answered the stranger. "I will not go with you," said Halbert, boldly, "for you are a false-hearted Southern; and the Southern killed my father; and I will war on you to the death, when I can draw my father's sword."

"God-a-mercy, my little levin-bolt," said Stawarth, "the goodly custom of deadly feud will never go down in thy day, I presume.—And you, my fine white-head, will you not go with me, to ride a cock-horse?"

"No," said Edward, demurely, "for you are a heretic."

"Why, God-a-mercy still!" said Stawarth Bolton. "Well, dame, I see I shall find no recruits for my troop from you; and yet I do envy you these two little chubby knaves." He sighed a sigh, as was visible, in spite of gorget and corselet, and then added, "And yet, my dame and I would but quarrel which of the knaves we should like best; for I should wish for the black-eyed rogue—and she, I warrant me, for that blue-eyed, fair-haired darling. Nathless, we must brook our solitary wedlock, and wish joy to those that are more fortunate.—Sergeant Britton, do thou remain here till recalled—protect this family, as under assuagance—do them no wrong, and suffer no wrong to be done to them, as thou wilt answer it.—Dame, Britton is a married man, old and steady; feed him on what you will, but give him not over much liquor."

Dame Glendinning again offered refreshments, but with a faltering voice, and an obvious desire her invitation should not be accepted. The fact was, that, supposing her boys as precious in the eyes of the Englishman as in her own, (the most ordinary of parental errors,) she was half afraid, that the admiration he expressed of them in his blunt manner might end in his actually carrying off one or other of the little darlings whom he appeared to covet so much. She kept hold of their hands, therefore, as if her feeble strength could have been of service, had any violence been intended, and saw with joy she could not disguise, the little party of horse countermarch, in order to descend the glen. Her feelings did not escape Stawarth Bolton, "I forgive you, dame," he said, "for being suspicious that an English falcon was hovering over your Scottish moor-brood. But fear not—those who have fewest children have fewest cares; nor does a wise man covet those of another household. Adieu, dame; when the black-eyed rogue is able to drive a foray from England, teach him to spare women and children, for the sake of Stawarth Bolton."

"God be with you, gallant Southern!" said Elspeth Glendinning, but not till he was out of hearing, spurring on his good horse to regain the head of his party, whose plumage and armour were now glancing and gradually disappearing in the distance, as they wended down the glen.

"Mother," said the elder boy, "I will not say amen to a prayer for a Southern."

"Mother," said the younger, more reverentially, "is it right to pray for a heretic?"

"The God to whom I pray only knows," answered poor Elspeth; "but these two words, Southern and heretic, have already cost Scotland ten thousand of her best and bravest, and me a husband, and you a father; and, whether blessing or blessing, I never wish to hear them more.—Follow me to the Place, etc," she said to Britton, "and such as we have to offer you shall be at your disposal."

CHAPTER III.

They lighted down on Tweed water,
And blew their coals me hot,
And fired the March and Teviotdale,
All in an evening late.

Auld ballad.

THE report soon spread through the patrimony of Saint Mary's and its vicinity, that the Mistress of Glendearg had received assurance from the English Captain, and that her cattle were not to be driven off, or her corn burned. Among others who heard this report, it reached the ears of a lady, who, once much higher in rank than Elspeth Glendinning, was now by the same calamity reduced to even greater misfortune.

She was the widow of a brave soldier, Walter Avenel, descended of a very ancient Dorder family, who once possessed immense estates in Eekdale. These had long since passed from them into other hands, but they still enjoyed an ancient Barony of considerable extent, not very far from the patrimony of Saint Mary's, and lying upon the same side of the river with the narrow vale of Glendearg, at the head of which was the little tower of the Glendinnings. Here they had lived, bearing a respectable rank amongst the gentry of their province, though neither wealthy nor powerful. This general regard had been much augmented by the skill, courage, and enterprise which had been displayed by Walter Avenel, the last Baron.

When Scotland began to recover from the dreadful shock she had sustained after the battle of Flukie-Cleuch, Avenel was one of the first who, assembling a small force, set an example in those bloody and unsparing skirmishes, which showed that a nation, though conquered and overrun by invaders, may yet wage against them such a war of detail as shall in the end become fatal to the foreigners. In one of these, however, Walter Avenel fell, and the news which came to the house of his fathers was followed by the distracting intelligence, that a party of Englishmen were coming to plunder the mansion and lands of his widow, in order, by this act of terror, to prevent others from following the example of the deceased.

The unfortunate lady had no better refuge than the miserable cottage of a shepherd among the hills, to which she was hastily removed, scarce conscious where or for what purpose her terrified attendants were removing her and her infant daughter from her own house. Here she was tended with all the duteous service of ancient times by the shepherd's wife, Tibb Tacket, who in better days had been her own house-woman. For a time the lady was unconscious of her misery; but when the first stunning effect of grief was so far passed away that she could form an estimate of her own situation, the widow of Avenel had cause to envy the lot of her husband in his dark and silent abode. The domestics who had guided her to her place of refuge, were presently obliged to depart for their own safety, or to seek for necessary subsistence; and the shepherd and his wife, whose poor cottage she shared, were soon after deprived of the means of affording their late mistress such coarse sustenance which they had jointly shared with her. Some of the English buyers had discovered and driven off the few sheep which had escaped the first researches of their avarice. Two cows shared the fate of the remnant of their stock; they had afforded the family almost their sole support, and now famine appeared to stare them in the face.

"We are broken and beggared now, out and out," said old Martin the shepherd—and he wrung his hands in the bitterness of agony, "the thieves, the harrying thieves! not a cloot left of the haddil hirsel!"

"And to see poor Grizy and Crumbie," said his wife, "turning back their necks to the byre, and routing while the stony-hearted villains were brogging them on wi' their lances!"

"There were but four of them," said Martin, "and I have seen the day forty wad not have ventured this length. But our strength and manhood is gane with our puir maister."

"For the sake of the holy rood, whisht, man," said the goodwife, "our laddy is half gane already, as ye may see by that fleigtering of the ee-lid—a word mair and she's dead outright."

"I could almost wish," said Martin, "we were a' gane, for, what to do passes my puir wit. I care little for mysell, or ye, Tibb,—we can make a fend—work or want—we can do baith, but she can do neither."

They canvassed their situation thus openly before the lady, convinced by the paleness of her look, her quivering lip, and dead-set eye, that she neither heard nor understood what they were saying.

"There is a way," said the shepherd, "but I kenna if she could bring her heart to it,—there's Simon Glendinning's widow of the glen yonder, has had assurance from the Southern loons, and nae soldier to steer them for one cause or other. Now, if the laddy could bow her mind to take quarters with Elspeth Glendinning till better days cast up, nae doubt it wad be doing an honour to the like of her, but——"

"An honour," answered Tibb, "ay, by my word, sic an honour as wad be pride to her kin mony a lang year after her banes were in the mould. Oh! gudeman, to hear ye even the Lady of Avenel to seeking quarters wi' a Kirk-vassal's widow!"

"Loath should I be to wish her to it," said Martin; "but what may we do!—to stay here is mere starvation; and where to go, I'm sure I ken nae mair than ony tup I ever herded."

"Speak no more of it," said the widow of Avenel, suddenly joining in the conversation, "I will go to the tower.—Dame Elspeth is of good folk; a widow, and the mother of orphans,—she will give us house-room until something be thought upon. These evil showers make the low bush better than no field."

"See there, see there," said Martin, "you see the laddy has twice our senses."

"And natural it is," said Tibb, "seeing that she is convent-bred, and can lay all herdery, herby white-scam and shall-work."

"Do you not think," said the lady to Martin, still clasping her child to her bosom, and making it clear from what motives she desired the refuge, "that Dame Glendinning will make us welcome?"

"Blithely welcome, blithely welcome, my laddy," answered Martin cheerily, "and we shall deserve a welcome at her hand. Men are scarce now, my laddy, with their wars; and give us a thought of came to it, I can do as gude a day's darg as ever I did in my life, and Tibb can sort cows with ony living woman."

"And muckle mair could I do," said Tibb, "were it in ony feasible house; but there will be neither pearls to mend, nor pinnars to busk up, in Elsieph Glendinning's."

"Whist wi' your pride, woman," said the shepherd, "enough ye can do, baith outside and inside, an ye set your mind to it; and hard it is if we twa canna work for three folk's meat, forby my dainty wee leddy there. Come awa, come awa, nae use in staying here langer; we have five Scots miles over moss and muir, and that is nae easy walk for a leddy born and bred."

Household stuff there was little or none to remove or care for; an old pony which had escaped the plunderers, owing partly to its pitiful appearance, partly from the reluctance which it shewed to be caught by strangers, was employed to carry the few blankets, and other trifles which they possessed. When Shagram came to his master's well known whistle, he was surprised to find the poor thing had been wounded, though slightly, by an arrow, which one of the forayers had shot off in anger after he had long chased it in vain.

"Ay, Shagram," said the old man, as he applied something to the wound, "must you rue the lang-bow as well as all of us!"

"What corner in Scotland rucs it not!" said the Lady of Avenel.

"Ay, ay, madam," said Martin, "God keep this kindly Scot from the cloth-yard shaft, and he will keep himself from the handy stroke. But let us go our way; the trash that is left I can come back for. There is nae ane to stir it but the good neighbours, and they —"

"For the love of God, goodman," said his wife, in a remonstrating tone, "haud your peace! Think what ye're saying, and we hae nae muckle wild land to go over before we win to the girth gate."

The husband nodded, acquiescence; for it was deemed highly imprudent to speak of the fairies either by their title of good neighbours or by any other, especially when about to pass the place, which they were supposed to haunt!

They set forward on their pilgrimage on the last day of October. "This is thy birth-day, my sweet Mary," said the mother, as a sting of bitter recollection crossed her mind. "Oh, who could have believed that the head, which, a few years since, was cradled amongst so many rejoicing friends, may perhaps this night seek a cover in vain!"

The exiled family then set forward,—Mary Avenel, a lovely girl between five and six years old, riding gipsy fashion upon Shagram, betwixt two bundles of bedding; the Lady of Avenel walking by the animal's side; Tibb leading the bridle, and old Martin walking a little before, looking anxiously around him to explore the way.

Martin's task as guide, after two or three miles' walking, became more difficult than he himself had expected, or than he was willing to avow. It happened that the extensive range of pasturage, with which he was conversant, lay to the west, and to get into the little valley of Glendearg he had to proceed easterly. In the wilder districts of Scotland, the passage from one vale to another, otherwise than by descending that which you leave, and reascending the other, is often very difficult.—Heights and hollows, mosses and rocks intervene, and all those local impediments which throw a traveller out of his course. So that Martin, however sure of his general direction, became conscious, and at length was forced reluctantly to admit, that he had missed the direct road to Glendearg, though he insisted they must be very near it. "If we can but win across this wide bog," he said, "I shall warrant ye are on the top of the tower."

But to get across the bog was a point of no small difficulty. The farther they ventured into it, though proceeding with all the caution which Martin's experience recommended, the more unsound the ground became, until, after they had passed some places of great peril, their best argument for going forward came to be, that they had to encounter equal danger in returning.

The Lady of Avenel had been tenderly nurtured, but what will not a woman endure when her child is in danger? Complaining less of the dangers of the road than her attendants, who had been injured to such from their infancy, she kept herself close by the side of the pony, watching its every footstep, and ready, if it should flounder in the morass, to snatch her little Mary from its back. At length they came to a place where the ground greatly deteriorated, for all around him was broken lumps of heath, divided from each other by deep sloughs of black tenacious mire. After great consideration, Martin, selecting what he thought the safest path, began himself to lead forward Shagram, in order to afford greater security to the child. But Shagram snorted, laid his ears back, stretched his two feet forward, and drew his hind feet under him, so as to adopt the best possible posture for obstinate resistance and refused to move one yard in the direction indicated. Old Martin, much puzzled, now hesitated whether to exert his absolute authority, or to defer to the contumacious obstinacy of Shagram, and was not greatly comforted by his wife's observation, who, seeing Shagram stare with his eyes, distend his nostrils, and tremble with terror, hinted that "he surely saw more than they could see."

In this dilemma, the child suddenly exclaimed—"Bonny leddy signs to us to come yon gate." They all looked in the direction where the child pointed, but saw nothing, save a wreath of rising mist, which fancy might form into a human figure; but which afforded to Martin only the sorrowful conviction, that the danger of their situation was about to be increased by a heavy fog. He once more essayed to lead forward Shagram; but the animal was inflexible in its determination not to move in the direction Martin recommended. "Take your awy, way for it then," said Martin, "and let us see what you can do for us."

Shagram, abandoned to the discretion of his own free-will, set off boldly in the direction the child had pointed. There was nothing wonderful in this, nor in its bringing them safe to the other side of the dangerous morass; for the instinct of these animals in traversing bogs is one of the most curious parts of their nature, and is a fact generally established. But it was remarkable, that the child more than once mentioned the beautiful lady and her signals, and that Shagram seemed to be in the secret, always moving in the same direction which she indicated. The Lady of Avenel took little notice at the time, her mind being probably occupied by the instant danger; but her attendants changed expressive looks with each other more than once.

"All-Hallow Eve!" said Tibb, in a whisper to Martin.

"For the mercy of Our Lady, not a word of that now!" said Martin in reply. "Tell your beads, woman, if you cannot be silent."

When they got once more on firm ground, Martin recognized certain land-marks, or cairns, on the tops of the neighbouring hills, by which he was enabled to guide his course, and ere long they arrived at the Tower of Glendearg.

It was at the sight of this little fortalice that the misery of her lot pressed hard on the poor Lady of Avenel. When by any accident they had met at church, market, or other place of public resort, she remembered the distant and respectful air with which the wife of the warlike baron was addressed by the spouse of the humble fear. "And now, so much was her pride humbled, that she was to ask to share the precarious safety of the same fear's widow, and her pittance of food, which might perhaps be yet more precarious. Martin probably guessed what was passing in her mind, for he looked at her with a wistful glance, as if to deprecate any change of resolution; and answering to his looks, rather than his words, she said, while the sparkle of subdued pride once more glanced from her eye; "If it were for myself alone, I could but die—but for this infant—the last pledge of Avenel—"

"True, my lady," said Martin hastily; and, as if to prevent the possibility of her retracting, he added, "I will step on and see Dame Elspeth—I lend her husband weel, and have bought and sold with him, for as great a man as he was."

Martin's tale was soon told, and met all acceptance from her companion in misfortune. The Lady of Avenel had been meek and courteous in her prosperity; in adversity, therefore, she met with the greater sympathy. Besides, there was a point of pride in sheltering and supporting a woman of such superior birth and rank; and, not to do Elspeth Glendinning injustice, she felt sympathy for one whose fate resembled her own in so many points, yet was so much more severe. Every species of hospitality was gladly and respectfully extended to the distressed travellers, and they were kindly requested to stay as long at Glendearg as their circumstances rendered necessary, or their inclination prompted.

CHAPTER IV.

Nether be I found by thee unawed,
On that thine halloo'd eve abroad,
When goblins haunt from food and fen,
The steps of men,
COLLINS'S Ode to Fear.

As the country became more settled, the Lady of Avenel would have willingly returned to her husband's mansion. But that was no longer in her power. It was a reign of minority, when the sovereign had the best right, and when acts of usurpation were frequent amongst those who had much power and little conscience.

Julian Avenel, the younger brother of the deceased Walter, was a person of this description. He hesitated not to seize upon his brother's house and lands, so soon as the retreat of the English permitted him. At first, he occupied the property in the name of his niece, but when the lady proposed to return with her child to the mansion of its fathers, he gave her to understand, that Avenel, being a male fief, descended to the brother, instead of the daughter, of the last possessor. The ancient philosopher declined a dispute with the emperor who commanded twenty legions, and the widow of Walter Avenel was in no condition to maintain a contest with the leader of twenty more-troopers. Julian was also a man of service, who could back a friend in case of need, and was sure, therefore, to find protectors among the ruling powers. In short, however clear the little Mary's right to the possessions of her father, her mother saw the necessity of giving way, at least for the time, to the usurpation of her uncle.

Her patience and forbearance were so far attended with advantage, that Julian, for very shame's sake, could no longer suffer her to be absolutely dependant on the charity of Elspeth Glendinning. A drove of cattle and a bull (which were probably missed by some English 'farmer') were driven to the pastures of Glendearg; presents of raiment and household stuff were sent liberally, and some little money, though with a more sparing hand: for those in the situation of Julian Avenel could come more easily by the goods, than the representing medium of value, and made their payments chiefly in kind.

In the meantime, the widows of Walter Avenel and Simon Glendinning had become habituated to each other's society, and were unwilling to part. The lady could dope no more secret and secure residence than in the Tower of Glendearg, and she was now in a condition to support her share of the mutual housekeeping. Elspeth, on the other hand, felt pride, as well as pleasure, in the society of a guest of such distinction, and was at all times willing to pay much greater deference than the Lady of Walter Avenel could be prevailed on to accept.

Martin and his wife diligently served the united family in their several vocations, and yielded obedience to both mistresses, though always considering themselves as the especial servants of the Lady of Avenel. This distinction sometimes occasioned a slight degree of difference between Dame Elspeth and Tibb; the former being jealous of her own consequence, and the latter apt to lay too much stress upon the rank and family of her mistress. But both were alike desirous to conceal such petty squabbles from the lady, her hostess source yielding to her old domestic in respect for her person. Neither did the difference exist in such a degree as to interrupt the general harmony of the family; for the one wisely gave way as she saw the other become warm; and Tibb, though she often gave the first provocation, had generally the sense to be the first in relinquishing the argument.

The world which lay beyond was gradually forgotten by the inhabitants of this sequestered glen, and unless when she attended mass at the Monastery Church upon some high holiday, Alice of Avenel almost forgot that she once had an equal rank with the proud wives of the neighbouring barons and nobles who on such occasions crowded to the solemnity. The recollection gave her little pain. She loved her husband for himself, and in his inestimable loss all lesser subjects of regret had ceased to interest her. At times, indeed, she thought of claiming the protection of the Queen Regent (Mary of Guise) for her little orphan, but the fear of Julian Avenel always came between. She was sensible that he would have neither scruple nor difficulty in spiriting away the child, (if he did not proceed farther,) should he once consider its existence as formidable to his interest. Besides, he led a wild and unsettled life, mingling in all feuds and forays, wherever there was a spear to be broken; he evinced no purpose of marrying, and the fate which he continually was braving might at length remove him from his usurped inheritance. Alice of Avenel, therefore, judged it wise to check all ambitious thoughts for the present, and remain quiet in the rude, but peaceable retreat, to which Providence had conducted her.

It was upon an All-Hallow's eve, when the family had passed together for the space of three years, that the domestic circle was assembled round the blazing turf-fire, in the old narrow hall of the Tower of Glendearg. The idea of the masters or mistresses of the mansion feeding or living apart from their domestics, was at this period never entertained. The highest end of the board, the most commodious settle by the fire,—these were the only marks of distinction; and the servants mingled, with deference indeed, but unimproved and with freedom, in whatever conversation was going forward. But the two or three domestics, kept merely for agricultural purposes, had retired to their own cottages without, and with them a couple of wenches, usually employed within doors, the daughters of one of the hinds.

After their departure, Martin looked, first, the iron grate; and, secondly, the inner door of the tower, when the domestic circle was thus arranged. Dame Elspeth sat pulling the thread from her distaff; Tibb watched the progress of staling the whey, which hung in a large pot upon the crook, a chain terminated by a hook, which was suspended in the chimney to serve the purpose of the modern crane. Martin, while busied in repairing some of the household articles, (for every man in those days was his own carpenter and smith, as well as his own tailor and shoemaker,) kept from time to time a watchful eye upon the three children.

They were allowed, however, to exercise their juvenile restlessness by running up and down the hall, behind the seats of the elder members of the family, with the privilege of occasionally making excursions into one or two small apartments which opened from it, and gave excellent opportunity to play at hide-and-seek. This night, however, the children seemed not disposed to avail themselves of their privilege of visiting these dark regions, but preferred carrying on their gambols in the vicinity of the light.

In the meanwhile, Alice of Avenel, sitting close to an iron candlestick, which supported a misshapen torch of domestic manufacture, read small detached passages from a thick clasped volume, which she preserved with the greatest care. The act of reading, she had acquired by her residence in a nunnery during her youth, but she seldom, of late years, put it to any other use than perusing this little volume, which formed her whole library. The family listened to the portions which she selected, as to some good thing which there was a merit in hearing with respect, whether it was fully understood or no. To her daughter, Alice of Avenel had determined to impart their mystery more fully, but the knowledge was at that period attended with personal danger, and was not rashly to be trusted to a child.

The noise of the romping children interrupted, from time to time, the voice of the lady, and drew on the noisy culprits the rebuke of Elspeth.

"Could they not go farther a-field, if they behoved to make such a din, and disturb the lady's good words?" And this command was backed with the threat of sending the whole party to bed if it was not attended to punctually. Acting under the injunction, the children first played at a greater distance from the party, and more quietly, and then began to stray into the adjacent apartments, as they became impatient of the restraint to which they were subjected. But, all at once, the two boys came openmouthed into the hall, to tell that there was an armed man in the spence.

"It must be Christie of Clint-hill," said Martin, rising; "what can have brought him here at this time?"

"Or how came he in?" said Elspeth.

"Alas! what can he seek?" said the Lady of Avenel, to whom this man, a retainer of her husband's brother, and who sometimes executed his commissions at Glendearg, was an object of secret apprehension and suspicion. "Gracious heavens!" she added, rising up, "where is my child?" All rushed to the spence, Halbert Glendinning first arming himself with a rusty sword, and the younger seizing upon the lady's book. They hastened to the spence, and were relieved of a part of their anxiety by meeting Mary at the door of the apartment. She did not seem in the slightest degree alarmed, or disturbed. They rushed into the spence, (a sort of interior apartment in which the family ate their victuals in the summer season,) but there was no one there.

"Where is Christie of Clint-hill?" said Martin.

"I do not know," said little Mary; "I never saw him."

"And what made you, ye misleard loons," said Dame Elspeth to her two boys, "come you gate into the ha', roaring like bulls, to frighten the leddy, and her far frae strong?" The boys looked at each other in silence and confusion, and their mother proceeded with her lecture. "Could ye find nae night for 'daffin but Hallowe'en, and nae time but when the leddy was reading to us about the holy Saints! May ne'er be in my fingers, if I dinna sort ye bairn for it!" The eldest boy bent his eyes on the ground, the younger began to weep, but neither spoke; and the mother would have proceeded to extremities, but for the interposition of the little maiden.

"Dame Elspeth, it was my fault—I did say to them, that I saw a man in the spence."

"And what made you do so, child," said her mother, "to startle us all thus?"

"Because," said Mary, lowering her voice, "I could not help it."

"Not help it, Mary!—you occasioned all this idle noise, and you could not help it! How means you by that, misson?"

"There really was an armed man in this space," said Mary; "and because I was surprised to see him, I cried out to Halbert and Edward——"

"She has told it herself," said Halbert Glendinning, "or it had never been told by me."

"Nor by me neither," said Edward, emulously.

"Mistress Mary," said Elspeth, "you never told us anything before that was not true; tell us if this was a Hallowe'en cantrip, and make an end of it." The Lady of Avenel looked as if she would have interfered, but knew not how; and Elspeth, who was too eagerly curious to regard any distant hint, persevered in her inquiries. "Was it Christie of the Clint-hill?—I would not for a mark that he were about the house, and a body no ken where."

"It was not Christie," said Mary; "it was——it was a gentleman——a gentleman with a bright breastplate, like what I have seen langyne, when we dwelt at Avenel——"

"What like was he?" continued Tibb, who now took share in the investigation.

"Black-haired, black-eyed, with a pecked black beard," said the child, "and many a fold of pearly round his neck, and hanging down his breast over his breastplate; and he had a beautiful hawk, with silver bells, standing on his left hand, with a crimson silk hood upon its head——"

"Ask her no more questions, for the love of God," said the anxious maternal to Elspeth, "but look to my laddy!" But the Lady of Avenel, taking Mary in her hand, turned hastily away, and, walking into the hall, gave them no opportunity of remarking in what manner she received the child's communication, which she thus cut short. What Tibb thought of it appeared from her crossing herself repeatedly, and whispering into Elspeth's ear, "Saints Mary preserve us!—the lassie has seen her father!"

When they reached the hall, they found the lady holding her daughter on her knee, and kissing her repeatedly. When they entered, she again arose, as if to shun observation, and retired to the little apartment where her child and she occupied the same bed.

The boys were also sent to their cabin, and no one remained by the hall fire save the faithful Tibb and Dame Elspeth, excellent persons both, and as thorough gossipers as ever wagged a tongue.

It was but natural that they should instantly resume the subject of the supernatural appearance, for such they deemed it, which had this night alarmed the family.

"I could have wished it had been the devil himself,—be good to and preserve us!—rather than Christie o' the Clint-hill," said the matron of the mansion, "for the word runs rife in the country, that he is aw o' the maist masterful thieves ever lap on horse."

"Hout-tout, Dame Elspeth," said Tibb, "fear ye naething frae Christie; tods keep their ain holes clean. Ye kirk-folk make sic a fasherie about men shifting a wee bit for their living! Our Border-lairds would ride with fifty men at their back, if a' the light-handed lads were out o' gate."

"Better they rode wi' none than distress the country-side the gate they do," said Dame Elspeth.

"But this is to hand back the Southern, then," said Tibb, "if ye take away the lance and broadsword? I trow we could write sonnets do that wi' rock and wheel, and as little the monks wi' belt and book."

"And me weel as the lances and broadsword has kept them back, I trow!—I was naer beholden to ae Southron, and that was Stewarth Belton, than to a' the Border-riders ever wore Saint Andrew's cross—I reckon their skelping back and forward, and lifting honest men's gear, has been a main cause of a' the breach between us and England, and I am sure that cost me a kind goodman. They spoke about the wedding of the Prince and our Queen, but it's as like to ae the driving of the Cumberland folk's stocking that brought them down on us like dragons." Tibb would not have failed in other circumstances to adiew what she thought reflections disparaging to her country folk; but she recollected that Dame Elspeth was mistress of the family, curbed her own zealous patriotism, and hastened to change the subject.

"And is it not strange," she said, "that the heiress of Avenel should have seen her father this blessed night?"

"And ye think it was her father, then!" said Elspeth Glendinning.

"What else can I think?" said Tibb.

"It may have been something waur, in his likeness," said Dame Glendinning.

"I ken naething about that," said Tibb,—"but his likeness it was, that I will be sworn to, just as he used to ride out a-hawking; for having enemies in the country, he seldom laid off the breast-plate; and for my part," added Tibb, "I dinna think a man looks like a man unless he has steel on his breast, and by his side too."

"I have no skill of your harness on breast or side either," said Dame Glendinning; "but I ken there is little luck in Hallowe'en sights, for I have had ane myself."

"Indeed, Dame Elspeth!" said old Tibb, edging her stool closer to the huge elbow-chair occupied by her friend, "I should like to hear about that."

"Ye maun ken then, Tibb," said Dame Glendinning, "that when I was a hempie of nineteen or twenty, it wassa my fault if I wassa at a' the merry-makings time about."

"That was very natural," said Tibb; "but ye hae sobered since that, or ye wadna haud our braw gallants sae lightly."

"I have had that wad sober me or ony ane," said the matron. "Aweel, Tibb, a lass like me wassa to lack woocers, for I wassa sae ill-favoured that the tikes wad bark after me."

"How should that be," said Tibb, "and you sic a weel-favoured woman to this day?"

"Fie, fie, summer," said the matron of Glendinning, hitching her seat of honour, in her turn, a little nearer to the cottage-stool on which Tibb was seated; "weel-favoured is past my time of day; but I might pass then, for I wassa sae tockentat; but what I had a bit hand at my breast-lace. My father was portioner of Little-dearg."

"Ye hae tell'd us that before," said Tibb; "but apent the Hallowe'en?"

"Aweel, aweel, I had mair joy than me, but I favoured none o' them; and me, at Hallowe'en, Father Nicholas the schoolmaster—he was coarser before this father, Father Glendinning was aw—was cracking the stone and shaking his brown beer with us, and as I think he might be, and they would have me try a sample, or see what said was me; and the monk said there was nae ill in it, and if there was, he would amail me for it. And wha but I into the barn to winnow my three weights o' naething—sair, sair my mind miggave me for fear o' wrang-doing and wrang-suffering baith; but I had aye a bairn spirit. I had not winnowed the last weight clean out, and the moon was shining bright upon the floor, when in stalked the presence of my dear Simon Glendinning, that is now happy. I never saw him plainer in my life than I did that moment; he held up an arrow as he passed me, and I awar'd awa wi' fright. Muckle wark there was to bring me to mysell again, and sair they tried to make me believe it was a trick of Father Nicolas and Simon between them; and that the strow was to signify Cupid's shaft, as the Father called it; and mony a time Simon wad threep it to me after I was married—gude man, he liked not it should be said that he was seen out o' the body!—But mark the end o' it, Tibb; we were married, and the gray-goose wing was the death o' him after a!"

"As it has been of ower mony brave men," said Tibb; "I wish there wass nae aebird as a goose in the wide world, forby the checking that ye hae at the burn-side."

"But tell me, Tibb," said Dame Glendinning, "what does your leddy aye do reading out o' that thick black book wi' the silver clasps?—these are ower mony gude words in it to come frae ony body but a priest—An it were about Robin Hood, or some o' David Lindsay's ballants, ane wad ken better what to say to it. I am no misdoubting your mistress nae way, but I wad like ill to hae a decent house haunted wi' ghaists and gyre-carlines."

"Ye hae nae reason to doubt my leddy, or ony thing she says or does, Dame Glendinning," said the faithful Tibb, something offended; "and touching the bairn, it's weel kend she was born on Hallowe'en was nine years gane, and they that are born on Hallowe'en whiles see mair than ither folk."

"And that wad be the cause, then, that the bairn didna mak muckle din about what it saw!—if it had been my Halbert himself, forby Edward; who is of softer nature, he wad hae yammered, the hail night of a constancy. But it's like Mistress Mary has sic sights mair natural to her."

"That may weel be," said Tibb; "for on Hallowe'en she was born, as I tell ye, and our auld parish priest wad fain hae had the night ower, and All-Hallow day begun. But for a' that, the sweet bairn is just like ither bairns, as ye may see yoursell; and except this blessed night, and ance before when we were in that weary bog on the road here, I kenna that it saw mair than ither folk."

"But what saw she in the bog, then," said Dame Glendinning, "forby moor-cocks and heather-blossoms?"

"The wean saw something like a white leddy that waised us the gate," said Tibb, "when we were like to hae perished in the moss-bags—certain it was that Shagran roisted, and I ken Martin thinks, he saw something."

"And what might the white leddy be?" said Elspeth; "have ye ony guess o' that?"

"It's weel kend that, Dame Elspeth," said Tibb; "if ye had lived under grit folk, as I hae done, ye wadna be to seek in that matter."

"I hae aye kept my ain ha' house stane my head," said Elspeth, not without emphasis, "and if I hae nae lived wi' grit folk, grit folk have lived wi' me."

"Weel, weel, dame," said Tibb, "your pardon's prayit, there was nae offence meant. But ye maun ken the great ancient families canna be just served wi' the ordinary saunts, (praise to them!) like Saunt Anthony, Saunt Cuthbert, and the like, that come and gang at every sinner's bidding, but they hae a sort of saunts or angels, or what not, to themselves; and as for the White Maiden of Avenel, she is kend ower the haill country. And she is aye seen to yammer and wail before ony o' that family dies, as was weel kend by twenty folk before the death of Walter Avenel, haly be his cast!"

"If she can do nae mair than that," said Elspeth, somewhat scornfully, "they needna make mony vows to her, I trow. Can she make nae better fend for them than that, and hae naething better to do than wait on them?"

"Mony braw servicos can the White Maiden do for them to the boot of that, and has done in the auld histories," said Tibb, "but I mind o' naething in my day, except it was her that the bairn saw in the bog."

"Aweel, aweel, Tibb," said Dame Glendinning, raising and lighting the iron lamp, "these are great privileges of your grand folk. But our Laddy and Saunt Paul are good enough saunts for me, and I'se warrant them never leave me in a bog that they can hlep me out o', seeing I send four waxen candles to their chapels every Candlemas; and if they are not seen to weep at my death, I'se warrant them smile at my joyful rising again, whilk Heaven send to all of us, Amen."

"Amen," answered Tibb, devoutly; "and now it's time I should hap up the wee bit gathering turf, as the fire is ower low."

Busily she set herself to perform this duty. The relict of Simon Glendinning did but pause a moment to cast a heedful and cautious glance all around the hall, to see that nothing was out of its proper place; then, wishing Tibb good-night, she retired to repose.

"The deil's in the carline," said Tibb to herself, "because she was the wife of a cock-laird, she thinks herself grander, I trow, than the bowerwoman of a lady of that ilk!" Having given vent to her suppressed spleen in this little ejaculation, Tibb also betook herself to slumber.

CHAPTER V.

A priest, ye cry, a priest!—Jame shepherds they.
How shall they gather in the stamping flock?
Dumb dogs which bark not—how shall they compel
The loitering vagrants to the Master's fold?
Fitter to bark before the blessing fire,
And snuff the man next-handed Phillis' dream,
Than on the snow-wreath battle with the wolf.

Reformation.

THE health of the Lady of Avenel had been gradually decaying ever since her disaster. It seemed as if the few years which followed her husband's death had done on her the work of half a century. She lost the fresh elasticity of form, the colour and the mien of health, and became wasted, wan, and feeble. She appeared to have no formed complaint; yet it was evident to those who looked on her, that her strength waned daily. Her lips at length became blanched and her eye dim; yet she spoke not of any desire to see a priest, until Elspeth Glendinning in her zeal could not refrain from touching upon a point which she deemed essential to salvation. Alice of Avenel received her hint kindly, and thanked her for it.

"If any good priest would take the trouble of such a journey," she said, "he should be welcome; for the prayers and lessons of the good must be at all times advantageous."

This quiet acquiescence was not quite what Elspeth Glendinning wished or expected. She made up, however, by her own enthusiasm, for the lady's want of eagerness to avail herself of ghostly counsel, and Martin was despatched with such haste as Shagram would make, to pray one of the religious men of Saint Mary's to come up to administer the last consolations to the widow of Walter de Avenel.

When the Sacristan had announced to the Lord Abbot, that the Lady of the unquhite Walter de Avenel was in very weak health in the Tower of Glendearg, and desired the assistance of a father confessor, the lordly monk paused on the request.

"We do remember Walter de Avenel," he said; "a good knight and a valiant; he was dispossessed of his lands, and slain by the Southron—May not the lady come hither to the sacrament of confession! the road is distant and painful to travel."

"The lady is unwell, holy father," answered the Sacristan, "and unable to bear the journey."

"True—ay,—yes—then must one of our brethren go to her—Knowest thou if she hath aught of a journey from this Walter de Avenel?"

"Very little, holy father," said the Sacristan; "she hath resided at Glendearg since her husband's death, well-nigh on the charity of a poor widow, called Elspeth Glendinning."

"Why, thou knowest all the widows in the country-side!" said the Abbot. "Ho! ho! ho!" and he shook his portly sides at his own jest.

"Ho! ho! ho!" echoed the Sacristan, in the tone and tune in which an inferior applauds the jest of his superior.—Then added, with a hypocritical snuffle, and a sly twinkle of his eye, "It is our duty, most holy father, to comfort the widow—He! he! he!"

This last laugh was more moderate, until the Abbot should put his sanction on the jest.

"Ho! ho!" said the Abbot; "then, to leave jesting, Father Philip, take thou thy riding gear, and go to comfort this Dame Avenel."

"But," said the Sacristan—

"Give me no But; neither But nor If pass between monk and Abbot, Father Philip; the hands of discipline must not be relaxed—heresy gathers force like a snow-ball—the multitude expect confessions and preachings from the Benedictine, as they would from so many beggarly friars—and we may not desert the vineyard, though the toil be grievous unto us."

"And with so little advantage to the holy monastery," said the Sacristan.

"True, Father Philip; but wot you not that what provoketh harm doth good? This Julian de Avenel lives a light and evil life, and should we neglect the widow of his brother, he might foray our lands, and we never able to shew who hurt us—therefore it is our duty to an ancient family, who, in their day, have been benefactors to the Abbey. Away with these instantly, brother; ride night and day, an it be necessary, and let men see how diligent Abbot Beniface and his faithful children are in the execution of their duty—toil not deterring them, for the glea is five miles in length—fear not withholding them, for it is said to be haunted of spectres—nothing moving them from pursuit of their spiritual calling; go the confusion of calumnious heretics, and the comfort and edification of all true and faithful sons of the Catholic Church. I wonder what our brother Eastace will say to this!"

Breathless with his own picture of the dangers and toil which he was to encounter, and the fame which he was to acquire, (both by proxy,) the Abbot moved slowly to finish his luncheon in the refectory, and the Sacristan, with no very good will, accompanied old Martin in his return to Glendearg; the greatest impediment in the journey being the trouble of restraining his pampered mule, that she might tread in something like an equal pace with poor jaded Shagram.

After remaining an hour in private with his penitent, the monk returned moody and full of thought. Dame Elspeth, who had placed for the honoured guest some refreshment in the hall, was struck with the embarrassment which appeared in his countenance. Elspeth watched him with great anxiety. She observed there was that on his brow which rather resembled a person come from hearing the confession of some enormous crime, than the look of a confessor who resigns a reconciled penitent, not to earth, but to heaven. After long hesitating, she could not at length refrain from hazarding a question. She was sure, she said, the lady had made an easy shrift. Five years had they resided together, and she could safely say, no woman lived better.

"Woman," said the Sacristan, sternly, "thou speakest thou knowest not what—What avails clearing the outside of the platter, if the inside be foul with heresy?"

"Our dishes and trenchers are not so clean as they could be wished, holy father," said Elspeth, but half understanding what he said, and beginning with her apron to wipe the dust from the plates, of which she supposed him to complain.

"Forbear, Dame Elspeth," said the monk; "your plates are as clean as wooden trenchers and pewter flagons can well be; the foulness of which I speak is of that pestilential heresy which is daily becoming ingrained in this our Holy Church of Scotland, and as a canker-worm in the rose-garland of the Spouse."

"Holy Mother of Heaven!" said Dame Elspeth, crossing herself, "have I kept house with a heretic?"

"No, Elspeth, no," replied the monk; "it were too strong a speech for me to make of this unhappy lady, but I would I could say she is free from heretical opinions. Alas! they fly about like the pestilence by noon-day, and infect even the first and fairest of the flock! For it is easy to see of this dame, that she hath been high in judgment as in rank."

"And she can write and read, I had almost said, as well as your reverence," said Elspeth.

"Whom dost she write to, and what doth she read?" said the monk, angrily.

"Nay," replied Elspeth, "I cannot say I ever saw her write at all, but her maiden that was — she now serves the family — says she can write — And for reading, she has often read to us good things out of a thick black volume with silver clasps."

"Let me see it," said the monk, hastily, "on your allegiance as a true vassal — on your faith as a Catholic Christian — instantly — instantly let me see it."

The good woman hesitated, alarmed at the tone in which the confessor took up her information; and being moreover of opinion, that what so good a woman as the Lady of Avenel studied so devoutly, could not be of a tendency actually evil. But borne down by the clamour, exclamations, and something like threats used by Father Philip, she at length brought him the fatal volume. It was easy to do this without suspicion on the part of the owner, as she lay on her bed exhausted with the fatigue of a long conference with her confessor, and as the small round, or turret closet, in which was the book and her other trifling property, was accessible by another door. Of all her effects the book was the last she would have thought of securing, for of what use or interest could it be in a family who neither read themselves, nor were in the habit of seeing any who did! so that Dame Elspeth had no difficulty in possessing herself of the volume, although her heart all the while accused her of an ungenerous and an inhospitable part towards her friend and inmate. The double power of a landlord and a feudal superior was before her eyes; and to say truth, the boldness, with which she might otherwise have resisted this double authority, was, I grieve to say it, much qualified by the curiosity she entertained, as a daughter of Eve, to have some explanation respecting the mysterious volume which the lady cherished with so much care, ^{eyes} whose contents she imparted with such caution. For never had Alice of Avenel read them any passage from the book in question until the iron door of the tower was locked, and all possibility of intrusion prevented. Even then she had shewn, by the selection of particular passages, that she was more anxious to impress on their minds the principles which the volume contained, than to introduce them to it as a new rule of faith.

When Elspeth, half curious, half remorseful, had placed the book in the monk's hands, he exclaimed, after turning over the leaves, "Now, by mine order, it is as I suspected! — My mule, my mule! — I will abide no longer here — well hast thou done, dame, in placing in my hands this perilous volume."

"Is it then witchcraft or devil's work?" said Dame Elspeth, in great agitation.

"Nay, God forbid!" said the monk, signing himself with the cross, "it is the Holy Scripture. But it is rendered into the vulgar tongue, and therefore, by the order of the Holy Catholic Church, unfit to be in the hands of any lay person."

"And yet is the Holy Scripture communicated for our common salvation," said Elspeth. "Good father, you must instruct mine ignorance better; but lack of wit cannot be a deadly sin, and truly, to my poor thinking, I should be glad to read the Holy Scripture."

"I darney thou wouldest," said the monk; "and even thou did our mother Eve seek to have knowledge of good and evil, and thus sin came into the world, and Death by sin."

"I am sure, and it is true," said Elspeth. "Oh, if she had dealt by the counsel of Saint Peter and Saint Paul!"

"If she had revered the command of Heaven," said the monk, "which, as it gave her birth, life, and happiness, fixed upon the great such conditions as best corresponded with its holy pleasure. I tell thee, Elspeth, the Word slayeth — that is, the text alone, read with unskilled eye and unhallowed lips, is like those strong medicines which sick men take by the advice of the learned. Such patients recover and thrive; while those dealing in them at their own hand, shall perish by their own deed."

"Nae doubt, nae doubt," said the poor woman, "your reverence knows best."

"Not I," said Father Philip, in a tone as deferential as he thought could possibly become the Sacristan of Saint Mary's, — "Not I, but the Holy Father of Christendom, and our own holy father the Lord Abbot, know best. I, the poor Sacristan of Saint Mary's, can but repeat what I hear from others my superiors. Yet of this, good woman, be assured, — the Word — the mere Word, slayeth. But the church hath her ministers to gloze and to expound the same unto her faithful congregation; and this I say, not so much, my beloved brethren — I mean, my beloved sister," (for the Sacristan, had got unto the end of one of his old sermons,) —

"This I speak not so much of the rectors, curates, and secular clergy, so called because they live after the fashion of the seculi or age, unbound by those ties which sequester us from the world; neither do I speak this of the mendicant friars, whether black or gray, whether crossed or uncrossed; but of the Monks, and especially of the Monks Benedictine, reformed on the rule of Saint Bernard of Clairvaux, thence called Cistercian, of which Monks, Christian brethren — sister, I would say — great is the happiness and glory of the country in possessing the holy ministers of Saint Mary's, whereof I, though an unworthy brother, may say it hath produced more saints, more bishops, more popes — may our patrons make us thankful! — than any holy foundation in Scotland. Wherefore — But I see Martin hath my mule in readiness, and I will but salute you with the kiss of sisterhood, which maketh not ashamed, and so betake me to my toilsome return, for the glen is of bad reputation for the evil spirits which haunt it. Moreover, I may arrive too late at the bridge, whereby I may be obliged to take the river, which I observed to be somewhat waxen."

Accordingly, he took his leave of Dame Elspeth, who was confounded by the rapidity of his utterance, and the doctrine he gave forth, and by no means easy on the subject of the book, which her conscience told her she should not have communicated to any one, without the knowledge of its owner.

Notwithstanding the haste which the monk as well as his mule made to return to better quarters than they had left at the head of Glendurg; notwithstanding the eager desire Father Philip had to be the very first who should acquaint the Abbot that a copy of the book they most dreaded had been found within the habitation, or patrimony of the Abbey; notwithstanding, moreover, certain feelings which induced him to hurry as fast as possible through the gloomy and evil-reputed glen, still the difficulties of the road, and the rider's want of habitude of quick motion, were such, that twilight came upon him ere he had nearly cleared the narrow valley.

It was indeed a gloomy ride. The two sides of the vale were so near, that at every double of the river the shadows from the western sky fell upon, and totally obscured, the eastern bank; the thickets of copsewood seemed to wave with a portentous agitation of boughs and leaves, and the very crags and scours seemed higher and grimmer, than they had appeared to the monk while he was travelling in daylight, and in company. Father Philip was heartily rejoiced, when, emerging from the narrow glen, he gained the open valley of the Tweed, which held on its majestic course from current to pool, and from pool stretched away to other currents, with a dignity peculiar to itself amongst the Scottish rivers; for whatever may have been the drought of the season, the Tweed usually fills up the space between its banks, seldom leaving those extensive sheets of shingle which deform the margins of many of the celebrated Scottish streams.

The monk, insensible to beauties which the age had not regarded as deserving of notice, was nevertheless, like a prudent general, pleased to find himself out of the narrow glen in which the enemy might have stolen upon him unperceived. He drew up his bridle, reduced his mule to her natural and luxurious amble, instead of the agitating and broken trot at which, to his no small inconvenience, she had hitherto proceeded, and, wiping his brow, gazed forth at leisure on the broad moon, which, now mingling with the lights of evening, was rising over field and forest, village and fortalice, and, above all, over the stately Monastery, seen far and dim amid the yellow light.

The worst part of the magnificent view, in the monk's apprehension, was, that the Monastery stood on the opposite side of the river, and that of the many fine bridges which have since been built across that classical stream, not one then existed. There was, however, in recompense, a bridge then standing which has since disappeared, although its ruins may still be traced by the curious.

It was of a very peculiar form. Two strong abutments were built on either side of the river, at a part where the stream was peculiarly contracted. Upon a rock in the centre of the current was built a solid piece of masonry, constructed like the pier of a bridge, and presenting, like a pier, an angle to the current of the stream. The masonry continued solid until the pier rose to a level with the two abutments upon either side, and from thence the building rose in the form of a tower. The lower story of this tower consisted only of an archway or passage through the building, over either entrance to which hung a drawbridge with counterpoises, either of which, when dropped, connected the archway with the opposite abutment, where the farther end of the drawbridge rested. When both bridges were thus lowered, the passage over the river was complete.

The bridge-keeper, who was the dependant of a neighbouring baron, resided with his family in the second and third stories of the tower, which, when both drawbridges were raised, formed an insulated fortress in the midst of the river. He was entitled to a small toll or custom for the passage, concerning the amount of which disputes sometimes arose between him and the passengers. It is needless to say, that the bridge-ward had usually the better in these questions, since he could at pleasure detain the traveller on, the opposite side; or, suffering him to pass half way, might keep him prisoner in his tower till they were agreed on the rate of pontage.¹

But it was most frequently with the Monks of Saint Mary's that the warder had to dispute his perquisites. These holy men insisted for, and at length obtained, a right of gratuitous passage to themselves, greatly to the discontent of the bridge-keeper. But when they demanded the same immunity for the numerous pilgrims who visited the shrine, the bridge-keeper waxed restive, and was supported by his lord in his resistance. The controversy grew animated on both sides; the Abbot menaced excommunication, and the Keeper of the bridge, though unable to retaliate in kind, yet made each individual monk who had to cross and recross the river, endure a sort of purgatory, ere he would accommodate them with a passage. This was a great inconvenience, and would have proved a more serious one, but that the river was fordable for man and horse in ordinary weather.

It was a fine moonlight night, as we have already said, when Father Philip approached this bridge, the singular construction of which gives a curious idea of the insecurity of the times. The river was not in flood, but it was above its ordinary level—a heavy water, as it is called in that country, through which the monk had no particular inclination to ride, if he could manage the matter better.

"Peter, my good friend," cried the Sacristan, raising his voice; "my very excellent friend, Peter, be so kind as to lower the drawbridge. Peter, I say, dost thou not hear!—it is thy gossip, Father Philip, who calls thee."

Peter heard him perfectly well, and saw him into the bargain; but, as he had considered the Sacristan as peculiarly his enemy in his dispute with the convent, he went quietly to bed, after reconnoitring the monk through his loop-hole, observing to his wife, that "riding the water in a moonlight night would do the Sacristan no harm, and would teach him the value of a brig the next time, on which a man might pass high and dry, winter and summer, flood and ebb."

After exhausting his voice in entreaties and threats, which were equally unattended to by Peter of the Brig, as he was called, Father Philip at length moved down the river to take the ordinary ford at the head of the next stream. Cursing the rustic obstinacy of Peter, he began, nevertheless, to persuade himself that the passage of the river by the ford was not only safe, but pleasant. The banks and scattered trees were so beautifully reflected from the bosom of the dark stream, the whole cool and delicious picture formed so pleasing a contrast to his late agitation, to the warmth occasioned by his vain endeavours to move the reluctant porter of the bridge, that the result was rather agreeable than otherwise.

As Father Philip came close to the water's edge, at the spot where he was to enter it, there sat a female under a large broken scathed oak-tree, or rather under the remains of such a tree, weeping.

wrangling her hands, and looking earnestly on the current of the river. The monk was struck with astonishment to see a female there at that time of night. But he was, in all honest service, — and if a step farther, I put it upon his own conscience, — a devoted squire of dames. After observing the maiden for a moment, although she seemed to take no notice of his presence, he was moved by her distress, and willing to offer his assistance. "Damsel," said he, "thou seemest in no ordinary distress; peradventure, like myself, thou hast been refused passage at the bridge by the churlish keeper, and thy crossing may concern thee either for performance of a vow, or some other weighty charge."

The maiden uttered some inarticulate sounds, looked at the river, and then in the face of the Sacristan. A struck Father Philip at that instant; that a Highland Chief of distinction had been for some time expected to pay his vows at the shrine of Saint Mary's; and that possibly this fair maiden might be one of his family, travelling alone for accomplishment of a vow, or left behind by some accident, to whom, therefore, it would be but right and prudent to use every civility in his power, especially as she seemed unacquainted with the Lowland tongue. Such at least was the only motive the Sacristan was ever known to assign for his courtesy; if there was any other, I once more refer it to his own conscience.

To express himself by signs, the common language of all nations, the cautious Sacristan first pointed to the river, then to his mule's crupper, and then made, as gracefully as he could, a sign to induce the fair solitary to mount behind him. She seemed to understand his meaning, for she rose up as if to accept his offer; and while the good monk, who, as we have hinted, was no great cavalier, laboured, with the pressure of the right leg and the use of the left rein, to place his mule with her side to the bank in such a position that the lady might mount with ease, she rose from the ground with rather portentous activity, and at one bound sat behind the monk upon the animal, much the firmer rider of the two. The mule by no means seemed to approve of this double burden; she bounded, bolted, and would soon have thrown Father Philip over her head, had not the maiden with a firm hand detained him in the saddle.

At length the restive brute changed her humour; and, from refusing to budge off the spot, suddenly stretched her nose homeward, and dashed into the ford as fast as she could scamper. A new terror now invaded the monk's mind — the ford seemed unusually deep, the water eddied off in strong ripple from the counter of the mule, and began to rise upon her side. Philip lost his presence of mind, which was at no time his most ready attribute; the mule yielded to the weight of the current; and as the rider was not attentive to keep her head turned up the river, she drifted downward, lost the ford and her footing at once, and began to swim with her head down the stream. And what was sufficiently strange, at the same moment, notwithstanding the extreme peril, the damsel began to sing, thereby increasing, if any thing could increase, the bodily fear of the worthy Sacristan.

I.

Merrily swim we, the moon shines bright,
Both current and ripple are dancing in light.
We have roused the night raven, I heard him creak,
As we plashed along beneath the oak
That flings its broad branches so far and so wide,
Their shadows are dancing in midst of the tide.
"Who wakens my nestlings," the raven he said,
"My brook shall be more in his blood be red,
For a blue swan corpse is a dainty meat,
And I'll have my share with the pike and the eel."

II.

Merrily swim we, the moon shines bright,
There's a golden gleam on the distant height;
There's a silver shower on the siders dank,
And the drooping willows that wave on the bank.
I see the Abbey, both turret and tower,
It is all astir for the vesper hour;
The monks for the chapel are leaving each cell,
But where's Father Philip, should toll the bell?

III.

Merrily swim we, the moon shines bright,
Downward we drift through shadow and light,
Under you rock the eddies sleep,
Calm and silent, dark and deep,
The Kelpy has risen from the fathomless pool,
He has lighted his candle of death and of dool
Look, Father, look, and you'll laugh to see How he gapes and glares with his eyes on three

IV.

Good luck to you! fishing, whom watch ye to-night:
A man of men or a man of might?
Is it layman or priest that must float in your cove,
(Or lover who comes to visit his love?)
Hark! I heard ye the Kelpy reply, "we pass't!" —
"God's blessing on the whorl, he lock'd the bridge fast
All that come to my cove are sunk,
Priest or layman, lover or monk."

How long the damsel might have continued to sing, or where the terrified monk's journey might have ended, is uncertain. As she sung the last stanza, they arrived at, or rather in, a broad tranquil sheet of water, caused by a strong weir or damhead, running across the river, which dashed in a broad cataract over the barrier. The mule, whether from choice, or influenced by the suction of the current, made towards the out intended to supply the convent mills, and entered it half-swimming, half-wading, and pitching the unlucky monk to and fro in the saddle at a fearful rate.

As his person flew hither and thither, his garment became loose, and in an effort to retain it, his hand lighted on the volume of the Lady of Avenel, which was in his bosom. No sooner had he grasped it, than his companion pitched him out of the saddle into the stream, where, still keeping her hand on his collar, she gave him two or three good souses in the watery fluid, so as to ensure that every other part of him had its share of wetting, and then quitted her hold when he was so near the side, that by slight effort (of a great one he was incapable) he might scramble on shore. This accordingly he accomplished, and fanning his eyes to see what had become of his extraordinary companion, she was nowhere to be seen; but still he heard, as if from the surface of the river, and mixing with the noise of the water breaking over the damhead, a fragment of her wild song, which seemed to run thus:—

Landed—landed! the black back hath won,
Else had you seen Burwick with morning sun!
Sain ye, and save ye, and little-mot ye be,
For seldom they land that go swimming with me

The ecstasy of the monk's terror could be endured no longer; his head grew dizzy, and, after staggering a few steps onward and running himself against a wall, he sunk down in a state of insensibility.

CHAPTER VI.

*Now let us sit in converse. That these weeds
Be rooted from the vineyard of the church,
That those foul tares be sever'd from the wheat, a
We are, I trust, agreed.—Yet how to do this,
Nor hurt the wholesome crop and tender vine-plants,
Craves good advisement.*

The Reformation.

THE vesper service in the Monastery Church of Saint Mary's was now over. The Abbot had disrobed himself of his magnificent vestures of ceremony, and resumed his ordinary habit, which was a black gown, worn over a white cassock, with a narrow scapulary; a decent and venerable dress, which was well calculated to set off to advantage the portly mien of Abbot Boniface.

In quiet times no one could have filled the state of a mitred Abbot, for such was his dignity, more respectfully than this worthy prelate. He had, no doubt, many of those habits of self-indulgence which men are apt to acquire who live for themselves alone. He was vain, moreover; and when boldly confronted, had sometimes shewn symptoms of timidity, not very consistent with the high claims which he preferred as an eminent member of the church, or with the punctual deference which he exacted from his religious brethren, and all who were placed under his command. But he was hospitable, charitable, and by no means of himself disposed to proceed with severity against any one. In short, he would in other times have shambled out his term of preferment with as much credit as any other "purple Abbot," who lived easily, but at the same time decorously—slept soundly, and did not disquiet himself with dreams.

But the wide alarm spread through the whole Church of Rome by the progress of the reformed doctrines, sorely disturbed the repose of Abbot Boniface, and opened to him a wide field of duties and cares which he had never so much as dreamed of. There were opinions to be combated and refuted—practices to be inquired into—heretics to be detected and punished—the fallen off to be reclaimed—the wavering to be confirmed—scandal to be removed from the clergy, and the vigour of discipline to be reestablished. Post upon post arrived at the Monastery of St Mary's—horses reeking, and riders exhausted—this from the Privy Council, that from the Primate of Scotland, and this other again from the Queen Mother, exhorting, approving, condemning, requesting advice upon this subject, and requiring information upon that.

These missives Abbot Boniface received with an important air of helplessness, or a helpless air of importance, whichever the reader may please to term it, evincing at once gratified vanity, and profound trouble of mind.

The sharp-witted Primate of Saint Andrews had foreseen the deficiencies of the Abbot of St Mary's, and undervalued to provide for them by getting sighted into his Monastery as Sub-Prior a brother Carmelite, a man of parts and knowledge, devoted to the service of the Catholic church, and very capable not only to advise the Abbot on occasions of difficulty, but to make him sensible of his duty in case he should, from good-nature or timidity, be disposed to shrink from it.

Father Eustace played the same part in the Monastery as the old general who, in foreign armies, is placed at the elbow of the Prince of the Blood, who nominally commands in chief, on condition of attempting nothing without the advice of his dry-nurse; and he shared the fate of all such dry-nurses, being heartily disliked as well as feared by his principal. Still, however, the Primate's intention was fully answered. Father Eustace became the constant theme and often the bugbear of the worthy Abbot, who hardly dared to turn himself in his bed without considering what Father Eustace would think of it. In every case of difficulty, Father Eustace was summoned, and his opinion asked; and no sooner was the embarrassment removed, than the Abbot's next thought was how to get rid of his advisor. In every letter which he wrote to those in power, he recommended Father Eustace to some high church preferment, a bishopric or an abbey; and as they dropped one after another, and were otherwise conferred, he began to think, as he confessed to the Sacristan in the bitterness of his spirit, that the Monastery of St Mary's had got a lifeless lease of their Sub-Prior.

Yet more indignant he would have been, had he suspected that Father Eustace's ambition was fixed upon his own mitre, which, from some attacks of an apoplectic nature, deemed by the Abbot's friends to be more serious than by himself, it was supposed might be shortly vacant. But the confidence which, like other dignitaries, he reposed in his own health, prevented Abbot Boniface from imagining that it held any concatenation with the motions of Father Eustace.

The necessity under which he found himself of consulting with his grand adviser, in cases of real difficulty, rendered the worthy Abbot particularly desirous of doing without him in all ordinary cases of administration, though not without considering what Father Eustace would have said of the matter. He scorned, therefore, to give a hint to the Sub-Prior of the bold stroke by which he had despatched Brother Philip to Glendearg; but when the vespers came without his re-appearance he became a little uneasy, the more as other matters weighed upon his mind. The feud with the warden or keeper of the bridge threatened to be attended with bad consequences, as the man's quarrel was taken up by the martial baron under whom he served; and pressing letters of an unpleasant tendency had just arrived from the Primate. Like a gouty man, who catches hold of his crutch while he curses the infirmity that reduces him to use it, the Abbot, however reluctant, found himself obliged to require Eustace's presence, after the service was over, in his house, or rather palace, which was attached to, and made part of, the Monastery.

Abbot Boniface was seated in his high-backed chair, the grotesque carved back of which terminated in a mitre, before a fire where two or three large logs were reduced to a few red glowing masses of charcoal. At his elbow, on an oaken stand, stood the remains of a roasted capon, on which his reverend had made his evening meal, flanked by a goodly store of bourdeaux of excellent flavour

He was gazing indolently on the fire, partly engaged in meditation on his past and present fortunes, partly occupied by endeavouring to trace towers and steeples in the red embers.

"Yes," thought the Abbot to himself, "in that red perspective I could fancy to myself the peaceful towers of Dunderman, where I passed my life ere I was called to pomp and to trouble. A quiet brotherhood we were, regular in our domestic duties; and when the frailties of humanity prevailed over us, we confessed, and were absolved by each other, and the most formidable part of the penance was the jest of the convent on the culprit. I can almost fancy that I see the cloister garden, and the pear-trees which I grafted with my own hands. And for what have I changed all this, but to be overwhelmed with business which concerns me not, to be called My Lord Abbot, and to be tutored by Father Eustace! I would these towers were the Abbey of Aberbrothwick, and Father Eustace the Abbot,—or I would he were in the fire on any terms, so I were rid of him! The Primate says our Holy Father the Pope hath an adviser—I am sure he could not live a week with such a one as mine. Then, there is no learning what Father Eustace thinks till you confess your own difficulties—No hint will bring forth his opinion—he is like a miser, who will not unbuckle his purse to bestow a farthing, until the wretch who needs it has owned his excess of poverty, and wrung out the boon by importunity. And thus I am dishonoured in the eyes of my religious brethren, who behold me treated like a child which hath no sense of its own—I will bear it no longer!—Brother Bennet,"—(a lay brother answered to his call)—"tell Father Eustace that I need not his presence."

"I came to say to your reverence, that the holy father is entering even now from the cloisters."

"Be it so," said the Abbot, "he is welcome,—remove these things—or rather, place a trencher, the holy father may be a little hungry—yet, no—remove them, for there is no good fellowship in him—Let the stoup of wine remain, however, and place another cup."

The lay brother obeyed these contradictory commands in the way he judged most seemly—he removed the carcasses of the half-sacked capon, and placed two goblets beside the stoup of Bourdeaux. At the same instant entered Father Eustace.

He was a thin, sharp-faced, slight-made little man, whose keen gray eyes seemed almost to look through the person to whom he addressed himself. His body was emaciated not only with the fasts which he observed with rigid punctuality, but also by the active and unwearied exercise of his sharp and piercing intellect;—

A dry soul, which, working out its way,
Fretted the puny body to decay,
And o'er-informed the tenement of clay.

He turned with conventual reverence to the Lord Abbot; and as they stood together, it was scarce possible to see a more complete difference of form and expression. The good-natured easy face and laughings of the Abbot, which even his present anxiety could not greatly ruffle, was a wonderful contrast to the thin pallid cheek and quick penetrating glance of the monk, in which an eager and keen spirit glanced through eyes to which it seemed to give supernatural lustre.

The Abbot opened the conversation by motioning to his monk to take a stool, and inviting to a cup of wine. The courtesy was declined with respect, yet not without a remark, that the vesperservice was past.

"For the stomach's sake, brother," said the Abbot, colouring a little—"you know the text."

"It is a dangerous one," answered the monk, "to handle alone, or at late hours. Out off from hunch society, the juice of the grape becomes a perilous tumpation of solitude, and therefore I ever shun it."

Abbot Beniface had poured himself out a goblet which might hold about half an English pint; but, either struck with the truth of the observation, or ashamed to act in direct opposition to it, he suffered it to remain untasted before him, and immediately changed the subject.

"The Primate hath written to us," said he, "to make strict search within our bounds after the heretical persons denounced in this list, who have withdrawn themselves from the justices which their opinions deserve. It is deemed probable that they will attempt to retire to England by our Borders, and the Primate requireth me to watch with vigilance, and what not."

"Assuredly," said the monk, "the magistrate should not bear the sword in vain—those be they that turn the world upside down—and doubtless your reverend wisdom will with due diligence second the exertions of the Right Reverend Father in God, being in the peremptory defence of the Holy Church."

"Ay, but how is this to be done?" answered the Abbot; "Saint Mary aid us! The Primate writes to me as if I were a temporal baron—a man under command, having soldiers under him! He says, send forth—scour the country—guard the passes—Truly, these men do not travel as those who would give their lives for nothing—the last who went south passed the dry-march at the Riddingburn with an escort of thirty spears, as our reverend brother the Abbot of Kelso did write unto us. How are cowls and scapularies to stop the way?"

"Your bailiff is accounted a good man-at-arms, holy father," said Eustace; "your vassals are obliged to rise for the defence of the Holy Kirk—it is the tenure on which they hold their lands—if they will not come forth for the Church which gives them bread, let their possessions be given to others."

"We shall not be wanting," said the Abbot, collecting himself with importance, "to do whatever may advantage Holy Kirk—thysell shall bear the charge to our Bailiff and our officials—but here again is our controversy with the warden of the bridge and the Baron of Malsiffot—Saint Mary! vovations do so multiply upon the House, and upon the generation, that a man wots not where to turn to! Thou didst say, Father Eustace, thou wouldst look into our evidents touching this free passage for the pilgrims?"

"I have looked into the Charters of the House, holy father," said Eustace, "and therein I find a written and formal grant of all duties and customs payable at the drawbridge of Brigton, not only by ecclesiastics of this Consecration, but by every pilgrim truly designed to accomplish his vows at this House, to the Abbot Ailford, and the Monks of the House of Saint Mary in Kennaquhair, from that time and for ever. The deed is dated on Saint Bridget's Even, in the year of Redemption, 1187, and bears the sign and seal of the granter, Charles of Meigallot, great-great-grandfather of this baron, and purports to be granted for the safety of his own soul, and for the weal of the souls of his father and mother, and of all his predecessors and successors, being Barons of Meigallot."

"But he alleges," said the Abbot, "that the bridge-wards have been in possession of those dues, and have rendered them available for more than fifty years—and the baron threatens violence—meanwhile, the journey of the pilgrims is interrupted, to the prejudice of their own souls and the diminution of the revenues of Saint Mary. The Sacristan advised us to put on a boat; but the warden, whom thou knowest to be a godless man, has sworn the devil tear him, but that if they put on a boat on the lair's stream, he will rive her board from board—and then some say we should compound the claim for a small sum in silver." Here the Abbot paused a moment for a reply, but receiving none, he added, "But what thinkest thou, Father Eustace? why art thou silent?"

"Because I am surprised at the question which the Lord Abbot of Saint Mary's asks at the young age of his brethren."

"Youngest in time of your abode with us, Brother Eustace," said the Abbot, "not youngest in years, or I think in experience—Sub-Prior of this convent."

"I am astonished," continued Eustace, "that the Abbot of this venerable house should ask of any one whether he can alienate the patrimony of our holy and divine patroness, or give up to an unconscientious, and perhaps a heretic baron, the rights conferred on this church by his devout progenitor. Popes and councils alike prohibit it—the honour of the living, and the weal of departed souls, alike forbid it—it may not be. To force, if he dare use it, we must surrender; but never by our consent should we see the goods of the church plundered, with as little scruple as he would drive off a herd of English bees. Rouse yourself, reverend father, and doubt nothing but that the good cause shall prevail. What the spiritual sword, and direct it against the wicked who would usurp our holy rights. What the temporal sword if it be necessary, and stir up the courage and zeal of your loyal vassals."

The Abbot sighed deeply. "All this," he said, "is soon spoken by him who hath to act it not; but—" He was interrupted by the entrance of Boynet rather hastily. "The mule on which the Sacristan had set out in the morning had returned," he said, "to the convent stable all over wet, and with the saddle turned round beneath her belly."

"Sancta Maria!" said the Abbot, "our dear brother hath perished by the way!"

"It may not be," said Eustace hastily—"let the bell be tolled—cause the brethren to get torches—alarm the village—hurry down to the river—I myself will be the foremost."

The real Abbot stood astonished and agape, when at once he beheld his office filled, and saw all which he ought to have ordered, going forward at the instigation of the youngest monk in the convent. The orders of Eustace, which nobody dreamed of disputing, were carried into execution, the necessity was prevented by the sudden apparition of the Sacristan, whose supposed danger excited all the alarm.

CHAPTER VII.

Rise out the written troubles of the brain,
Gleams the fast bosom of the perious stuff
That weighs upon the heart.

Macbeth.

WHAT betwixt cold and fright the afflicted Sacristan stood before his Superior, propped on the friendly arm of the convent miller, drenched with water, and scarce able to utter a syllable.

After various attempts to speak, the first words he uttered were,

"Swim we merrily—the moon shines bright."

"Swim we merrily!" retorted the Abbot indignantly; "a merry night have ye chosen for swimming, and a becoming salutation to your Superior!"

"Our brother is bewildered," said Eustace;—"speak, Father Philip, how is it with you?"

"Good luck to your fishing."

"Good luck to your fishing!" repeated the Abbot, still more surprised and displeased; "by my halldom, he is drunken with wine, and comes to our presence with his jolly catches in his throat! If bread and water can cure this folly—"

"With your pardon, venerable father," said the Sub-Prior, "of water our brother has had enough; and methinks, the confusion of his eye is rather that of terror, than of aught unbecoming his profession. Where did you find him, Hob Miller?"

"An it please your reverence, I did but go to shut the sluice of the mill,—and as I was going to shut the sluice, I heard something groan near to me; but judging it was one of Giles Fletcher's hogs—for so please you, he never shuts his gate—I caught up my lever, and was about—Saint Mary forgive me!—to strike where I heard the sound, when, as the saints would have it, I heard the second groan just like that of a living man. So I called up my knaves, and found the Father Sacristan lying wet and senseless under the wall of our kiln. So soon as we brought him to himself a bit, he prayed to be brought to your reverence, but I doubt me his wits have gone a bell-wavering by the road. It was but now that he spoke in somewhat better form."

"Well!" said Brother Eustace, "thou hast done well, Hob Miller; only begone now, and remember a second time to pause, ere you strike in the dark."

"Please your reverence, it shall be a lesson to me," said the miller, "not to mistake a holy man for a hog again, so long as I live." And, making a bow, with profound humility, the miller withdrew.

"And now that this church is gone, Father Philip," said Eustace, "with thou tell our venerable Superior what ails thee? art thou then a creature, man! if so, we will have thee to the gall."

"Water! water! not wine," murmured the exhausted Sacristan.

"Nay," said the monk, "if that be thy complaint, wine may perhaps cure thee;" and he reached him a cup, which the patient drank off to his great benefit.

"And now," said the Abbot, "let his garments be changed, or rather let him be carried to the infirmary; for it will prejudice our health, should we hear his narrative while he stands there, steaming like arising hoar-frost."

"I will hear his adventure," said Eustace, "and report it to your reverence." And, accordingly, he attended the Sacristan to his cell. In about half an hour he returned to the Abbot.

"How is it with Father Philip?" said the Abbot; "and through what came he into such a state?"

"He comes from Glendearg, reverend sir," said Eustace; "and for the rest, he telleth such a legend, as has not been heard in this Monastery for many a long day." He then gave the Abbot the outlines of the Sacristan's adventures in the homeward journey, and added, that for some time he was inclined to think his brain was infirm, seeing he had sung, laughed, and wept, all in the same breath.

"A wonderful thing it is to us," said the Abbot, "that Satan has been permitted to put forth his hand thus far on one of our sacred brethren!"

"True," said Father Eustace; "but for every text there is a paraphrase; and I have my suspicions, that if the drenching of Father Philip cometh of the Evil one, yet it may not have been altogether without his own personal fault."

"How!" said the Father Abbot; "I will not believe that thou makest doubt that Satan, in former days, hath been permitted to afflict saints and holy men, even as he afflicted the pious Job?"

"God forbid I should make question of it," said the monk, crossing himself; "yet, where there is an exposition of the Sacristan's tale, which is less than miraculous, I hold it safe to consider it at least, if not to abide by it. Now, this Hob' the Miller hath a buxom daughter. Suppose—I say only suppose—that our Sacristan met her at the ford on her return from her uncle's on the other side, for there she hath this evening been—suppose, that, in courtesy, and to save her stripping hose and shoon, the Sacristan brought her across behind him—suppose he carried his familiarities farther than the maiden was willing to admit; and we may easily suppose, farther, that this wetting was the result of it."

"And this legend invented to deceive us!" said the Superior, reddening with wrath; "but what strictly shall it be sifted and inquired into; it is not upon us that Father Philip must hope to pass the result of his own evil practices for doings of Satan. To-morrow cite the wench to appear before us—we will examine, and we will punish."

"Under your reverence's favour," said Eustace, "that were but poor policy. As things now stand with us, the heretics catch hold of each flying report which tends to the scandal of our clergy. We must abate the evil, not only by strengthening discipline, but also by suppressing and stifling the voice of scandal. If my conjectures are true, the miller's daughter will be silent for her own sake; and your reverence's authority may also impose silence on her father, and on the Sacristan. If he is again found to afford room for throwing dishonour on his order, he can be punished with severity, but at the same time with secrecy. For what say the Degretals! Faciunt ostendi dum puniuntur, flagitia autem abscondi debent."

A sentence of Latin, as Eustace had before observed, had often much influence on the Abbot, because he understood it not fluently, and was ashamed to acknowledge his ignorance. On these terms they parted for the night.

The next day, Abbot Boniface strictly interrogated Philip on the real cause of his disaster of the previous night. But the Sacristan stood firm to his story; nor was he found to vary from any point of it, although the answers he returned were in some degree incoherent, owing to his intermingling with them ever and anon snatches of the strange damsel's song, which had made such deep impression on his imagination, that he could not prevent himself from imitating it repeatedly in the course of his examination. The Abbot had compassion with the Sacristan's involuntary frailty, to which something supernatural seemed annexed, and finally became of opinion, that Father Eustace's more natural explanation was rather plausible than just. And indeed, although we have recorded the adventure as we find it written down, we cannot forbear to add that there was a schism on the subject in the convent, and that several of the brethren pretended to have good reason for thinking that the miller's black-eyed daughter was at the bottom of the affair after all. Whichever way it might be interpreted, all agreed that it had too ludicrous a sound to be permitted to get abroad, and therefore the Sacristan was charged, on his vow of obedience, to say no more of his ducking; an injunction which, having once eased his mind by telling his story, it may be well conjectured that he joyfully obeyed.

The attention of Father Eustace was much less forcibly arrested by the marvellous tale of the Sacristan's danger, and his escape, than by the mention of the volume which he had brought with him from the Tower of Glendearg. A copy of the Scriptures, translated into the vulgar tongue, had found its way even into the proper territory of the church, and had been discovered in one of the most hidden and sequestered recesses of the Hallidome of Saint Mary's.

He anxiously requested to see the volume. In this the Sacristan was unable to gratify him, for he had lost it, as far as he recollected, when the supernatural being, as he conceived her to be, took her departure from him. Father Eustace went down to the spot in person, and searched all around it, in hopes of recovering the volume in question; but his labour was in vain. He returned to the Abbot, and reported that it must have fallen into the river or the mill-stream; "for I will hardly believe," he said, "that Father Philip's musical friend would fly off with a copy of the Holy Scriptures."

"Being," said the Abbot, "as it is, an heretical translation, it may be thought that Satan may have power over it."

"Ay!" said Father Eustace, "it is indeed his chiefest magazine of artillery, when he inspirith presumptuous and daring men to set forth their own opinions and expositions of Holy Writ. But though thus abused, the Scriptures are the source of our salvation, and are no more to be reckoned unholy, because of these rash men's proceedings, than a powerful medicine is to be contumacious, or held poisonous, because bold and evil leeches have employed it to the prejudice of their patients. With the permission of your reverence, I would that this matter were looked into more closely. I will myself visit the Tower of Glendearg ere I am many hours older, and we shall see if any specific or white woman of the wild will venture to interrupt my journey or return. Have I your reverend permission and your blessing?" he added, but in a tone that appeared to set no great store by either.

"Thou hast both, my brother," said the Abbot; but no sooner had Eustace left the apartment, than Boniface could not help breaking on the willing ear of the Sacristan his sincere wish, that any spirit, black, white, or gray, would read the adviser such a lesson, as to cure him of his presumption in esteeming himself wiser than the whole community.

"I wish him no worse lesson," said the Sacristan, "than to go swimming fiendishly down the river with a ghost behind, and Kelpies, night-crows, and mud-eels, all waiting to have a snatch at him.

Merrily swim we, the moon shines bright!
Good luck to your fishing, when you watch you to-night!"

"Brother Philip," said the Abbot, "we exhort thee to say thy prayers, compose thyself, and banish that foolish chant from thy mind;—it is but a deception of the devils."

"I will essay, reverend Father," said the Sacristan, "but the tune lings by my memory like a bur in a beggar's rags; it mingles with the psalter—the very bells of the convent seem to repeat the words, and jingle to the tune; and were you to put me to death at this very moment, it is my belief I should die singing it.—Now swim we merrily—it is as it were a spell upon me."

He then again began to warble

"Good luck to your fishing."

And checking himself in the strain with difficulty, he exclaimed, "It is too certain—I am but a lost priest! Swim we merrily—I shall sing it at the very mass—Wo is me! I shall sing all the remainder of my life, and yet never be able to change the tune!"

The honest Abbot replied, "he knew many a good fellow in the same condition;" and concluded the remark with "ho! ho! ho!" for his reverence, as the reader may partly have observed, was one of those dull folks who love a quiet joke.

The Sacristan, well acquainted with his Superior's humour, endeavoured to join in the laugh, but his unfortunate canticle came again across his imagination, and interrupted the hilarity of his customary cup.

"By the road, Brother Philip," said the Abbot, much moved, "you become altogether intolerable! and I am convinced that such a spell could not subsist over a person of religion, and in a religious house, unless he were under mortal sin. Wherefore, say the seven penitentiary psalms—make diligent use of thy scourge and hair-cloth—refrain for three days from all food, save bread and water—I myself will abide thee, and we will see if this singing devil may be driven out of thee; at least I think Father Eustace himself could devise no better means."

The Sacristan sighed deeply, but knew reason strance was vain. He retired therefore to his cell, to try how far psalmody might be able to drive off the sounds of the syren tune which haunted his memory.

Meanwhile, Father Eustace proceeded to the drawbridge, in his way to the lonely valley of Glendearg. In a brief conversation with the churchwarden, he had the address to render him more tractable in the controversy betwixt him and the convent. He reminded him that his father had been a vassal under the community; that his brother was childless; and that their possession would revert to the church on his death, and might be either granted to himself the warder, or to some greater favourite of the Abbot, as matters seemed to stand betwixt them at the time. The Sub-Prior suggested to him also, the necessary connection of interests betwixt the Monastery and the office which this man enjoyed. He listened with temper to his rude and churlish answers; and by keeping his own interest firm pitched in his view, he had the satisfaction to find that Peter gradually softened his tone, and consented to let every pilgrim who travelled upon foot pass free of exaction until Pentecost next; they who travelled on horseback or otherwise, consenting to pay the ordinary custom. Having thus accommodated a matter in which the weal of the convent was so deeply interested, Father Eustace proceeded on his journey.

CHAPTER VIII.

Nay, dally not with time, the wise man's treasure,
Though fools are lavish on't—the fatal Fisher
Hooks souls, while we waste moments.

Old Play.

A November mist overspread the little valley, up which slowly but steadily rode the Monk Eustace. He was not insensible to the feeling of melancholy inspired by the scene and by the season. The stream seemed to murmur with a deep and oppressed note, as if bewailing the departure of autumn. Among the scattered aspens which here and there fringed its banks, the oak-trees only retained that pallid green that precedes their russet hue. The leaves of the willows were most of them stripped from the branches, lay rustling at each breath, and disturbed by every step of the mule; while the foliage of other trees, totally withered, kept still precarious possession of the boughs, waiving the first wind to scatter them.

The monk dropped into the natural train of pensive thought which these autumnal emblems of mortal hopes are peculiarly calculated to inspire. "There," he said, looking at the leaves which lay strewn around, "in the hopes of early youth, first formed that they may soonest wither, and loveliest in spring to become most contemptible in winter; but you, ye lingers, he added, looking to a knot of beeches which still bore their withering leaves, "you are the proud plans of adventurous manhood, formed later, and still clinging to the mind of age, although it acknowledges their vanity! None lasts—none endures, save the foliage of the handy oak, which only begins to show itself when that of the east of the forest has enjoyed half its existence. A pale and decayed hue is all it pos-ness, but still it retains that symptom of vitality to the last.—So be it with Father Eustace! The fairy hopes of my youth I have trodden under foot like those neglected rustlers—to the prouder dreams of my manhood I look back as to lofty chimeras, of which the pith and essence have long since faded; but my religious vows, the faithful profession which I have made in my maturer age, shall retain life while aught of Eustace lives. Dangerous it may be—feeble it must be—yet live it shall, the proud determination to serve the church of which I am a member, and to combat the heresies by which she is assailed.” Thus spoke, at least thus thought, a man zealous according to his imperfect knowledge, confounding the vital interests of Christianity with the extravagant and usurped claims of the Church of Rome, and defending his cause with an ardour worthy of a better.

While moving onward in this contemplative mood, he could not help thinking more than once, that he saw in his path the form of a female dressed in white, who appeared in the attitude of lamentation. But the impression was only momentary, and whenever he looked steadily to the point where he conceived the figure appeared, it always proved that he had mistaken some natural object, a white crag, or the trunk of a decayed birch-tree with its silver bark, for the appearance in question.

Father Eustace had dwelt too long in Rome to partake the superstitious feelings of the more ignorant Scottish clergy; yet he certainly thought it extraordinary, that so strong an impression should have been made on his mind by the legend of the Sacristan. “It is strange,” he said to himself, “that this story, which doubtless was the invention of Brother Philip to cover his own impropriety of conduct, should run so much in my head, and disturb my more serious thoughts—I am wont, I think, to have more command over my senses. I will repeat my prayers, and banish such folly from my recollection.”

The monk accordingly began with devotion to tell his beads, in pursuance of the prescribed rule of his order, and was not again disturbed by any wanderings of the imagination, until he found himself beneath the little fortalice of Glendearg.

Dame Glendinning, who stood at the gate, set up a shout of surprise and joy at seeing the good father. “Martin,” she said, “Jasper, where be a’ the folk!—help the right reverend Sub-Prior to dismount, and take his mule from him.—O father! God has sent you in our need—I was just going to send man and horse to the convent, though I ought to be ashamed to give so much trouble to your reverence.”

“Our trouble matters not, good dame,” said Father Eustace; “in what can I pleasure you? I came hither to visit the Lady of Avenel.”

“Well-a-day!” said Dame Alice, “and it was on her part that I had the boldness to think of summoning you, for the good lady will never be able to wear over the day!—Would it please you to go to her chamber?”

“Hath she not been shriven by Father Philip?” said the monk.

“Shriven she was,” said the Dame of Glendearg, “and by Father Philip, as your reverence truly says—but—I wish it may have been a clean shrift.—Methought Father Philip looked but meekly upon it—and there was a book which he took away with him, that——” She paused as if unwilling to proceed.

“Speak out, Dame Glendinning,” said the Father; “with us it is your duty to have no secrets.”

“Nay, if it please your reverence, it is not that I would keep any thing from your reverence’s knowledge, but I fear I should prejudice the lady in your opinion; for she is an excellent lady—months and years has she dwelt in this tower, and none more exemplary than she; but this matter, doubtless, she will explain it herself to your reverence.”

“I desire first to know it from you, Dame Glendinning,” said the monk; “and I again repeat, it is your duty to tell it to me.”

“This book, if it please your reverence, which Father Philip removed from Glendearg, was this morning returned to us in a strange manner,” said the good widow.

“Returned!” said the monk; “How mean you?”

“I mean,” answered Dame Glendinning, “that it was brought back to the tower of Glendearg, the saints best know how—that same book which Father Philip carried with him but yesterday. Old Martin, that is my tasker and the lady’s servant, was driving out the cows to the pasture—for we have three good milk-cows, reverend father, blessed be Saint Waldeve, and thanks to the holy Monastery——”

The monk groaned with impatience; but he remembered that a woman of the good dame’s condition was like a top, which, if you let it spin on untouched, must at last come to a pause; but, if you interrupt it, by flogging, there is no end to its gyrations. “But to speak no more of the cows, your reverence, though they are likely cattle as ever were tied to a stake, the tasker was driving them out, and the lady, that is my Halbert and my Edward, that your reverence has seen at church on holidays, and especially Halbert,—for you patted him on the head and gave him a brooch of Saint Cuthbert, which he wears in his bonnet,—and little Mary Avenel, that is the lady’s daughter, they ran all after the cattle, and began to play up and down the pasture as young folk will, your reverence. And at length they lost sight of Martin and the cows; and they began to run up a little clough which we call Corri-nan-Blain, where there is a wee bit strip of a burn, and they saw there—Good guide us!—a White Woman sitting on the burn-side wringing her hands—so the bairns were frightened to see a strange woman sitting there, all but Halbert, who will be sixteen come Whitsuntide; and, besides, he never feared any thing—and when they went up to her—behold she was passed away!”

“For shame, good woman!” said Father Eustace; “a woman of your sense to listen to a tale so idle!—the young folk told you a lie, and that was all.”

“Nay, sir, it was more than that,” said the old dame; “for, besides that they never told me a lie in their lives, I must warn you that on the very ground where the White Woman was sitting, they found the Lady of Avenel’s book, and brought it with them to the tower.”

“That is worthy of mark at least,” said the monk. “Know you no other copy of this volume within these bounds?”

“None, your reverence,” returned Elspeth; “why should there!—no one could read it were there twenty."

"Then you are sure it is the very same volume which you gave to Father Philip?" said the monk.

"As sure as that I now speak with your reverence."

"It is most singular!" said the monk; and he walked across the room in a musing posture.

"I have been upon nettles to hear what your reverence would say," continued Dame Glendinning, "respecting this matter—There is nothing I would not do for the Lady of Avenel and her family, and that has been proved, and for her servants to boot, both Martin and Tibb, although Tibb is not so civil sometimes as altogether I have a right to expect; but I cannot think it becoming to have angels, or ghosts, or fairies, or the like, waiting upon a lady when she is in another Conan's house, in respect, it is no ways creditable. Only thing she had to do was always done to her hand, without costing her either pains or pence, as a country body says; and besides the discredit, I cannot but think that there is no safety in having such unchancy creatures about one. But I have tied red thread round the bairns' throats," (so her fondness still called them,) "and given ilk one of them a riding-wand of rowan-tree, forby sewing up a slip of with-elm into their doublets; and I wish to know of your reverence if there be any thing mair that a lone woman can do in the matter of ghosts and fairies!—Be here! that I should have named their unlucky names twice ower!"

"Dame Glendinning," answered the monk, somewhat abruptly, when the good woman had finished her narrative, "I pray you, do you know the miller's daughter?"

"Did I know Kate Happer?" replied the widow; "as well as the beggar knows his dish—a canty quean was Kate, and a special cummer of my ain uye be twenty years syne."

"She cannot be the wench I mean," said Father Eustace; "she after whom I inquire is scarce fifteen, a black-eyed girl—you may have seen her at the kirk."

"Your reverence must be in the right; and she is my cummer's niece, doubtless, that you are pleased to speak of. But I thank God I have always been too duteous in attention to the mass, to know whether young wenches have black eyes or green ones."

The good Father had so much of the world about him, that he was unable to avoid smiling, when the dame boasted her absolute resistance to a temptation, which was not quite so liable to beset her as those of the other sex.

"Perhaps, then," he said, "you know her usual dress, Dame Glendinning?"

"Ay, ay, Father," answered the dame readily enough, "a white kirtle the wench wears, to hide the dust of the mill, no doubt—and a blue hood, that might weel be spared, for gridefulness."

"Then, may it not be she," said the Father, "who has brought back this book, and stepped out of the way when the children came near her?"

The dame paused—was unwilling to combat the solution suggested by the monk—but was at a loss to conceive why the lass of the mill should come so far from home into so wild a corner merely to leave an old book with three children, from whose observation she wished to conceal herself. Above all, she could not understand why, since she had acquaintances in the family, and since the Dame Glendinning had always paid her muture and knaveship duly, the said lass of the mill had not come in to rest herself and eat a morsel, and tell her the current news of the water.

These very objections satisfied the monk that his conjectures were right. "Dame," he said, "you must be cautious in what you say. This is an instance—I would it were the sole one—of the power of the Enemy in these days. The matter must be sifted with a curious and careful hand."

"Indeed," said Elspeth, trying to catch and elude in with the ideas of the Sub-Prior, "I have often thought the miller's folk at the Monastery-mill were far over careless in sifting our melder, and in bolting it too—some folk say they will not stick at whiles to put in a handful of ashes amongst Christian folk's corn-meal."

"That shall be looked after also, dame," said the Sub-Prior, not displeased to see that the good old woman went off on a false scent; "and now, by your leave, I will see this lady—do you go before, and prepare her to see me."

Dame Glendinning left the lower apartment accordingly, which the monk paced in anxious reflection, considering how he might best discharge, with humanity as well as with effect, the important duty imposed on him. He resolved to approach the bedside of the sick person with reprimands, mitigated only by a feeling for her weak condition—he determined, in case of her reply, to which late examples of hardened heretics might encourage her, to be prepared with answers to their customary scruples. High fraught, also, with zeal against her unauthorized intrusion into the priestly function, by study of the Sacred Scriptures, he imagined to himself the answers which one of the modern school of heresy might return to him—the victorious refutation which should lay the disputant prostrate at the Confessor's mercy—and the healing, yet awful exhortation, which, under pain of refusing the last consolations of religion, he designed to make to the penitent, conjuring her, as she loved her own soul's welfare, to disclose to him what she knew of the dark mystery of iniquity, by which heresies were introduced into the most secluded spots of the very patrimony of the church herself—what agents they had who could thus glide, as it were unseen, from place to place, bring back the volume which the church had interdicted to the spots from which it had been removed under her express auspices; and who, by encouraging the daring and profane thirst after knowledge forbidden and useless to the laity, had encouraged the fisher of souls to use with effect his old bait of ambition and vain-glory.

Much of this premeditated disputation escaped the good father, when Elspeth returned, her tears flowing faster than her apron could dry them, and made him a signal to follow her. "How," said the monk, "is she then so near her end!—may, the church must not break or bruise, when comfort is yet possible; and forgetting his polemics, the good Sub-Prior hastened to the little apartment, where, on the wretched bed which she had occupied since her misfortunes had driven her to the Tower of Glendinning, the widow of Walter Avenel had rendered up her spirit to her Creator. "My God!" said the Sub-Prior, "and has my unfortunate dying suffered her to depart without the Church's consolation! "Look to her, dame," he exclaimed with eager impatience; "is there not yet a sparkle of the life left!—may she not be recalled—recalled but for a moment!—Oh! would that she could express, but by the most imperfect word—but by the most feeble motion, her acquiescence in the needful task of penitential prayer!—Does she not breathe!—Art thou sure she doth not?"

"She will never breathe more," said the matron. "Oh! the poor fatherless girl—now motherless also—Oh, the kind companion I have had these many years, whom I shall never see again! But she is in heaven for certain, if ever woman went there; for a woman of better life—"

"Wo to me," said the good monk, "if indeed she went not hence in good assurance—wo to the reckless shepherd, who suffered the wolf to carry a choice one from the flock, while he busied himself with trimming his sling and his staff to give the monster battle! Oh! if in the long Hereafter, aught but weal should that poor spirit share, what has my delay cost!—the value of an immortal soul!"

He then approached the body, full of the deep remorse natural to a good man of his persuasion, who devoutly believed the doctrines of the Catholic Church. "Ay," said he, gazing on the pallid corpse, from which the spirit had parted so placidly as to leave a smile upon the thin blue lips, which had been so long wasted by decay that they had parted with the last breath of animation without the slightest convulsive tremor—"Ay," said Father Eustace, "there lies the faded tree, and, as it fell, so it lies—awful thought for me, should my neglect have left it to descend in an evil direction!" He then again and again conjured Dame Glendinning to tell him what she knew of the demeanour and ordinary walk of the deceased.

All tended to the high honour of the deceased lady; for her companion, who admired her sufficiently while alive, notwithstanding some trifling points of jealousy, now idolized her after her death, and could think of no attribute of praise with which she did not adorn her memory.

Indeed, the Lady of Avenel, however she might privately doubt some of the doctrines announced by the Church of Rome, and although she had probably tacitly appealed from that corrupted system of Christianity to the volume on which Christianity itself is founded, had nevertheless been regular in her attendance on the worship of the church, not, perhaps, extending her scruples so far as to break off communion. Such indeed was the first sentiment of the earlier reformers, who sought to have studied, for a time at least, to avoid a schism, until the violence of the Pope rendered it inevitable.

Father Eustace, on the present occasion, listened with eagerness to every thing which could lead to assure him of the lady's orthodoxy in the main points of belief; for his conscience reproached him sorely, that, instead of protracting conversation with the Dame of Glendearg, he had not instantly hastened where his presence was so necessary. "If," he said, addressing the dead body, "thou art yet free from the utmost penalty due to the followers of false doctrine—if thou dost but suffer for a time, to expiate faults done in the body, but partaking of mortal frailty more than of deadly sin, fear not that thy abode shall be long in the penal regions to which thou mayest be doomed—if vigils—if masses—if penance—if maceration of my body, till it resembles that entranced form, which the soul hath abandoned, may assure thy deliverance." The Holy Church—the godly foundation—our blessed Patroness herself, shall intercede for one whose errors were counterbalanced by so many virtues.—Leave me, dame—here, and by her bedside, will I perform those duties which this piteous case demands!"

Elspeth left the monk, who employed himself in fervent and sincere, though erroneous prayers, for the weal of the departed spirit. For an hour he remained in the apartment of death, and then returned to the hall, where he found the still weeping friend of the deceased.

But it would be injustice to Mrs Elspeth Glendinning's hospitality, if we suppose her to have been weeping during this long interval, or rather if we suppose her so entirely absorbed by the tribute of sorrow which she paid frankly and plentifully to her deceased friend, as to be incapable of attending to the rights of hospitality due to the holy visitor—who was confessor at once, and Sub-Prior—mighty in all religious and secular considerations, so far as the vassals of the Monastery were interested.

Her barley-bread had been toasted—her choicest cask of home-brewed ale had been broached—her best butter had been placed on the hall-table, along with her most savoury ham and her choicest cheese, ere she abandoned herself to the extremity of sorrow; and it was not till she had arranged her little repast neatly on the board, that she sat down in the chimney corner, threw her checked apron over her head, and gave way to the current of tears and sobs. In this there was no grimace or affectation. The good dame held the honours of her house to be as essential a duty, especially when a monk was her visitor, as any other pressing call upon her conscience; nor until these were suitably attended to did she find herself at liberty to indulge her sorrow for her departed friend.

When she was conscious of the Sub-Prior's presence, she rose with the same attention to his reception; but he declined all the offers of hospitality with which she endeavoured to tempt him. Not her butter, as yellow as gold, and the best, she assured him, that was made in the patrimony of Saint Mary—nor the barley scones, which "the departed saint, God save her! used to say were so good"—nor the ale, nor any other eaties which poor Elspeth's stores afforded, could prevail on the Sub-Prior to break his fast.

"This day," he said, "I must not taste food until the sun go down, happy if, in so doing, I can expiate my own negligence—happier still, if my sufferings of this trifling nature, undertaken in pure faith and singleness of heart, may benefit the soul of the deceased. Yet, dame," he added, "I may not so far forget the living in my cares for the dead, as to leave behind me that book, which is to the ignorant what, to our first parents, the tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil unhappily proved—excellent indeed in itself, but fatal because used by those to whom it is prohibited."

"Oh, blithely, reverend father," said the widow of Simon Glendinning, "will I give you the book, if so be I can wile it from the bairns; and indeed, poor things, as the case stands with them even now, you might take the heart out of their bodies, and they never find it out, they are sae begrutten.”¹

“Give them this mural instead, good dame,” said the Father, drawing from his pocket one which was curiously illuminated with paintings, “and I will come myself, or send one at a jitting time, and teach them the meaning of these pictures.”

“The bonny images!” said Dame Glendinning, forgetting for an instant her grief in her admiration, “and weel I wot,” added she, “it is another sort of a book than the poor Lady of Avenel’s; and blessed might we have been this day, if your reverence had found the way up the glen, instead of Father Philip, though the Sacristan is a powerful man too, and speaks as if he would get the house fly abroad, save that the walls are gey thick. Simon’s forebears (may he and they be blessed!) took care of that.”

The monk ordered his mule, and was about to take his leave; and the good dame was still delaying him with questions about the funeral, when a horseman, armed and accoutred, rode into the little court-yard which surrounded the Keep.

CHAPTER IX.

*For since they rode among our doors
With splent or spauld and rusty spurs,
There grows no fruit into our furrows.*
Thus said John Up-on-hand.

Bannatyne MS.

THE Scottish laws, which were as wisely and judiciously made as they were carelessly and ineffectually executed, had in vain endeavoured to restrain the damage done to agriculture, by the chiefs and landed proprietors retaining in their service what were called jack-men, from the jack, or doublet quilted with iron which they wore as defensive armour. These military retainers conducted themselves with great insolence towards the industrious part of the community—lived in a great measure by plunder, and were ready to execute any commands of their master, however unlawful. In adopting this mode of life, they resigned the quiet hopes and regular labours of industry, for an unsettled, precarious, and dangerous trade, which yet had such charms for those once accustomed to it, that they became incapable of following any other. Hence the complaint of John Upland, a fictitious character, representing a countryman, into whose mouth the poets of the day put their general satires upon men and manners:

*They ride about in such a rage,
By forest, firth, and fack,²
With buckler, bow, and brand.
Lo! where they ride out through the rye!
The Devil wot save the company,
Quoth John Up-on-hand.*

Christie of the Clinthill, the horseman who now arrived at the little Tower of Glendearg, was one of the hopeful company of whom the poet complains, as was indicated by his “splent or spauld,” (iron-plates on his shoulder,) his rusted spurs, and his long lance. An iron skull-cap, none of the brightest, bore for distinction a sprig of the holly, which was Avenel’s badge. A long two-edged straight sword, having a handle made of polished oak, hung down by his side. The meagre condition of his horse, and the wild and emaciated look of the rider, shewed their occupation could not be accounted an easy or a thriving one. He saluted Dame Glendinning with little courtesy, and the monk with less; for the growing disrespect to the religious orders had not failed to extend itself among a class of men of such disorderly habits, although it may be supposed they were tolerably indifferent alike to the new or the ancient doctrines.

“So, our lady is dead, Dame Glendinning!” said the jack-man; “my master has sent you even now a fat bullock for her mart—it may serve for her funeral. I have left him in the upper cleugh, as he is somewhat kenspeckle,³ and is marked both with cut and burn—the sooner the skin is off, and he is in saultat, the less like you are to have trouble—you understand me! Let me have a peck of corn for my horse, and beef and beer for myself, for I must go on to the Monastery—though I think this monk here might do mine errand.”

“Thine errand, rude man!” said the Sub-Prior, knitting his brows—

“For God’s sake!” cried poor Dame Glendinning, terrified at the idea of a quarrel between them,—“O Christie!—it is the Sub-Prior—the reverend sir, it is Christie of the Clinthill, the laird’s chief jack-man; ye know that little havings can be expected from the like o’ them.”

“Are you a retainer of the Laird of Avenel?” said the monk, addressing himself to the horseman, “and do you speak thus rudely to a brother of Saint Mary’s, to whom thy master is so much beholden?”

“He means to be yet more beholden to your house, Sir Monk,” answered the fellow; “for hearing his sister-in-law, the widow of Walter of Avenel, was on her death-bed, he sent me to say to the Father Abbot and the brethren, that he will hold the funeral-feast at their convent, and invites himself thereto, with a score of horse and some friends, and to abide there for three days and three nights,—having horse-meat and men’s-meat at the charge of the community; of which his intention he sends due notice, that fitting preparation may be timeously made.”

“Friend,” said the Sub-Prior, “believe not that. I will do to the Father Abbot the indignity of delivering such an errand.—Think’st thou the goods of the church were bestowed upon her by holy princes and pious nobles, now dead and gone, to be consumed in revelry by every profligate layman who numbers in his train more followers than he can support by honest means, or by his own incomes! Tell thy master, from the Sub-Prior of Saint Mary’s, that the Primate hath issued his commands to us that we submit no longer to this compulsory exaction of hospitality on slight or false pretences. Our lands and goods were given to relieve pilgrims and pious persons, not to feast bands of rude soldiers.”

“This to me?” said the angry spearman, “this to me and to my master—Look to yourself then, Sir Priest, and try if Ave and Crede will keep bullocks from wandering, and hay-stacks from burning.”

“Dost thou menace the Holy Church’s patrimony with waste and fire-raising,” said the Sub-Prior,

² Kenspeckle—that which is easily recognised by the eye.

"and that is the face of the sun! I call on all who hear me to bear witness to the words this ruffian has spoken. Remember how the Lord James drowned such as you by scores in the black pool at Jeddart. — To him and to the Primate will I complain." The soldier shifted the position of his lance, and brought it down to a level with the monk's body.

Dame Glendinning began to shriek for assistance. "Tibb Tacket! Martin! where be ye all! — Christie, for the love of God, consider he is a man of Holy Kirk!"

"I care not for his spear," said the Sub-Prior; "if I am slain in defending the rights and privileges of my community, the Primate will know how to take vengeance."

"Let him look to himself," said Christie, but at the same time depositing his lance against the wall of the tower; "if the Fife men spoke true who came hither with the Governor in the last raid, Norman Leslie has him at feud, and is like to set him hard. We know Norman a true bloodhound, who will never quit the slot. But I had no design to offend the holy father," he added, thinking perhaps he had gone a little too far; "I am a rude man, bred to lance and stirrup, and not used to deal with book-learned men and priests; and I am willing to ask his forgiveness and his blessing, if I have said aught amiss."

"For God's sake, your reverence," said the widow of Glendearg apart to the Sub-Prior, "bestow on him your forgiveness — how shall we poor folk sleep in security in the dark nights, if the Convent is at feud with such men as he is!"

"You are right, dame," said the Sub-Prior, "your safety should, and must, be in the first instance consulted. — Soldier, I forgive thee, and may God bless thee and send thee honesty."

Christie of the Clinthill made an unwilling inclination with his head, and muttered apart, "that is as much as to say, God send thee starvation. — But now to my master's demand, Sir Priest! What answer am I to return?"

"That the body of the widow of Walter of Avenel," answered the Father, "shall be interred as becomes her rank, and in the tomb of her valiant husband. For your master's proffered visit of three days, with such a company and retinue, I have no authority to reply to it; you must intimate your Chief's purpose to the Reverend Lord Abbot."

"That will cost me a farther ride," said the man, "but it is all in the day's work. — How now, my lad," said he to Halbert, who was handling the long lance which he had laid aside; "how do you like such a plaything! — will you go with me and be a moss-trooper?"

"The Saints in their mercy forbid!" said the poor mother; and then, afraid of having displeased Christie by the vivacity of her exclamation, she followed it up by explaining, that since Simon's death she could not look on a spear or a bow, or any implement of destruction without trembling.

"Farew!" answered Christie, "thou shouldst take another husband, dame, and drive such follies out of thy thoughts — what sayst thou to such a strapping lad as I! Why, this old tower of thine is feasible enough, and there is no want of clensha, and crags, and heags, and thickets, if one, was set hard; a man might bide here and keep his half-score of lads, and as many goldings, and live on what he could lay his hand on, and be kind to thee, old wench."

"Alas! Master Christie," said the matron, "that you should talk to a lone woman in such a fashion, and death in the house besides!"

"Lone woman! — why, that is the very reason thou shouldst take a mate. Thy old friend is dead, why, good — choose thou another of somewhat tougher frame, and that will not die of the pip like a young chicken. — Better still — Come, dame, let me have something to eat, and we will talk mair of this."

Dame Elspeth, though she well knew the character of the man, whom in fact she both disliked and feared, could not help simpering at the personal address which he thought proper to make to her. She whispered to the Sub-Prior, "ony thing just to keep him quiet," and went into the tower to set before the soldier the food he desired, trusting, betwixt good cheer and the power of her own charms, to keep Christie of the Clinthill so well amused, that the altercation betwixt him and the holy father should not be renewed.

The Sub-Prior was equally unwilling to hazard any unnecessary rupture between the community and such a person as Julian of Avenel. He was sensible that moderation, as well as firmness, was necessary to support the tottering cause of this Church of Rome; and that, contrary to former times, the quarrels betwixt the clergy and laity had, in the present, usually terminated to the advantage of the latter. He resolved, therefore, to avoid farther strife by withdrawing, but failed not, in the first place, to possess himself of the volume which the Sacristan carried off the evening before, and which had been returned to the glen in such a marvellous manner.

Edward, the younger of Dame Elspeth's boys, made great objections to the book's being removed, in which Mary would probably have joined, but that she was now in her little sleeping-chamber with Tibb, who was exerting her simple skill to console the young lady for her mother's death. But the younger Glendinning stood up in defence of her property, and, with a positiveness which had hitherto made no part of his character, declared, that now the kind lady was dead, the book was Mary's, and no one but Mary should have it.

"But if it is not a fit book for Mary to read, my dear boy," said the Father, gently, "you would not wish it to remain with her?"

"The lady read it," answered the young champion of property; "and so it could not be wrong — it shall not be taken away. — I wonder where Halbert is! — listening to the braving tales of gay Christie, I reckon — he is always wishing for fighting, and now he is out of the way."

"Why, Edward, you would not fight with me, who am both a priest and an old man?"

"If you were as good a priest as the Pope," said the boy, "and as old as the hills to boot, you shall not carry away Mary's book without her leave. I will do battle for it."

"But see you, my love," said the monk, amused with the resolute friendship manifested by the boy, "I do not take it; I only borrow it; and I leave in its place my own gay mistal, as a pledge I will bring it again."

Edward opened the mistal with eager curiosity, and glanced at the pictures with which it was illustrated. "Saint George and the dragon—Halbert will like that; and Saint Michael brandishing his sword over the head of the Wicked One—and that will do for Halbert too. And see the Saint John leading his lamb in the wilderness, with his little cross made of reeds, and his scrip and staff—that shall be my favourite; and where shall we find one for poor Mary?—here is a beautiful woman weeping and lamenting herself."

"This is Saint Mary Magdalen repenting of her sins, my dear boy," said the Father.

"That will not suit our Mary; for she commits no faults, and is never angry with us, but when we do something wrong."

"Then," said the Father, "I will shew you a Mary, who will protect her and you, and all good children. See how fairly she is represented, with her gown covered with golden stars."

The boy was lost in wonder at the portrait of the Virgin, which the Sub-Prior turned up to him.

"This," he said, "is really like our sweet Mary; and I think I will let you take away the black book, that has no such goodly shows in it, and leave this for Mary instead. But you must promise to bring back the book, good Father—for now I think upon it, Mary may like that best which was her mother's."

"I will certainly return," said the monk, evading his answer, "and perhaps I may teach you to write and read such beautiful letters as you see there written, and to paint them blue, green, and yellow, and to blazon them with gold."

"Ay, and to make such figures as these blessed Saints, and especially these two Marys!" said the boy.

"With their blessing," said the Sub-Prior, "I can teach you that art too, so far as I am myself capable of shewing, and you of learning it."

"Then," said Edward, "will I paint Mary's picture—and remember you are to bring back the black book; that you must promise me."

The Sub-Prior, anxious to get rid of the boy's pertinacity, and to set forward on his return to the convent, without having any farther interview with Christie the galloper, answered by giving the promise Edward required, mounted his mule, and set forth on his return homeward.

The November day was well spent ere the Sub-Prior resumed his journey; for the difficulty of the road, and the various delays which he had met with at the tower, had detained him longer than he proposed. A chill easterly wind was sighing among the withered leaves, and stripping them from the hold they had yet retained on the parent trees.

"Even so," said the monk, "our prospects in this vale of time grow more disconsolate as the stream of years passes on. Little have I gained by my journey, saving the certainty that heresy is busy among us with more than his usual activity, and that the spirit of insulting religious orders, and plundering the Church's property, so general in the eastern districts of Scotland, has now come nearer home."

The tread of a horse which came up behind him, interrupted his reverie, and he soon saw he was mounted by the same wild rider whom he had left at the tower.

"Good even, my son, and benedictio," said the Sub-Prior as he passed; but the rude soldier scarcely acknowledged the greeting, by bending his head; and dashing the spurs into his horse, went on at a pace which soon left the monk and his mule far behind. And there, thought the Sub-Prior, goes another plague of the times—a fellow whose birth designed him to cultivate the earth, but who is perverted by the unhallowed and unchristian divisions of the country, into a daring and dissolute robber. The barons of Scotland are now turned masterful thieves and ruffians, oppressing the poor by violence, and wasting the Church, by extorting free-quarters from abbays and priories, without either shame or reason. I fear me I shall be too late to counsel the Abbot to make a stand against these daring cornerers—I must make haste." He struck his mule with his riding-wand accordingly; but, instead of mending her pace, the animal suddenly started from the path, and the rider's utmost efforts could not force her forward.

"Art thou, too, infected with the spirit of the times!" said the Sub-Prior; "thou wert wont to be ready and serviceable, and art now as restive as any wild jack-man or stubborn heretic of them all."

While he was contending with the startled animal, a voice, like that of a female, chanted in his ear, or at least very close to it,

"Good evening, Sir Priest, and so late as you ride,
With your mule so fair, and your mantle so wide;
But ride you through valley, or ride you o'er hill,
There is one that has warrant to wait on you still.

Back, back,
The volume black!
I have a warrant to carry it back."

The Sub-Prior looked around, but neither bush nor brake was near which could conceal an am bushed songstress. "May Our Lady have mercy on me!" he said; "I trust my senses have not forsaken me—yet how my thoughts should arrange themselves into rhymes which I despise, and music which I care not for, or why there should be the sound of a female voice in ears, in which its melody has been so long indifferent, baffles my comprehension, and almost realizes the vision of Philip the Sacristan. Come, good mule, betake thee to the path, and let us hence while our judgment serves us."

But the mule stood as if it had been rooted to the spot, backed from the point to which it was pressed by its rider, and by her ears laid close into her neck, and her eyes almost starting from their sockets, testified that she was under great terror.

While the Sub-Prior, by alternate threats and soothing, endeavoured to reclaim the wayward animal to her duty, the wild musical voice was again heard close beside him.

"What, ho! Sub-Prior, and came you but here
To conjure a book from a dead woman's bier?
Sah you, and save you, be wary and wise,
Ride back with the book, or you'll pay for your prize
Back, back,
There's death in the track!

In the name of my master, I bid thee bear back."

"In the name of my Master," said the astonished monk, "that name before which all things created tremble, I conjure thee to say what thou art that hauntest me thus!"

The same voice replied,

"That which is neither ill nor well,
That which belongs not to Heaven nor to hell.

A wreath of the mist, a bubble of the stream,
 'Twas a waking thought and a sleeping dream;
 A form that men spy
 With the half-shut eye.
 In the beams of the setting sun, and I."

"This is more than simple fantasy," said the Sub-Prior, rousing himself; though, notwithstanding the natural hardihood of his temper, the sensible presence of a supernatural being so near him, failed not to make his blood run cold, and his hair bristle. "I charge thee," he said aloud, "be thine errand what it will, to depart and trouble me no more! False spirit, thou canst not appal any save those who do the work negligently."

The voice immediately answered:

"Vainly, Sir Prior, wouldst thou bar me my right!
 Like the star when it shoots, I can dart through the night;
 I can dance on the storm and ride on the air,
 And travel the world with the hoary night-mare."

Again, again,
 At the crook of the glen,
 Where flickers the burnie, I'll meet thee again."

The road was now apparently left open; for the mule collected herself, and changed from her posture of terror to one which promised advance, although a profuse perspiration, and general trembling of the joints, indicated the bodily terror she had undergone.

"I used to doubt the existence of Cabalists and Rosicrucians," thought the Sub-Prior, "but, by my Holy Order, I know no longer what to say!—My pulse beats temperately—my hand is cool—I am fasting from every thing but sip, and possessed of my ordinary faculties—Either some fiend is permitted to bewilder me, or the tales of Cornelius Agrippa, Paracelsus, and others who treat of occult philosophy, are not without foundation.—At the crook of the glen! I could have desired to avoid a second meeting, but I am on the service of the church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against me."

He moved around accordingly, but with precaution, and not without fear; for he neither knew the manner in which, or the place where, his journey might be next interrupted by his invisible attendant. He descended the glen without interruption for about a mile farther, when, just at the spot where the brook approached the steep hill, with a winding so abrupt as to leave scarcely room for a horse to pass, the mule was again visited with the same symptoms of terror which had before interrupted her course. Better acquainted than before with the cause of her restiveness, the Priest employed no effort to make her proceed, but addressed himself to the object, which he doubted not was the same that had formerly interrupted him, in the words of solemn exorcism prescribed by the Church of Rome on such occasions.

In reply to his demand, the voice again sung;—

"Men of good are held as madmen, Men of rods are wild and reckless,
 Lie their still
 In the nook of the hill,
 For those be before thee that gish thee ill."

While the Sub-Prior listened, with his head turned in the direction from which the sounds seemed to come, he felt as if something rushed against him; and ere he could discover the cause, he was pushed from his saddle with gentle but irresistible force. Before he reached the ground his senses were gone, and he lay long in a state of insensibility; for the sunset had not ceased to gild the top of the distant hill when he fell,—and when he again became conscious of existence, the pale moon was gleaming on the landscape. He awakened in a state of terror, from which, for a few minutes, he found it difficult to shake himself free. At length he wate up on the grass, and became sensible, by repeated exertion, that the only personal injury which he had sustained was the numbness arising from extreme cold. The motion of something near him made the blood again run to his heart, and by a sudden effort he started up, and, looking around, saw to his relief that the noise was occasioned by the footsteps of his own mule. The peaceable animal had remained quietly beside her master during his trance, browsing on the grass which grew plentifully in that sequestered nook.

With some exertion he collected himself, remounted the animal, and meditating upon his wild adventure, descended the glen till its junction with the broader valley through which the Tweed winds. The drawbridge was readily dropped at his first summons; and so much had he won upon the heart of the churlish warden, that Peter appeared himself with a lantern to show the Sub-Prior his way over the perilous pass.

"By my sooth, air," he said, holding the light up to Father Eustace's face, "you look sorely travelled and deadly pale—but a little matter serves to weary out you men of the cell. I now who speak to you—I have ridden—before I was perched up here on this pillar betwixt wind and water—it may be thirty Scots miles before I broke my fast, and have had the red of a bramble rose in my cheek all the while—But will you taste some food, or a cup of distilled waters?"

"I may not," said Father Eustace, "being under a vow; but I thank you for your kindness, and pray you to give what I may not accept to the next poor pilgrim who comes hither pale and fainting, for so it shall be the better both with him here, and with you hereafter."

"By my faith, and I will do so," said Peter Bridge-Ward, "even for thy sake—It is strange now, how this Sub-Prior gets round one's heart more than the rest of these cowed gentry, that think of nothing but quaffing and stuffing!—Wife, I say,—wife, we will give a cup of distilled waters and a crust of bread unto the next pilgrim that comes over; and ye may keep for the purpose the grunds of the last greybeard," and the ill-backed hannock which the bairns couldna eat."

While Peter issued these charitable, and, at the same time, prudent injunctions, the Sub-Prior, whose mild interference had awakened the Bridge-Ward to such an act of unwonted generosity, was pacing onward to the Monastery. In the way, he had to commune with and subdue his own rebellious heart, an enemy, he was sensible, more formidable than any which the external powers of Satan could place in his way.

Father Eustace had indeed strong temptation to suppress the extraordinary incident which had befallen him, which he was the more reluctant to confess, because he had passed so severe a judgment upon Father Philip, who, as he was not unwilling to allow, had, on his return from Glendour, encountered obstacles somewhat similar to his own. Of this the Sub-Prior was the more convinced, when, feeling in his bosom for the Book which he had brought off from the Tower of Glendour, he found it was amissing, which he could only account for by supposing it had been stolen from him during his trance.

"If I confess this strange visitation," thought the Sub-Prior, "I become the ridicule of all my brethren — I whom the Primate sent hither to be a watch, as it were, and a check upon their follies. I give the Abbot an advantage over me which I shall never again recover, and Heaven only knows how he may abuse it, in his foolish simplicity, to the dishonour and loss of Holy Kirk. — But then, if I make not true confession of my shame, with what face can I again presume to admonish or restrain others! — Avow, proud heart," continued he, addressing himself, "that the seal of Holy Church interests thee less in this matter than thine own humiliation — Yes, Heaven has punished thee even in that point in which thou didst deem thyself most strong, in thy spiritual pride and thy carnal wisdom. Thou hast laughed at and derided the inexperience of thy brethren — stoop thyself in turn to their derision — tell what they may not believe — affirm that which they will ascribe to idle fear, or perhaps to idle falsehood — sustain the disgrace of a silly visionary, or a wilful deceiver. — Be it so; I will do my duty, and make ample confession to my Superior. If the discharge of this duty destroys my usefulness in this house, God and Our Lady will send me where I can better serve them."

There was no little merit in the resolution thus piously and generously formed by Father Eustace. To men of any rank the esteem of their order is naturally most dear; but in the monastic establishment, cut off, as the brethren are, from other objects of ambition, as well as from all exterior friendship and relationship, the place which they hold in the opinion of each other is all in all.

But the consciousness how much he should rejoice the Abbot and most of the other monks of Saint Mary's, who were impatient of the unauthorised, yet irresistible control, which he was wont to exercise in the affairs of the convent, by a confession which would put him in a ludicrous, or perhaps even in a criminal point of view, could not weigh with Father Eustace in comparison with the task which his belief enjoined.

As, strong in his feelings of duty, he approached the exterior gate of the Monastery, he was surprised to see torches gleaming, and men assembled around it, some on horseback, some on foot, while several of the monks, distinguished through the night by their white scapularies, were making themselves busy among the crowd. The Sub-Prior was received with a unanimous shout of joy, which at once made him sensible that he had himself been the object of their anxiety.

"There he is! there he is! God be thanked — there he is, hale and fear!" exclaimed the vassals; while the monks exclaimed, "Te Deum laudamus — the blood of thy servants is precious in thy sight!"

"What is the matter, children! what is the matter, my brethren?" said Father Eustace, descending at the gate.

"Nay, brother, if thou know'st not, we will not tell thee till thou art in the refectory," answered the monks; "Suffice it that the Lord Abbot had ordered these, our zealous and faithful vassals, instantly to set forth to guard thee from imminent peril — Ye may ungirth your horses, children, and dismiss; and to-morrow, each who was at this rendezvous may send to the convent kitchen for a quarter of a yard of roast beef, and a black-jack full of double ale."

The vassals dispersed with joyful acclamation, and the monks, with equal jubilee, conducted the Sub-Prior into the refectory.

CHAPTER X.

Here we stand —
Woundless and well, may Heaven's high name be bless'd for't!
As erst, ere treason couch'd a lance against us.

DICKENS.

No sooner was the Sub-Prior hurried into the refectory by his rejoicing companions, than the first person on whom he fixed his eye proved to be Christie of the Clithill. He was seated in the chimney-corner, fettered and guarded, his features drawn into that air of sulky and turbid resolution with which those hardened in guilt are accustomed to view the approach of punishment. But as the Sub-Prior drew near to him, his face assumed a more wild and startled expression, while he exclaimed — "The devil! the devil himself, brings the dead back upon the living!"

"Nay," said a monk to him, "may rather that Our Lady foils the attempts of the wicked on her faithful servants — our dear brother lives and moves."

"Lives and moves!" said the ruffian, rising and shuffling towards the Sub-Prior as well as his chains would permit; "nay, then I will never trust ashen shaft and steel point more — It is even so," he added, as he gazed on the Sub-Prior with astonishment; "neither wem nor wound — not as much as a rent in his frock!"

"And whence should my wound have come!" said Father Eustace.

"From the good lance that never failed me before," replied Christie of the Clithill.

"Heaven absolve thee for thy purpose!" said the Sub-Prior; "wouldst thou have slain a servant of the altar?"

"To choose!" answered Christie, "the Fifteen say, an the whole pack of ye were slain, there were more lost at Flodden."

"Villain! art thou heretic as well as murderer!"

"Not I, by Saint Giles," replied the rider; "I listened blithely enough to the Laird of Monance, when he told me ye were all cheats and knaves; but when he would have had me go hear one Wiseheart, a gospeller, as they call him, he might as well have persuaded the wild colt that had flung one rider to kneel down and help another into the saddle."

"There is some goodness about him yet," said the Sacristan to the Abbot, who at that moment entered — "He refused to hear a heretic preacher."

"The better for him in the next world," answered the Abbot. "Prepare for death, my son, — we deliver thee over to the secular arm of our battle, for execution on the Gallow-hill by peep of light."

"Amen!" said the ruffian; "'tis the end I must have come by sooner or later — and what care I whether I feed the crows at Saint Mary's or at Carlisle?"

"Let me implore your reverend patience for an instant," said the Sub-Prior; "until I shall inquire —"

"What!" exclaimed the Abbot, observing him for the first time — "Our dear brother restored to us when his life was unhopèd for! — nay, kneel not to a sinner like me — stand up — thou hast my blessing. When this villain came to the gate, accused by his own evil conscience, and crying out he had murdered thee, I thought that the pillar of our main aisle had fallen — no more shall a life so precious be exposed to such risks as occur in this border country; no longer shall one beloved and rescued of Heaven hold so low a station in the church as that of a poor Sub-Prior — I will write by express to the Primate for thy speedy removal and advancement."

"Nay, but let me understand," said the Sub-Prior; "did this soldier say he had slain me?"

"That he had transfixed you," answered the Abbot, "in full career with his lance — but it seems he had taken an indifferent aim. But no sooner didst thou fall to the ground mortally gored, as he deemed, with his weapon, than our blessed Patroness appeared to him, as he averred —"

"I averred no such thing," said the prisoner; "I said a woman in white interrupted me, as I was about to examine the priest's cassock, for they are usually well lined — she had a bulrush in her hand, with one touch of which she struck me from my horse, as I might strike down a child of four years old with an iron mace — and then, like a singing fiend as she was, she sung to me,

"Thank the holly-bush
That nods on thy brow;
Or with this slender rush
I had strangled thee now."

I gathered myself up with fear and difficulty, threw myself on my horse, and came hither like a fool, to get myself hanged for a rogue."

"Thou seest, honoured brother," said the Abbot to the Sub-Prior, "in what favour thou art with our blessed Patroness, that she herself bestows the guardian of thy path — Not since the days of our blessed founder hath she shown such grace to any one. All unworthy were we to hold spiritual superiority over thee, and we pray thee to prepare for thy speedy removal to Aberbrothwick."

"Alas! my lord and father," said the Sub-Prior, "your words pierce my very soul. Under the seal of confession will I presently tell thee why I conceive myself rather the buffeted sport of a spirit of another sort, than the protected favourite of the heavenly powers. But first let me ask this unhappy man a question or two."

"Do as ye list," replied the Abbot — "but you shall not convince me that it is fitting you remain in this inferior office in the convent of Saint Mary."

"I would ask of this poor man," said Father

Eustace, "for what purpose he nourished the thought of putting to death one who never did him evil?"

"Ay! but thou didst menace me with evil," said the ruffian, "and no one but a fool is menaced twice. Dost thou not remember what you said touching the Primate and Lord James, and the black pool of Jedwood? Didst thou think me fool enough to wait till thou hadst betrayed me to the sack and the fork! There were small wisdom in that, methinks — as little as in confiding hither to tell my own misdeeds — I think the devil was in me when I took this road — I might have remembered the proverb, 'Never Friar forget fend.'"

"And it was solely for that — for that only hasty word of mine, uttered in a moment of impatience, and forgotten ere it was well spoken!" said Father Eustace.

"Ay! for that, and — for the love of thy gold crucifix," said Christie of the Clifftill.

"Glorious Heaven! and could the yellow metal — the glittering earth — so far overcome every sense of what is thereby represented! — Father Abbot, I pray, as a dear boon, you will deliver this guilty person to my mercy."

"Nay, brother," interposed the Sacristan, "to your doom, if you will, not to your mercy — Remember, we are not all equally favoured by our blessed Lady, nor is it likely that every frock in the Convent will serve as a coat of proof when a lance is couched against it."

"For that very reason," said the Sub-Prior, "I would not that for my worthless self the community were to fall at feud with Julian of Avenel, this man's master."

"Our Lady forbid!" said the Sacristan, "he is a second Julian the Apostate."

"With our reverend father the Abbot's permission, then," said Father Eustace, "I desire this man be free from his chains, and suffered to depart uninjured; — and here, friend," he added, giving him the golden crucifix, "is the image for which thou wert willing to stain thy hands with murder. View it well, and may it inspire thee with other and better thoughts than those which referred to it as a piece of bullion. Fast with it, nevertheless, if thy necessities require, and get thee one of such coarse substance that Manneken shall have no share in any of the reflections to which it gives rise. It was the bequest of a dear friend to me; but dearer service can it never do than that of winning a soul to Heaven."

The borderer, now freed from his chains, stood gazing alternately on the Sub-Prior, and on the golden crucifix. "By Saint Giles," said he, "I understand ye not! — An ye give me gold for couching my lance at thee, what would you give me to level it at a heretic?"

"The Church," said the Sub-Prior, "will try the effect of her spiritual censures to bring these stray sheep into the fold, ere she employ the edge of the sword of Saint Peter."

"Ay, but," said the ruffian, "they say the Primate recommends a little strangling and burning in aid both of censure and of sword. But fare ye weel, I owe you a life, and it may be I will not forget my debt."

The brute now came bustling in dressed in his blue coat and bandoliers, and attended by two or three halberdiers. "I have been a thought too late in waiting upon your reverend lordship. I am grown somewhat fatter since the field of Pinkie, and my leathern coat slips not on so soon as it was wont; but the dungeon is ready, and though, as I said, I have been somewhat late——"

Here his intended prisoner walked gravely up to the officer's nose, to his great amazement.

"You have been indeed somewhat late, baillie," said he, "and I am greatly obligated to your buff-coat, and to the time you took to put it on. If the secular arm had arrived some quarter of an hour sooner, I had been out of the reach of spiritual grace; but as it is, I wish you good even, and a safe riddance out of your garment of durance, in which you have much the air of a hog in armour."

Wroth was the baillie with this comparison, and exclaimed in ire—"An it were not, for the presence of the venerable Lord Abbot, thou knave——"

"Nay, an thou wouldst try conclusions," said Christie of the Clinthill, "I will meet thee at day-break by Saint Mary's well."

"Hardened wretch!" said Father Eustace, "art thou but this instant delivered from death, and dost thou so soon mornse thoughts of slaughter?"

"I will meet with thee ere it be long, thou knave," said the baillie, "and teach thee thine Oremus."

"I will meet thy cattle in a moonlight night before that day," said he of the Clinthill.

"I will have thee by the neck one misty morning, thou strong thief," answered the secular officer of the church.

"Thou art thyself as strong a thief as ever rode," retorted Christie; "and if the worms were once feasting on that fat carcass of thine, I might well hope to have thine office, by favour of these reverend men."

"A cast of their office, and a cast of mine," answered the baillie; "a cord and a confessor, that is all thou wilt have from us."

"Sirs," said the Sub-Prior, observing that his brethren began to take more interest than was exactly decorous in this wrangling betwixt justice and iniquity, "I pray you both to depart—Master Baillie, retire with your halberdiers, and trouble not the man whom we have dismissed.—And thou, Christie, or whatever be thy name, take thy departure, and remember thou owest thy life to the Lord Abbot's clemency."

"Nay, as to that," answered Christie, "I judge that I owe it to your own; but impute it to whom ye list, I owe a life among ye, and there is an end." And whistling as he went, he left the apartment, seeming as if he held the life which he had forfeited not worthy farther thanks.

"Obstinate even to brutality!" said Father Eustace; "and yet who knows but some better ore may lie under so rude an exterior?"

"Save a thief from the gallows," said the Sacristan—"you know the rest of the proverb; and admitting, as may Heaven grant, that our lives and limbs are safe from this outrageous knave, who shall insure our meal and our malt, our herds and our flocks?"

"Nay, that will I, my brethren," said an aged monk. "All brethren, you little know what may be made of a repentant robber. In Abbot Ingilram's days, ay, and I remember them as it were yesterday—the freebooters were the best welcome men that came to Saint Mary's. Ay, they paid tithe of every drove that they brought over from the South, and because they were something lightly come by, I have known them make the tithe a seventh—that is, if their confessor knew his business—ay, when we saw from the tower a score of fat bullocks, or a drove of sheep coming down the valley, with two or three stout men-at-arms behind them with their glittering steel caps, and their black-jacks, and their long lances, the good Lord Abbot Ingilram was wont to say—he was a merry man—there come the tithes of the spoilers of the Egyptians! Ay, and I have seen the famous John the Armstrang—a fair man he was and a goodly, the more pity that hemp was ever heckled for him—I have seen him come into the Abbey-Church with nine tassels of gold in his bonnet, and every tassel made of nine English nobles, and he would go from chapel to chapel, and from image to image, and from altar to altar, on his knees—and leave here a tassel, and there a noble, till there was as little gold on his bonnet as on my hood—you will find no such Border thieves now!"

"No truly, Brother Nicolas," answered the Abbot; "they are more apt to take any gold the Church has left, than to bestow or bestow any—and for cattle, beahrew me if I think they care whether beehes have fed on the meadows of Lanercost Abbey or of Saint Mary's!"

"There is no good thing left in them," said Father Nicolas; "they are clean naught—Ah, the thieves that I have seen!—such proper men! and as pitiful as proper, and as pious as pitiful!"

"It skills not talking of it, Brother Nicolas," said the Abbot; "and I will now dismiss you, my brethren, holding your meeting upon this our inquisition concerning the danger of our reverend Sub-Prior, instead of the attendance on the lauds this evening—Yet let the bells be duly rung for the edification of the laymen without, and also that the novices may give due reverence.—And now, bechedicite, brethren! The cellarer will bestow on each a grace-cup and a morsel as ye pass the buttery, for ye have been turmoilled and anxious, and dangerous it is to fall asleep in such cases with empty stomach."

"Gratias agimus quam maximas, Domine reverendissime," replied the brethren, depaoting in their due order.

But the Sub-Prior remained behind, and falling on his knees before the Abbot, as he was about to withdraw, craved him to hear under the seal of confession the adventures of the day. The reverend Lord Abbot yawned, and would have alleged fatigue; but to Father Eustace, of all men, he was ashamed to shew indifference in his religious duties. The confession, therefore, proceeded, in which Father Eustace told all the extraordinary circumstances which had befallen him during the journey. And being questioned by the Abbot, whether he was not conscious of any secret sin, through which he might have been subjected for a time to the delusions of evil spirits, the Sub-Prior admitted with frank avowal that he thought he might have deserved such penance for having judged with unfriendly rigour of the report of Father Philip the Sacristan.

"Heaven," said the penitent, "may have been willing to convince me, not only that he can at pleasure open a communication betwixt us and beings of a different, and, as we word it, supernatural class, but also to punish our pride of superior wisdom, or superior courage, or superior learning."

It is well said that virtue is its own reward; and I question if duty was ever more completely recompensed, than by the audience which the reverend Abbot so unwillingly yielded to the confession of the Sub-Prior. To find the object of his fear shall we say, or of his envy, or of both, accusing himself of the very error with which he had so tacitly charged him, was at once a corroboration of the Abbot's judgment, a soothing of his pride, and an allaying of his fears. The sense of triumph, however, rather increased than diminished his natural good humour; and so far was Abbot Boniface from being disposed to tyrannize over his Sub-Prior, in consequence of this discovery, that in his exhortation he hovered somewhat ludicrously betwixt the natural expression of his own gratified vanity, and his timid reluctance to hurt the feelings of Father Eustace.

"My brother," said he, ex cathedra, "it cannot have escaped your judicious observation, that we have often declined our own judgment in favour of your opinion, even about those matters which most nearly concerned the community. Nevertheless, grieved would we be, could you think that we did this either because we deemed our own opinion less pregnant, or our wit more shallow, than that of our other brethren. For it was done exclusively to give our younger brethren, such as your much esteemed self, my dearest brother, that courage which is necessary to a free deliverance of your opinion,—we oftentimes setting apart our proper judgment, that our inferiors, and especially our dear brother the Sub-Prior, may be comforted and encouraged in proposing valiantly his own thoughts. Which our deference and humility may, in some sort, have produced in your mind, most reverend brother, that self-opinion of parts and knowledge, which hath led unfortunately to your over-estimating your own faculties, and thereby, subjecting yourself, as is but too visible, to the japes and mockeries of evil spirits. For it is assured that Heaven always holdeth us in the least esteem when we deem of ourselves most highly; and also, on the other hand, it may be that we have somewhat departed from what became our high seat in this Abbey, in suffering ourselves to be too much guided, and even as it were controlled, by the voice of our inferior. Wherefore," continued the Lord Abbot, "in both of its such faults shall and must be amended—you hereafter presuming less upon your gifts and carnal wisdom, and I taking heed not so easily to relinquish mine own opinion for that of one lower in place and in office. Nevertheless, we would not that we should thereby lose the high advantage which we have derived, and may yet derive, from your wise counsels, which hath been so often recommended to us by our most reverend Primate. Wherefore, on affairs of high moment, we will call you to our presence in private, and listen to your opinion, which, if it shall agree with our own, we will deliver to the Chapter, as emanating directly from ourselves; thus sparing you, dearest brother, that seeming victory which is so apt to engender spiritual pride, and avoiding ourselves the temptation of falling into that modest facility of opinion, whereby our office is lessened and our person (were that of consequence) rendered less important in the eyes of the community over which we preside."

Notwithstanding the high notions which, as a rigid Catholic, Father Eustace entertained of the sacrament of confession, as his church calls it, there was some danger that a sense of the ridiculous might have stolen on him, when he heard his Superior, with such simple cunning, lay out a little plan for availing himself of the Sub-Prior's wisdom and experience, while he should take the whole credit to himself. Yet his conscience immediately told him that he was right.

"I should have thought more," he reflected, "of the spiritual Superior, and less of the individual." I should have spread my mantle over the frailties of my spiritual father, and done what I might to support his character, and, of course, to extend his utility among the brethren, as well as with others. The Abbot cannot be humbled, but what the community must be humbled in his person. Her boast is, that over all her children, especially over those called to places of distinction, she can diffuse those gifts which are necessary to render them illustrious."

Actuated by these sentiments, Father Eustace frankly assented to the charge which his Superior, even in that moment of authority, had rather insinuated than made, and signified his humble acquiescence in any mode of communicating his counsel which might be most agreeable to the Lord Abbot, and might best remove from himself all temptation to glory in his own wisdom. He then prayed the reverend Father to assign him such penance as might best suit his offence, intimating at the same time, that he had already fasted the whole day.

"And it is that I complain of," answered the Abbot, instead of giving him credit for his abstinence; "it is these very penances, fasts, and vigils, of which we complain; as tending only to generate airs and fumes of vanity, which, ascending from the stomach into the head, do but puff us up with vain-glory and self-opinion. It is meet and becoming that novices should undergo fasts and vigils; for some part of every community must fast, and young stomachs may best endure it. Besides, in them it abates wicked thoughts, and the desire of worldly delights. But, reverend brother, for those to fast who are dead and mortified to the world, as I and thou, is work of supererogation, and is but the matter of spiritual pride. Wherefore, I enjoin thee, most reverend brother, go to the buttery, and drink two cups at least of good wine, eating withal a comfortable morsel, such as may best suit thy taste and stomach. And in respect that thine opinion of thy own wisdom hath at times made thee less conformable to, and companionable with, the weaker and less learned brethren, I enjoin thee, during the said repast, to choose for thy companion our reverend brother Nicolas, and without interruption or impatience, to listen for a stricken hour to his narration, concerning those things which befell in the times of our venerable predecessor, Abbot Ingilram, on whose soul may Heaven have mercy! And for such holy exercises as may further advantage your soul, and expiate the faults whereof you have contritely and humbly avowed yourself guilty, we will ponder upon that matter, and announce our will unto you the next morning."

It was remarkable, that after this memorable evening, the feelings of the worthy Abbot towards his adviser were much more kindly and friendly than when he deemed the Sub-Prior the impeccable and infallible person, in whose garment of virtue and wisdom no flaw was to be discerned. It seemed as if this avowal of his own imperfections had recommended Father Eustace to the friendship of the Superior, although at the same time this increase of benevolence was attended with some circumstances, which, to a man of the Sub-Prior's natural elevation of mind and temper, were more grievous than even undergoing the legends of the dull and verbose Father Nicolas. For instance, the Abbot seldom mentioned him to the other monks, without designing him our beloved Brother Eustace, poor man!—and now and then he used to warn the younger brethren against the snares of vain-glory and spiritual pride, which Satan sets for the more rigidly righteous, with such looks and demonstrations as did all but expressly designate the Sub-Prior as one who had fallen at one time under such delusions. Upon these occasions, it required all the votive obedience of a monk, all the philosophical discipline of the schools, and all the patience of a Christian, to enable Father Eustace to endure the pompous and patronising parade of his honest, but somewhat thick-headed Superior. He began himself to be desirous of leaving the Monastery, or at least he manifestly declined to interfere with its affairs, in that marked and authoritative manner, which he had at first practised.

CHAPTER XI.

You call this education, do you not?
Why 'tis the forced march of a herd of bullocks
Before a shouting driver. The glad van
Move on at ease, and pause a while to match
A passing marvel from the dervy greenward,
While all the blows, the cuts, the indignation,
Fall on the cranks of the ill-fated laggard
That cripples in the rear.

Old Play.

Two or three years glided on, during which the storm of the approaching alteration in church government became each day louder and more ilious. Owing to the circumstances which we have intimated in the end of the last chapter, the Sub-Prior Eustace appeared to have altered considerably his habits of life. He afforded, on all extraordinary occasions, to the Abbot, whether privately, or in the assembled Chapter, the support of his wisdom and experience; but in his ordinary habits he seemed now to live more for himself, and less for the community, than had been his former practice.

He often absented himself for whole days from the convent: and as the adventure of Glendearg dwelt deeply on his memory, he was repeatedly induced to visit that lonely tower, and to take an interest in the orphans who had their shelter under its roof. Besides, he felt a deep anxiety to know whether the volume which he had lost, when so mysteriously preserved from the lance of the murderer, had again found its way back to the Tower of Glendearg. "It was strange," he thought, "that a spirit," for such he could not help judging the being whose voice he had heard, "should, on the one side, seek the advancement of heresy, and, on the other, interpose to save the life of a zealous Catholic priest."

But from no inquiry which he made of the various inhabitants of the Tower of Glendearg could he learn that the copy of the translated Scriptures, for which he made such diligent inquiry, had again been seen by any of them.

In the meanwhile the good father's occasional visits were of no small consequence to Edward Glendinning and to Mary Avenel. The former displayed a power of apprehending and retaining whatever was taught him, which filled Father Eustace with admiration. He was at once acute and industrious, alert and accurate; one of those rare combinations of talent and industry, which are seldom united.

It was the earnest desire of Father Eustace that the excellent qualities thus early displayed by Edward should be dedicated to the service of the church, to which he thought the youth's own consent might be easily obtained, as he was of a calm, contemplative, retired habit, and seemed to consider knowledge as the principal object, and its enlargement as the greatest pleasure, in life. As to the mother, the Sub-Prior had little doubt that, trained as she was to view the monks of Saint Mary's with such profound reverence, she would be but too happy in an opportunity of enrolling one of her sons in its honoured community. But the good Father proved to be mistaken in both these particulars.

When he spoke to Elspeth Glendinning of that which a mother best loves to hear—the proficiency and abilities of her son—she listened with a delighted ear. But when Father Eustace hinted at the duty of dedicating to the service of the church, talents which seemed fitted to defend and adorn it, the dame endeavoured always to shift the subject; and when pressed farther, enlarged on her own incapacity, as a lone woman, to manage the fen; on the advantage which her neighbours of the township were often taking of her unprotected state, and on the wish she had that Edward might fill his father's place, remain in the tower, and close her eyes.

On such occasions the Sub-Prior would answer, that even in a worldly point of view the welfare of the family would be best consulted by one of the sons entering into the community of Saint Mary's, as it was not to be supposed that he would fail to afford his family the important protection which he could then easily extend towards them. What could be a more pleasing prospect than to see him high in honour! or what more sweet than to have the last duties rendered to her by a son, reared for his holiness of life and exemplary manners? Besides, he endeavoured to impress upon the dame that her eldest son, Halbert, whose bold temper and headstrong indulgence of a wandering humour, rendered him incapable of learning, was for that reason, as well as that he was her eldest born, fittest to bustle through the affairs of the world, and manage the little fen.

Elspeth durst not directly dissent from what was proposed, for fear of giving displeasure, and yet she always had something to say against it. Halbert, she said, was not like any of the neighbour boys—he was taller by the head, and stronger by the half, than any boy of his years within the Hallidome. But he was fit for no peaceful work that could be devised. If he liked a book ill, he liked a plough or a cattle worse. He had scoured his father's old broadsword—suspended it by a belt round his waist, and seldom stirred without it. He was a sweet boy and a gentle if spoken fair, but cross him and he was a born devil. "In a word," she said, bursting into tears, "deprive me of Edward, good father, and ye bereave my house of prop and pillar; for my heart tells me that Halbert will take to his father's gates, and die his father's death."

When the conversation came to this crisis, the good-humoured monk was always content to drop the discussion for the time, trusting some opportunity would occur of removing her prejudices, for such he thought them, against Edward's proposed destination.

When, leaving the mother, the Sub-Prior addressed himself to the son, animating his zeal for knowledge, and pointing out how amply it might be gratified should he agree to take holy orders, he found the same repugnance which Dame Elspeth had exhibited. Edward pleaded a want of sufficient vocation to so serious a profession—his reluctance to leave his mother, and other objections, which the Sub-Prior treated as evasive.

"I plainly perceive," he said one day, in answer to them, "that the devil has his factors as well as Heaven, and that they are equally, oh, alas! the former are perhaps more active, in bespeaking for their master the first of the market. I trust, young man, that neither idleness, nor licentious pleasure, nor the love of worldly gain and worldly grandeur, the chief baits with which the great Fisher of souls conceals his hook, are the causes of your declining the career to which I would incite you. But above all I trust—above all I hope—that the vanity of superior knowledge—a sin with which those who have made proficiency in learning are most frequently beset—has not led you into the awful hazard of listening to the dangerous doctrines which are now afloat concerning religion. Better for you that you were as grossly ignorant as the beasts which perish, than that the pride of knowledge should induce you to lend an ear to the voice of the heretics." Edward Glendinning listened to the rebuke with a downcast look, and failed not, when it was concluded, earnestly to vindicate himself from the charge of having pushed his studies into any subjects which the Church inhibited; and so the monk was left to form vain conjectures respecting the cause of his reluctance to embrace the monastic state.

It is an old proverb, used by Chaucer, and quoted by Elizabeth, that "the greatest clerks are not the wisest men;" and it is as true as if the poet had not rhymed, or the queen reasoned on it. If Father Eustace had not had his thoughts turned so much to the progress of hersey, and so little to what was passing in the tower, he might have read, in the speaking eyes of Mary Avenel, now a girl of fourteen or fifteen, reasons which might incline her youthful compassion towards the monastic vows. I have said, that she also was a promising pupil of the good father, upon whom her innocent and infantine beauty had an effect of which he was himself, perhaps, unconscious. Her rank and expectations entitled her to be taught the arts of reading and writing;—and each lesson which the monk assigned her was signed over in company with Edward, and by him explained and re-explained, and again illustrated, until she became perfectly mistress of it.

In the beginning of their studies, Halbert had been their school companion. But the boldness and impatience of his disposition soon quarrelled with an occupation in which, without assiduity and unremitting attention, no progress was to be expected. The Sub-Prior's visits were at irregular intervals, and often weeks would intervene between them, in which case Halbert was sure to forget all that had been proscribed for him to learn, and much which he had partly acquired before. His deficiencies on these occasions gave him pain, but it was not of that sort which produces amendment.

For a time, like all who are fond of idleness, he endeavoured to detach the attention of his brother and Mary Avenel from their task, rather than to learn his own, and such dialogues as the following would ensue.

"Take your bonnet, Edward, and make haste—the Laird of Colnachie is at the head of the glen with his hounds."

"I care not, Halbert," answered the younger brother; "two brace of dogs may kill a deer without my being there to see them, and I must help Mary Avenel with her lesson."

"Ay! you will labour at the monk's lessons till you turn monk yourself," answered Halbert—"Mary, will you go with me, and I will show you the cushat's nest I told you of?"

"I cannot go with you, Halbert," answered Mary, "because I must study this lesson—it will take me long to learn it—I am sorry I am so dull, for if I could get my task as fast as Edward, I should like to go with you."

"Should you indeed?" said Halbert; "then I will wait for you—and, what is more, I will try to get my lesson also."

With a smile and a sigh he took up the primers, and began heavily to con over the task which had been assigned him. As if banished from the society of the two others, he sat sad and solitary in one of the deep window-recesses, and after in vain struggling with the difficulties of his task, and his disinclination to learn it, he found himself involuntarily engaged in watching the movements of the other two students, instead of telling any longer.

The picture which Halbert looked upon was delightful in itself, but somehow or other it afforded very little pleasure to him. The beautiful girl, with looks of simple, yet earnest anxiety, was bent on disentangling those intricacies which obstructed her progress to knowledge, and looking ever and anon to Edward for assistance, while, seated close by her side, and watchful to remove every obstacle from her way, he seemed at once to be proud of the progress which his pupil made, and of the assistance which he was able to render her. There was a bond betwixt them, a steady and interesting tie, the desire of obtaining knowledge, the pride of surmounting difficulties.

Feeling most acutely, yet ignorant of the nature and source of his own emotions, Halbert could no longer endure to look upon this quiet scene, but, starting up, dashed his book from him, and exclaimed aloud, "To the glen I become! all books, and the dreamers that make them!—I would a score of Southrons would come up the glen, and we should learn how little all this muttering and scribbling is worth.”

Mary Avenel and his brother started, and looked at Halbert with surprise, while he went on with great animation, his features swelling, and the tears starting into his eyes as he spoke.—“Yes, Mary—I wish a score of Southrons came up the glen this very day; and you should see one good hand, and one good sword, do more to protect you, than all the books that were ever opened, and all the pens that ever grew on a goose’s wing.”

Mary looked a little surprised and a little frightened at his vehemence, but instantly replied affectionately, “You are vexed, Halbert, because you do not get your lesson so fast as Edward can; and so am I, for I am as stupid as you.—But come, and Edward shall sit betwixt us and teach us.”

“He shall not teach me,” said Halbert, in the same angry mood; “I never can teach him to do any thing that is honourable and manly, and he shall not teach me any of his monkish tricks.—I hate the monks, with their drawling nasal tone like so many frogs, and their long black petticoats like so many women, and their reverences, and their lodgings, and their lazy vassals, that do nothing but peddle in the mire with plough and harrow from Yule to Michaelmas. I will call none lord, but him who wears a sword to make his title good; and I will call none man, but he that can bear himself manlike and masterful.”

“For Heaven’s sake, peace, brother!” said Edward; “if such words were taken up and reported out of the house, they would be our mother’s ruin.”

“Report them yourself then, and they will be your making, and nobody’s marring save mine own. Say that Halbert Glendinning will never be vassal to an old man with a owl and glaven crown, while there are twenty barons who wear casque and plume that lack bold followers. Let them grant you these wretched acres, and much meal may they bear you to make your brooches.” He left the room hastily, but instantly returned, and continued to speak with the same tone of quick and irritated feeling. “And you need not think so much, neither of you, and especially you, Edward, need not think so much of your parchment book there, and your cunning in reading it. By my faith, I will soon learn to read as well as you; and—for I know a better teacher than your grim old monk, and a better book than his printed breviary; and since you like scholarship so well, Mary Avenel, you shall see whether Edward or I have most of it.” He left the apartment, and came not again.

“What can be the matter with him?” said Mary, following Halbert with her eyes from the window, as with hasty and unequal steps he ran up the wild glen.—“Where can your brother be going, Edward?—what book?—what teacher does he talk of?”

“It avails not guessing,” said Edward. “Halbert is angry, he knows not why, and speaks of he knows not what; let us go again to our lessons, and he will come home when he has tired himself with scribbling among the crags as usual.”

But Mary’s anxiety on account of Halbert became more deeply rooted. She declined prosecuting the task in which they had been so pleasingly engaged, under the excuse of a headache; nor could Edward prevail upon her to resume it again that morning.

Meanwhile Halbert, his head unbonnected, his features swelled with jealous anger, and the tear still in his eye, sped up the wild and upper extremity of the little valley of Glendearg with the speed of a roebuck, choosing, as if in desperate defiance of the difficulties of the way, the wildest and most dangerous paths, and voluntarily exposing himself a hundred times to dangers which he might have escaped by turning a little aside from them. It seemed as if he wished his course to be as straight as that of the arrow to its mark.

He arrived at length in a narrow and secluded cluch, or deep ravine, which ran down into the valley, and contributed a scanty rivulet to the supply of the brook with which Glendearg is watered. Up this he sped with the same precipitate haste which had marked his departure from the tower, nor did he pause and look around until he had reached the fountain from which the rivulet had its rise.

Here Halbert stood short, and cast a gloomy, and almost a frightened glance around him. A huge rock rose in front, from a cleft of which grew a wild holly-tree, whose dark green branches rustled over the spring which arose beneath. The banks on either hand rose so high, and approached each other so closely, that it was only when the sun was at its meridian height, and during the summer solstice, that its rays could reach the bottom of the glasm in which he stood. But it was now summer, and the hour was noon, so that the unwonted reflection of the sun was dancing in the pellucid fountain.

“It is the season and the hour,” said Halbert to himself; “and now I—I might soon become wiser than Edward with all his pains! Mary should see whether he alone is fit to be consulted, and to sit by her side, and hang over her as she reads, and point out every word and every letter. And she loves me better than him—I am sure she does—for she comes of noble blood, and scorns sloth and cowardice.—And do I myself not stand here slothful and cowardly as any priest of them all?—Why should I fear to call upon this form—this shape?—Already have I endured the vision, and why not again?—What can it do to me, who am a man of lith and limb, and have by my side my father’s sword? Does my heart beat—do my hairs bristle, at the thought of calling up a painted shadow, and how should I face a band of Southrons in flesh and blood? By the soul of the first Glendinning, I will make proof of the charm!”

He cast the leathern brogue or buskin from his right foot, planted himself in a firm posture, unsheathed his sword, and first looking around to collect his resolution, he bowed three times deliberately towards the holly-tree, and as often to the little fountain repeating at the same time, with a determined voice, the following rhyme:

“Thrice to the holly brake—
Thrice to the well—
I bid thee awake,
White Maid of Avenel!”

Now glance on the Lather—
Now glow on the Fath—
Wake thee, O mine,
White Maid of Avenel!”

Those lines were hardly uttered, when there stood the figure of a female clothed in white, within three steps of Halbert Glendinning.

"I guess 'twas frightful there to see
A lady richly clad as she—Beautiful exceedingly!"

CHAPTER XII.

There's something in that ancient superstition,
Which, erring as it is, our fancy loves.
The spring that, with its thousand crystal bubbles,
Bursts from the bosom of some desert rock
In secret solitude, may well be deem'd
The haunt of something purer, more refined,
And mightier than ourselves.

Old Play.

Young Halbert Glendinning had scarcely pronounced the mystical rhymes, than, as we have mentioned in the conclusion of the last chapter, an appearance, as of a beautiful female, dressed in white, stood within two yards of him. His terror for the moment overcame his natural courage, as well as the strong resolution which he had formed, that the figure which he had now twice seen should not a third time daunt him. But it would seem there is something thrilling and abhorrent to flesh and blood, in the consciousness that we stand in presence of a being in form like to ourselves, but so different in faculties and nature, that we can neither understand its purposes, nor calculate its means of pursuing them.

Halbert stood silent and gasped for breath, his hairs erecting themselves on his head—his mouth open—his eyes fixed, and, as the sole remaining sign of his late determined purpose, his sword pointed towards the apparition. At length, with a voice of ineffable sweetness, the White Lady, for by that name we shall distinguish this being, sung, or rather chanted, the following lines:—

"Youth of the dark eye, wherefore didst thou call me?
Wherefore art thou here, if terrors can appal thee?
He that seeks to deal with us must know our fear nor failing:
To coward and churl our speech is dark, our gifts are unavailing.
The breeze that brought me hither now, must sweep Egypt-dust ground,
The fleecy cloud on which I ride for Araby is bound:
The fleecy cloud is drifting by, the breeze sighs for my stay,
For I must sail a thousand miles before the close of day."

The astonishment of Halbert began once more to give way to his resolution, and he gained voice enough to say, though with a faltering accent, "In the name of God, what art thou?" The answer was in melody of a different tone and measure:—

"What I am I must not shew—
What I am thou couldst not know—
Something betwixt heaven and hell—
Something that neither stood nor fell—
Something that through thy wit or will
May work thee good—may work thee ill.
Neither substance quite, nor shadow,
Haunting lonely mead and fenowd,
Dancing by the haunted spring,
Riding on the whirlwind's wing;
Ape in fantastic fashion
Every change of human passion,
While o'er our frozen minds they pass,
Like shadows from the mirror'd glass.
Wayward, doleful is our mood,
Horrible betwixt bad and good,
Happier than brief-dated men,
Living twenty times his span;

Coleridge's Chthonic.

Far less happy, for we have Died nor hope beyond the grave!
Man awakes to joy or sorrow:
Thus the sleep that knows no morrow.
This is all that I can shew—
This is all that thou mayest know."

The White Lady paused, and appeared to await an answer; but, as Halbert hesitated how to frame his speech, the vision seemed gradually to fade, and become more and more incorporeal. Justly guessing this to be a symptom of her disappearance, Halbert compelled himself to say,—"Lady, when I saw you in the glen, and when you brought back the black book of Mary of Avenel, thou didst say I should one day learn to read it."

The White Lady replied,

"Ay! and I taught thee the word and the spell,
To awaken me here by the Fairies' Well.
But thou hast loved the heron and hawk,
More than to seek my haunted walk;
And thou hast loved the lance and the spear,
More than good text and holy word;
And thou hast loved the deer to track,
More than the lines and the letters black;
And thou art a ranger of moss and of wood,
And scornest the nurture of gentle blood."

"I will do so no longer, fair maiden," said Halbert; "I desire to learn; and thou didst promise me, that when I did so desire, thou wouldst be my helper; I am no longer afraid of thy presence, and I am no longer regardless of instruction." As he uttered these words, the figure of the White Maiden grew gradually as distinct as it had been at first; and what had well-nigh faded into an ill-defined and colourless shadow, again assumed an appearance at least of corporeal consistency, although the hues were less vivid, and the outline of the figure less distinct and defined—so at least it seemed to Halbert—than those of an ordinary inhabitant of the earth. "Wilt thou grant my request," he said, "fair Lady, and give to my keeping the holy book which Mary of Avenel has so often wept for?"

The White Lady replied:

"Thy heaven fear my truth accused,
Thine illhood my trust abused;
He that draws to harbour late,
Must sleep without, or burst the gate.
There is a star for thee which burn'd,
Its influence wanes, its course is turn'd;
Valour and constancy alone
Can bring thee back the chance that's flown."

"If I have been a loiterer, Lady," answered young Glendinning, "thou shalt now find me willing to press forward with double speed. Other thoughts have filled my mind, other thoughts have engaged my heart, within a brief period—and by Heaven, other occupations shall henceforward fill up my time. I have lived in this day the space of years—I came hither a boy—I will return a man—a man, such as may converse not only with his own kind, but with whatever God permits to be visible to him. I will learn the contents of that mysterious volume—I will learn why the Lady of Avenel loved it—why the priests feared, and would have stolen it—why thou didst twice recover it from their hands.—What mystery is wrapt in it!—Speak! I conjure thee!" The lady assumed an air peculiarly sad and solemn, as drooping her head, and folding her arms on her bosom, she replied:

"Within that awful volume lies
The mystery of mystery!
Happiest they of human race,
To whom God has granted grace."

To read, to fear, to hope, to pray,
To lift the latch, and force the way;
And better had they ne'er been born,
Who read to doubt, or read to scorn."

"Give me the volume, Lady," said young Glendinning. "They call me idle—they call me dull—in this pursuit my industry shall not fail, nor, with God's blessing, shall my understanding. Give me the volume." The apparition again replied:

"Many a fathom dark and deep
I have laid the book to sleep;
Ethereal fires around it glowing—
Ethereal music ever flowing—
The sacred pledge of Heav'n's
All things revere,
Each in his sphere,
Have man for whom 'twas giv'n:
Lend thy hand, and thou shalt say Things ne'er seen by mortal eye."

Halbert Glendinning boldly reached his hand to the White Lady.

"Farest thou to go with me?" she said, as his hand trembled at the soft and cold touch of her own—

"Farest thou to go with me?
Still it is free to thee
A peasant to dwell;
Thou mayst drive the dull steer,
And chase the king's deer,
But never more come near
This haunted well."

"If what thou sayest be true," said the undaunted boy, "my destinies are higher than thine own. There shall be neither well nor wood which I dare not visit. No fear of aught, natural or supernatural, shall bar my path through my native valley."

He had scarce uttered the words, when they both descended through the earth with a rapidity which took away Halbert's breath and every other sensation, saving that of being hurried on with the utmost velocity. At length they stopped with a shock so sudden, that the mortal journeyer through this unknown space must have been thrown down with violence, had he not been upheld by his supernatural companion.

It was more than a minute, ere, looking around him, he beheld a grotto, or natural cavern, composed of the most splendid spars and crystals which returned in a thousand prismatic hues the light of a brilliant flame that glowed on an altar of alabaster. This altar, with its fire, formed the central point of the grotto, which was of a round form, and very high in the roof, resembling in some respects the dome of a cathedral. Corresponding to the four points of the compass, there went off four long galleries, or arcades, constructed of the same brilliant materials with the dome itself, and the termination of which was lost in darkness.

No human imagination can conceive, or words suffice to describe, the glorious radiance, which, shot fiercely forth by the flame, was returned from so many hundred thousand points of reflection, afforded by the sparry pillars and their numerous angular crystals. The fire itself did not remain steady and unmoved, but rose and fell, sometimes ascending in a brilliant pyramid of condensed flame half way up the lofty expanse, and again fading into a softer and more rosy hue, and hovering, as it were, on the surfaces of the altar to collect its strength for another powerful exertion. There was no visible fuel by which it was fed, nor did it emit either smoke or vapour of any kind.

What was of all the most remarkable, the black volume so often mentioned lay not only unconsumed, but untouched in the slightest degree, amid this intensity of fire, which, while it seemed to be of force sufficient to melt adamant, had no effect whatever on the sacred book thus subjected to its utmost influence.

The White Lady, having paused long enough to let young Glendinning take a complete survey of what was around him, now said in her usual chant,

"Here lies the volume thou boldly hast sought; Touch it, and take it,—'twill dearly be bought!"

Familiarized in some degree with marvels, and desperately desirous of shewing the courage he had boasted, Halbert plunged his hand, without hesitation, into the flame, trusting to the rapidity of the motion, to snatch out the volume before the fire could greatly affect him. But he was much disappointed. The flame instantly caught upon his sleeve, and though he withdrew his hand immediately, yet his arm was so dreadfully scorched, that he had well-nigh screamed with pain. He suppressed the natural expression of anguish, however, and only intimated the agony which he felt by a contortion and a muttered groan. The White Lady passed her cold hand over his arm, and, ere she had finished the following metrical chant, his pain had entirely gone, and the mark of the scorching was visible:

"Hush thy deed,
Mortal woe
To immortal flames applying;
Rasher trust
Has thing of dust,
On his own weak worth relying:
Strip thee of such fencible vain,
Strip, and prove thy luck again."

Obedient to what he understood to be the meaning of his conductress, Halbert bared his arm to the shoulder, throwing down the remains of his sleeve, which no sooner touched the floor on which he stood than it collected itself together, shrivelled itself up, and was without any visible fire reduced to light tinder, which a sudden breath of wind dispersed into empty space. The White Lady, observing the surprise of the youth, immediately repeated—

"Mortal warp and mortal woof, Cannot brook this charmed roof;
All that mortal art hath wrought,
In our cell returns to naught.
The molten gold returns to clay,
The polish'd diamond melts away;
All is alter'd all is flown,
Naught stands fast but truth alone.
Not for that thy quest give o'er:
Courage! prove thy chance once more."

Imboldened by her words, Halbert Glendinning made a second effort, and, plunging his bare arm into the flame, took out the sacred volume without feeling either heat or inconvenience of any kind. Astonished, and almost terrified at his own success, he beheld the flame collect itself, and shoot up into one long and final stream, which seemed as if it would ascend to the very roof of the cavern, and then, sinking as suddenly, became totally extinguished. The deepest darkness ensued; but Halbert had no time to consider his situation, for the White Lady had already caught his hand, and they ascended to upper air with the same velocity with which they had sunk into the earth.

They stood by the fountain in the Corri-nan-sham when they emerged from the bowels of the earth; but on casting a bewildered glance around him, the youth was surprised to observe, that the shadows had fallen far to the east, and that the day was well-nigh spent. He gazed on his conductress for explanation, but her figure began to fade before his eyes—her cheeks grew paler, her features less distinct, her form became shadowy, and blended itself with the mist which was ascending the hollow ravine. What had lost the symmetry of form, and the delicate, yet clear hues of feminine beauty, now resembled the fitting and pale ghost of some maiden who has died for love, as it is seen indistinctly and by moonlight, by her perjured lover.

"Stay, spirit!" said the youth, imboldened by his success in the subterranean dome, "thy kindness must not leave me, as one encumbered with a weapon he knows not how to wield. Thou must teach me the art to read, and to understand this volume; else what avails it me that I possess it?"

But the figure of the White Lady still waned before his eye, until it became an outline as pale and indistinct as that of the moon, when the winter morning is far advanced, and ere she had ended the following chant, she was entirely invisible—

"Alas! alas!
Not ours the grace
These holy characters to trace:
Idle form of painted air,
Not to us is given to share
The boon bestow'd on Adam's race!
With patience bide,
Heaven will provide
The fitting time, the fitting guide."

The form was already gone, and now the voice itself had melted away in melancholy cadence, softening, as if the Being who spoke had been slowly wafted from the spot where she had commenced her melody.

It was at this moment that Halbert felt the extremity of the terror which he had hitherto so manfully suppressed. The very necessity of exertion had given him spirit to make it, and the presence of the mysterious Being, while it was a subject of fear in itself, had nevertheless given him the sense of protection being near to him. It was when he could reflect with composure on what had passed, that a cold tremor shot across his limbs, his hair bristled, and he was afraid to look around lest he should find at his elbow something more frightful than the first vision. A breeze arising suddenly realized the beautiful and wild idea of the most imaginative of our modern bards—

"It fan'd his cheek, it raised his hair,
Like a meadow gale in spring;
It mingled strangely with his fears,
Yet it felt like a welcoming."

The youth stood silent and astonished for a few moments. It seemed to him that the extraordinary Being he had seen, half his terror, half his protector, was still hovering on the gale which swept past him, and that she might again make herself sensible to his organs of sight. "Speak!" he said, wildly tossing his arms, "speak yet again—be once more present, lovely vision!—thrice have I now seen thee, yet the idea of thy invisible presence around or beside me, makes my heart beat faster than if the earth yawned and gave up a demon."

Coleridge.

But neither sound nor appearance indicated the presence of the White Lady, and nothing preternatural beyond what he had already witnessed, was again audible or visible. Halbert, in the meanwhile, by the very exertion of again inviting the presence of this mysterious Being, had recovered his natural audacity. He looked around once more, and resumed his solitary path down the valley into whose recesses he had penetrated.

Nothing could be more strongly contrasted than the storm of passion with which he had bounded over stock and crag, in order to plunge himself into the Corri-nah-Shian, and the sobered mood in which he now returned homeward, industriously seeking out the most practicable path, not from a wish to avoid danger, but that he might not by personal toil distract his attention, deeply fixed on the extraordinary scene which he had witnessed. In the former case, he had sought by hard and bodily exertion to indulge at once the fiery excitation of passion, and, to banish the cause of the excitement from his recollection; while now he studiously avoided all interruption to his contemplative walk, lest the difficulty of the way should interfere with, or disturb, his own deep reflections. Thus slowly pacing forth his course, with the air of a pilgrim rather than of a deer-hunter, Halbert about the close of the evening regained his paternal tower.

CHAPTER XIII.

The Miller was of manly make,
To meet him was no mow;
There durst na ten come him to take,
Nae noited he their pow.
Christ's Kirk on the Green.

It was after sunset, as we have already stated, when Halbert Glendinning returned to the abode of his father. The hour of dinner was at noon, and that of supper about an hour after sunset at this period of the year. The former had passed without Halbert's appearing; but this was no uncommon circumstance; for the chase, or any other pastime which occurred, made Halbert a frequent neglecter of hours; and his mother, though angry and disappointed when she saw him not at table, was so much accustomed to his occasional absence, and knew so little how to teach him more regularly, that a testy observation was almost all the censure with which such omissions were visited.

On the present occasion, however, the wrath of good Dame Elspeth soared higher than usual. It was not merely on account of the special tap's-head and trotters, the haggis and the side of mutton, with which her table was set forth; but also because of the arrival of no less a person than Bob Miller, as he was universally termed, though the man's name was Happer.

The object of the Miller's visit to the Tower of Glendearg was like the purpose of those embassies which potentates send to each other's courts, partly ostensible, partly politic. In outward show, Bob came to visit his friends of the Halidoms, and share the festivity common among country folk, after the barn-yard has been filled, and to renew old intimacies by new conviviality. But in very truth he also came to have an eye upon the contents of each stack, and to obtain such information respecting the extent of the crop reaped, and gathered in by each tenant, as might prevent the possibility of abstracted multures.

All the world knows that the cultivators of each barony or regality, temporal or spiritual, in Scotland, are obliged to bring their corn to be "grinded at the mill of the territory, for which they pay a heavy charge, called the intown multures. I could speak to the thirlage of insects et illata too, but let that pass. I have said enough to intimate that I talk not without book. Those of the Sucken, or enthrall'd ground, were liable in penances, if, deviating from this thirlage, (or thraldom,) they carried their grain to another mill. Now such another mill, erected on the lands of a lay-baron, lay within a tempting and convenient distance of Glendearg; and the Miller was so obliging, and his charge so moderate, that it required Hob Miller's utmost vigilance to prevent evasions of his right of monopoly.

The most effectual means he could devise was this show of good fellowship and neighbourly friendship, — under colour of which he made his annual cruise through the barony — numbered every corn-stack, and computed its contents by the boll, so that he could give a shrewd hint afterwards whether or not the grist came to the right mill.

Dame Elspeth, like her counpleers, was obliged to take these domiciliary visits in the sense of politeness; but in her case they had not occurred since her husband's death, probably because the Tower of Glendearg was distant, and there was but a trifling quantity of arable or infield land attached to it. This year there had been, upon some speculation of old Martin's, several bolls sown in the out-field, which, the season being fine, had ripened remarkably well. Perhaps this circumstance occasioned the honest Miller's including Glendearg, on this occasion, in his annual round.

Dame Glendinning received with pleasure a visit which she used formerly only to endure with patience; and she had changed her view of the matter chiefly, if not entirely, because Hob had brought with him his daughter Mysie, of whose features she could give so slight an account, but whose dress she had described so accurately to the Sub-Prior.

Hitherto this girl had been an object of very trifling consideration in the eyes of the good widow; but the Sub-Prior's particular and somewhat mysterious inquiries had set her brains to work on the subject of Mysie of the Mill; and she had here asked a broad question, and there she had thrown out an innuendo, and there again she had gradually led on to a conversation on the subject of poor Mysie. And from all inquiries and investigations she had collected, that Mysie was a dark-eyed laughter-loving wench, with cherry-cheeks, and a skin as white as her father's finest boldest flour, out of which was made the Abbot's own wastel-bread. For her temper, she sang and laughed from morning to night; and for her fortune, a material article, besides that which the Miller might have amassed by means of his proverbial golden thumb, Mysie was to inherit a good handsome lump of land, with a prospect of the mill and mill-acres descending to her husband on an easy lease, if a fair word were spoken in season to the Abbot, and to the Prior, and to the Sub-Prior, and to the Sacristan, and so forth.

By turning and again turning these advantages over in her own mind, Elspeth at length came to be of opinion, that the only way to save her son Halbert from a life of "spur, spear, and snaffle," as they called that of the border-riders, from the dint of a cloth-yard shaft, or the loop of an inch-cord, was, that he should marry and settle, and that Mysie Happer should be his destined bride.

As if to her wish, Hob Miller arrived on his strong-built mare, bearing on a pillion behind him the lovely Mysie, with cheeks like a peony-rose, (if Dame Glendinning had ever seen one,) spirits all afloat with rustic coquetry, and a profusion of hair as black as ebony. The beau-ideal which Dame Glendinning had been bodying forth in her imagination, became unexpectedly realized in the buxom form of Mysie Happer, whom, in the course of half an hour, she settled upon as the maiden who was to fix the restless and untutored Halbert. True, Mysie, as the dame soon saw, was like to love dancing round a may-pole as well as managing a domestic establishment, and Halbert, as like to break more heads than he would grin stacks of corn. But then a miller should always be of manly make, and has been described so since the days of Chaucer and James I.¹ Indeed to be able to outdo and bully the whole Sucken, (once more we use this barbarous phrase,) in all athletic exercises, was one way to render easy the collection of multures which men would have disputed with a less formidable champion. Then, as to the deficiencies of the miller's wife, the dame was of opinion that they might be supplied by the rectivity of the miller's mother. "I will keep house for the young folk myself, for the tower is grown very lonely," thought Dame Glendinning, "and to live near the kirk will be mair comfortable in my auld age — and then Edward may agree with his brother about the feu, more especially as he is a favourite with the Sub-Prior, and then he may live in the auld tower like his worthy father before him — and 'wha kens' but Mary Avenel, high-blood as she is, may even draw in her stool to the chimney-nook, and sit down here for good and a'!" — It's true she has no tocher, but the like of her for beauty and sonso no'er crossed my een; and I have kend every vench in the Hallidome of St Mary's — ay, and their mothers that bore them — ay, she is a sweet and a lovely creature as ever tied smood over brown hair — ay, and then, though her uncle keeps her out of her ain for the present time, yet it is to be thought the gray-hair'd shaft will find a hole in his coat of proof, as God help us! it has done in many a better man's — And, moreover, if they should stand on their pedigree and gentle race, Edward might say to them, that is, to her gentle kith and kin, 'whilk o' ye was her best friend when she came down the glen to Glendearg in a misty evening, on a beast mair like a cuddie than aught else?' — And if they tax him with churlish-

¹ The verse we have chosen for a motto, is from a poem imputed to James I. of Scotland. As for the Miller who figures among the Canterbury pilgrims; besides his sword and buckle, he boasted other attributes, all of which, but especially the last, shew that he relied more on the strength of the outside than that of the inside of his skull.

The miller was a stout carf for the nation,
Full big he was of brawn, and o'er of bones;
That proved well, for whensome he was gone;
At wedding he wold bear away the queen;
He was about shoulder'd, broad, a thick pair;
There was no spier that he wold leave a hair,
He drank it as a scunner with his heart, and cheer.

blood, Edward might say, that, forby the old proverbly, how Gentle deed

Makes gentle bield;

yet, moreover, there comes no churi's blood from Glendinning or Brydone; for, says Edward—

The hoarse voice of the Miller at this moment recalled the game from her reverie, and compelled her to remember that if she meant to realize her airy castle, she must begin by laying this foundation in civility to her guest and his daughter, whom she was at that moment most strangely neglecting, though her whole plan turned on conciliating their favour and good opinion, and that, in fact, while arranging matters for so intimate a union with her company, she was suffering them to sit unnoticed, and in their riding gear, as if about to resume their journey. "And so I say, dame," concluded the Miller, (for she had not marked the beginning of his speech,) "an ye be so busied with your house-keep, or aught else, why, Mysie and I will trot our way down the glen again to Johnnie Broxmouth's, who pressed us right kindly to bide with him."

Starting at once from her dream of marriages and intermarriages, mills, mill-lands, and baronies, Dame Elspeth felt for a moment like the milkmaid in the fable, when she overset the pitcher, on the contents of which so many golden dreams were founded. But the foundation of Dame Glendinning's hopes was only tottering, not overthrown, and she hastened to restore its equilibrium. Instead of attempting to account for her absence of mind and want of attention to her guests, which she might have found something difficult, she assumed the offensive, like an able general when he finds it necessary, by a bold attack, to disguise his weakness.

A loud exclamation she made, and a passionate complaint she set up against the unkindness of her old friend, who could for an instant doubt the heartiness of her welcome to him and to his hopeful daughter; and then to think of his going back to John Broxmouth's, when the auld tower stood where it did, and had room in it for a friend or two in the worst of times—and he too a neighbour that his umquille gossip Simon, blessed be his cast, used to think the best friend he had in the Halidome! And on she went, urging her complaint with so much seriousness, that she had well-nigh imposed on herself as well as upon Hob Miller, who had no mind to take any thing in duddoon; and as it suited his plans to pass the night at Glendearg, would have been equally contented to do so even had his reception been less vehemently hospitable.

To all Elspeth's expostulations on the unkindness of his proposal to leave her dwelling, he answered composedly, "Nay, dame, what could I tell? ye might have had other grist to grind, for ye looked as if ye scarce saw us—or what know I? ye might bear in mind the words Martin told I had about the last barley ye sowed—for I ken dry miltures¹ will sometimes stick in the throat. A man seeks but his awn, and yet folk abill hold him for both miller and miller's man, that is miller and knave,² all the country over."

¹ Dry miltures were a fine, or compensation in money, for not grinding at the mill of the thirl. It was, and is, accounted a venial offence.

² The waul miller, is in the language of this age, called the knave, which, indeed, signifies originally his knave, (a knave—

"Alas, that you will say so, neighbour Hob," said Dame Elspeth, "for that Martin should have had any words with you about the mill-dues! I will chide him roundly for it, I promise you, on the faith of a true widow. You know full well that a lone woman is sore put upon by her servants."

"Nay, dame," said the Miller, unbuckling the broad belt which made fast his cloak, and served, at the same time, to suspend by his side a swinging Andrea Ferrara, "bear no grudge at Martin, for I bear none—I take it on me as a thing of mine office, to maintain my right of milture, lock, and goupin." And reason good, for as the old song says,

I live by my mill, God bless her,
She's parent, child, and wife.

The poor old slut, I am beholden to her for my living, and bound to stand by her, as I say to my mill-knave, in right and in wrong. And so should every honest fellow stand by his bread-winner.—And so, Mysie, ye may doff your cloak since our neighbour is so kindly glad to see us—why, I think, we are as blithe to see her—not one in the Halidome pays their miltures more duly, sequel, arriage, and carriage, and mill-services, used and wont."

With that the Miller hung his ample cloak without further ceremony upon a huge pair of stag's antlers, which adorned at once the naked walls of the tower, and served for what we vulgarly call cloak-pins.

In the meantime Dame Elspeth assisted to disembarass the dame whom she destined for her future daughter-in-law, of her hood, mantle, and the rest of her riding gear, giving her to appear as becommed the buxom daughter of the wealthy Miller, gay and goodly, in a white kirtle, the bussum of which were embroidered with green silk on lace or fringe, enfyned with some silver thread. An anxious glance did Elspeth cast upon the good-humoured face, which was now more fully shewn to her, and was only obscured by a quantity of raven black hair, which the maid of the mill had restrained by a swood of green silk, embroidered with silver, corresponding to the trimmings of her kirtle. The countenance itself was exceedingly comely—the eyes black, large, and roguishly good-humoured—the mouth was small—the lips well formed, though somewhat full—the teeth were pearly white—and the chin had a very seducing dimple in it. The form belonging to this joyous face was full and round, and firm and fair. It might become coarse and masculine some years hence, which is the common fault of Scottish beauty; but in Mysie's sixteenth year she had the shape of a Hebe. The anxious Elspeth, with all her maternal partiality, could not help admitting within herself, that a better man than Halbert might go further and fare worse. She looked a little giddy, and Halbert was not nineteen; still it was time ne

German, but by degrees came to be taken in a worse sense. In the old translations of the Bible, Paul is made to strike himself the knave of our Saviour. The allowance of meat taken by the miller's servant was called knave-ship.

³ The milture was the regular taxation for grinding the meal. The lock, signifying a small quantity, and the person, a hand-mill, were additional privileges demanded by the miller, and submitted to or refused by the farmer as circumstances permitted. These and other petty dues were called in general the Scyrie.

should be settled, for to that point the dame always returned; and here was an excellent opportunity.

The simple cunning of Dame Elspeth now exhausted itself in commendations of her fair guest, from the smood, as they say, to the single-soled shoe. Mysie listened and blushed with pleasure for the first five minutes; but ere ten had elapsed, she began to view the old lady's compliments rather as subjects of mirth than of vanity, and was much more disposed to laugh at than to be flattered with them, for Nature had mingled the good-humour with which she had endowed the dame with no small portion of shrewdness. Even Hob himself began to tire of hearing his daughter's praises, and broke in with, "Ay, ay, she is a clever qucan enough; and, were she five years older, she shall lay a loaded sack on an *aeer*¹ with e'er a lass in the Halidome. But I have been looking for your two sons, dame. Men say downby that Halbert's turned a wild springald, and that we may have word of him from Westmofeland one moonlight night or another."

"God forbid, my good neighbour; God, in his mercy, forbid!" said Dame Glendinning earnestly; for it was touching the very key-note of her apprehensions, to hint any probability that Halbert might become one of the marauders so common in the age and country. But, fearful of having betrayed too much alarm on this subject, she immediately added, "That though; since the last rout at Pinkiecleuch, she had been all of a tremble when a gun or a spear was named, or when men spoke of fighting; yet, thanks to God, and our Lady, her sons were like to live and die honest and peaceful tenants to the Abbey, as their father might have done, but for that awful hosting which he went forth to, with many a brave man that never returned."

"Ye need not tell me of it, dame," said the Miller, "since I was there myself, and made two pair of legs (and these were not mine, but my mare's,) worth one pair of hands. I judged how it would be, when I saw our host break ranks, with rushing on through that broken ploughed field, and so as they had made a pricker of me, I e'en pricked off with myself while the play was good."

"Ay, ay, neighbour," said the dame, "ye were aye a wise and a wary man; if my Simon had had your wit, he might have been here to speak about it this day; but he was aye cracking of his good blood and his high kindred, and lest would not serve him than to bide the bang to the last, with the earls, and knights, and squires, that had no wives to greet for them, or else had wives that cared not how soon they were widows; but that is not for the like of us. But touching my son Halbert, there is no fear of him; for if it should be his misfortune to be in the like case, he has the best pair of heels in the Halidome, and could run almost as fast as your mare herself."

"Is this he, neighbour?" quoth the Miller.

"No," replied the mother; "that is my youngest son, Edward, who can read and write like the Lord Abbot himself, if it were not a sin to say so."

"Ay," said the Miller; "and is that the young clerk the Sub-Prior thinks so much of? I they say he will come far ben that lad; wha kens but he may come to the Sub-Prior himself!—as broken a ship has been his land."

"To be a Prior, neighbour Miller," said Edward, "a man must first be a priest, and for that I judge I have little vocation."

"He will take to the plough-pettle, neighbour," said the good dame; "and so will Halbert too, I trust. I wish you saw Halbert.—Edward, where is your brother?"

"Hunting, I think," replied Edward; "at least he left us this morning to join the Laird of Colmalie and his hounds. I have heard them baying in the glen all day."

"And if I had heard that music," said the Miller, "it would have done my heart good, ay, and may be taken me two or three miles out of my road. When I was the Miller of Morebattle's knave, I have followed the hounds from Eckford to the foot of Hounam-law—followed them on foot, Dame Glendinning, ay, and led the chase when the Laird of Cessford and his gay riders were all thrown out by the mosses and gills. I brought the stag on my back to Hounam Cross, when the dogs had pulled him down. I think I see the old gray knight, as he sat so upright on his strong war-horse, all white with foam; and 'Miller,' said he to me, 'an thou wilt turn thy back on the mill, and wind with me, I will make a man of thee.' But I chose rather to abide by clap and happer, and the better luck was mine; for the proud Percy caused hang five of the Laird's hofschmen at Alrick for burning a rickle of houses some gate beyond Fowberry, and it might have been my luck as well as another man's."

"Ah, neighbour, neighbour," said Dame Glendinning, "you were aye wise and wary; but if you like hunting, I must say Halbert's the lad to please you. He hath all those fair holiday terms of hawk and hound as ready in his mouth as Tom with the tod's tail, that is the Lord Abbot's ranger."

"Ranges he not homeward at dinner-time, dame," demanded the Miller; "for we call noon the dinner-hour at Kennahuhair?"

The widow was forced to admit, that, even at this important period of the day, Halbert was frequently absent; at which the Miller shook his head, intimating, at the same time, some allusion to the proverb of MacFarlane's geese, which "liked their play better than their meat."

That the delay of dinner might not increase the Miller's disposition to prejudice Halbert, Dame Glendinning called hastily on Mary Avenel to take her task of entertaining Mysie Happer, while she herself rushed to the kitchen, and, entering at once into the province of Tibb Tacket, rummaged among trenehers and diabes, scratched pots from the fire, and placed pans and gridirons on it, accompanying her own feats of personal activity with such a continued list of injunctions to Tibb, that Tibb at length lost patience, and said, "Here was an unkele wark about meeting an auld miller, as if they had been to banquet the Hood of Bruce." But this, as it was supposed to be spoken aside, Dame Glendinning did not think it convenient to hear.

New Play

"AND what brave lass is this?" said Hob Miller, as Mary Avenel entered the apartment to supply the absence of Dame Elapheth Glendinning.

"The young Lady of Avenel, father," said the Maid of the Mill, dropping as low a curtsy as her rustic manners enabled her to make. The Miller, her father, doffed his bonnet, and made his reverence, not altogether so low perhaps as if the young lady had appeared in the pride of rank and riches, yet so as to give high birth the due homage which the Scotch for a length of time scrupulously rendered to it.

Indeed, from having had her mother's example before her for so many years, and from a native sense of propriety and even of dignity, Mary Avenel had acquired a demeanour, which marked her title to consideration, and effectually checked any attempt at familiarity on the part of those who might be her associates, in her present situation, but could not be well termed her equals. She was by nature mild, pensive, and contemplative, gentle in disposition, and most placable when accidentally offended; but still she was of a retired and reserved habit, and shunned to mix in ordinary sports, even when the rare occurrence of a fair or wake gave her an opportunity of mingling with companions of her own age. If at such seasons she was seen for an instant, she appeared to behold them with the composed indifference of one to whom their gaiety was a matter of no interest, and who seemed only desirous to glide away from the scene as soon as she possibly could.

Something also had transpired concerning her being born on All-hallow Eve, and the powers with which that circumstance was supposed to invest her over the invisible world. And from all these particulars combined, the young men and women of the Halidome used to distinguish Mary among themselves by the name of the Spirit of Avenel, as if the fair but ~~fragile~~ beautiful but rather colourless cheek, the dark blue eye, and the shady hair, had belonged rather to the immaterial than the substantial world. The general tradition of the White Lady, who was supposed to wait on the fortunes of the family of Avenel, gave a sort of zest to this piece of rural wit. It gave great offence, however, to the two sons of Simon Glendinning; and when the expression was in their presence applied to ~~the young lady~~, Edward was wont to check the petulance of those who used it by strength of argument, and Halbert by strength of arm. In such cases Halbert had this advantage, that although he could render no aid to his brother's argument, yet when circumstances required it, he was sure to have that of Edward, who never indeed himself commenced a fray, but on the other hand, did not testify any reluctance to enter into combat in Halbert's behalf or in his rescue.

But the zealous attachment of the two youths, being themselves, from the retired situation in which they dwelt, comparative strangers in the Halidome, did not serve in any degree to alter the feelings of the inhabitants towards the young lady, who seemed to have dropped amongst them from another sphere of life. Still, however, she was regarded with respect, if not with fondness; and the attention of the Sub-Prior to the family, not to mention the formidable name of Julian Avenel, which every new incident of those tumultuous times tended to render more famous, attached to his niece a certain importance. Thus some aspired to her acquaintance out of pride, while the more timid of the fens were anxious to inculcate upon their children, the necessity of being respectful to the noble orphan. So that Mary Avenel, little loved because little known, was regarded with a mysterious awe, partly derived from fear of her uncle's moss-troopers, and partly from her own retired and distant habits, enhanced by the superstitious opinions of the time and country.

It was not without some portion of this awe, that Myrie felt herself left alone in company with a young person so distant in rank, and so different in bearing, from herself; for her worthy father had taken the first opportunity to step out unobserved, in order to mark how the barn-yard was filled, and what prospect it afforded of grist to the mill. In youth, however, there is a sort of free-masonry, which, without much conversation, teaches young persons to estimate each other's character, and places them at ease on the shortest acquaintance. It is only when taught deceit by the commerce of the world, that we learn to shroud our character from observation, and to disguise our real sentiments from those with whom we are placed in communion.

Accordingly, the two young women were soon engaged in such objects of interest as best became their age. They visited Mary Avenel's pigeon, which she nursed with the tenderness of a mother; they turned over her slender stores of finery, which yet contained some articles that excited the respect of her companion, though Myrie was too good-humoured to nourish envy. A golden rosary, and some female ornaments marking superior rank, had been rescued in the moment of their utmost adversity, mere by Tibb Tacket's presence of mind, than by the care of their owner, who was at that sad period too much sunk in grief to pay any attention to such circumstances. They struck Myrie with a deep impression of veneration; for, excepting what the Lord Abbot and the convent might possess, she did not believe there was so much real gold in the world as was exhibited in these few trinkets, and Mary, however sage and serious, was not above being pleased with the admiration of her rustic companion.

Nothing, indeed, could exhibit a stronger contrast than the appearance of the two girls; — the good-humoured daughter-loving countenance of the Maid of the Mill, who stood gazing with unexpressed astonishment on whatever was in her inexperienced eye rare and costly, and with an humble, and at the same time cheerful acquiescence in her inferiority, asking all the little queries about the use and value of the ornaments, while Mary Avenel, with her quiet composed dignity and placidity of manner, produced them one after another for the amusement of her companion.

As they became gradually more familiar, Mysie of the Mill was just venturing to ask, why Mary Avenel never appeared at the May-pole, and to express her wonder when the young lady said she disliked dancing, when a tramping of horses at the gate of the tower interrupted their conversation.

Mysie flew to the shot window in the full ardour of unrestrained female curiosity. "Saint Mary! sweet lady! here come two well-mounted gallants; will you stop this way to look at them?"

"No," said Mary Avenel, "you shall tell me who they are."

"Well, if you like it better," said Mysie — "but how shall I know them? — Stay, I do know one of them, and so do you, lady; he is a blithe man, somewhat light of hand they say, but the gallants of those days think no great harm of that. He is your uncle's henchman, that they call Christie of the Clinthill; and he has not his old green jerkin and the rusty black-jack over it, but a scarlet cloak, laid down with silver lace three inches broad, and a breast-plate you might see to dress your hair in, as well as in that keeking-glass in the ivory frame that you shewed me even now. Come, dear lady, come to the shot-window and see him."

"If it be the man you mean, Mysie," replied the orphan of Avenel, "I shall see him soon enough, considering either the pleasure or comfort the sight will give me."

"Nay, but if you will not come to see gay Christie," replied the Maid of the Mill, her face flushed with eager curiosity, "come and tell me who the gallant is that is with him, the handsomest, the very loveliest young man I ever saw with sight."

"It is my foster-brother, Halbert Glendinning," said Mary, with apparent indifference; for she had been accustomed to call the sons of Elspeth her foster-brothers, and to live with them as if they had been brothers in earnest.

"Nay, by Our Lady, that it is not," said Mysie; "I know the favour of both the Glendinnings well, and I think this rider be not of our country. He has a crimson velvet bonnet, and long brown hair falling down under it, and a beard on his upper lip, and his chin clean and close shaved, save a small patch on the point of the chin, and a sky-blue jerkin, slashed and lined with white satin, and trunk-hose to suit, and no weapon but a rapier and dagger — Well, if I was a man, I would never wear weapon but the rapier! it is so slender and becoming, instead of having a cart-load of iron at my back, like my father's broad-sword with its great rusty basket-hilt. Do you not delight in the rapier and poniard, lady?"

"The best sword," answered Mary, "if I must needs answer a question of the sort, is that which is drawn in the best cause, and which is best used when it is out of the scabbard."

"But can you not guess who this stranger should be?" said Mysie.

"Indeed, I cannot even attempt it; but to judge by his companion, it is no matter how little he is known," replied Mary.

"My bonison on his bonny face," said Mysie, "if he is not going to alight here! Now, I am as much pleased as if my father had given me the silver settings he has promised me so often; — nay, you had as well come to the window, for you go and see him by and by whether you will or not."

"Do not know how much sooner, Mary Avenel might have sought the point of observation, if she had not been scared from it by the unrestrained curiosity expressed by her buxom friend; but at length the same feeling prevailed over her sense of dignity, and satisfied with having displayed all the indifference that was necessary in point of decorum, she no longer thought herself bound to restrain her curiosity.

From the out-shot or projecting window she could perceive, that Christie of the Clinthill was attended on the present occasion by a very gay and gallant cavalier, who from the nobleness of his countenance and manner, his rich and handsome dress, and the showy appearance of his horse and furniture, must, she agreed with her new friend, be a person of some consequence.

Christie also seemed conscious of something, which made him call out with more than his usual insolence of manner, "What, ho! so ho! the house! Churr peasants, will no one answer when I call! — Ho! Martin, — Tibb, — Dame Glendinning! — a murrain on you, must we stand keeping our horses in the cold here, and they steaming with heat, when ye have ridden so sharply?"

"At length he was obeyed, and old Martin made his appearance. "Ha!" said Christie, "art thou there, old Truopenny! here, stable me these steeds, and see them well bedded, and stretch thine old limbs by rubbing them down; and see thou quit not the stable till there is not a turned hair on either of them."

Martin took the horses to the stable as commanded, but suppressed not his indignation a moment after he could vent it with safety. "Would not any one think," he said to Jasper, an old ploughman, who, in coming to his assistance, had heard Christie's imperious injunctions, "that this loon, this Christie of the Clinthill, was laird or lord at least of him? No such thing, man! I remember him a little dirty turnspit-boy in the house of Avenel, that every body in a frosty morning like this warmed his fingers by kicking or cuffing! and now he is a gentleman, and swears, d—n him and renounce him, as if the gentlemen could not so rich as keep their own wickedness to themselves, without the like of him going to hell in their very company, and by the same road. I have as much a mind as ever I had to my dinner, to go back and tell him to sort his horse himself, since he is as able as I am."

"Hout, hout, man!" answered Jasper, "keep a calm sough; better to fleech a fool than fight with him."

Martin acknowledged the truth of the proverb, and, much comforted therewith, betook himself to cleaning the stranger's horse with great assiduity, remarking, it was a pleasure to handle a handsome nag, and turned over the other to the charge of Jasper. Nor was it until Christie's commands were literally complied with, that he deemed it proper after fitting ablutions, to join the party in the spence; not for the purpose of waiting upon them, as a mere modern reader might possibly expect, but that he might have his share of dinner in their company.

In the meanwhile Christie had presented his companion to Dame Glendinning as Sir Phoebe Shaston, a friend of his and of his master, come to spend three or four days with little din in the tower. The good dame could not conceive how she was entitled to shew an honour, and would fain have pleaded her want of every sort of convenience to entertain a guest of that quality. But, indeed, the visitor, when he cast his eyes round the bare walls, eyed the huge black chimney, scrutinized the meagre and broken furniture of the apartment, and beheld the embarrassment of the mistress of the family, instigated great reluctance to intrude upon Dame Glendinning a visit, which could scarce, from all appearances, prove otherwise than an inconvenience to her, and a penance to himself.

But the reluctant hostess and her guest had to do with an inexorable man, who silenced all expostulation with, "such was his master's pleasure. And, moreover," he continued, "though the Baron of Avenel's will must, and ought to prove law to all within ten miles around him, yet here, dame," he said, "is a letter from your petticoated baron, the lord-priest yonder, who enjoins you, as you regard his pleasure, that you afford to this good knight such decent accommodation as is in your power, suffering him to live as privately as he shall desire. — And for you, Sir Pierce Shafton," continued Christie, "you will judge for yourself, whether secrecy and safety is not more your object even now, than soft beds and high cheer. And do not judge of the dame's goods by the semblance of her cottage; for you will see by the dinner she is about to spread for us, that the vessel of the kirk is seldom found with her basket bare." To Mary Avenel Christie presented the stranger, after the best fashion he could, as to the niece of his master the baron.

While he thus laboured to reconcile Sir Pierce Shafton to his fate, the widow, having consulted her son Edward on the real import of the Lord Abbot's injunction, and having found that Christie had given a true exposition, saw nothing else left for her but to make that fate as easy as she could to the stranger. He himself also seemed reconciled to his lot by some feeling probably of strong necessity; and accepted with a good grace the hospitality which the dame offered with a very indifferent one.

In fact, the dinner, which soon smoked before the assembled guests, was of that substantial kind which warrants plenty and comfort. Dame Glendinning had cooked it after her best manner; and, delighted with the handsome appearance which her good cheer made when placed on the table, forgot both her plans and the vexations which interrupted them, in the business of expressing her assembled visitors to eat and drink, watching every trencher as it waxed empty, and longing it with fresh supplies ere the guest could utter a negative.

In the meanwhile, the company attentively regarded each other's motions, and seemed endeavouring to form a judgment of each other's character. Sir Pierce Shafton condescended to speak to no one but to Mary Avenel, and on her he conferred exactly the same familiar and compassionate, though somewhat scornful sort of attention, which a pretty fellow of these days will sometimes condescend to bestow on a country maid, when there is no prettier or more fashionable woman present. The manner indeed was different, for the courtesy of those times did not permit Sir Pierce Shafton to pick his teeth, or to yawn, or to gabble like the begone whose tongue (as he says) was cut out by the king, or to neglect cleanliness or blindness, or any other infirmity of the organs. But in the embroidery of his conversation was different. The groundwork was the same, and the high-flown and ornate compliments with which the gallant knight of the sixteenth century interarded his conversation, were as much the offspring of egotism and self-conceit, as the jargon of the coxcombs of our own days.

The English knight was, however, somewhat daunted at finding that Mary Avenel listened with an air of indifference, and answered with wonderful brevity, to all the fine things which caught, as he conceived, to have dazzled her with their brilliancy, and puzzled her by their obscurity. But if he was disappointed in making the desired, or rather the expected impression, upon her when he addressed, Sir Pierce Shafton's discourse was marvellous in the ears of Mysie the Miller's daughter, and not the less so that she did not comprehend the meaning of a single word which he uttered. Indeed, the gallant knight's language was far too courtly to be understood by persons of much greater acuteness than Mysie's.

It was about this period, that the "only rare poet of his time, the witty, comical, facetiously-quick, and quickly-facetious, John Lyly—he that sat at Apollo's table, and to whom Phoebus gave a wreath of his own hairs without mistaking"—he, in short, who wrote that singularly conceited work, called Euphues and his England, was in the very zenith of his absurdity and reputation. The quaint, forced, and unnatural style which he introduced by his "Anatomy of Wit," had a fashion as rapid as it was momentary—all the court ladies were his scholars, and to parler Euphuisme, was as necessary a qualification to a courtly gallant, as those of understanding how to use his rapier, or to dance a minuet.

It was no wonder that the Maid of the Mill was soon as effectually blinded by the intricacies of this erudite and courtly style of conversation; as she had ever been by the dust of her father's own meal-sacks. But there she sat with her mouth and eyes as open as the mill-door and the two windows, chewing teeth as white as her father's bolted flour, and endeavouring to secure a word or two for her own future use out of the pearls of rhetoric which Sir Pierce Shafton scattered around him with such bounteous profusion.

For the male part of the company, Edward felt ashamed of his own manner and slowness of speech, when he observed the handsome young courtier, with an ease and volubility of which he had no conception, run over all the commonplace topics of high-flown gallantry. It is true, the good sense and natural taste of young Glendinning soon informed him that the gallant cavalier was speaking nonsense. But, alas! where is the man of modest merit, and real talent, who has not suffered from being outshone in conversation, and outstripped in the race of life, by men of less reserve, and of qualities more showy, though less substantial; and well constituted must the mind be, that can yield up the prize without envy to competitors more worthy than himself.

¹ Such, and yet more extravagant, are the compliments paid to this author by his other names. Notwithstanding all imagination, Lyly was really a man of wit and imagination, though both were obscured by his most monstrous affectation that ever depicted a painted page.

Edward Glendinning had no such philosophy. While he despised the jargon of the gay cavalier, he envied the facility with which he could run on, as well as the courtly tone and expression, and the perfect ease and elegance with which he offered all the little acts of politeness to which the duties of the table gave opportunity. And if I am to speak truth, I must own that he envied those qualities the more as they were all exercised in Mary Avenel's service, and, although only so far accepted as they could not be refused, intimated a wish on the stranger's part to place himself in her good graces, as the only person in the room to whom he thought it worth while to recommend himself. His title, rank, and very handsome figure, together with some sparks of wit and spirit which flashed across the cloud of nonsense which he uttered, fondled him, as the words of the old song say, "a lad for a lady's vying;" so that poor Edward, with all his real worth and acquired knowledge, in his home-spun doublet, blue cap, and deerskin trowsers, looked like a clown beside the courtier, and, feeling the full inferiority, nourished no good-will to him by whom he was eclipsed.

Christie, on the other hand, so soon as he had satisfied to the full a voracious appetite, by means of which persons of his profession could, like the wolf and eagle, gorge themselves with as much food at one meal as might serve them for several days, began also to feel himself more in the background than he liked to be. This worthy had, amongst his other good qualities, an excellent opinion of himself; and, being of a bold and forward disposition, had no mind to be thrown into the shade by any one. With an impudent familiarity which such persons mistake for graceful case, he broke in upon the knight's finest speeches with as little remorse as he would have driven the point of his lance through a laced doublet.

Sir Pierce Shafton, a man of rank and high birth, by no means encouraged or endured this familiarity, and requested the intruder either with total neglect, or such laconic replies, as intimated a sovereign contempt for the rude spearman, who affected to converse with him upon terms of equality.

The Miller held his peace; for, as his usual conversation turned chiefly on his clapper and toll-dial, he had no mind to brag of his wealth in presence of Christie of the Clinthill, or to intrude his discourse on the English cavalier.

A little specimen of the conversation may not be out of place, were it but to shew young ladies what fine things they have lost by living when Euphuism is out of fashion.

"Credit me, fairest lady," said the knight, "that such is the tanning of our English courtiers of the chaffard strain, that, as they have infinitely refined upon the plain and rustical discourse of our fathers, which, as I may say, more becometh the mouths of country roisterers in a May-game than that of courtly gallants in a galliard, so I hold it ineffably and unutterably impossible, that those who may succeed us in that garden of wit and courtesy shall alter or amend it. Venus delighted but in the language of Mercury, Euphrosyne will stoop to no one but Alexander, none can sound Apollo's pipe but Orpheus."

"Without sir," said Mary, who could scarcely help laughing, "we have but to rejoice in the changes which hath honoured this solitude with a glimpse of the sun of courtesy, though it rather blinds than enlightens us."

"Pretty and quaint, fairest lady," answered the Euphuist. "Ah, that I had with me my Anatomy of Wit—that all-to-be-unparalleled volume—that quintessence of human wit—that treasury of quaint invention—that exquisitely-pleasant-to-read, and inevitably-necessary-to-be-remembered manual, of all that is worthy to be known—which indoctrines the rude in civility, the dull in intellectuality, the heavy in jocosity, the blunt in gentility, the vulgar in nobility, and all of them in that unutterable perfection of human utterance, that eloquence which no other eloquence is sufficient to praise, that art which, when we call it by its own name of Euphuism, we bestow on it its richest panegyric."

"By Saint Mary," said Christie of the Clinthill, "if your worship had told me that you had left such stores of wealth as you talk of at Prudhoe Castle, Long Dickie and I would have had them off with us if man and horse could have carried them; but you told us of no treasure I wot of, save the silver tongue for turning up your mustachoes."

The knight treated this intruder's mistake—for certainly Christie had no idea that all these epithets which sounded so rich and splendid, were lavished upon a small quarto volume—with a stare, and then turning again to Mary Avenel, the only person whom he thought worthy to address, he proceeded in his strain of high-flown oratory, "Even thus," said he, "do hogs condemn the splendour of Oriental pearls; even thus are the delicacies of a choice repast in vain offered to the long-eared graser of the common, who turneth from them to devour a thistle. Surely as idle is it to pour forth the treasures of oratory before the eyes of the ignorant, and to spread the dainties of the intellectual banquet before those who are, morally and metaphysically speaking, no better than asses."

"Sir Knight, since that is your quality," said Edward, "we cannot strive with you in loftiness of language; but I pray you in fair courtesy, while you honour my father's house with your presence, to spare us such vile comparisons."

"Peace, good villagio," said the knight, gracefully waving his hand, "I pritheee peace, kind rustic; and you, my guide, whom I may scarce call honest, let me prevail upon you to imitate the laudable taciturnity of that honest yeoman, who sits as mute as a mill-post, and of that comely damsel, who seems as with her ears she drank in what she did not altogether comprehend, even as a palfrey listening to a lute, whereof, however, he knoweth not the gamut."

"Marvelous fine words," at length said dame Glendinning, who began to be tired of sitting so long silent, "marvellous fine words, neighbour Happer, are they not?"

"Brave words—very brave words—very exceeding pyot words," answered the Miller; "nevertheless, to speak my mind, a Epy of brass were worth a bushel o' them."

"I think so too, under his worship's leave," answered Christie of the Clinthill. "I well remember that at the race of Morham, as we call it, near Berwick, I took a young Scottish fellow out of saddle with my lance, and sent him, I thought, a good length from his nag; and so, as he had some gold on his laced doublet, I deemed he might he' the like on it in his pocket too, though that is a rule that does not aye hold good—So I was speaking to him of ransom, and out he comes with a handful of such tokens as his honour there hath gleaned up, and staved me for mercy, as I was a true son of Mars, and such like."

"And obtained no mercy at thy hand, I dare be sworn," said the knight, who deigned not to speak Englishman excepting to the fair sex.

"By my troggas," replied Christie, "I would have thrust my lance down his throat, but just then they flung open that accursed postern gate, and forth pricked old Hunson, and Henry Carey, and as many fellows as their heels as turned the chase northward again. So I e'en pricked Bayard with the spur, and went off with the rest; for a man should ride when he may not wrestle, as they say in Tynedale."

"Trust me," said the knight, again turning to Mary Avenel, "if I do not pity you, lady, who, being of noble blood, are thus in a manner compelled to abide in the cottage of the ignorant, like the precious stone in the head of the toad, or like a precious garland on the brow of an ass.—But soft, what gallant haunts are here, whose garb savoureth more of the rustic than doth his demeanour, and whose looks seem more lofty than his habit! even as——"

"I pray you, Sir Knight," said Mary, "to spare your courtly similitudes for refined ears, and give me leave to name unto you my foster-brother, Halbert Glendinning."

"The son of the good dame of the cottage?" said the English knight; "for by some such name did my guide discriminate the mistress of this mansion, which you, madam, enrich with your presence.—And yet, touching this juvenile, he hath that about him which belongeth to higher birth, for all are not black who dig coals."

"Nor all white who are millers," said honest Happer, glad to get in a word, as they say, edge-ways.

Halbert, who had sustained the glance of the Englishman with some impatience, and knew not what to make of his manner and language, replied with some asperity, "Sir Knight, we have in this land of Scotland an ancient saying, 'Scorn not the buck that hides you'—you are a guest of my father's house to shelter you from danger, if I am rightly informed by the domestics. Be not its humbleness, nor that of its inmates—ye might long have chidden at the court of England, ere we had sought your favour, or lumbered you with our society. Since your fate has sent you hither amongst us, be contented with such fare and such converse as we can afford you, and scorp us not for our kindness; for the Scots wear short patience and long daggers."

All eyes were turned on Halbert while he was thus speaking, and there was a general feeling that his countenance had an expression of intelligence, and his person an air of dignity, which they had never before observed. Whether it was that the wonderful being with whom he had so lately held communication, had bestowed on him a grace and dignity of look and bearing which he had not before, or whether the being conversant in high matters, and called on a daily toward that of other men, had a natural effect in giving becoming confidence to his language and manner, we pretend not to determine. But it was evident to all, that, from this day, young Halbert was an altered man; that he acted with the steadiness, promptitude, and determination, which belonged to riper years, and bore himself with a manner which appertained to higher rank.

The knight took the rebuke with good humour. "By mine honour," he said, "thou hast reason on thy side, good juvenile—nevertheless, I spoke not as in ridicule of the roof which shelters me, but rather in your own praise, to whom, if this roof be native, thou mayst nevertheless rise from its lowliness; even as the lark, which maketh its humble nest in the furrow, ascendeth towards the sun, as well as the eagle which buildeth her eyrie in the cliff."

This high-flown discourse was interrupted by Dame Glendinning, who, with all the busy anxiety of a mother, was loading her son's trencher with food, and dining in his ear her reproaches on account of his prolonged absence. "And see," she said, "that you do not one day get such a sight while you are walking about among the haunts of them that are not of our flesh and bone, as that Mungo Murray when he slept on the greenward ring of the Auld Kirkhill at sunset, and awakened at daybreak in the wild hills of Breadalbane. And see that, when you are looking for deer, the red stag does not gail you as he did Diccon Thorburn, who never overcast the wound that he took from a buck's horn. And see, when you go swaggering about with a long broadsword by your side, which it becomes no peaceful man to do, that you chance meet with them that have broadsword and lance both—there are enow of rank riders in this land, that neither fear God nor regard man."

Here her eye, "in a fine frenzy rolling," fell full upon that of Christie of the Clinthill, and at once her fears for having given offence interpreted the current of maternal rebuke, which, like rebuke matrimonial, may be often better meant than stated. There was something of sly and watchful significance in Christie's eye, an eye gray, keen, fierce, yet wily, formed to express at once cunning and malice, which made the dame instantly conjecture she had said too much, while she saw in imagination her twelve goodly cows go bowing down the glen in a moonlight night, with half a score of Border spearmen at their heels.

Her voice, therefore, sunk from the elevated tone of maternal authority into a whimpering apologetic sort of strain, and she proceeded to say, "It is as that I have only ill thoughts of the Border riders, for Tibb Tacket there has often heard me say that I thought spear and bridle as natural to a Borderman as a pen to a priest, or a feather-bed to a lady; and—have you not heard us say it, Tibb?"

Tibb showed something less than her expected alacrity in attesting her mistress's deep respect for the freebooters of the southland hills; but, thus conjured, did at length reply, "Ment ay, mistress, I be warrant I have heard you say something like that."

"Mother!" said Halbert, in a firm and commanding tone of voice, "what or whom is it that you fear under my father's roof?—I well hope that it harbours not a guest in whose presence you are afraid to say your pleasure to me or my brother! I am sorry I have been detained so late, being ignorant of the fair company which I should encounter on my return.—I pray you let this excuse suffice: and what satisfies you will, I trust, be nothing less than acceptable to your guests.”

An answer calculated so justly betwixt the submission due to his parent, and the natural feeling of dignity in one who was by birth master of the mansion, excited universal satisfaction. And as Elspeth herself confessed to Tibb on the same evening, “She did not think it had been in the callant. Till that night, he took pets and passions if he was spoke to, and lap through the house like a four-year-auld at the least word of advice that was muint at him, but now he spoke as grave and as douce as the Lord Abbot himself. She kendua,” she said, “what might be the upshot of it, but it was like he was a wonderfu’ callant even now.”

The party then separated, the young men setting for their apartment, the elder to their household cares. While Christie went to see his horse properly accommodated, Edward betock himself to his book, and Halbert, who was as ingenious in employing his hands as he had hitherto appeared imperfect in mental exertion, applied himself to constructing a place of concealment in the floor of his apartment by raising a plank, beneath which he resolved to deposit that copy of the Holy Scriptures which had been so strangely regained from the possession of men and spirits.

In the meanwhile, Sir Pierce Shafton sat still as a stone, in the chair in which he had deposited himself, his hands folded on his breast, his legs stretched straight out before him, and resting upon the heels, his eyes cast up to the ceiling as if he had meant to count every mesh of every cobweb with which the arched roof was canopied, wearing at the same time a face of as solemn and imperturbable gravity, as if his existence had depended on the accuracy of his calculation.

He could scarce be roused from his listless state of contemplative absorption so as to take some supper, a meal at which the younger females appeared not. Sir Pierce stared around twice or thrice as if he missed something; but he asked not for them, and only evinced his sense of a proper audience being wanting, by his abstraction and absence of mind, seldom speaking until he was twice addressed, and then replying, without trope or figure, in that plain English, which nobody could speak better when he had a mind.

Christie, finding himself in undisturbed possession of the conversation, indulged all who chose to listen with details of his own wild and inglorious warfare, while Dame Elspeth’s eurch bristled with horror, and Tibb Tasket, rejoiced to find herself once more in the company of a jack-man, listened to his tales, like Desdemona to Othello’s, with undisguised delight. Meantime the two young Glendinning were each wrapped up in his own reflections, and only interrupted in them by the signal to move bedward.

CHAPTER XV.

*He strikes no coin, 'tis true, but coins new phrases,
And sends them forth as knaves read gilded counters,
Which wise men scorn, and fools accept in payment.
Old Play.*

In the morning Christie of the Clinthill was no where to be seen. As this worthy personage did seldom pique himself on sounding a trumpet before his movements, no one was surprised at his moonlight departure, though some alarm was excited lest he had not made it empty-handed. So, in the language of the rational bailed,

*Some ran to cupboard, and some to kist,
But nought was away that could be mist.*

All was in order, the key of the stable left above the door, and that of the iron grate in the inside of the lock. In short, the retreat had been made with scrupulous attention to the security of the garrison, and so far Christie left them nothing to complain of.

The safety of the premisses was ascertained by Halbert, who, instead of stretching up a gun or crossbow, and sallying out for the day as had been his frequent custom, now, with a gravity beyond his years, took a survey of all around the tower, and then returned to the spence, or public apartment, in which, at the early hour of seven, the morning-meal was prepared.

There he found the Euphuist in the same elegant posture of abstruse calculation which he had exhibited on the preceding evening, his arms folded in the same angle, his eyes turned up to the same cobwebs, and his heels resting on the ground as before. Tired of this affectation of indolent importance, and not much flattered with his guest’s persevering in it to the last, Halbert resolved at once to break the ice, being determined to know what circumstance had brought to the Tower of Glendinning a guest at once so supercilious and so silent.

“Sir Knight,” he said with some firmness, “I have twice given you good morning, to which the absence of your mind hath, I presume, prevented you from yielding attention, or from making return. This exchange of courtesy is at your pleasure to give or withhold—But, as what I have farther to say concerns your comfort and your emotions in an especial manner, I will entreat you to give me some signs of attention, that I may be sure I am not wasting my words on a monumental image.”

At this unexpected address, Sir Pierce Shafton opened his eyes, and afforded the speaker a broad stare; but as Halbert returned the glance without either confusion or dismay, the knight thought proper to change his posture, draw in his legs, raise his eyes, fix them on young Glendinning, and assume the appearance of one who listens to what is said to him. Nay, to make his purpose more evident, he gave voice to his resolution in those words, “Speak! we do hear.”

“Sir Knight,” said the youth, “it is the custom of this household, or particularly of St. Mary’s, to trouble with inquiries no guests who receive our hospitality, providing they carry in our houses only for a single revolution of the sun. We know that both criminals and debtors come hither for sanctuary, and we seek to make them the pillars whom chance may make our guest, an avowal of the cause of his pilgrimage and penance. But when one so high above our rank as yourself, Sir Knight, and especially one to whom the possession of such pre-eminence is not indifferent, shews his determination to be our guest for a longer time, it is our usage to inquire of him whence he comes, and what is the cause of his journey?"

The English knight gaped twice or thrice before he answered, and then replied in a bantering tone, "Truly, good villaggio, your question hath in it somewhat of embarrassment, for you ask me of things concerning which I am not as yet altogether determined what answer I may find it convenient to make. Let it suffice thee, kind juvenal, that thou hast the Lord Abbot's authority for treating me to the best of that power of thine, which, indeed, may not always so well suffice for my accommodation as either of us would desire."

"I must have a more precise answer than this, Sir Knight," said the young Glendinning.

"Friend," said the knight, "be not outrageous. It may suit your northern imaginers thus to press harshly upon the secrets of thy betters; but believe me, that even as the ~~lute~~ struck by an unskilful hand, doth produce discords, so —" At this moment the door of the apartment opened, and Mary Avenel presented herself — "But who can talk of discords," said the knight, assuming his complimentary vein and humour, "when the soul of harmony descends upon us in the presence of surpassing beauty! For even as foxes, wolves, and other animals void of sense and reason, do fly from the presence of the resplendent sun of heaven when he arises in his glory, so do strife, wrath, and all ireful passions retreat, and, as it were, scud away, from the face which now beams upon us, with power to compose our angry passions, illuminate our errors and difficulties, soothe our wounded minds, and lull to rest our disorderly apprehensions; for as the heat and warmth of the eye of day is to the material and physical world, so is the eye which I now bow down before to that of the intellectual microcosm."

He concluded with a profound bow; and Mary Avenel, gazing from one to the other, and plainly seeing that something was amiss, could only say, "For heaven's sake, what is the meaning of this?"

The newly-acquired tact and intelligence of her foster-brother was as yet insufficient to enable him to give an answer. He was quite uncertain how he ought to deal with a guest, who, preserving a singularly high tone of assumed superiority and importance, seemed nevertheless so little serious in what he said, that it was quite impossible to discern with accuracy whether he was in jest or earnest.

Fearing, however, the internal resolution to being Sir Pierce Shafton to a reckoning at a more fit place and season, he resolved to prosecute the matter no farther at present; and the entrance of his mother with the damsel of the Mill, and the return of the honest Miller from the stack-yard, where he had been numbering and calculating the probable amount of the season's grist, rendered further discussion impossible for the moment.

In the course of the calculation it could not but strike the men of men and grindstones, that, after the dinner's dues were paid, and after all which he himself could, by any means deduct from the crop, still the residue which must revert to Dame Glendinning could not be less than considerable. I wet not if this led the honest Miller to nourish any plans similar to those adopted by Elspeth; but it is certain that he accepted with grateful alacrity an invitation which the dame gave to his daughter, to remain a week or two as her guest at Glendearg.

The principal persons being thus in high good humour with each other, all business gave place to the hilarity of the morning repast; and so much did Sir Pierce appear gratified by the attention which was paid to every word that he uttered by the nut-brown Mysie, that, notwithstanding his high birth and distinguished quality, he bestowed on her some of the more ordinary and second-rate tropes of his elocution.

Mary Avenel, when relieved from the awkwardness of feeling the full weight of his conversation addressed to herself, enjoyed it much more; and the good knight, encouraged by those conciliating marks of approbation from the sex, for whose sake he cultivated his oratorical talents, made speedy intimation of his purpose to be more communicative than he had shewn himself in his conversation with Halbert Glendinning, and gave them to understand, that it was in consequence of some pressing danger that he was at present their involuntary guest.

The conclusion of the breakfast was a signal for the separation of the company. The Miller went to prepare for his departure; his daughter to arrange matters for her unexpected stay; Edward was summoned to consultation by Martin concerning some agricultural matter, in which Halbert could not be brought to interest himself; the dame left the room upon her household concerns, and Mary was in the act of following her, when she suddenly recollected, that if she did so, the strange knight and Halbert must be left alone together, at the risk of another quarrel.

The maiden no sooner observed this circumstance, than she instantly returned from the door of the apartment, and, seating herself in a small stone window-seat, resolved to maintain that curb which she was sensible her presence imposed on Halbert Glendinning, of whose quick temper she had some apprehensions.

The stranger marked her motions, and, either interpreting them as inviting his society, or obedient to those laws of gallantry which permitted him not to leave a lady in silence and solitude, he instantly placed himself near to her side and opened the conversation as follows: —

"Credit me, fair lady," he said, addressing Mary Avenel, "it much rejoiceth me, being, as I am, a banished man from the delights of mine own country, that I shall find here, in this obscure and silvan cottage of the north, a fair form and a candid soul, with whom I may explain my mutual sentiments. And let me pray you in particular, lovely lady, that, according to the universal custom now predominant in our court, the garden of superior wits, you will exchange with me some epithet whereby you may mark my devotion to your service. Be henceforward named, for example, my Protection, and let me be your Affability."

"Our northern and country manners, Sir Knight, do not permit us to exchange epithets with those to whom we are strangers," replied Mary Avenel.

"Nay, but see now," said the knight, "how you are started! even as the unbroken steed, which swerves aside from the shaking of a handkerchief, though he must in time encounter the waving of a peacock. This courtly exchange of epithets of honour, is no more than the compliments which pass between valour and beauty, wherever they meet, and under whatever circumstances. Elizabeth of England herself calls Philip Sydney her Courage, and he in return calls that princess his Inspiration. Wherefore, my fair Protection, for by such epithet it shall be mine to denominate you—"

"Not without the young lady's consent, sir!" interrupted Halbert; "most truly do I hope your courtly and quaint breeding will not so far prevail over the more ordinary rules of civil behaviour."

"Fair tenant of an indifferent copyhold," replied the knight, with the same coolness and civility of men, but in a tone somewhat more lofty than he used to the young lady, "we do not in the southern parts, much intermingle discourse, save with those with whom we may stand on some footing of equality; and I must, in all discretion, remind you, that the necessity which makes us inhabitants of the same cabin, doth not place us otherwise on a level with each other."

"By Saint Mary," replied young Gleninning, "it is my thought that it does; for plain men hold, that he who asks the shelter is indebted to him who gives it; and so far, therefore, is our rank equalized while this roof covers us both."

"Thou art altogether deceived," answered Sir Pierce; "and that thou mayst fully adapt thyself to our relative condition, know that I account not myself thy guest, but that of thy master, the Lord Abbot of St Mary's, who, for reasons best known to himself and me, chooseth to administer his hospitality to me through the means of thee, his servant and vassal, who art, therefore, in good truth, as passive an instrument of my accommodation as this ill-made and rugged joint-stool on which I sit, or as the wooden trencher from which I eat my coarse commons. Wherefore," he added, turning to Mary, "fairest mistress, or rather, as I said before, most lovely Protection!"

Mary Avenel was about to reply to him, when the stern, fierce, and resentful expression of voice and countenance with which Halbert exclaimed, "Not from the King of Scotland, did he live, would I brook such terms!" induced her to throw herself between him and the stranger, exclaiming, "For God's sake, Halbert, beware what you do!"

"Fear not, fairest Protection," replied Sir Pierce, with the utmost serenity, "that I can be provoked by this rustical and mistaught juvenile to do aught misbecoming your presence or mine own dignity; for as soon shall the gunner's linstock give fire unto the icicle, as the spark of passion inflame my blood, tempered as it is to serenity by the respect due to the presence of my gracious Protection."

"You may well call her your protection, Sir Knight," said Halbert; "by Saint Andrew, it is the only sensible word I have heard you speak! But we may meet where her protection shall no longer afford you shelter."

"Fairest Protection," continued the courtier, not again humming with a look, far less with a direct gaze, the threat of the incensed Halbert, "doubt not that my faithful Affability will be more com-moved by the speech of this rudesby, than the bright and serene moon is perturbed by the baying of the cottage-cur, proud of the height of his own dung-hill, which, in his conceit, thrust him nearer unto the majestic luminary."

To what lengths so unavowable a shaft might have driven Halbert's indignation, is left uncertain; for at that moment Edward rushed into the apartment with the intelligence that two most important officers of the Convent, the Kitchenier and Refectoryer, were just arrived with a sumpter-mule, loaded with provisions, announcing that the Lord Abbot, the Sub-Prior, and the Sacristan, were on their way thither. A circumstance so very extraordinary had never been recorded in the annals of Saint Mary's, or in the traditions of Glendearg, though there was a faint legendary report that a certain Abbot had dined there in old days, after having been bewildered in a hunting expedition amongst the wilds which lie to the northward. But that the present Lord Abbot should have taken a voluntary journey to so wild and dreary a spot, the very Kamtschatka of the Halidoms, was a thing never dreamt of; and the news excited the greatest surprise in all the members of the family saving Halbert alone.

This fiery youth was too full of the insult he had received to think of any thing as unconnected with it. "I am glad of it," he exclaimed; "I am glad the Abbot comes hither. I will know of him by what right this stranger is sent hither to domineer over us under our father's roof, as if we were slaves and not freemen. I will tell the proud priest to his beard!"

"Alas! alas! my brother," said Edward, "think what these words may cost thee!"

"And what will, or what can they cost me," said Halbert, "that I should sacrifice my human feelings and my justifiable resentment to the fear of what the Abbot can do?"

"Our mother—our mother!" exclaimed Edward; "think, if she is deprived of her home, expelled from her property, how can you amend what your rashness may ruin!"

"It is too true, by Heaven!" said Halbert striking his forehead. Then, stamping his foot against the floor to express the full energy of the passion to which he dared no longer give vent, he turned round and left the apartment.

Mary Avenel looked at the stranger knight, while she was endeavouring to frame a request that he would not report the intemperate violence of her foster-brother to the prejudice of his family, in the mind of the Abbot. But Sir Pierce, the very pink of courtesy, conjectured her meaning from her embarrassment, and waited not to be entreated.

"Credit me, fairest Protection," said he, "your Affability is less than capable of seeing or hearing, far less of reading or retorting,ught of an unseemly nature which may have chanced while I enjoyed the Elysium of your presence. The winds of idle passion may indeed rudely agitate the bosom of the rude; but the heart of the courtier is polished to resist them. As the frozen lake resists not the influence of the breeze, even so—"

The voice of Dame Gleninning, in still more mournful tones, demanded Mary Avenel's attention, who instantly obeyed, not a little glad to escape from the compliments and similes of this court-like gallant. Nor was it apparently less a relief to his part; for no sooner was she past the threshold of the room, than he exchanged the look of formal and elaborate politeness which had accompanied each word he had uttered hitherto, for an expression of the utmost lassitude and ennui; and after indulging in one or two portentous yawns, broke forth into a soliloquy.

"What the foul fiend sent this wench hither! As if it were not sufficient plague to be harboured in a hovel that would hardly serve for a dog's kennel in England, baited by a rude peasant-boy, and dependent on the faith of a mercenary ruffian, but I cannot even have time to muse over my own mishap, but must come aloft, frisk, fidget, and make speeches, to please this pale hectic phantom, because she has gentle blood in her veins! By mine honour, setting prejudices aside, the mill-wench is the more attractive of the two—But patience, Pierce Shafton; thou must not lose thy well-earned claim to be accounted a devout servant of the fair sex, a witty-brained, prompt, and accomplished courtier. Rather thank heaven, Pierce Shafton, which hath sent thee a subject, wherein, without derogating from thy rank, (since the honours of the Avenel family are beyond dispute,) thou mayest find a whetstone for thy witty compliments, a strap whereon to sharpen thine acute ingine, a butt wherewith to shoot the arrows of thy gallantry. For even as a Bilboa blade, the more it is rubbed, the brighter and the sharper will it prove, so—But what need I waste my stock of similitudes in holding converse with myself!—Yonder comes the mouldy retinue, like some half score of crows winging their way slowly up the valley—I hope, a'gad, they have not forgotten my trunk-mails of apparel amid the ample provision they have made for their own belly-timber—Mercy, a'gad, I were finely helped up if the vesture has miscarried among the thievish Borderers!"

Stung by this reflection, he ran hastily down stairs, and caused his horse to be saddled, that he might, as soon as possible, ascertain this important point, by meeting the Lord Abbot and his retinue as they came up the glen. He had not ridden a mile before he met them advancing with the slowness and decorum which became persons of their dignity and profession. The knight failed not to greet the Lord Abbot with all the formal compliments with which men of rank at that period exchanged courtesies. He had the good fortune to find that his mails were numbered among the train of baggage which attended upon the party; and, satisfied in that particular, he turned his horse's head, and accompanied the Abbot to the Tower of Glendearg.

Great, in the meanwhile, had been the turmoil of the good Dame Elspeth and her coadjutors, to prepare for the fitting reception of the Father Lord Abbot and his retinue. The monks had indeed taken care not to trust too much to the state of her pantry; but she was not the less anxious to make such additions as might enable her to chain the thanks of her feudal lord and spiritual father. Meeting Halbert, as, with his blood on fire, he returned from his altercation with her guest, she commanded him instantly to go forth to the hill, and get a return without fail, reminding him that he was not enough to go thither for his own pleasure, and must now do so for the credit of the house.

The Miller, who was now hastening his journey homewards, promised to send up some salmon by his own servant. Dame Elspeth, who by this time thought she had guests enough, had begun to repent of her invitation to poor Myrie, and was just considering by what means, short of giving offence, she could send off the Maid of the Mill behind her father, and adjourn all her own aerial architecture till some future opportunity, when this unexpected generosity on the part of the sire rendered any present attempt to return his daughter on his hands too highly ungracious to be farther thought on. So the Miller departed alone on his homeward journey.

Dame Elspeth's sense of hospitality proved in this instance its own reward; for Myrie had dwelt too near the Convent to be altogether ignorant of the noble art of cookery, which her father patronized to the extent of consuming on festival days such dainties as his daughter could prepare in emulation of the luxuries of the Abbot's kitchen. Laying aside, therefore, her holiday kirtle, and adopting a dress more suitable to the occasion, the good-humoured maidon bared her snowy arms above the elbows; and, as Elspeth acknowledged, in the language of the time and country, took "entire and acauld part with her" in the labours of the day; shewing unparalleled talent, and indefatigable industry, in the preparation of mortroux, blanc-manger, and heaven knows what delicacies besides, which Dame Glendinning, unassisted by her skill, dared not even have dreamt of presenting.

Leaving this able substitute in the kitchen, and regretting that Mary Avenel was so brought up, that she could intrust nothing to her care, unless it might be seeling the great chamber strewn with rushes, and ornamented with such flowers and branches as the season afforded, Dame Elspeth hastily donned her best attire, and with a beating heart presented herself at the door of her little tower, to make her obeisance to the Lord Abbot as he crossed her humble threshold. Edward stood by his mother, and felt the same palpitation, which his philosophy was at a loss to account for. He was yet to learn how long it is ere our reason is enabled to triumph over the force of external circumstances, and how much our feelings are affected by novelty, and blunted by use and habit.

On the present occasion, he witnessed with wonder and awe the approach of some half-score of sterner, sober men upon sober palfreys, muffled in their long black garments, and only relieved by their white scapularies, shewing more like a funeral procession than aught else, and not quibbling their pace beyond that which permitted easy conversation and easy digestion. The sobriety of the scene was, indeed somewhat unlovely by the presence of Sir Pierce Shafton, who, to show that his skill in the manege was not inferior to his other accomplishments, kept alternately pressing and checking his gay courser, forcing him to plaffe, to caracole, to passage, and to do all the other feats of the school, to the great annoyance of the Lord Abbot, the wonted sobriety of whose palfrey became at length discomposed by the vivacity of his companion, while the dignitary kept crying out in hoarse alarm, "I do pray you, sir—Sir Knight—good now, Sir Pierce—Be quiet, Bepaidet, there is a good steed—soh, poor fellow?" and uttering all the other procreant and soothing exclamations by which a timid horseman usually bespeaks the favour of a frisky companion, or of his own unquiet nag, and concluding the head-roll with a sincere Deo gratias so soon as he alighted in the court-yard of the Tower of Glendearg.

The inhabitants unanimously knelt down to kiss the hand of the Lord Abbot, a ceremony which even the monks were often condemned to. Good Abbot Boniface was too much flattered by the incidents of the latter part of his journey, to go through this ceremony with much solemnity, or indeed with much patience. He kept wiping his brow with a snow-white handkerchief with one hand, while another was abandoned to the homage of his vassals; and then signing the cross with his outstretched arm, and exclaiming, "Bless ye—bless ye, my children!" he hastened into the house, and murmured not a little at the darkness and steepness of the rugged winding stair, whereby he at length scaled the spence destined for his entertainment, and, overcome with fatigue, threw himself, I do not say into an easy chair, but into the easiest the apartment afforded.

Magnetic Lady.

WHEN the Lord Abbot had suddenly and superciliously vanished from the eyes of his expectant vassals, the Sub-Prior made amends for the negligence of his principal, by the kind and affectionate greeting which he gave to all the members of the family, but especially to Dame Elspeth, her foster-daughter, and her son Edward. "Where," he even condescended to inquire, "is that naughty Nimrod, Halbert!—He hath not yet, I trust, turned, like his great prototype, his hunting-spear against man!"

"O no, an it please your reverence," said Dame Glendinning, "Halbert is up at the glen to get some venison, or surely he would not have been absent when such a day of honour dawned upon me and mine."

"Oh, to get savoury meat, such as our soul loveth," muttered the Sub-Prior; "it has been at times an acceptable gift.—I bid you good morrow, my good dame, as I must attend upon his lordship the Father Abbot."

"And O, reverend sir," said the good widow, detaining him, "if it may be your pleasure to take part with us if there is anything wrong; and if there is any thing wanted, to say that it is just coming, or to make some excuses your learning best knows how. Every bit of yassal and silver work have we been spoiled of since Pinkie Cleuch, when I lost poor Simon Glendinning, that was the wart of a'."

"Never mind—never fear," said the Sub-Prior, gently extricating his garment from the anxious grasp of Dame Elspeth, "the Refectory has with him the Abbot's plate and drinking cups; and I pray you to believe that whatever is short in your entertainment will be deemed amply made up in good-will."

So saying, he escaped from her and went into the spence, where such preparations as haste permitted were making for the noon collation of the Abbot and the English knight. Here he found the Lord Abbot, for whom a cushion, composed of all the plaids in the house, had been unable to render Simon's huge elbow-chair a soft or comfortable place of rest.

"Benedicite!" said Abbot Boniface, "now marry fie upon these hard benches with all my heart—they are as uneasy as the scabella of our novices. Saint Jude be with us, Sir Knight, how have you contrived to pass over the night in this dungeon! An your bed was no softer than your seat, you might as well have slept on the stone couch of Saint Pacomius. After trotting a full ten miles, a man needs a softer seat than has fallen to my hard lot."

With sympathizing faces, the Sacristan and the Refectory ran to raise the Lord Abbot, and to adjust his seat to his mind, which was at length accomplished in some sort, though he continued alternately to bewail his fatigue, and to exult in the conscious sense of having discharged an arduous duty. "You errant cavaliers," said he, addressing the knights, "may now perceive that others have their travail and their toils to undergo as well as your honoured faculty. And this I will say for myself and the soldiers of Saint Mary, among whom I may be termed captain, that it is not our wont to flinch from the heat of the service, or to withdraw from the good fight. No, by Saint Mary!—no sooner did I learn that you were here, and cared not for certain reasons come to the Monastery, where, with as good will, and with more convenience, we might have given you a better reception, than, striking the table with my hammer, I called a brother—Timothy, said I, let them saddle Benedict—let them saddle my black palfrey, and bid the Sub-Prior and some half-score of attendants be in readiness to-morrow after matins—we would ride to Glendearg.—Brother Timothy stared, thinking, I imagine, that his ears had scarce done him justice—but I repeated my commands, and said, Let the Kitchen and Refectory go before to aid the poor vassals to whom the place belongs in making a suitable collation. So that you will consider, good Sir Piercie, our mutual incommodities, and forgive whatever you may find amiss."

"By my faith," said Sir Piercie Shafton, "there is nothing to forgive.—If you spiritual warriors have to submit to the grievous inconveniences which your lordship narrates, it would ill become me, a sinful and secular man, to complain of a bed as hard as a board, of broth which relished as if made of burnt wool, of flesh, which, in its sable and singed shape, seemed to put me on a level with Richard Cœur-de-Lion, when he ate up the head of a Moor carbonadoed, and of other viands savouring rather of the rusticity of this northern region."

"By the good Saints, sir," said the Abbot, somewhat touched in point of his character for hospitality, of which he was in truth a most faithful and zealous professor, "it grieves me to the heart that you have found our vassals no better provided for your reception.—Yet I scarce know to observe, that if Sir Piercie Shafton's affairs had permitted him to honour with his company our poor house of Saint Mary, he might have had less to complain of in respect of accommodations."

"To give your lordship the reasons," said Sir

"Pierce Shafton, "why I could not at this present time approach your dwelling, or avail myself of its well known and undoubted hospitality, craves either some delay, or," looking around him, "a limited audience."

The Lord Abbot immediately issued his mandate to the Refectory: "His thee to the kitchen, Brother Hilarius, and there make inquiry of our brother the Kitchener, within what time he opines that our collation may be prepared, since sin and sorrow it were, considering the hardships of this noble and gallant knight, no whit mentioning or weighing those we ourselves have endured, if we were now either to advance or retard the hour of refectory beyond the time when the viands are fit to be set before us."

Brother Hilarius parted with an eager alertness to execute the will of his Superior, and returned with the assurance, that punctually at one afternoon would the collation be ready.

"Before that time," said the accurate Refectory, "the wafers, flamma, and pastry-meat, will scarce have had the just degree of fire which learned pottingers prescribe as fittest for the body; and if it should be past one o'clock, were it but ten minutes, our brother the Kitchener opines, that the haunch of venison would suffer in spite of the skill of the little turn-broche whom he has recommended to your holiness by his praises."

"How!" said the Abbot, "a haunch of venison!—from whence comes that dainty! I remember not thou didst intimate its presence in thy lampers of vivers."

"So please your holiness and lordship," said the Refectory, "he is a son of the woman of the house who hath shot it and sent it in—killed but now; yet, as the animal heat hath not left the body, the Kitchener undertakes it shall be as tender as a young chicken—and this youth hath a special gift in shooting deer, and never misses the heart or the brain; so that the blood is not driven through the flesh, as happens too often with us. It is a hart of grace—your holiness has seldom seen such a haunch."

"Silence, Brother Hilarius," said the Abbot, wiping his mouth; "it is not becoming our order to talk of food so earnestly, especially as we must oft have our animal powers exhausted by fasting, and be accessible (as being ever mere mortals) to those signs of longing" (he again wiped his mouth) "which arise on the mention of victuals to an hungry man.—Minute down, however, the name of that youth—it is fitting merit should be rewarded, and he shall hereafter be a frater ad succurrendum in the kitchen and buttery."

"Alas! reverend Father, and my good lord," replied the Refectory, "I did inquiry after the youth, and I leave to one who professes the casque to the cow, and the sword of the flesh to the weapons of the spirit."

"And if it be so," said the Abbot, "see that thou retain him as a deputy-keeper and man-at-arms, and not as a lay brother of the Monastery—for old Tully, our preceptor, waxed dim-eyed, and hath twice spoiled a noble buck, by hitting him unawares on the haunch. Ah! 'tis a foul fault, the showing by evil-willing, evil-doing, evil-appetite, or otherwise, the good creatures indulged to us for our sin. Wherefore, devote us the service of this youth, Brother Hilarius, in the way that may best suit him.—And now, Sir Pierce Shafton, since the fates have assigned us a space of well-nigh an hour, ere we dare hope to enjoy more than the vapour or savour of our repast, may I pray you, of your courtesy, to tell me the cause of this visit; and, above all, to inform us, why you will not approach our more pleasant and better furnished hospitium?"

"Reverend Father, and my very good lord," said Sir Pierce Shafton, "it is well known to your wisdom, that there are stone walls which have ears, and that secrecy is to be looked to in matters which concern a man's head."

The Abbot signed to his attendants, excepting the Sub-Prior, to leave the room, and then said, "Your valour, Sir Pierce, may freely unburden yourself before our faithful friend and counsellor Father Eustace, the benefits of whose advice we may too soon lose, inasmuch as his merits will speedily recommend him to an higher station, in which, we trust, he may find the blessing of a friend and adviser as valuable as himself, since I may say of him, as our claustral rhyme goeth,"

*Dixit Abbas ad prioris,
Tu es homo boni moris,
Quin semper minoris
Mili das concilia.*

Indeed," he added, "the office of Sub-Prior is altogether beneath our dear brother; nor can we elevate him unto that of Prior; which, for certain reasons, is at present kept vacant amongst us. Howbeit, Father Eustace is fully possessed of my confidence, and worthy of yours, and well may it be said of him, Intravit in secretis nostris."

Sir Pierce Shafton bowed to the reverend brother, and, heaving a sigh, as if he would have burst his steel cuirass, he thus commenced his speech:—

"Certain, reverend sir, I may well heave such a suspiration, quo have, as it were, exchanged heaven for purgatory, leaving the lightsome sphere of the royal court of England, for a remote nook in this inaccessible desert—quitting the tilt-yard, where I was ever ready among my comrades to splinter a lance, either for the love of honour, or for the honour of love, in order to couch my knightly spear against base and pilfering besognies and marauders—exchanging the lighted halls, wherein I used nimble to pace the swift ocean, or to move with a loftier grace in the stately galliard, for this rugged and decayed dungeon of rusty-coloured stone—quitting the gay theatre, for the solitary chimney-nook of a Scottish dog-house—bartering the sounds of the soul-reviving lute, and the love-awakening viol-de-gamba, for the discordant squeak of a northern bagpipe—above all, exchanging the smiles of those beauties, who form a galaxy around the throne of England, for the cold courtesy of an untought damsel, and the bewildered stare of a miller's maiden. More might I say, of the exchange of the conversation of gallant knights and gay courtiers of mine own order and capacity, whose counsels are bright and vivid as the lightning, for that of monks and churchmen—but I were discourteous to urge that topic."

The Abbot listened to this list of complaints with great round eyes, which displayed no exact intelli-goace of the orator's meaning; and when the knight paused to take breath, he looked with a doubtful and inquiring eye at the Sub-Prior, not well knowing in what tone he should reply, to an exordium so extraordinary. The Sub-Prior accordingly stepped in to the relief of his principal.

"We deeply sympathize with you, Sir Knight, in the several mortifications and hardships to which fate has subjected you, particularly in that which has thrown you into the society of those, who, as they were conscious they deserved not such an honour, so neither did they at all desire it. But all this goes little way to expound the cause of this train of disasters, or, in plainer words, the reason which has compelled you into a situation having so few charms for you."

"Gentle and reverend sir," replied the Knight, "forgive an unhappy person, who, in giving a history of his miseries, dilateth upon them extremely, even as he who, having fallen from a precipice, looketh upward to measure the height from which he hath been precipitated."

"Yea, but," said Father Eustace, "methinks it were wiser in him to tell those who come to lift him up, which of his bones have been broken."

"You, reverend sir," said the knight, "have, in the encounter of our wits, made a fair attain; whereas I may be in some sort said to have broken my staff across. Pardon me, grave sir, that I speak the language of the tilt-yard, which is doubtless strange to your reverend ears. — Ah! brave remort of the noble, the fair, and the gay! — Ah! throne of love, and citadel of honour! — Ah! celestial beauties, by whose bright eyes it is graced! Never more shall Pierce Shafton advance, as the centre of your radiant glances, couch his lance, and spur his horse at the sound of the spirit-stirring trumpets, nobly called the voice of war — never more shall he baffle his adversary's encounter boldly, break his spear dexterously, and, ambling around the lovely circle, receive the rewards with which beauty honours chivalry!"

Here he paused, wrung his hands, looked upwards, and seemed lost in contemplation of his own fallen fortunes.

"Mad, very mad," whispered the Abbot to the Sub-Prior; "I would we were fairly rid of him; few, of a truth, I expect he will proceed from raving to mischief — Were it not better to call up the rest of the brethren?"

But the Sub-Prior knew better than his Superior how to distinguish the jargon of affection from the ravings of insanity; and although the extremity of the knight's passion seemed altogether fantastic, yet he was not ignorant to what extravagances the fashion of the day can conduct its votaries.

Allowing, therefore, two minutes' space to permit the knight's enthusiastic feelings to exhaust themselves, he again gravely reminded him that the Lord Abbot had taken a journey, unwonted to his age and habits, solely to learn in what he could serve Sir Pierce Shafton — that it was altogether impossible he could do so without his receiving distinct information of the situation in which he had now sought refuge in Scotland. — "The day were on," he observed, looking at the window; "and if the Abbot should be obliged to return to the Monastery without obtaining the necessary intelligence, the regret might be mutual, but the inconvenience was like to be all on Sir Pierce's own side."

The hint was not thrown away.

"O, goddess of courtesy!" said the knight, "can I have so far forgotten thy behests, as to make this good prelate's ease and time a sacrifice to my vain complaints! Know, then, most worthy, and not less worshipful, that I, your poor visiter and guest, am by birth nearly bound to the Pierce of Northumbreland, whose fame is so widely blown through all parts of the world where English worth hath been known. Now, this present Earl of Northumbreland, of whom I propose to give you the brief history —"

"It is altogether unnecessary," said the Abbot; "we know him to be a good and true nobleman, and a sworn upholder of our Catholic faith, in the spite of the heretical woman who now sits upon the throne of England. And it is specially as his kinsman, and as knowing that ye partake with him in such fervent and faithful belief and adherence to our holy Mother Church, that we say to you, Sir Pierce Shafton, that ye be heartily welcome to us, and that, as we wist how, we would labour to do you good service in your extremity."

"For such kind offer I rest your most humble debtor," said Sir Pierce; "nor need I at this moment say more than that my Right Honourable Cousin of Northumbreland, having devised with me and some others, the choice and picked spirits of the age, how and by what means the worship of God, according to the Catholic Church, might be again introduced into this distracted kingdom of England, (eff as one deviseth, by the assistance of his friend, to catch and to bridle a runaway steed,) it pleased him so deeply to intrust me in those communications, that my personal safety becomes, as it were, obnoxious or complicated therewith. Nathless, as we have had sudden reason to believe, this Princess Elizabeth, who maintaineth around her a sort of counsellors skilful in tracking whatever schemes may be pursued for bringing her title into challenge, or for erecting again the discipline of the Catholic church, has obtained certain knowledge of the trains which we had laid before us, and given fire unto them. Wherefore, my Right Honourable Cousin of Northumbreland, thinking it best belike that one man should take both blame and shame for the whole, did lay the burden of all this trafficking upon my back; which load I am the rather content to bear, in that he hath always shown himself my kind and honourable kinsman, as well as that my estate, I wot not how, hath of late been somewhat insufficient to maintain the expense of those braveries, wherewith it is incumbent on us, who are chosen and selected spirits, to distinguish ourselves from the vulgar."

"So that possibly," said the Sub-Prior, "your private affairs rendered a foreign journey less inconvenient to you than it might have been to the noble earl, your right worthy cousin?"

"Yea, are right, reverend sir," answered the courtier; "for ere — you have touched the point with a needle — My coat and expenses had been indeed somewhat brisk at the late campaign, and

A tilt-yard was a term of tilting used to express the champion's being tilted at the mark, or, in other words, struck his lance straight and fair against the breast or breast of his adversary. When a knight took the lance upon, he entered a total failure in striking the point of the weapon on the object of his aim.

journeys, and the flat-opp'd citizens had shewn themselves unwilling to furnish my pocket for new gallantries for the honour of the nation, as well as for mine own peculiar glory—and, to speak truth, it was in some part the hope of seeing these matters amended that led me to desire a new world in England."

"So that the miscarriage of your public enterprise, with the derangement of your own private affairs," said the Sub-Prior, "have induced you to seek Scotland as a place of refuge?"

"Rem con, once again," said Sir Pierce; "and not without good cause, since my neck, if I remained, might have been brought within the circumstances of a halter—and so speedy was my journey northward, that I had but time to exchange my peach-coloured doublet of Genoa velvet, thickly laid over with goldsmith's work, for this cuirass, which was made by Bonamico, of Milan, and travelled northward with all speed, judging that I might do well to visit my Right Honourable Cousin of Northumberland, at one of his numerous castles. But as I posted towards Alnwick, even with the speed of a star, which, darting from its native sphere, shoots wildly downwards, I was met at Northallerton by one Henry Vaughan, a servant of my right honourable kinsman, who shewed me, that as then I might not with safety come to his presence, seeing that, in obedience to orders from his court, he was obliged to issue out letters for my incarceration."

"This," said the Abbot, "seems but hard measure on the part of your honourable kinsman."

"It might be so judged, my lord," replied Sir Pierce; "nevertheless, I will stand to the death for the honour of my Right Honourable Cousin of Northumberland. Also, Henry Vaughan gave me, from my said cousin, a good horse, and a purse of gold, with two Border-prickers, as they are called, for my guides, who conducted me, by such roads and by-paths as have never been seen since the days of Sir Lancelot and Sir Tristram, into this kingdom of Scotland, and to the house of a certain baron, or one who holds the style of such, called Julian Avenel, with whom I found such reception as the place and party could afford."

"And that," said the Abbot, "must have been right wretched; for, to judge from the appetite which Julian sheweth when absent, he hath not, I judge, over-abundant provision at home."

"You are right, sir—your reverence is in the right," continued Sir Pierce; "we had but latten far, and, what was worse, a score to clear at the departure; for though this Julian Avenel called us to no reckoning, yet he did so extravagantly admire the fashion of my poniard—the poignant being of silver exquisitely hatched, and indeed the weapon being altogether a piece of exceeding rare device and beauty—that in faith I could not for very shame's sake but pray his acceptance of it; words which he gave me not the trouble of repeating twice, before he had stuck it into his greeny buff-belt, where, credit me, reverend sir, it shewed more like a butcher's knife than a gentleman's dagger."

"So goodly a gift might at least have purchased you a few days' hospitality," said Father Eustace.

"Reverend sir," said Sir Pierce, "had I talked with him, I should have been complimented out of every remnant of my wardrobe—actually flayed, by the hospitable gods I swear it! Sir, he secured my spare doublet, and had a plunk at my galligaskins—I was enforced to heat a retreat before I was altogether unrigged. That Border knave, his serving-man, had a pluck at me too, and usurped a scarlet cassock and steel cuirass belonging to the page of my body, whom I was fain to leave behind me. In good time I received a letter from my Right Honourable Cousin, shewing me that he had written to you in my behalf, and sent to your charge two mails filled with wearing apparel—namely, my rich crimson silk doublet, slashed out and lined with cloth of gold, which I wore at the last revel, with baldric and trimmings to correspond—also two pair black silk slops, with hanging garters of carnation silk—also the flesh-coloured silken doublet, with the trimmings of fur, in which I danced the salvage man at the Gray's-Inn mummers—also,——"

"Sir Knight," said the Sub-Prior, "I pray you to spare the farther inventory of your wardrobe. The monks of Saint Mary's are no free-booting barons, and whatever part of your vestments arrived at our house, have been this day faithfully brought hither, with the mails which contained them. I may presume from what has been said, as we have indeed been given to understand by the Earl of Northumberland, that your desire is to remain for the present as unknown and as unnoticed, as may be consistent with your high worth and distinction!"

"Alas, reverend father!" replied the courtier, "a blade when it is in the scabbard cannot give lustre, a diamond when it is in the casket cannot give light, and worth, when it is couped by circumstances to obscure itself, cannot draw observation—my retreat can only attract the admiration of those few to whom circumstances permit its displaying itself."

"I conceive now, my venerable father and lord," said the Sub-Prior, "that your wisdom will assign such a course of conduct to this noble knight, as may be alike consistent with his safety, and with the weal of the community. For you wot well, that perilous strides have been made in these audacious days, to the destruction of all ecclesiastical foundations, and that our holy community has been repeatedly menaced. Hitherto they have found no flaw in our ramparts; but a party, friendly as well to the Queen of England, as to the heretical doctrines of the schismatical church, or even to worse and wilder forms of heresy, prevails now at the court of our sovereign, who dare not yield to her suffering clergy the protection she would gladly extend to them."

"My lord, and reverend sir," said the knight, "I will gladly relieve you of my presence, while ye entrust this matter at your freedom; and to speak truly, I am desirous to see in what case the chamberlain of my noble kinsman hath found my wardrobe, and how he hath packed the same, and whether it has suffered from the journey—there are four suits of as pure and elegant device as ever the fancy of a fair lady doted upon, every one having a treble, and appropriate change of ribbons, trimmings, and fringes, which, in case of need, may as it were renew each of them, and multiply the four into twelve.—There is also my new coloured riding-suit, and three cut-work shirts with falling hands — I pray you, pardon me — I must needs see how matters stand with them without farther dallying."

Thus speaking, he left the room; and the Sub-Prior, looking after him significantly, added, "Where the treasure is will the heart be also."

"Saint Mary preserve our wits!" said the Abbot, stunned with the knight's abundance of words; "were man's brains ever so stuffed with silk and broadcloth, cut-work, and I wot not what besides! And what could move the Earl of Northumberland to assume for his bosom counsellor, in matters of depth and danger, such a feather-brained coxcomb as this?"

"Had he been other than what he is, venerable father," said the Sub-Prior, "he had been less fitted for the part of scape-goat, to which his Right Honourable Cousin had probably destined him from the commencement, in case of their plot failing. I know something of this Pierce Shafton. The legitimacy of his mother's descent from the Percio family, the point on which he is most jealous, hath been called in question. If hairbrained courage, and an outrageous spirit of gallantry, can make good his pretensions to the high lineage he claims, these qualities have never been denied him. For the rest, he is one of the ruffling gallants of the time, like Rowland Yorke, Stukely, and others, who wear out their fortunes, and endanger their lives, in idle braveries, in order that they may be esteemed the only choice gallants of the time; and afterwards endeavour to repair their estate, by engaging in the desperate plots and conspiracies which wiser heads have devised. To use one of his own conceited similitudes, such courageous fools resemble hawks, which the wiser conspirator keeps hooded and blinded on his wrist until the quarry is on the wing, and who are then flown at them."

"Saint Mary," said the Abbot, "he were an evil guest to introduce into our quiet household. Our young monks make bustle enough, and more than is becoming God's servants, about their outward attire already — this knight were enough to turn their brains, from the Vestianus down to the very scullion boy."

"A worse evil might follow," said the Sub-Prior: "in these bad days, the patrimony of the church is bought and sold, forfeited and distrained as if it were the unhallowed soil appertaining to a secular baron. Think what penalty awaits us, were we convicted of harbouring a rebel to her whom they call the Queen of England! There would neither be wanting Scottish parasites to beg the lands of the foundation, nor an army from England to burn and harry the Halidome. The men of Scotland were once Scotsmen, firm and united in their love of their country, and throwing every other consideration aside when the frontier was menaced — now they are — what shall I call them — the one part French, the other part English, considering their dear native country merely as a prize-fighting stage, upon which foreigners are welcome to decide their quarrels."

"Benedicite!" replied the Abbot, "they are indeed slippery and evil times."

"And therefore," said Father Eustace, "we must walk warily — we must not, for example, bring this man — this Sir Pierce Shafton, to our house of Saint Mary's."

"But how then shall we dispose of him?" replied the Abbot; "bethink thee that he is a sufferer for holy Church's sake — that his patron, the Earl of Northumberland, hath been our friend, and that, lying so near us, he may work us weal or woe according as we deal with his kinsman."

"And, accordingly," said the Sub-Prior, "for these reasons, as well as for discharge of the great duty of Christian charity, I would protect and relieve this man. Let him not go back to Julian Avenel — that unconscionable baron would not stick to plunder the exiled stranger — Let him remain here — the spot is secluded, and if the accommodation be beneath his quality, discovery will become the less likely. We will make such means for his convenience as we can devise."

"Will he be persuaded, thinkest thou?" said the Abbot; "I will leave my own travelling bed for his repose, and send up a suitable easy-chair."

"With such easements," said the Sub-Prior, "he must not complain; and then, if threatened by any sudden danger, he can soon come down to the sanctuary, where we will harbour him in secret until means can be devised of dismissing him in safety."

"Were we not better," said the Abbot, "send him on to the court, and get rid of him at once?"

"Ay, but at the expense of our friends — this butterfly may fold his wings, and lie under cover in the cold air of Glendearg; but were he at Holyrood, he would, did his life depend on it, expand his spangled drapery in the eyes of the queen and court — Rather than fail of distinction, he would sue for love to our gracious sovereign — the eyes of all men would be upon him in the course of three short days, and the international peace of the two ends of the island endangered for a creature, who, like a silly moth, cannot abstain from fluttering round a light."

"Thou hast prevailed with me, Father Eustace," said the Abbot, "and it will go hard but I improve on thy plan — I will send up in secret, not only household stuff, but wine and wassell-bread. There is a young swankie here who shoots venison well. I will give him directions to see that the knight lacks none."

"Whatever accommodation he can have, which infernally is not a risk of discovery," said the Sub-Prior, "it is our duty to afford him."

"Nay," said the Abbot, "we will do more, and will instantly despatch a servant express to the keeper of our revery to send us such things as he may want, even this night. See it done, good father."

"I will," answered Father Eustace; "but I hear the gull clamorous for some one to trust his points." He will be fortunate if he lights on any one here who can do him the office of groom of the chamber."

"I would he would appear," said the Abbot, "for here comes the Rebecksoner with the collation — By my faith, the ride hath given me a sharp appetite!"

* The joints were the sides of cord or ribbon, (as called, because pointed with metal like the hoofs of women's shoes), which attached the doublet to the hose. They were very numerous, and required assistance to do them properly, which was called frapping.

CHAPTER XVII.

*I'll seek for other aid—Spirits, they say,
Fit round invisible, as thick as smokes
Dance in the autumn. If that spirit
Of our companion's sign can compel them,
They shall hold council with me.*

JAMES DUFF.

THE reader's attention must be recalled to Halbert Glendinning, who had left the Tower of Glendearg immediately after his quarrel with its new guest, Sir Pierce Shafton. As he walked with a rapid pace up the glen, Old Martin followed him, beseeching him to be less hasty.

"Halbert," said the old man, "you will never live to have white hair, if you take fire thus at every spark of provocation."

"And why should I wish it, old man," said Halbert, "if I am to be the butt that every fool may aim shaft of scorn against?—What avails it, old man, that you yourself move, sleep, and wake, eat thy niggard meal, and repose on thy hard pallet?—Why art thou so well pleased that the morning should call thee up to dilly toil, and the evening again lay thee down a wearied-out wretch? Were it not better sleep and wake no more, than to undergo this dull exchange of labour for insensibility and of insensibility for labour?"

"God help me," answered Martin, "there may be truth in what thou sayest—but walk slower, for my old limbs cannot keep pace with your young legs—walk slower, and I will tell you why age, though unlovely, is yet endurable."

"Speak on then," said Halbert, slackening his pace, "but remember we must seek venison to refresh the fatigues of these holy men, who will this morning have achieved a journey of ten miles; and if we reach not the Brocksburn head, we are scarce like to see an antler."

"Then know, my good Halbert," said Martin, "whom I love as my own son, that I am satisfied to live till death calls me, because my Maker wills it. Ay, and although I spend what men call a hard life, pinched with cold in winter, and burnt with heat in summer, though I feed hard and sleep hard, and am held mean and despised, yet I bethink me that were I of no use on the face of this fair creation, God would withdraw me from it."

"Thou poor old man," said Halbert, "and can such a vain conceit as this of thy fancied use, reconcile thee to a world where thou art the poorest of a part?"

"My part was nearly as poor," said Martin, "my person nearly as much despised, the day that I saved my mistress and her child from perishing in the wilderness."

"Right, Martin," answered Halbert, "there, indeed, thou didst what might be a sufficient apology for a whole life of insignificance."

"And do you account it for nothing, Halbert, that I should have the power of giving you a lesson of patience, and submission to the destinies of Providence? Methinks there is use for the gray hairs on the old scalp, were it but to instruct the green head by precept and by example."

Halbert held down his face, and remained silent for a minute or two; and then resumed his discourse: "Martin, soon thou mightst changed in me of late."

"Surely," said Martin, "I have always known you hasty, wild, and inconsiderate, rude, and prompt to speak at the valley and without reflection; but now, methinks, your bearing, without losing its natural fire, has something in it of force and dignity which it had not before. It seems as if you had fallen asleep a while, and awakened a gentleman."

"Thou canst judge, then, of noble bearing?" said Halbert.

"Surely," answered Martin, "in some sort I can; for I have travelled through court, and camp, and city, with my master Walter Avenel, although he could do nothing for me in the long run, but give me room for two score of sheep on the hill—and surely even now, while I speak with you, I feel sensible that my language is more refined than it is my wont to use, and that—though I know not the reason—the rude northern dialect, so familiar to my tongue, has given place to a more town-bred speech."

"And this change is thyself and me, thou canst by no means account for?" said young Glendinning.

"Change?" replied Martin, "by our Lady it is not so much a change which I feel, as a recalling and renewing sentiments and expressions which I had some thirty years since, ere Tibb and I set up our humble household. It is singular, that your society should have this sort of influence over me, Halbert, and that I should never have experienced it ere now."

"Thinkest thou," said Halbert, "thou seest in me aught that can raise me from this base, low, despised state, into one where I may rank with those proud men, who now despise my clownish poverty?"

Martin paused an instant, and then answered "Doubtless you may, Halbert; as broken a ship has come to land. Heard you never of Hughie Dun, who left this Halidome some thirty-five years gone by? A deliverly fellow was Hughie—could read and write like a priest, and could wield brand and buckler with the best of the riders. I mind him—the like of him was never seen in the Halidome of Saint Mary's, and so was seen of the pre-ferment that God sent him."

"And what was that?" said Halbert, his eyes sparkling with eagerness.

"Nothing less," answered Martin, "than body-servant to the Archbishop of Saint Andrews!"

Halbert's countenance fell.—"A servant—and to a priest? Was this all that knowledge and activity could raise him to?"

Martin, in his turn, looked with wistful surprise in the face of his young friend. "And to what could fortune lead him farther?" answered he. "The son of a kirk-fear is not the stuff that lords and knights are made of. Courage and school craft cannot change churl's blood into gentle blood, I trow. I have heard, forby, that Hughie Dun left a good five hundred pounds of Scots money to his only daughter, and that she married the Balfour of Pittenweem."

At this moment, and while Halbert was embarrassed with devising a suitable answer, a deer bounded across their path. In an instant the crossbow was at the youth's shoulder, the belt whistled, and the deer, after giving one bound upright, dropped dead on the green sward.

"There lies the venison our dame wanted," said Martin; "who would have thought of an out-lying stag being so low down the glen at this season?—"

And it is a hart of grease too, in full season, and three inches of fat on the bricket. Now this is all your luck, Halbert, that follows you, go where you like. Were you to put in for it, I would warrant you were made one of the Abbot's yeoman-prickers, and ride about in a purple doublet as bold as the best."

"Tush, man," answered Halbert, "I will serve the Queen or no one. Take thou care to have down the venison to the Tower, since they expect it. I will of to the moss. I have two or three bird-bolts at my girdle, and it may be I shall find wild-fowl."

He hastened his pace, and was soon out of sight. Martin paused for a moment, and looked after him. "There goes the making of a right gallant stripling, an ambition have not the spoiling of him—Serve the Queen! said he. By my faith, and she hath worse servants, from all that I e'er heard of him. And wherefore should he not keep a high head! They that ettle to the top of the ladder will at least get up some rounds. They that mint at a gown of gold, will always get a sleeve of it. But come, sir, (addressing the stag,) you shall go to Glendearg on my two legs somewhat more slowly than you were frisking it even now on your own four nimble shanks. Nay, by my faith, if you be so heavy, I will content me with the best of you, and that's the haunch and the nimbles, and e'en heave up the rest on the old oak-tree yonder, and come back for it with one of the vaulds."

While Martin returned to Glendearg with the venison, Halbert prosecuted his walk, breathing more easily since he was free of his companion. "The domestic of a proud and lazy priest—body-squire to the Archbishop of Saint Andrews," he repeated to himself; "and this, with the privilege of allying his blood with the Raile of Pittenweem, is thought a preferment worth a brave man's struggling for;—nay more a preferment which, if allowed, should crown the hopes, past, present, and to come, of the son of a Kirk-vassal! By Heaven, but that I find in me a reluctance to practise their arts of nocturnal rapine, I would rather take the jack and lance, and join with the Border-riders.—Something I will do. Here, degraded and dishonoured, I will not live the scorn of each whiffling stranger from the South, because, forsooth, he wears tinkling spurs on a tawny boot. This thing—this phantom, be it what it will, I will see it once more. Since I spoke with her, and touched her hand, thoughts and feelings have dawned on me, of which my former life had not even dreamed; but shall I, who feel my father's glen too narrow for my expanding spirit, brook to be hearded in it by this vain gowgaw of a courtier, and in the sight too of Mary Avenel? I will not stoop to it, by Heaven!"

As he spoke thus, he arrived in the sequestered glen of Corri-man-achin, as it was upon the hour of noon. A few moments he remained looking upon the fountain, and doubting in his own mind with what countenance the White Lady might receive him. She had not indeed expressly forbidden his again evoking her; but yet there was something in such a prohibition implied in the farewell, which recommended him to wait for another guide.

Halbert Glendinning did not long, however, allow himself to pause. Hardihood was the natural characteristic of his mind; and under the expansion and modification which his feelings had lately undergone, it had been augmented rather than diminished. He drew his sword, and the buskin from his foot, bowed three times with deliberation towards the fountain, and as often towards the tree, and repeated the same rhyme as formerly,—

"Thrice to the holy brake—
Thrice to the wall:—
I bid thee awake,
White Maid of Avenel!"

Noon gleams on the lake—
Moon glows on the fell—
Wake thee, O wake,
White Maid of Avenel!"

His eye was on the holly bush as he spoke the last line; and it was not without an involuntary shuddering that he saw the air betwixt his eye and that object become more dim, and condense, as it were, into the faint appearance of a form, through which, however, so thin and transparent was the first appearance of the phantom, he could discern the outline of the bush, as through a veil of fine crape. But, gradually, it darkened into a more substantial appearance, and the White Lady stood before him with displeasure on her brow. She spoke, and her speech was still song, or rather measured chant; but, as if now more familiar, it flowed occasionally in modulated blank-verse, and at other times in the lyrical measure which she had used at their former meeting.

"This is the day when the fairy kind
Sit weeping alone for their hopeless lot,
And the wood-maiden sighs to the sighing wind,
And the mer-maiden weeps in her crystal grot:
For this is the day that a deed was wrought,
In which we have neither part nor share,
For the children of clay was salvation bought,
But not for the forms of sea or air!
And ever the mortal is most forlorn,
Who meeteth our race on the Friday morn."

"Spirits!" said Halbert Glendinning boldly, "it is bootless to threaten one who holds his life at no rate. Thine anger can but slay; nor do I think thy power extendeth, or thy will stretcheth, so far. The terrors which your race produce upon others, are vain against me. My heart is hardened against fear, as by a sense of despair. If I am, as thy words infer, of a race more peculiarly the care of Heaven than thine, it is mine to call, it must be thine to answer. I am the nobler being."

As he spoke, the figure looked upon him with a fierce and ireful countenance, which, without losing the similitude of that which it usually exhibited, had a wilder and more exaggerated cast of features. The eyes seemed to contract and become more fiery, and slight convulsions passed over the face, as if it was about to be transformed into something hideous. The whole appearance assembled those faces which the imagination summons up when it is disturbed by dreams, but which do not remain under the visionary's command, and, beautiful in their first appearance, become wild and grotesque ere we can arrest them.

But when Halbert had concluded his bold speech, the White Lady stood before him with the same pale, fixed, and melancholy aspect which she usually bore. He had expected the agitation which she exhibited would conclude in some singular metamorphosis. Folding her arms on her bosom, the phantom replied,—

"During youth I for thee it is well,
Here calling me in haunted dell,
That thy heart has not quail'd,
Nor thy courage fail'd,
And that thou couldst break
The angry look
Of Her of Avenel.
Dad one imb silver,
Or an opal quiver,
Thou wert lost far o'er.
Though I am form'd from the ether blue,
And my blood is of the unblen dew,
And thou art framed of mud and dust,
'Tis thine to speak, reply I must."

"I demand of thee, then," said the youth, "by what charm it is that I am thus altered in mind and in wisdom—that I think no longer of deer or dog, of bow or bolt—that my soul spurns the bounds of this obscure glen—that my blood boils at an insult from one by whose stirrup I would some days since have run for a whole summer's morn, contented and honoured by the notice of a single word! Why to I now seek to mate me with princes, and knights, and nobles!—Am I the same, who but yesterday, as it were, slumbered in contented obscurity, but who am to-day awakened to glory and ambition!—Speak—tell me, if thou canst, the meaning of this change!—Am I spell-bound!—or have I till now been under the influence of a spell, that I feel as another being, yet am conscious of remaining the same! Speak and tell me, is it to thy influence that the change is owing!"

The White Lady replied,—

"A mightier wizard far than I
Wields o'er the universe his power,
Him owns the eagle in the sky,
The turtle in the bow.
Changeful in shape, yet mightiest still,
He wields the heart of man at will,
From ill to good, from good to ill,
In cot and castle-tower."

"Speak not thus darkly," said the youth, colouring so deeply, that face, neck, and hands, were in a sanguine glow; "make me sensible of thy purpose."

The spirit answered,—

"Ask thy heart, whose secret cell
Is fill'd with Mary Avenel!
Ask thy pride, why scornful look
In Mary's view it will not brook?
Ask it, why thou seek'st to rise
Among the mighty and the wise?
Why thou aspir'st thy lofty lot?
Why thy passions are forgot?
Why thou would'st in bloody strife
Mend thy luck or lose thy life?
Ask thy heart, and it shall tell,
Sighing from its secret cell,
'Tis for Mary Avenel."

"Tell me, then," said Halbert, his cheek still deeply crimsoned, "alas who hast said to me that which I dared not say to myself, by what means shall I urge my passion—by what means make it known?"

The White Lady replied,—

"Do not ask me;
On doubts like these thou canst not task me
We only show the passing show
Of human passion's ebb and flow;
And view the patient's idle glance
As darkness thro' the visionary dance,
When dream'd dreams, floating bright,
Gaze o'er the scene of light,
And seem to see their glimmer'd gleams,
But find no influence from their beams."

"Yet thine own fate," replied Halbert, "unless men greatly err, is linked with that of mortals?"

The phantom answered,—

"By the mysterious link'd, our fated race
Holds strange connection with the sons of men.
The star that rose upon the House of Avenel,
When Norman Urie first assumed the name,
That star, when culminating in its orbit,
Shot from its sphere a drop of diamond dew,
And this bright fell resented it—and a Spirit
Edg'd from the fountain, and her date of life
Hath to existence with the House of Avenel,
And with the star that rules it."

"Speak yet more plainly," answered young Glendinning; "of this I can understand nothing. Say, what hath forged thy wretched link of destiny with the House of Avenel! Say, especially, what fate now overhangs that house?"

The White Lady replied,—

"Look on my girdle—on this thread of gold—
'Tis fine as web of lightest gossamer,
And, but there is a spell on 't, would not bind,
Light as they are, the folds of my thin robe.
But when 'twas don'd, it was a massive chain,
Such might bind the champion of the Jews,
Even when his locks were longest—it hath divided,
Hath sunder'd in its substance and its strength,
As sunk the greatness of the House of Avenel.
When this frail thread given way, I to the elements
Reigns the principles of life they lent me
Ask me no more of this!—the stars forbid it."

"Then canst thou read the stars," answered the youth, "and mayest tell me the fate of my passion, if thou canst not aid it?"

The White Lady again replied,—

"Dim burns the once bright star of Avenel, Dim as the beacon when the storm is nigh,
And the o'er-weathered wander leaves the light-house,
There is an influence sorrowful and fearful,
That dogs its downward course. Dismal passion,
Fierce hate and rivalry, are in the aspect
That lowers upon its fortunes."

"And rivalry!" repeated Glendinning; "it is then as I feared!—But shall that English silk-worm presume to board me in my father's house, and in the presence of Mary Avenel!—Give me to meet him, spirit,—give me to do away the vain distinction of rank on which he refuses me the combat. Place us on equal terms, and gleam the stars with what aspect they will, the sword of my father shall control their influences."

She answered as promptly as before,—

"Complain not of me, child of day,
If to thy harm I yield the way.
We, who near thy sphere above,
Know not nought of hate or love;
As will or wisdom rules thy mood,
My gifts to evil turn, or good."

"Give me to redeem my honour," said Halbert Glendinning—"give me to return on my proud rival the insults he has thrown off me, and let the rest fare as it will. If I cannot revenge my wrong, I shall sleep quiet, and know nought of my disgrace."

The phantom fail'd not to reply,—

"When fierce Shafon boasts his high,
Let this token meet his eye.
The sun is winking from the dell,
Thy wish is granted—fare thee well!"

As the White Lady spoke or chanted these last words, she smil'd from her looks a silver beaming around which they were twisted, and gave it to Halbert Glendinning; then shaking her dishevelled hair till it fell like a veil around her, the outlines of her form gradually became as diffuse as her flowing tresses, her countenance grew pale as the moon in her first quarter, her features became indistinguishable, and she melted into the air.

Habit inures us to wonders; but the youth did not find himself alone by the fountain without experiencing, though in a much less degree, the revelation of spirits which he had felt upon the phantom's former disappearance. A doubt strongly pressed upon his mind, whether it were safe to avail himself of the gifts of a spirit which did not even pretend to belong to the class of angels, and might, for aught he knew, have a much worse lineage than that which she was pleased to avow. "I will speak of it," he said, "to Edward, who is clerically learned, and will tell me what I should do. And yet, no—Edward is scrupulous and wary.—I will prove the effect of her gift on Sir Piercie Shafton if he again braves me, and by the issue, I will be myself a sufficient judge whether there is danger in resorting to her counsel. Home, then, home—and we shall soon learn whether that home shall longer hold me; for not again will I brook insult, with my father's sword by my side, and Mary for the spectator of my disgrace."

CHAPTER XVIII.

I give thee eightpence a-day.
And my bow shall thou bear,
And over all the north country,
I make thee the chief ryder.
And I thirtypence a-day, quoth the queen;
By God and by my fay,
Come fetch thy payment when thou wilt,
No man shall say thee nay.

William of Cloudesley.

THE manners of the age did not permit the inhabitants of Glendurg to partake of the collation which was placed in the apence of that ancient tower, before the Lord Abbot and his attendants, and Sir Piercie Shafton. Dame Glendinning was excluded, both by inferiority of rank and by sex, for (though it was a rule often neglected) the Superior of Saint Mary's was debarred from taking his meals in female society. To Mary Avenel the latter, and to Edward Glendinning the former, incapacity attached; but it pleased his lordship to require their presence in the apartment, and to say sundry kind words to them upon the ready and hospitable reception which they had afforded him.

The smoking haunch now stood upon the table; a napkin, white as snow, with due reverence, tucked under the chin of the Abbot by the Refectory: and noight was wanting to commence the repast, save the presence of Sir Piercie Shafton, who at length appeared, glittering like the sun, in a carnation-velvet doublet, slashed and puffed out with cloth of silver, his hat of the newest block, surrounded by a husband of goldsmith's work, while around his neck he wore a collar of gold, set with rubies and topazes so rich, that it vindicated his anxiety for the safety of his baggage from being deposited upon his love of mere finery. This gorgeous collar or chain, resembling those worn by the knights of the highest orders of chivalry, fell down on his breast, and terminated in a medallion.

"We waited for Sir Piercie Shafton," said the Abbot, hastily assuming his place in the great chair which the Kitchener advanced to the table with ready hand.

"I pray your pardon, reverend father, and my good lord," replied that pink of courtesy; "I did but wait to cast my riding along, and to transmute myself into some civil form meet for this worshipful company."

"I cannot but praise your gallantry, Sir Knight," said the Abbot, "and your prudence also, for choosing the fitting time to appear thus adorned. Certain had that goodly chain been visible in some part of your late progress, there was risk that the lawful owner might have parted company therewith."

"This chain, said your reverence?" answered Sir Piercie; "surely it is but a toy, a trifle, a slight thing which shews but poorly with this doublet—marry, when I wear that of the murrey-coloured double-piled Genoa velvet, puffed out with cyprus, the gems, being relieved and set off by the darker and more grave ground of the stuff, shew like stars giving a lustre through dark clouds."

"Nothing doubt ye," said the Abbot, "but I pray you to sit down at the board."

But Sir Piercie had now got into his element, and was not easily interrupted—"I own," he continued, "that slight as the toy is, it might perchance have had some captivation for Julian—Santa Maria!" said he, interrupting himself; "what was I about to say, and my fair and beauteous Protection, or shall I rather term her my Discretion, here in presence!—Indiscreet hath it been in your Affability, O most lovely Discretion, to suffer a stray word to have broke out of the pen-fold of his mouth, that might overleap the fence of civility, and trespass on the manor of decorum."

"Marry!" said the Abbot, somewhat impatiently, "the greatest discretion that I can see in the matter is, to eat your victuals being hot—Father Eustace, say the Benedicite, and cut up the haunch."

The Sub-Prior readily obeyed the first part of the Abbot's injunction, but paused upon the second—"It is Friday, most reverend," he said in Latin, desirous that the hint should escape, if possible, the ears of the stranger.

"We are travellers," said the Abbot, in reply, "and viatoribus licet—You know the canon—a traveller must eat: what food his hard fate sets before him.—I grant you all a dispensation to eat flesh this day, conditionally that you, brethren, say the Confiteor at curfew time, that the knights give alms to his ability, and that all and each of you fast from flesh on each day within the next month that shall seem most convenient; wherefore fall to and eat your food with cheerful countenance, and you, Father Refectory, de missis."

While the Abbot was thus stating the conditions on which his indulgence was granted, he had already half finished a slice of the noble haunch, and now washed it down with a flagon of rhenish, modestly tempered with water.

"Well it is said," he observed, as he required from the Refectory another slice, "that rhenish is its own reward; for though this is but human fare, and hastily prepared, and eaten in a poor chamber, I do not remember me of having had such an appetite since I was a simple brother in the Abbey of Dundrennan, and was wont to labour in the garden from morning until noon, when our Abbot struck the Cymbalum. Then would I enter keen with hunger, paroled with thirst, (de mili cibus quare, et moris sit) and partake with appetite of whatever was set before us, according to our rule; feast or fast-day, carissae or penitentie, was the same to me. I had no stomach complaints then, which now crave both the aid of wine and choice cookery, to render my food acceptable to my palate, and easy of digestion."

"It may be, holy father," said the Sub-Prior, "an occasional ride to the extremity of Saint Mary's patrimony, may have the same happy effect on your health as the air of the garden at Dundrennan."

"Perchance, with our patroness's blessing, such progresses may advantage us," said the Abbot; "having an especial eye that our venison is carefully killed by some woodsman that is master of his craft."

"If the Lord Abbot will permit me," said the Kitchener, "I think the best way to assure his lordship on that important point, would be to retain as a yeoman-pricker, or deputy-ranger, the eldest son of this good woman, Dame Glendinning, who is here to wait upon us. I should know by mine office what belongs to killing of game, and I can safely pronounce, that never saw I, or any other coquinarius, a bolt so justly shot. It has cloven the very heart of the buck."

"What speak you to us of one good shot, father?" said Sir Piercie; "I would advise you that such no more maketh a shooter, than doth one swallow make a summer—I have seen this springald of whom you speak, and if his hand can send forth his shafts as boldly as his tongue doth utter presumptuous speeches, I will own him as good an archer as Robin Hood."

"Marry," said the Abbot, "and it is fitting we know the truth of this matter from the dame herself; for ill advised were we to give way to any rashness in this matter, whereby the bounties which Heaven and our patroness provide might be unskillfully mangled, and rendered unfit for worthy men's use.—Stand forth, therefore, Dame Glendinning, and tell to us, as thy liege lord and spiritual Superior, using plainness and truth, without either fear or favour, as being a matter wherein we are deeply interested, Dost this son of thine use his bow as well as the Father Kitchener avows to us?"

"So please your noble fatherhood," answered Dame Glendinning, with a deep curtsy, "I should know somewhat of archery by my cost, seeing my husband—God ansooize him!—was slain in the field of Pinkie with an arrow-shot, while he was fighting under the Kirk's banner, as became a liege vassal of the Hallidome. He was a valiant man, please your reverence, and an honest; and saying that he loved a bit of venison, and shifted for his living at a time as Border-men will sometimes do, I wot not of him that he did. And yet, though I have paid for mase after mase to the master of a forty shilling, besides a quarter of wheat and four fitches of rye, I can have no venison, yet that he has been delivered from purgatory."

"Dame," said the Lord Abbot, "this shall be taken into heedfully; and since thy husband fell, as thou sayest, in the Kirk's quarrel, and under her banner, rely upon it that we will have him out of purgatory forthwith—that is, always provided he be there.—But it is not of thy husband whom we now devise to speak, but of thy son; not of a shot Scotsman, but of a shot deer.—Wherefore I say, answer me to the point, is thy son a practised archer, ay or no?"

"Alack! my reverend lord," replied the widow, "and my craft would be better tilted, if I could answer your reverence that he is not.—Practised archer!—marry, holy sir, I would he would practise something else—cross-bow and long-bow, hand-gun and hackbut, falconet and saker, he can shoot with them all. And if it would please this right honourable gentleman, our guest, to hold out his hat at the distance of a hundred yards, our Halbert shall send shaft, bolt, or bullet through it, (so that right honourable gentleman averre not, but hold out steady,) and I will forfeit a quarter of barley if he touch but a knot of his ribands. I have seen our old Martin do as much, and so has our right reverend the Sub-Prior, if he be pleased to remember it."

"I am not like to forget it, dame," said Father Eustace; "for I knew not which most to admire, the composure of the young marksman, or the steadiness of the old mark. Yet I presume not to advise Sir Piercie Shafton to subject his valuable beaver, and yet more valuable person, to such a risk, unless it should be his own special pleasure."

"Be assured it is not," said Sir Piercie Shafton, something hastily; "be well assured, holy father, that it is not. I dispute not the lad's qualities, for which your reverence vouches. But bows are but wood, strings are but flax, or the silk-worm's excrement at best; archers are but men, fingers may slip, eyes may dazzle, the blindest may hit the butt, the best marker may shoot a bow's length beside. Therefore will we try no perilous experiments."

"Be that as you will, Sir Piercie," said the Abbot; "meantime we will name this youth bow-bearer in the forest granted to us by good King David, that the chase might recreate our wearied spirits, the flesh of the deer improve our poor commons, and the hides cover the books of our library, thus tending at once to the sustenance of body and soul."

"Kneel down, woman, kneel down," said the Refectiener and the Kitchener, with one voice, to Dame Glendinning, "and kiss his lordship's hand, for the grace which he has granted to thy son."

They then, as if they had been chanting, the service and the responses, set off in a sort of dactyl, enumerating the advantages of the situation.

"A green gown and a pair of leathern galligaskins every Pentecost," said the Kitchener.

"Four marks by the year at Candlemas," answered the Refectiener.

"An hoghead of ale at Martinmas, of the double-strike, and single ale at pleasure, as he shall agree with the Cellarer."

"Who is a reasonable man," said the Abbot, "and will encourage an active servant of the cell-vant."

"A mase of broth and a dole of mutton or beef, at the Kitchener's, on each high holiday," sustained the Kitchener.

"The gang of two cows and a palfrey on our Lady's meadow," answered his brother officer.

"An ox-hide to make bukkins of yearly, because of the brambles," echoed the Kitchener.

"And various other perquisites, quæ nund præscribere longum," said the Abbot, summing, with his own lordly voice, the advantages attached to the office of conventual bow-hearer.

Dame Glendinning was all this while on her knees, her head mechanically turning from the one church-officer to the other, which, as they stood one on each side of her, had much the appearance of a figure moved by clock-work, and so soon as they were silent, most devoutly did she kiss the munificent hand of the Abbot. Conscious, however, of Halbert's intractability in some points, she could not help qualifying her grateful and reiterated thanks for the Abbot's bountiful proffer, with a hope that Halbert would see his wisdom, and accept of it.

"How," said the Abbot, bending his brows, "accept of it!—Woman, is thy son in his right wits?"

Elspeth, stunned by the tone in which this question was asked, was altogether unable to reply to it. Indeed, any answer she might have made could hardly have been heard, as it pleased the two office-bearers of the Abbot's table again to recommence their alternate dialogue.

"Refuse!" said the Kitchener.

"Refuse!" answered the Refectiener, echoing the other's word in a tone of still louder astonishment.

"Refuse four marks by the year!" said the one.

"Ale and beer—broth and nuton—cow's-grass and palfrey's!" shouted the Kitchener.

"Gown and galligaskins!" responded the Refectiener.

"A moment's patience, my brethren," answered the Sub-Prior, "and let us not be thus astonished before cause is afforded of our amazement. This good dame best knoweth the temper and spirit of her son—this much I can say, that it lieth not towards letters or learning, of which I have in vain endeavoured to instil into him some tincture. Nevertheless, he is a youth of no common spirit, but much like those (in my weak judgment) whom God raises up among a people when he meaneth that their deliverance shall be wrought out with strength of hand and valour of heart. Such men we have seen marked by a waywardness, and even an obstinacy of character, which hath appeared intractability and stupidity to those among whom they walked and were conversant, until the very opportunity hath arrived in which it was the will of Providence that they should be the fitting instrument of great things."

"Now, in good time hast thou spoken, Father Eustace," said the Abbot; "and we will see this swankie before we decide upon the means of employing him.—How say you, Sir Pierce Shafton, is it not the court fashion to suit the man to the office, and not the office to the man?"

"So please your reverence and lordship," answered the Northumbrian knight, "I do partly, that is, in some sort, subscribe to what your wisdom hath delivered.—Nevertheless, under reverence of the Sub-Prior, we do not look for gallant feats and national deliverers in the bosom of the green common people. Credit me, that if there be some flashes of martial spirit about this young person, which I am not called upon to dispute, (though I have seldom seen that presumption and arrogance were made good upon the upshot by deed and action,) yet still these will prove insufficient to distinguish him, save in his own limited and lowly sphere—even as the glowworm, which makes a goodly show among the grass of the field, would be of little avail if deposited in a beacon-grate."

"Now, in good time," said the Sub-Prior, "and here comes the young huntsman to speak for himself;" for, being placed opposite to the window, he could observe Halbert as he ascended the little mound on which the tower was situated.

"Summon him to our presence," said the Lord Abbot; and with an obedient start the two attendant monks went off with emulous alertness. Dame Glendinning sprung away at the same moment, partly to gain an instant to recommend obedience to her son, partly to prevail with him to change his apparel before coming in presence of the Abbot. But the Kitchener and Refectiener, both speaking at once, had already seized each an arm, and were leading Halbert in triumph into the apartment, so that she could only ejaculate, "His will be done; but as he had but had on him his Sunday's hose!"

Limited and humble as this desire was, the fates did not grant it, for Halbert Glendinning was hurried into the presence of the Lord Abbot and his party without a word of explanation, and without a moment's time being allowed to assume his holiday hose, which, in the language of the time, implied both breeches and stockings.

Yet though thus suddenly presented amid the centre of all eyes, there was something in Halbert's appearance which commanded a certain degree of respect from the company into which he was so unceremoniously intruded, and the greater part of whom were disposed to consider him with hauteur if not with absolute contempt. But his appearance and reception we must devote to another chapter.

CHAPTER XIX.

Now choose thee, gallant, betwixt wealth and honour;
There lies the path, in sun to bear thee through
The dance of youth, and the turmoil of manhood,
Yet leave enough for age's chimney-corner;
But an' thou grasp to it, farewell ambition!
Farewell each hope of bettering thy condition,
And raising thy low rank above the churls
That till the earth for bread.

Old Play.

It is necessary to dwell for some brief space on the appearance and demeanour of young Glendinning, ere we proceed to describe his interview with the Abbot of Saint Mary's, at this momentous crisis of his life.

Halbert was now about nineteen years old, tall and active rather than strong, yet of that hardy conformation of limb and show, which promises great strength when the growth shall be complete, and the system confirmed. He was perfectly well made, and like most men who have that advantage, possessed a grace and natural ease of manner and carriage, which prevented his being taken being the distinguished part of his external appearance. It was not until you had compared his stature with that of those amongst or near to whom he stood, that you became sensible that the young Glendinning was upwards of six feet high. In the combination of unusual height with perfect symmetry, ease, and grace of carriage, the young heir of Glendearg, notwithstanding his rustic birth and education, had greatly the advantage even of Sir Pierce Shafton himself, whose stature was lower, and his limbs, though there was no particular point as object to, were on the whole less exactly proportioned. On the other hand, Sir Pierce's very handsome countenance afforded him as decided an advantage over the Scotsman, as regularity of features and brilliancy of complexion could give over traits which were rather strongly marked than beautiful, and upon whose complexion the "akey influences," to which he was constantly exposed, had blended the red and white into the purely nut-brown hue, which coloured alike cheeks, neck, and forehead, and blushed only in a darker glow upon the former. — Halbert's eyes supplied a marked and distinguished part of his physiognomy. They were large and of a hazel colour, and sparkled in moments of animation with such uncommon brilliancy, that it seemed as if they actually emitted light. Nature had closely curled the locks of dark-brown hair, which relieved and set off the features, such as we have described them, displaying a bold and animated disposition, much more than might have been expected from his situation, or from his previous manners, which hitherto had seemed bashful, homely, and awkward.

Halbert's dress was certainly not of that description which sets off to the best advantage a presence of itself prepossessing. His jerkin and hose were of coarse rustic cloth, and his cap of the same. A belt round his waist served at once to sustain the broadsword which we have already mentioned, and to hold five or six arrows and pike-bolts, which were stuck into it on the right side, along with a large knife hilted with buck-horn, or, as it was then called, a dudgeon-dagger. To complete his dress, we must notice his loose buskins of deer-hide, formed so as to draw up on the leg as high as the knee, or at pleasure to be thrust down lower than the calves. These were generally used at the period by such as either had their principal occupation, or their chief pleasure, in silvan sports, as they served to protect the legs against the rough and tangled thickets into which the pursuit of game frequently led them. — And these trifling particulars complete his external appearance.

It is not so easy to do justice to the manner in which young Glendinning's soul spoke through his eyes when unshorn so suddenly into the company of those whom his earliest education had taught him to treat with awe and reverence. The degree of embarrassment, which his demeanour evinced, had nothing in it either meanly servile, or utterly disconcerted. It was no more than became a generous and ingenuous youth of a bold spirit, but totally inexperienced, who should for the first time be called upon to think and act for himself in such society and under such disadvantageous circumstances. There was not in his carriage a grain either of forwardness or of timidity, which a friend could have wished away.

He lifted and kissed the Abbot's hand, then rose, and making two passes, bowed respectfully to the whole assembly, smiling gently as he received an encouraging nod from the Sub-Prior, to whom alone he was personally known, and blushing as he encountered the anxious look of Mary Avenel, who beheld with painful interest the sort of ordeal to which her foster-brother was about to be subjected. Recovering from the transient flurry of spirits into which the encounter of her glance had thrown him, he stood composedly awaiting till the Abbot should express his pleasure.

The ingenuous expression of countenance, noble form, and graceful attitude of the young man, failed not to prepossess in his favour the churchmen in whose presence he stood. The Abbot looked round, and exchanged a gracious and approving glance with his counsellor Father Eustace, although probably the appointment of a ranger, or bow-bearer, was one in which he might have been disposed to proceed without the Sub-Prior's advice, were it but to shew his own free agency. But the good mien of the young man now in nomination was such, that he rather hastened to exchange congratulation on meeting with so proper a subject of promotion, than to indulge any other feeling. Father Eustace enjoyed the pleasure which a well-constituted mind derives from seeing a benefit light on a deserving object; for as he had not seen Halbert since circumstances had made so material a change in his manner and feelings, he scarce doubted that the proffered appointment would, notwithstanding his mother's uncertainty, suit the disposition of a youth who had appeared devoted to woodland sports, and a foe alike to sedentary or settled occupation of any kind. The Refectory and Kitchen were so well pleased with Halbert's prepossessing appearance, that they seemed to think that the salary, emoluments, and perquisites, the dole, the grasing, the gown, and the galligaskins, could scarce be better bestowed than on the active and graceful figure before them.

Sir Pierce Shafton, whether from being more deeply engaged in his own cogitations, or that the subject was unworthy of his notice, did not seem to partake of the general feeling of approbation excited by the young man's presence. He sat with his eyes half shut, and his arms folded, appearing to be wrapped in contemplations of a nature deeper than those arising out of the scene before him. But, notwithstanding his seeming abstraction and absence of mind, there was a flutter of vanity in Sir Pierce's very handsome countenance, an occasional change of posture from one striking attitude (or what he conceived to be such) to another, and an occasional stolen glance at the female part of the company, to spy how far he succeeded in riveting their attention, which gave a marked advantage, in comparison, to the less regular and more harsh features of Halbert Glendinning, with their composed, manly, and deliberate expression of mental fortitude.

Of the females belonging to the family of Glendearg, the Miller's daughter alone had her mind sufficiently at leisure to admire, from time to time, the graceful attitudes of Sir Pierce Shafton; for both Mary Avenel and Dame Glendinning were waiting in anxiety and apprehension the answer which Halbert was to return to the Abbot's proposal, and anxiously anticipating the consequences of his probable refusal. The conduct of his brother Edward, for a lad constitutionally shy, respectful, and even timid, was at once affectionate and noble. This younger son of Dame Elspeth had stood unnoticed in a corner, after the Abbot, at the request of the Sub-Prior, had honoured him with some passing notice, and asked him a few commonplace questions about his progress in Donatus, and in the Promptuarium Parvulorum, without waiting for the answers. From his corner he now glided round to his brother's side, and keeping a little behind him, slid his right hand into the huntsman's left, and by a gentle pressure, which Halbert instantly and ardently returned, expressed at once his interest in his situation, and his resolution to share his fate.

The group was thus arranged, when, after the pause of two or three minutes, which he employed in slowly sipping his cup of wine, in order that he might enter on his proposal with due and deliberate dignity, the Abbot at length expressed himself thus:—

"My son—we your lawful Superior, and the Abbot, under God's favour, of the community of Saint Mary's, have heard of your manifold good gifts—a-hem—especially touching wood-craft—and the huntsman-like fashion in which you strike your game, truly and as a yeoman should, not abusing Heaven's good benefits by spoiling the flesh, as is too often seen in careless rangers—a-hem." He made here a pause, but observing that Glendinning only replied to his compliment by a bow, he proceeded,—"My son, we commend your modesty; nevertheless, we will that thou shouldst speak freely to us touching that which we have premeditated for thine advancement, meaning to confer on thee the office of bow-bearer and ranger, as well over the chases and forests wherein our house hath privilege by the gifts of pious kings and nobles, whose souls now enjoy the fruits of their bounties to the church, as to those which belong to us in exclusive right of property and perpetuity. Thy knee, my son—that we may, with our own hand, and without loss of time, induct thee into office."

"Kneel down," said the Kitchener on the one side; and "Kneel down," said the Refectory on the other.

But Halbert Glendinning remained standing.

"Were it to shew gratitude and good-will for your reverend lordship's noble offer, I could not," he said, "kneel low enough, or remain long enough kneeling. But I may not kneel to take investiture of your noble gift, my lord Abbot, being a man determined to seek my fortune otherwise."

"How is that, sir?" said the Abbot, knitting his brows; "do I hear you speak aright? and do you, a born vassal of the Halidome, at the moment when I am destining to you such a noble expression of my good-will, propose exchanging my service for that of any other?"

"My lord," said Halbert Glendinning, "it grieves me to think you hold me capable of undervaluing your gracious offer, or of exchanging your service for another. But your noble proffer doth but hasten the execution of a determination which I have long since formed."

"Ay, my son," said the Abbot, "is it indeed so?—right early have you learned to form resolutions without consulting those on whom you naturally depend. But what may it be, this sagacious resolution, if I may so far pray you?"

"To hold up to my brother and mother," answered Halbert, "mine interest in the fate of Glendearg, lately possessed by my father, Simon Glendinning: and having prayed your lordship to be the same kind and generous master to them, that your predecessors, the venerable Abbots of Saint Mary's, have been to my fathers in time past; for myself, I am determined to seek my fortune where I may best find it."

Dame Glendinning here ventured, imboldened by maternal anxiety, to break silence with an exclamation of "O my son!" Edward, clinging to his brother's side, half spoke, half whispered, a similar ejaculation, of "Brother! brother!"

The Sub-Prior took up the matter in a tone of grave reprehension, which, as he conceived, the interest he had always taken in the family of Glendearg required at his hand.

"Willful young man," he said, "what folly can urge thee to push back the hand that is stretched out to aid thee! What visionary aim hast thou, before thee, that can compensate for the decay and sufficient independence which thou art now rejecting with scorn!"

"Four marks by the year, duly and truly," said the Kitchener.

"Cow's-grass, doublet, and galligaskins," responded the Refectory.

"Peace, my brethren," said the Sub-Prior; "and may it please your lordship, venerable father, upon my petition, to allow this headstrong youth a day for consideration, and it shall be my part so to indoctrinate him, as to convince him what is due on this occasion to your lordship, and to his family, and to himself."

"Your kindness, reverend father," said the youth, "craves my dearest thanks—it is the continuance of a long train of benevolence towards me, for which I give you my gratitude, for I have nothing else to offer. It is my mishap, not your fault, that your intentions have been frustrated. But my present resolution is fixed and unalterable. I cannot accept the generous offer of the Lord Abbot; my fate calls me elsewhere, to scenes where I shall end it or mend it."

"By our Lady," said the Abbot, "I think the youth be mad indeed—or that you, Sir Pierce, judged of him most truly, when you prophesied that he would prove unfit for the promotion we designed him—it may be you knew something of this wayward humour before!"

"By the mass, not I," answered Sir Pierce Shafton, with his usual indifference. "I but judged of him by his birth and breeding; for seldom doth a good hawk come out of a kite's egg."

"Thou art thyself a kite, and kestrel to boot," replied Halbert Glendinning, without a moment's hesitation.

"This in our presence, said to a man of worship!" said the Abbot, the blood rushing to his face.

"Yes, my lord," answered the youth; "even in your presence I return to this gay man's face, the careless dishonour which he has flung on my name. My brave father, who fell in the cause of his country, demands that justice at the hands of his son!"

"Unmannered boy!" said the Abbot.

"Nay, my good lord," said the knight, "praying pardon for the coarse interruption, let me suggest you notice be worth with this rustic!—From the north wind shall we soon puff one of your fellows from its perch, as swift which I have to do."

and inconsiderate as the churchish speech of an untaught churl, shall move the spleen of Pierce Shafton."

"Proud as you are, Sir Knight," said Halbert, "in your imagined superiority, be not too confident that you cannot be moved."

"Faith, by nothing that thou canst urge," said Sir Pierce.

"Knowest thou then this token?" said young Glendinning, offering to him the silver bodkin which he had received from the White Lady.

Never was such an instant change, from the most contemptuous serenity, to the most furious state of passion, as that which Sir Pierce Shafton exhibited. It was the difference between a cannon lying quiet in its embrasure, and the same gun when touched by the linstock. He started up, every limb quivering with rage, and his features so inflamed and agitated by passion, that he more resembled a demoniac, than a man under the regulation of reason. He clenched both his fists, and thrusting them forward, offered them furiously at the face of Glendinning, who was even himself startled at the frantic state of excitation which his action had occasioned. The next moment he withdrew them, struck his open palm against his own forehead, and rushed out of the room in a state of indescribable agitation. The whole matter had been so sudden, that no person present had time to interfere.

When Sir Pierce Shafton had left the apartment, there was a moment's pause of astonishment; and then a general demand that Halbert Glendinning should instantly explain by what means he had produced such a violent change in the deportment of the English cavalier.

"I did nought to him," answered Halbert Glendinning, "but what you all saw—I am I to answer for his fantastic freaks of humour?"

"Boy," said the Abbot, in his most authoritative manner, "these subterfuges shall not avail thee. This is not a man to be driven from his temperament without some sufficient cause. That cause was given by thee, and must have been known to thee. I command thee, as thou wilt save thyself from worse measure, to explain to me by what means thou hast moved our friend thus. We choose not that our vassals shall drive our guests mad in our very presence, and we remain ignorant of the means whereby that purpose is effected."

"So may it please your reverence, I did but shew him this token," said Halbert Glendinning, delivering it at the same time to the Abbot, who looked at it with much attention, and then, shaking his head, gravely delivered it to the Sub-Prior, without speaking a word.

Father Eustace looked at the mysterious token with some attention; and then addressing Halbert in a stern and severe voice, said, "Young man, if thou wouldst not have us suspect thee of some strange double-dealing in this matter, let us instantly know whence thou hadst this token, and how it possessed an influence on Sir Pierce Shafton?"—It would have been extremely difficult for Halbert, thus hard pressed, to have either evaded or answered so puzzling a question. To have avowed the truth might, in those times, have occasioned his being burnt at a stake, although, in our day, his confession would have only gained for him the credit of a liar beyond all national credibility. He was fortunately relieved by the return of Sir Pierce Shafton himself, whose ear caught, as he entered, the sound of the Sub-Prior's question.

Without waiting until Halbert Glendinning replied, he came forward, whispering to him as he passed, "Be secret—thou shalt have the satisfaction thou hast dared to seek for."

When he returned to his place, there were still marks of discomposure on his brow; but, becoming apparently collected and calm, he looked around him, and apologized for the indecorum of which he had been guilty, which he ascribed to sudden and severe indisposition. All were silent, and looked on each other with some surprise.

The Lord Abbot gave orders for all to retire from the apartment, save himself, Sir Pierce Shafton, and the Sub-Prior. "And have an eye," he added, "on that bold youth, that he escape not; for if he hath practised by charm, or otherwise, on the health of our worshipful guest, I swear by the alb and mitre which I wear, that his punishment shall be most exemplary."

"My lord and venerable father," said Halbert, bowing respectfully, "fear not but that I will abide my doom. I think you will best learn from the worshipful knight himself, what is the cause of his distemperature, and how alight my share in it has been."

"Be assured," said the knight, without looking up, however, while he spoke, "I will satisfy the Lord Abbot."

With these words the company retired, and with them young Glendinning.

When the Abbot, the Sub-Prior, and the English knight were left alone, Father Eustace, contrary to his custom, could not help speaking the first. "Expeund unto us, noble sir," he said, "by what mysterious means the production of this simple toy could so far move your spirit, and overcome your patience, after you had shewn yourself proof to all the provocation offered by this self-sufficient and singular youth?"

The knight took the silver bodkin from the good father's hand, looked at it with great composure, and, having examined it all over, returned it to the Sub-Prior, saying at the same time, "In truth venerable father, I cannot but marvel, that the wisdom implied alike in your silver hairs, and in your eminent rank, should, like a babbling hound, (excuse the similitude,) open thus loudly on a false scent. I were, indeed, more slight to be moved than the leaves of the aspen-tree, which wag at the least breath of heaven, could I be touched by such a trifle as this, which in no way concerns me more than if the same quantity of silver were stricken into so many groats. Truth is, that from my youth upward, I have been subjected to such a malady as you saw me visited with even now—a cruel and searching pain, which goeth through nerve and bone, even as a good brand in the hands of a brave soldier sheers through limb and sinew—but it passes away speedily, as you yourselves may judge."

"Still," said the Sub-Prior, "this will not account for the youth offering to you this piece of silver, as a token by which you were to understand something, and, as we must needs conjecture, something disagreeable."

"Your reverence is in conjecture what you will," said Sir Pierce; "but I cannot pretend to lay your judgment on the right scent when I see it at sight."

I hope I am not liable to be called upon to account for the foolish actions of a malapert boy?"

"Assuredly," said the Sub-Prior, "we shall prosecute no inquiry which is disagreeable to our guest. Nevertheless," said he, looking to his Superior, "this chance may, in some sort, alter the plan your lordship had formed for your worshipful guest's residence for a brief term in this tower, as a place alike of secrecy and of security; both of which, in the terms which we now stand on with England, are circumstances to be desired."

"In truth," said the Abbot, "and the doubt is well thought on, were it as well removed; for I scarce know in the Halligome so fitting a place of refuge, yet see I not how to recommend it to our worshipful guest, considering the unrestrained petulance of this headstrong youth."

"Tush! reverend sire,—what would you make of me?" said Sir Piercie Shafton. "I protest, by mine honour, I would abide in this house were I to choose. What! I take no exceptions at the youth for shewing a flash of spirit, though the spark may light on mine own head. I honour the lad for it. I protest I will abide here, and he shall aid me in striking down a deer. I must needs be friends with him, as he be such a shot; and we will speedily send down to my lord Abbot a buck of the first head, killed so artificially as shall satisfy even the reverend Kitchener."

This was said with such apparent ease and good-humour, that the Abbot made no farther observation on what had passed, but proceeded to acquaint his guest with the details of furniture, hangings, provisions, and so forth, which he proposed to send up to the Tower of Glendearg for his accommodation. This discourse, seasoned with a cup or two of wine, served to prolong the time until the reverend Abbot ordered his cavalcade to prepare for their return to the Monastery.

"As we have," he said, "in the course of this our toilsome journey, lost our meridian, indulgence shall be given to those of our attendants who shall, from very weariness, be unable to attend the duty at prime," and this by way of misrecorder or indulgentia."

Having benevolently intimated a boon to his faithful followers, which he probably judged would be far from unacceptable, the good Abbot, seeing all ready for his journey, bestowed his blessing on the assembled household—gave his hand to be kissed by Dame Glendinning—himself kissed the cheek of Mary Avenel, and even of the Miller's maiden, when they approached to render him the same homage—commanded Halbert to rule his temper, and to be aiding and obedient in all things to the English knight—admonished Edward to be discipulus impii etque strenuus—then took a courteous farewell of Sir Piercie Shafton, advising him to lie close, for fear of the English borderers, who might be employed to kidnap him; and having discharged these various offices of courtesy, moved forth to the court-yard, followed by the whole establishment. Here, with a heavy sigh approaching to a groan, the venerable father heaved himself upon his palfrey, whose dark purple housings swept the ground; and, greatly comforted that the discretion of the animal's pace would be no longer disturbed by the gambadoes of Sir Piercie and his prancing war-horse, he set forth at a sober and steady trot upon his return to the Monastery.

When the Sub-Prior had mounted to accompany his principal, his eye sought out Halbert, who, partly hidden by a projection of the outward wall of the court, stood apart from, and gazing upon the departing cavalcade, and the group which assembled around them. Unsatisfied with the explanation he had received concerning the mysterious transaction of the silver bodkin, yet interesting himself in the youth, of whose character he had formed a favourable idea, the worthy monk resolved to take an early opportunity of investigating that matter. In the meanwhile, he looked upon Halbert with a serious and warning aspect, and held up his finger to him as he signed farewell. He then joined the rest of the churchmen, and followed his Superior down the valley.

CHAPTER XX.

I hope you'll give me cause to think you noble,
And do me right with your sword, sir, as becomes
One gentleman of honour to another;
All this is fair, sir—let us make no days on't,
I'll lead your way.

Love's Pilgrimage.

THE look and sign of warning which the Sub-Prior gave to Halbert Glendinning as they parted, went to his heart; for although he had profited much less than Edward by the good man's instructions, he had a sincere reverence for his person; and even the short time he had for deliberation tended to shew him he was embarked in a perilous adventure. The nature of the provocation which he had given to Sir Piercie Shafton he could not even conjecture; but he saw that it was of a mortal quality, and he was now to abide the consequences.

That he might not force these consequences forward by any premature renewal of their quarrel, he resolved to walk apart for an hour, and consider on what terms he was to meet this haughty foreigner. The time seemed propitious for his doing so without having the appearance of wilfully shunning the stranger, as all the members of the little household were dispersing either to perform such tasks as had been interrupted by the arrival of the dignitaries, or to get in order what had been deranged by their visit.

Leaving the tower, therefore, and descending, unobserved as he thought, the knoll on which it stood, Halbert gained the little piece of level ground which extended between the descent of the hill, and the first sweep made by the brook after washing the foot of the eminence on which the tower was situated, where a few struggling birch and oak-trees served to secure him from observation. But scarcely had he reached the spot, when he was surprised to feel a smart tap upon the shoulder, and, turning around, he perceived he had been closely followed by Sir Piercie Shafton.

1. The hour of repose at noon, which, in the middle ages, was employed in slumber, and which the monastic rules of the time rendered necessary.

2. The midnight service of the monks.

3. Discipulus impii, according to the learned work of Pambrooke on the subject, signifies, meant not only an indulgence, or remission of some particular duties, but also a particular appointment to a service, where the monks continued to enjoy such indulgences as were granted beyond the rule.

When, whether from our state of animal spirits, want of confidence in the justice of our cause, or any other motive, our own courage happens to be in a wavering condition, nothing tends so much altogether to disconcert us, as a great appearance of promptitude on the part of our antagonist. Halbert Glendinning, both morally and constitutionally intrepid, was nevertheless somewhat troubled at seeing the stranger, whose resentment he had provoked, appear at once before him, and with an aspect which boded hostility. But though his heart might beat somewhat thicker, he was too high-spirited to exhibit any external signs of emotion.

"What is your pleasure, Sir Pierre?" he said to the English knight, enduring without apparent discomposure all the terrors which his antagonist had summoned into his aspect.

"What is thy pleasure?" answered Sir Pierre; "a goodly question after the part you have acted towards me!—Young man, I know not what infatuation has led thee to place thyself in direct and insolent opposition to one who is a guest of thy liege-lord the Abbot, and who, even from the courtesy due to thy mother's roof, had a right to remain there without meeting insult. Neither do I ask, or care, by what means thou hast become possessed of the fatal secret by which thou hast dared to offer me open shame. But I must now tell thee, that the possession of it hath cost thee thy life."

"Not, I trust, if my hand and sword can defend it," replied Halbert, boldly.

"True," said the Englishman, "I mean not to deprive thee of thy fair chance of self-defence. I am only sorry to think, that, young and country-bred as thou art, it can but little avail thee. But thou must be well aware, that in this quarrel I shall use no terms of quarter."

"Rely on it, proud man," answered the youth, "that I shall ask none; and although thou speakest as if I lay already at thy feet, trust me, that as I am determined never to ask thy mercy, so I am not fearful of needing it."

"Thou wilt, then," said the knight, "do nothing to avert the certain fate which thou hast provoked with such wantonness?"

"And how were that to be purchased?" replied Halbert Glendinning, more with the wish of obtaining some farther insight into the terms on which he stood with this stranger, than to make him the submission which he might require.

"Explain to me instantly," said Sir Pierre, "without equivocation or delay, by what means thou wert enabled to wound my honour so deeply—and shouldst thou point out to me by so doing an enemy more worthy of my resentment, I will permit thine own obscure insignificance to draw a veil over thine insolence."

"This is too high a flight," said Glendinning, fiercely, "for thine own presumption to soar without being checked. Thou hast come to my father's house, as well as I can guess, a fugitive and an exile, and thy first greeting to its inhabitants has been that of contempt and injury. By what means I have been able to retort that contempt, let thine own conscience tell thee. Enough for me that I stand on the privilege of a free Scotchman, and will brook no insult unreturned, and no injury unrequited."

"It is well, then," said Sir Pierre Shafton,

"we will dispute this matter to-morrow morning with our swords. Let the time be daybreak, and do thou assign the place. We will go forth as if to strike a deer."

"Content," replied Halbert Glendinning; "I will guide thee to a spot where an hundred men might fight and fall without any chance of interruption."

"It is well," answered Sir Pierre Shafton.

"Here then we part.—Many will say, that in thus indulging the right of a gentleman to the son of a clod-breaking peasant, I derogate from my sphere, even as the blessed man would derogate should he condescend to compare and match his golden beams with the twinkle of a pale, blinking, expiring, gross-fed taper. But no consideration of rank shall prevent my avenging the insult thou hast offered me. We bear a smooth face, observe me, Sir Villagio, before the worshipful inmates of yonder cabin, and to-morrow we try conclusions with our swords." So saying, he turned away towards the tower.

It may not be unworthy of notice, that in the last speech only, had Sir Pierre used some of those flowers of rhetoric which characterized the usual style of his conversation. Apparently, a sense of wounded honour, and the deep desire of vindicating his injured feelings, had proved too strong for the fantastic affectation of his acquired habits. Indeed, such is usually the influence of energy of mind, when called forth and exerted, that Sir Pierre Shafton had never appeared in the eyes of his youthful antagonist half so much deserving of enmity and respect as in this brief dialogue, by which they exchanged mutual defiance. As he followed him slowly to the tower, he could not help thinking to himself, that, had the English knight always displayed this superior tone of bearing and feeling, he would not probably have felt so earnestly disposed to take offence at his hand. Mortal offence, however, had been exchanged, and the matter was to be put to mortal arbitrament.

The family met at the evening meal, when Sir Pierre Shafton extended the benignity of his countenance and the graces of his conversation far more generally over the party than he had hitherto condescended to do. The greater part of his attention was, of course, still engrossed by his divine and inimitable Discretion, as he chose so term Mary Avenel; but, nevertheless, there were interjectional flourishes to the Maid of the Mill, under the title of Comely Damsel, and to the Dame, under that of Worshy Matron. Nay, lest he should fail to excite their admiration by the graces of his rhetoric, he generously, and without solicitation, added those of his voice; and after regretting bitterly the absence of his viol-da-gamba, he regaled them with a song, "which," said he, "the inimitable Astrophel, whom mortals call Philip Sidney, composed in the songs of his muse, to show the world what they are to expect from his riper years, and which will one day see the light in that not-to-be-parallelled perfection of human wit, which he has addressed to his sister, the matchless Parthenope, whom men call Countess of Pembroke; a work," he continued, "whereof his friendship hath permitted me, though unworthy, to be an occasional partaker, and whereof I may well say, that the deep afflative tale which swells our spheres, is so enriched with brilliant singutudes, dulcet descriptions, pleasant poems, and engaging interludes, that they seem as the stars of the firmament, beautifying the dusky robe of night. And though I wot well how much the lovely and quaint language will suffer by my widowed voice, widowed in that it is no longer matched by my beloved viol-de-gamba, I will essay to give you a taste of the ravishing sweetness of the poetry of the un-to-be-imitated Astrophel."

So saying, he sung without mercy or remorse about five hundred verses, of which the two first and the four last may suffice for a specimen —

What tongue cancher perfections tell,
On whose each part all pens may dwell.

Of whose high praise and praiseful bias;
Goodness the pen, Heaven paper is;
The ink immortal fame doth send,
And I began so I must end.

As Sir Pierce Shafton always sung with his eyes half shut, it was not until, agreeably to the promise of poetry, he had fairly made an end, that looking round, he discovered that the greater part of his audience had, in the meanwhile, yielded to the charms of repose. Mary Avenel, indeed, from a natural sense of politeness, had contrived to keep awake through all the prolixities of the divine Astrophel; but Mysie was transported in dreams back to the dusty atmosphere of her father's mill. Edward himself, who had given his attention for some time, had at length fallen fast asleep; and the good dame's nose, could its tones have been put under regulation, might have supplied the bass of the lamented viol-de-gamba. Halbert, however, who had no temptation to give way to the charms of slumber, remained awake with his eyes fixed on the songster; not that he was better entertained with the words, or more ravished with the execution, than the rest of the company, but rather because he admired, or perhaps envied, the composure, which could thus spend the evening in interminable madrigals, when the next morning was to be devoted to deadly combat. Yet it struck his natural acuteness of observation, that the eye of the gallant cavalier did now and then, furtively as it were, seek a glance of his countenance, as to discover how he was taking the exhibition of his antagonist's composure and serenity of mind.

He shall read nothing in my countenance, thought Halbert, proudly, that can make him think my indifference less than his own.

And taking from the shelf a bag full of miscellaneous matters collected for the purpose, he began with great industry to dress hooks, and had finished half-a-dozen of flies (we are enabled, for the benefit of those who admire the antiquities of the gentle art of angling, to state that they were brown hackles) by the time that Sir Pierce had arrived at the conclusion of his long-winded strophes of the divine Astrophel. So that he also testified a magnanimous contempt of that which to-morrow should bring forth.

As it now waxed late, the family of Glendearg separated for the evening; Sir Pierce first saying to the dame that "her son Albert —"

"Halbert," said Elspeth, with emphasis. "Halbert, after his goodnight, Halbert Brydone."

"Well, then, I have prayed your son, Halbert, that we may arrive to-morrow, with the sun's splendour, to wake a stag from his lair, that I may see whether he be as prompt at that sport as fame bespeaks him."

"Alas! sir," answered Dame Elspeth, "he is but too prompt, in you talk of promptitude, at any thing that has steel at one end of it, and mischief at the other. But he is at your honourable disposal, and I trust you will teach him how obedience is due to our venerable father and lord, the Abbot, and prevail with him to take the bow-bearer's place in fee; for, as the two worthy monks said, it will be a great help to a widow-woman."

"Trust me, good dame," replied Sir Pierce, "it is my purpose so to indoctrinate him, touching his conduct and bearing towards his betters, that he shall not lightly depart from the reverence due to them. — We meet, then, beneath the birch-trees in the plain," he said, looking to Halbert, "so soon as the eye of day hath opened its lids." Halbert answered with a sign of acquiescence, and the knight proceeded, "And now, having wished to my fairest Discretion those pleasant dreams which wave their pinions around the couch of sleeping beauty, and to this comely damsel the boonties of Morpheus, and, to all others the common good-night, I will crave you leave to depart to my place of rest, though I may any with the poet,

'Ah rest! — no rest but change of place and posture:
Ah sleep! — no sleep but worn-out Nature's swooning;
Ah bed! — no bed but cushion fill'd with stones;
Rest, sleep, nor bed, await not on an exile.'"

With a delicate obeisance he left the room, evading Dame Glendinning, who hastened to assure him he would find his accommodations for repose much more agreeable than they had been the night before, there having been store of warm coverlets, and a soft feather-bed, sent up from the Abbey. But the good knight probably thought that the grace and effect of his exit would be diminished, if he were recalled from his heroics to discuss such sublimary and domestic topics, and therefore hastened away without waiting to hear her out.

"A pleasant gentleman," said Dame Glendinning; "but I will warrant him an humorous! — And sings a sweet song, though it is somewhat of the longest. — Well, I make mine avow he is goodly company — I wonder when he will go away."

Having thus expressed her respect for her guest, not without intimation that she was heartily tired of his company, the good dame gave the signal for the family to disperse, and laid her injunctions on Halbert to attend Sir Pierce Shafton at daybreak, as he required.

When stretched on his pallet by his brother's side, Halbert had no small cause to envy the sound sleep which instantly settled on the eyes of Edward, but refused him any share of its influence. He saw now too well what the spirit had darkly indicated, that, in granting the boon which he had asked so unadvisedly, she had contributed more to his harm than his good. He was now sensible, too late, of the various dangers and inconveniences with which his dearest friends were threatened, alike by his disfigurement or his success in the approaching duel. If he fell, he might say personally, "good-night all." But it was not the less certain that he should leave a dreadful legacy of distress and embarrassment to his mother and family,—an anticipation which by no means tended to render the front of death, in itself a grisly object, more agreeable to his imagination. The vengeance of the Abbot, his conscience told him, was sure to descend on his mother and brother, or could only be averted by the generosity of the victor—And Mary Arvenel—he should have shewn himself, if he succumbed in the present combat, as inefficient in protecting her, as he had been unnecessarily active in bringing disaster on her, and on the house in which she had been protected from infancy. And to this view of the case were to be added all those imbibed and anxious feelings with which the bravest men, even in a better or less doubtful quarrel, regard the issue of a dubious combat, the first time when it has been their fate to engage in an affair of that nature.

But however disconsolate the prospect seemed in the event of his being conquered, Halbert could expect from victory little more than the safety of his own life, and the gratification of his wounded pride. To his friends—to his mother and brother—especially to Mary Arvenel—the consequences of his triumph would be more certain destruction than the contingency of his defeat and death. If the English knight survived, he might in courtesy extend his protection to them; but if he fell, nothing was likely to screen them from the vindictive measures which the Abbot and convent would surely adopt against the violation of the peace of the Halidome, and the slaughter of a protected guest by one of their own vassals, within whose house they had lodged him for shelter. These thoughts, in which neither view of the case augured aught short of ruin to his family, and that ruin entirely brought on by his own rashness, were thorns in Halbert Glendinning's pillow, and deprived his soul of peace and his eyes of slumber.

There appeared no middle course, saving one which was marked by degradation, and which, even if he stooped to it, was by no means free of danger. He might indeed confess to the English knight the strange circumstances which led to his presenting him with that token which the White Lady (in her displeasure as it now seemed) had given him, that he might offer it to Sir Piercie Shafton. But to this avowal his pride could not stoop, and Penson, who is wonderfully ready to be of counsel with pride on such occasions, offered many arguments to shew it would be useless as well as mean so far to degrade himself. "If I tell tales so wonderful," thought he, "shall I not either be stigmatized as a liar, or punished as a wizard?—Were Sir Piercie Shafton generous, noble, and benevolent, as the champions of whom we hear in romance, I might indeed gain his ear, and, without demeaning myself, escape from the situation in which I am placed. But as he is, or at least seems to be, self-conceited, arrogant, vain, and presumptuous—I should but humble myself in vain—and I will not humble myself!" he said, starting out of bed, grasping to his broadsword, and brandishing it in the light of the moon, which streamed through the deep niche that served them as a window; when, to his extreme surprise and terror, an airy form stood at the moonlight, but intercepted not the reflection on the floor.

Dimly as it was expressed, the sound of the voice soon made him sensible he saw the White Lady.

At no time had her presence seemed so terrific to him; for when he had invoked her, it was with the expectation of the apparition, and the determination to abide the issue. But now she had come unalled, and her presence impressed him with a sense of approaching misfortune, and with the hideous apprehension that he had associated himself with a demon, over whose motions he had no control, and of whose powers and quality he had no certain knowledge. He remained, therefore, in more terror, gazing on the apparition, which chanted or recited in cadence the following lines—

"He whose heart for vengeance ached,
Must not shrink from shedding blood;
The knot that thou hast tied with word,
Thou must loose by edge of sword."

"Avant thee, false Spirit!" said Halbert Glendinning; "I have bought thy advice too dearly already—Begone in the name of God!"

The Spirit laughed; and the cold unnatural sound of her laughter had something in it more fearful than the usual melancholy tones of her voice. She then replied,—

"You have summon'd me once—you have summon'd me twice,
And without me a summons I come to you thrice,
Unask'd for, unask'd for, you came to my glen;
Unask'd and unask'd I am with you again."

Halbert Glendinning gave way for a moment to terror, and called on his brother, "Edward! waken, waken, for Our Lady's sake!"

Edward awoke accordingly, and asked what he wanted.

"Look out," said Halbert, "look up! seest thou no one in the room?"

"No, upon my good word," said Edward, looking out.

"What! seest thou nothing in the moonshine upon the floor there?"

"No, nothing," answered Edward, "save thyself resting on thy naked sword. I tell thee, Halbert, thou shouldst trust more to thy spiritual arms, and less to those of steel and iron. For this many a night hast thou started and moaned, and cried out of fighting, and of apocrypha, and of goblins—thy sleep hath not refreshed thee—thy waking hath been a dream.—Credit me, dear Halbert, say the Pater and Credo, resign thyself to the protection of God, and thou wilt sleep sound and wake in comfort."

"It may be," said Halbert slowly, and having his eye still bent on the female form which to him seemed distinctly visible,— "it may be—But tell me, dear Edward, seest thou no one on the chamber floor but me?"

"No one," answered Edward, raising himself on his elbow; "dear brother, lay aside thy weapon, say thy prayers, and lay thee down to rest."

While he thus spoke, the Spirit smiled at Halbert as if in scorn; her wan cheek faded in the wan moonlight even before the smile had passed away, and Halbert himself no longer beheld the vision to which he had so anxiously solicited his brother's attention. "May God preserve my wife!" he said, as, lying aside his weapon, he again threw himself on his bed.

"Answer I my dearest brother," answered Edward, "but we must not provoke that Heaven in our wantonness which we invoke in our misery.—He not angry with me, my dear brother — I know not why you have totally of late estranged yourself from me — It is true, I am neither so athletic in body, nor so alert in courage, as you have been from your infancy; yet, till lately, you have not absolutely cast off my society — Believe me, I have wept in secret, though I forbore to intrude myself on your privacy. The time has been when you held me not so cheap; and when, if I could not follow the game so closely, or make it so truly as you, I could fill up our intervals of pastime with pleasant tales of the olden times, which I had read or heard, and which excited even your attention as we sat and eat our provision by some pleasant spring — but now I have, though I know not why, lost thy regard and affection. — Nay, toss not thy arms about thee thus wildly," said the younger brother; "from thy strange dreams, I fear some touch of fever hath affected thy blood — let me draw closer around thee thy mantle."

"Forbear," said Halbert — "your care is needless — your complaints are without reason — your fears on my account are in vain."

"Nay, but hear me, brother," said Edward. "Your speech in sleep, and now even your waking dreams, are of things which belong not to this world, but to our race — Our good Father Eustace says, that howbeit we may not do well to receive all idle tales of goblins and spectres, yet there is warrant from holy Scripture to believe, that the fiends haunt waste and solitary places; and that those who frequent such wildernesses alone, are the prey, or the sport, of these wandering demons. And therefore, I pray thee, brother, let me go with you when you go next up the glen, where, as you well know, there be places of evil reputation — Thouarest not for my escort; but, Halbert, such dangers are more safely encountered by the wise in judgment, than by the bold in bosom; and though I have small cause to boast of my own wisdom, yet I have that which ariseth from the written knowledge of elder times."

There was a moment during this discourse, when Halbert had well-nigh come to the resolution of disburdening his own breast, by intrusting Edward with all that weighed upon it. But when his brother reminded him that this was the morning of a high holiday, and that, setting aside all other business or pleasure, he ought to go to the Monastery and shrive himself before Father Eustace, who would that day occupy the confessional, pride stepped in and confirmed his wavering resolution. "I will not avow," he thought, "a tale so extraordinary, that I may be considered as an impostor or something worse — I will not fly from this Englishman, whose arm and sword may be no better than my own. My father have faced his betters, were he as much distinguished in battle as he is by his quaint discourse."

Pride, which has been said to save man, and woman too, from falling, has yet a stronger influence on the mind when it embraces the cause of passion, and seldom fails to render it victorious over conscience and reason. Halbert, once determined, though not to the better course, at length slept soundly, and was only awakened by the dawn of day.

Old Play

With the first gray peep of dawn, Halbert Glen-dinning arose and hastened to dress himself, girded on his weapon, and took a cross-bow in his hand, as if his usual sport had been his sole object. He groped his way down the dark and winding staircase, and undid with as little noise as possible, the fastenings of the inner door, and of the exterior iron grate. At length he stood free in the courtyard, and looking up to the tower, saw a signal made with a handkerchief from the window. Nothing doubting that it was his antagonist, he passed expecting him. But it was Mary Arden, who glided like a spirit from under the low and rugged portal.

Halbert was much surprised, and felt, he knew not why, like one caught in the act of a meditated trespass. The presence of Mary Arden had till that moment never given him pain. She spoke, too, in a tone where sorrow seemed to mingle with reproach, while she asked him with emphasis, "What he was about to do?"

He showed his cross-bow, and was about to express the pretext he had meditated, when Mary interrupted him.

"Not so, Halbert — that evasion were unworthy of one whose word has hitherto been truth. You meditate not the destruction of the deer — your hand and your heart are aimed at other game — you seek to do battle with this stranger."

"And wherefore should I quarrel with our guest?" answered Halbert, blushing deeply.

"There are, indeed, many reasons why you should not," replied the maiden, "nor is there one of avari wherefore you should — yet nevertheless, such a quarrel you are now searching after."

"Why should you suppose so, Mary?" said Halbert, endeavouring to hide his conscious purpose — "he is my mother's guest — he is protected by the Abbot and the community, who are our masters — he is of high degree also, — and wherefore should you think that I can, or dare, resent a hasty word, which he has perchance thrown out against me more from the wantonness of his wit, than the purpose of his heart?"

"Alas!" answered the maiden, "the very asking that question puts your resolution beyond a doubt. Since your childhood you were ever daring, seeking danger rather than avoiding it — delighting in whatever had the air of adventure and of courage; and it is not from fear that you will now blush from your purpose — Oh, let it then be from pity! — from pity, Halbert, to your aged mother, whose your death or victory will alike deprive of the comfort and stay of her age."

"She has my brother Edward," said Halbert, turning suddenly from her.

"She has indeed," said Mary Arden, "the calm, the noble-minded, the conscientious Edward, who has thy courage, Halbert, without thy fiery notions, — thy generous spirit, with more of reason to guide it. He would not have heard his mother, he would not have heard his adopted sister, he would him in vain not to ruin himself, and tear up their future hopes of happiness and protection."

Halbert's heart swelled as he replied to this reproach. "Well — what avails it speaking! — you have him that is better than me — wiser, more considerate — braver, for aught I know — you are provided with a protector, and need care no more for me."

Again he turned to depart, but Mary Avenel laid her hand on his arm so gently that he scarce felt her hold, yet felt that it was impossible for him to strike it off. There he stood, one foot advanced to leave the court-yard, but so little determined on departure, that he resembled a traveller arrested by the spell of a magician, and unable either to quit the attitude of motion, or to proceed on his course.

Mary Avenel availed herself of his state of suspense. "Hear me," she said, "hear me, Halbert! — I am an orphan, and even Heaven hears the orphan — I have been the companion of your infancy, and if you will not hear me for an instant, from whom may Mary Avenel claim so poor a boon?"

"I hear you," said Halbert Glendinning, "but be brief, dear Mary — you mistake the nature of my business — it is but a morning of summer sport which we propose."

"Say not thus," said the maiden, interrupting him, "say not thus to me — others thou mayest deceive, but me thou canst not — There has been that in me from the earliest youth, which fraud flies from, and which imposture cannot deceive. For what fate has given me such a power I know not; but bred an ignorant maiden, in this sequestered valley, mine eyes can too often see what man would most willingly hide — I can judge of the dark purposes, though it is hid under the smiling brow, and a glance of the eye says more to me than oaths and protestations do to others."

"Then," said Halbert, "if thou canst so read the human heart, — say, dear Mary — what dost thou see in mine! — tell me that — say that what thou seest — what thou readest in this bosom, does not offend thee — say but that, and thou shalt be the guide of my actions, and mould me now and henceforward to honour or to dishonour at thy own free will!"

Mary Avenel became first red, and then deadly pale, as Halbert Glendinning spoke. But when, turning round at the close of his address, he took her hand, she gently withdrew it, and replied, "I cannot read the heart, Halbert, and I would not of my will know aught of yours, save what becomes us both — I only can judge of signs, words, and actions of little outward import, more truly than shoes around me, as my eyes, thou knowest, have seen objects not presumed to those of others."

"Let them gaze then on one whom they shall never see more," said Halbert, once more turning from her, and rushing out of the court-yard without again looking back.

Mary Avenel gave a faint scream, and clasped both her hands firmly on her forehead and eyes. She had been a minute in this attitude, when she was thus greeted by a voice from behind: "Generously done, my most eloquent Discretion, to hide those brilliant eyes from the far inferior beams which even now begin to gild the eastern horizon — Darest thou there were that Phœbus, outdone in splendour, might in very shamefacedness turn back his eye, and rather leave this world in darkness, than incur the disgrace of such an encounter — Credit me, lovely Discretion —"

But as Sir Piercie Shafton (the reader will readily set down these flowers of eloquence to the proper owner) attempted to take Mary Avenel's hand, in order to proceed in his speech, she shook him abruptly off, and regarding him with an eye which braved terror and agitation, rushed past him into the tower.

The knight stood looking after her with a countenance in which contempt was strongly mingled with mortification. "By my knighthood!" he ejaculated, "I have thrown away upon this rude rustic Phideia a speech, which the predest beauty at the court of Felicia (so let me call the Elysium from which I am banished!) might have termed the very matins of Cupid. Hard and inexorable was the fate that sent thee thither, Piercie Shafton, to waste thy wit upon country wenches, and thy valour upon hob-nailed clowns! But that insult — that affront — had it been offered to me by the lowest plebeian, he must have died for it by my hand, in respect the enormity of the offence doth counteravail the inequality of him by whom it is given. I trust I shall find this clownish roisterer not less willing to deal in blows than in taunts."

While he held this conversation with himself, Sir Piercie Shafton was hastening to the little tuft of birch-trees which had been assigned as the place of meeting. He greeted his antagonist with a courtly salutation, followed by this commentary: "I pray you to observe, that I doff my hat to you, though so much my inferior in rank, without derogation on my part, inasmuch as my having so far honoured you in receiving and admitting your defiance, doth, in the judgment of the best martialists, in some sort and for the time, raise you to a level with me — an honour which you may and ought to account cheaply purchased, even with the loss of your life, if such should chance to be the issue of this duello."

"For which condescension," said Halbert, "I have to thank the token which I presented to you."

The knight changed colour, and grinded his teeth with rage — "Draw your weapon!" said he to Glendinning.

"Not in this spot," answered the youth; "we should be liable to interruption — Follow me, and I will bring you to a place where we shall encounter no such risk."

He proceeded to walk up the glen, resolving that their place of combat should be in the entrance of the Corri-nan-shian; both because the spot, lying under the reputation of being haunted, was very little frequented, and also because he regarded it as a place which to him might be termed fitted, and which he therefore resolved should witness his death or victory.

They walked up the glen for some time in silence, like honourable enemies who did not wish to contend with words, and who had nothing friendly to exchange with each other. Silence, however, was always an unknown state with Sir Piercie, and moreover, his anger was usually a hasty and short-lived passion. As, therefore, he went forth, in his own idea, in all love and honour towards his antagonist, he saw not any cause for submitting longer to the painful restraint of positive silence.

He began by complimenting Halbert on the alert activity with which he surmounted the obstacles and impediments of the way.

"Trust me," said he, "worthy rustic, we have not a lighter or a firmer step in our courtlike revels, and if duly set forth by a silk hose, and trained unto that stately exercise, your leg would make an indifferent good show in a pavin or a galliard. And I doubt nothing," he added, "that you have availed yourself of some opportunity to improve yourself in the art of fence, which is more akin than dancing to our present purpose."

"I know nothing more of fencing," said Halbert, "than hath been taught me by an old shepherd of ours, called Martin, and at whiles a lesson from Christie of the Clinthill—for the rest, I must trust to good sword, strong arm, and sound heart."

"Marry and I am glad of it, young Audacity, (I will call you my Audacity, and you will call me your Condescension, while we are on these terms of unnatural equality.) I am glad of your ignorance with all my heart. For we martialists proportion the punishments which we inflict upon our opposites, to the length and hazard of the efforts wherewith they oppose themselves to us. And I see not why you, being but a tyro, may not be held sufficiently punished for your outrecuidance, and orgillous presumption, by the loss of an ear, an eye, or even a finger, accompanied by some flesh-wound of depth and severity, suited to your error—whereas, had you been able to stand more effectually on your defence, I see not how less than your life could have atoned sufficiently for your presumption."

"Now, by God and Our Lady," said Halbert, "unable any longer to restrain himself, 'thou art thyself over presumptuous, who speakest thus daringly of the issue of a combat which is not yet even begun—Are you a god, that you already dispose of my life and limbs? or are you a judge in the justice-air, telling at your ease and without risk, how the head and quarters of a condemned criminal are to be disposed of?'"

"Not an, O thou, whom I have well permitted to call thyself my Audacity! I, thy Condescension, am neither a god to judge the issue of the combat before it is fought, nor a judge to dispose at my ease and in safety of the limbs and head of a condemned criminal; but I am an indifferent good master of fence, being the first pupil of the first master of the first school of fence that our royal England affords, the said master being no other than the truly noble, and all-unutterably-skilful Vincentio Saviola, from whom I learned the firm step, quick eye, and nimble hand—of which qualities thou, O my most rustical Audacity, art full like to reap the fruits so soon as we shall find a piece of ground fitting for such experiments."

They had now reached the gorge of the ravine, where Halbert had at first intended to stop; but when he observed the narrowness of the level ground, he began to consider that it was only by superior agility that he could expect to make up his deficiency in the science, as it was called, of defence. He found no spot which afforded sufficient room to traverse for this purpose, until he gained the well-known fountain, by whose margin, and in front of the huge rock from which it sprung, was an amphitheatre of level turf, of small space indeed, compared with the great height of the cliffs with which it was surrounded on every point save that from which the rivulet issued forth, yet large enough for their present purpose.

When they had reached this spot of ground, fitted well by its gloom and sequestered situation to be a scene of mortal strife, both were surprised to observe that a grave was dug close by the foot of the rock with great neatness and regularity, the green turf being laid down upon the one side, and the earth thrown out in a heap upon the other. A mattock and shovel lay by the verge of the grave.

Sir Pierce Shafton bent his eye with unusual seriousness upon Halbert Glendinning, as he asked him sternly, "Does this bode treason, young man? And have you purpose to set upon me here as in an emboscade or place of vantage?"

"Not on my part, by Heaven!" answered the youth: "I told no one of our purpose, nor would I for the throne of Scotland take odds against a single arm."

"I believe thou wouldst not, mine Audacity," said the knight, resuming the affected manner which was become a second nature to him; "nevertheless this fosse is curiously well shaped, and might be the masterpiece of Nature's last bed-maker, I would say the sexton—Wherefore, let us be thankful to chance or some unknown friend, who hath thus provided for one of us the decencies of sepulture, and let us proceed to determine which shall have the advantage of enjoying this place of undisturbed slumber."

So saying, he stripped off his doublet and cloak, which he folded up with great care, and deposited upon a large stone, while Halbert Glendinning, not without some emotion, followed his example. Their vicinity to the favourite haunt of the White Lady led him to form conjectures concerning the incident of the grave—"It must have been her work!" he thought: "the Spirit foresaw and has provided for the fatal event of the combat—I must return from this place a homicide, or I must remain here for ever!"

The bridge seemed now broken down behind him, and the chance of coming off honourably without killing or being killed, (the hope of which issue has cheered the sinking heart of many a duellist,) seemed now altogether to be removed. Yet the very desperation of his situation gave him, on an instant's reflection, both firmness and courage, and presented to him one sole alternative, conquest, namely, or death.

"As we are here," said Sir Pierce Shafton, "unaccompanied by any patrons or seconds, it were well you should pass your hands over my side, as I shall over yours; not that I suspect you to use any quaint device of privy armour, but in order to comply with the ancient and laudable custom practised on all such occasions."

While, complying with his antagonist's humour, Halbert Glendinning went through this ceremony, Sir Pierce Shafton did not fail to solicit his attention to the quality and fineness of his wrought and embroidered shirt—"In this very shirt," said he, "O mine Audacity!—I am in this very garment, in which I am now to combat a Scottish rustic like thyself, it was my envied lot to lead the winning party at that venous match at ballou, which bewit the divine Anstruther, (our master of the law,) and the right honourable my very good lord of Oxford. All the beauties of Flanders (by which man I distinguish our beloved England) stood in the gallery, waving their kerchiefs at each turn of the game, and cheering the winners by their plaudits. After which noble sport we were refreshed by a suitable banquet, whereto it pleased the noble Urania (being the unmatched Countess of Pembroke) to accommodate me with her fan for the cooling my somewhat too much inflamed visage, to requite which courtesy, I said, casting my features into a smiling yet melancholy fashion, O divinest Urania ! receive again that too fatal gift, which not like the Zephyr cooleth, but like the hot breath of the Sirocco, heateth yet more that which is already inflamed. Whereupon, looking upon me somewhat scornfully, yet not so but what the experienced courtier might perceive a certain cast of approbative affection —

Here the knight was interrupted by Halbert, who had waited with courteous patience for some little time, till he found, that far from drawing to a close, Sir Pierce seemed rather inclined to wax prolix in his reminiscences.

"Sir Knight," said the youth, "if this matter be not very much to the purpose, we will, if you object not, proceed to that which we have in hand. You should have abidden in England had you desired to waste time in words, for here we spend it in blows."

"I crave your pardon, most rusticated Audacity," answered Sir Pierce; "truly I become oblivious of every thing beside, when the recollections of the divine court of Felicia press upon my wakened memory, even as a saint is dazzled when he be-thinks him of the beatific vision. Ah, felicitous Felician! delicate nurse of the fair, chosen abode of the wise, the birth-place and cradle of nobility, the temple of courtesy, the fane of sprightly chivalry — Ah heavenly court, or rather courtly heaven! cheered with dances, lulled asleep with harmony, awakened with sprightly sports and tourneys, decorated with silks and tissues, glittering with diamonds and jewels, standing on end with double piled velvets, satins, and satinets!"

"The token, Sir Knight, the token!" exclaimed Halbert Glendinning, who, impatient of Sir Pierce's interminable oratory, reminded him of the ground of their quarrel, as the best way to compel him to the purpose of their meeting.

And he judged right; for Sir Pierce Shafton no sooner heard him speak, than he exclaimed, "Thy death-hour has struck — betake thee to thy sword — Via!"

Both swords were unsheathed, and the combats commenced their engagement. Halbert became immediately aware, that, as he had expected, he was far inferior to his adversary in the use of his weapon. Sir Pierce Shafton had taken no more than his own share of real merit, when he termed himself an absolutely good fencer; and Glendinning soon found that he should have great difficulty in coping with life and honour from such a master of the sword. The English knight was master of all the mystery of the stoccata, ambroscata, punto-reverso, incertata, and so forth, which the Italian masters of defence had lately introduced into general practice. But Glendinning, on his part, was no novice in the principles of the art, according to the old Scottish fashion, and possessed the spirit of all genuine, steady and collected mind. At first, being desirous to try the skill, and become acquainted with the play of his enemy, he stood on his defence, keeping his foot, hand, eye, and body, in perfect unison, and holding his sword short, and with the point towards his antagonist's face, so that Sir Pierce, in order to assail him, was obliged to make actual passes, and could not avail himself of his skill in making feints; while, on the other hand, Halbert was prompt to parry these attacks, either by shifting his ground, or with the sword. The consequence was, that, after two or three sharp attempts on the part of Sir Pierce, which were evaded or disconcerted by the address of his opponent, he began to assume the defensive in his turn, fearful of giving some advantage by being repeatedly the assailant. But Halbert was too cautious to press on a swordsman whose dexterity had already more than once placed him within a hair's-breadth of death, which he had only escaped by uncommon watchfulness and agility.

When each had made a feint or two, there was a pause in the conflict, both as if by one assent dropping their swords' point, and looking on each other for a moment without speaking. At length Halbert Glendinning, who felt perhaps more uneasy on account of his family than he had done before he had displayed his own courage, and proved the strength of his antagonist, could not help saying, "Is the subject of our quarrel, Sir Knight, so mortal, that one of our two bodies must needs fill up that grave? or may we with honour, having proved ourselves against each other, sheathe our swords and depart friends?"

"Valiant and most rustical Audacity," said the Southron knight, "to no man on earth could you have put a question on the code of honour, who was more capable of rendering you a reason. Let us pause for the space of one venue, until I give you my opinion on this dependance; for certain it is, that brave men should not run upon their fate like brute and furious wild beasts, but should slay each other deliberately, decently, and with reason. Therefore, if we coolly examine the state of our dependance, we may the better apprehend whether the sisters three have doomed one of us to expiate the same with his blood — Dost thou understand me?"

"I have heard Father Eustace," said Halbert, after a moment's recollection, "speak of the three furies, with their thread and their shears."

"Enough — enough," — interrupted Sir Pierce Shafton, crimsoning with a new fit of rage, "the thread of thy life is spun!"

And with these words he attacked with the utmost ferocity the Scottish youth, who had but just time to throw himself into a posture of defence. But the rash fury of the assailant, as frequently happens, disappointed its own purpose; for, as he made a desperate thrust, Halbert Glendinning avoided it, and ere the knight could recover his weapon, requited him (to use his own language) with a resolute stoccata, which, passing through his body, and Sir Pierce Shafton fell to the ground.

¹ Dependance — A phrase among the brethren of the sword for an existing quarrel.

CHAPTER XXII.

Yes, life hath left him — every busy thought,
Each fiery passion, every strong affection,
All sense of outward ill and inward sorrow,
Are fled at once from the pale trunk before me;
And I have given that which spoke and moved,
Thought, action, suffer'd as a living man,
To be a ghastly form of bloody clay,
Soon the foul food for reptiles.

Old Play.

I BELIEVE few successful duellists (if the word successful can be applied to a superiority so fatal) have beheld their dead antagonist stretched on the earth at their feet, without wishing they could redeem with their own blood that which it has been their fate to spill. Least of all could such indifference be the lot of so young a man as Halbert Glendinning, who, unused to the sight of human blood, was not only struck with sorrow, but with terror, when he beheld Sir Pierce Shafton lie stretched on the green-sward before him, vomiting gore as if impelled by the strokes of a pump. He threw his bloody sword on the ground, and hastened to kneel down and support him, vainly striving, at the same time, to stanch his wound, which seemed rather to bleed inwardly than externally.

The unfortunate knight spoke at intervals, when the syncope would permit him, and his words, so far as intelligible, partook of his affected and encoined, yet not ungenerous character.

"Most rustical youth," he said, "thy fortune hath prevailed over knightly skill — and Audacity hath overcome Condescension, even as the kite hath sometimes hawked at and struck down the falcon-gentle. — Fly and save thyself! — Take my purse — it is in the nether pocket of my carnation-coloured hose — and is worth a clown's acceptance. See that my mails, with my vestments, be sent to the Monastery of St Mary's" — (here his voice grew weak, and his mind and recollection seemed to waver) — "I bestow the out velvet jerkin, with close breeches conforming — for — oh! — the good of my soul."

"Be of good comfort, sir," said Halbert, half-distracted with his agony of pity and remorse. "I trust you shall yet do well — Oh for a leech!"

"Were there twenty physicians, O most generous Audacity, and that were a grave spectacle — I might not survive, my life is ebbing fast. — Commend me to the rustical nymph whom I called my Discretion — O Claridiana! — true empress of this bleeding heart — which now bleedeth in sad earnest! — Place me on the ground at my length, most rustical victor, born to quench the pride of the burning light of the most felicitous court of Follies — O omits and angus — knights and ladies — masques and theatres — quaint devices — chain-work and brocade — love, honour, and beauty! —"

While muttering these last words, which slid from him, as it were unawares, while doubtless he was recalling to mind the glories of the English court, the gallant Sir Pierce Shafton stretched out his limbs — groaned deeply, shut his eyes, and became motionless.

Halbert tore his hair for very sorrow, as he looked on the pale countenance of his victim. Life, he thought, had not utterly fled, but without better aid than his own, he saw not how it could be preserved.

"Why," he exclaimed, in vain penitence, "why did I provoke him to an issue so fatal! Would to God I had submitted to the worst insult man could receive from man, rather than be the bloody instrument of this bloody deed — and doubly cursed be this evil-boding spot, which, haunted as I knew it to be by a witch or a devil, I yet chose for the place of combat! In any other place, save this, there had been help to be gotten by speed of foot, or by uplifting of voice — but here there is no one to be found by search, no one to hear my shouts, save the evil spirit who has counselled this mischief. It is not her hour — I will essay the spell howsoever; and if she can give me aid, she shall do it, or know of what a madman in capable even against those of another world!"

He spurned his bloody shoe from his foot, and repeated the spell with which the reader is well acquainted; but there was neither voice, apparition, nor signal of answer. The youth, in the impatience of his despair, and with the rash-hardihood which formed the basis of his character, shouted aloud, "Witch — Sorceress — Fiend! — art thou deaf to my cries of help, and so ready to appear and answer those of vengeance! Arise and speak to me, or I will choke up thy fountain, tear down thy hollybush, and leave thy haunt as waste and bare as thy fatal assistance has made me waste of comfort and bare of counsel!" — This furious and saving invocation was suddenly interrupted by a distant sound, resembling a hallo, from the gorge of the ravine. "Now may Saint Mary be praised," said the youth, hastily fastening his sandal, "I hear the voice of some living man, who may give me counsel and help in this fearful extremity."

Having donned his sandal, Halbert Glendinning, hallooing at intervals, in answer to the sound which he had heard, ran with the speed of a hunted buck down the rugged delf, as if paradise had been before him, hell and all her furies behind, and his eternal happiness or misery had depended upon the speed which he exerted. In a space incredibly short for any one but a Scottish mountaineer having his nerves strung by the deepest and most passionate interest, the youth reached the entrance of the ravine, through which the rill that flows down Corri-nan-shian discharges itself, and unites with the brook that waters the little valley of Glendearg.

Here he paused, and looked around him upwards and downwards through the glen, without perceiving a human form. His heart sank within him. But the windings of the glen intercepted his prospect, and the person, whose voice he had heard, might therefore, be at no great distance, though not obvious to his sight. The branches of an oak-tree, which shot straight out from the face of a tall cliff, proffered to his bold spirit, steady head, and active limbs, the means of ascending it as a place of out-look, although the enterprise was what most men would have shrunk from. But by out-bound from the earth, the active youth caught hold of the lower branch, and swung himself up into the tree, and in a minute more gained the top of the cliff, from which he could easily survey a human figure descending the valley. It was not that of a shepherd, or of a hunter, and scarcely any others used to traverse this deserted solitude, especially coming from the north, since the reader may remember that the brook took its rise from an extensive and dangerous morass which lay in that direction.

But Halbert Glendinning did not pause to consider who the traveller might be, or what might be the purpose of his journey. To know that he saw a human being, and might receive, in the extremity of his distress, the countenance and advice of a fellow-creature, was enough for him at the moment. He threw himself from the pinnacle of the cliff once more into the arms of the projecting oak-tree, whose boughs waved in middle air, anchored by the roots in a huge gulf, or chasm of the rock. Catching at the branch which was nearest to him, he dropped himself from that height upon the ground; and such was the athletic springiness of his youthful sinews, that he pitched there as lightly, and with as little injury, as the falcon stooping from her wheel.

To resume his race at full speed up the glen, was the work of an instant; and as he turned angle after angle of the indented banks of the valley, without meeting that which he sought, he became half afraid that the form which he had seen at such a distance had already melted into thin air, and was either a deception of his own imagination, or of the elementary spirits by which the valley was supposed to be haunted.

But, to his inexpressible joy, as he turned round the base of a huge and distinguished crag, he saw, straight before and very near to him, a person, whose dress, as he viewed it hastily, resembled that of a pilgrim.

He was a man in advanced life, and wearing a long beard, having on his head a large slouched hat, without either band or brooch. His dress was a tunic of black serge, which like those commonly called lussar-cloaks, had an upper part, which covered the arms and fell down on the lower; a small scrip and bottle, which hung at his back, with a stout staff in his hand, completed his equipage. His step was feeble, like that of one exhausted by a toilsome journey.

"Save ye, good father!" said the youth. "God and Our Lady have sent you to my assistance."

"And for what, my son, can so frail a creature as I am, be of service to you?" said the old man, not a little surprised at being thus accosted by so handsome a youth, his features discomposed by anxiety, his face flushed with exertion, his hands and much of his dress stained with blood.

"A man bleeds to death in the valley here, hard by. Come with me—come with me! You are aged—you have experience—you have at least your senses—and mine have well-nigh left me."

"A man—and bleeding to death—and here in this desolate spot!" said the stranger.

"Stay not to question it, father," said the youth, "but come instantly to my rescue. Follow me—follow me, without an instant's delay."

"Nay, but my son," said the old man, "we do not lightly follow the guides who present themselves thus suddenly in the bosom of a howling wilderness. Ere I follow thee, thou must expound to me thy name, thy purpose, and thy cause."

"There is no time to expound any thing," said Halbert; "I tell thee a man's life is at stake, and thou must come to aid him, or I will carry thee thither by force!"

"Nay, thou shalt not need," said the traveller; "if it indeed be as thou sayest, I will follow thee of free-will—the rather that I am not wholly unskilled in leech-craft, and have in my scrip that which may do thy friend a service—Yet walk more slowly, I pray thee, for I am already well-nigh foreworn with travel."

With the indignant impatience of the fiery steed when compelled by his rider to keep pace with some slow drudge upon the highway, Halbert accompanied the wayfarer, burning with anxiety which he endeavoured to subdue, that he might not alarm his companion, who was obviously afraid to trust him. When they reached the place where they were to turn off the wider glen into the Corri, the traveller made a doubtful pause, as if unwilling to leave the broader path—"Young man," he said, "if thou meanest aught—but good to these gray hairs, thou wilt gain little by thy cruelty—I have no earthly treasure to tempt either robber or murderer."

"And I," said the youth, "am neither—and yet—God of Heaven!—I may be a murderer, unless your aid comes in time to this wounded wretch!"

"Is it even so," said the traveller; "and do human passions disturb the breast of nature even in her deepest solitude!—Yet why should I marvel that where darkness abides the works of darkness should abound!—By its fruits in the tree known—Lead on, unhappy youth—I follow thee!"

And with better will to the journey than he had evinced hitherto, the stranger exerted himself to the uttermost, and seemed to forget his own fatigue in his efforts to keep pace with his impatient guide.

What was the surprise of Halbert Glendinning, when, upon arriving at the fatal spot, he saw no appearance of the body of Sir Pierce Shaffron! The traces of the fray were otherwise sufficiently visible. The knight's cloak had indeed vanished as well as his body, but his doubt remained where he had laid it down, and the turf on which he had been stretched was stained with blood in many a dark crimson spot.

As he gazed round him in terror and astonishment, Halbert's eyes fell upon the place of sepulchre which had so lately appeared to gape for a victim. It was no longer open, and it seemed that earth had received the expected tenant; for the usual narrow hillock was piled over what had lately been an open grave, and the green sod was adjusted over all with the accuracy of an experienced sexton. Halbert stood aghast. The idea rushed on his mind irresistibly, that the earth-heap before him enclosed what had lately been a living, moving, and sentient fellow-creature, whom, on little provocation, his fell act had reduced to a clod of the valley, as senseless and as cold as the turf under which he rested. The hand that scooped the grave had completed its work; and whose hand could it be save that of the mysterious being of doubtful quality, whom his rashness had invoked, and whom he had suffered to intermingle in his destinies!

As he stood with clasped hands and uplifted eyes, bitterly ruing his rashness, he was roused by the voice of the stranger, whose suspicions of his guide had again been awakened by finding the scene so different from what Halbert had led him to expect—"Young man," he said, "hast thou baited thy tongue with falsehood to ent perhaps only a few days from the life of one whom Nature will soon call home, without guilt on thy part to hasten his journey?"

"By the blessed Heaven!—by our dear Lady!" ejaculated Halbert—

"Swear not at all!" said the stranger, interrupting him, "neither by Heaven, for it is God's throne, nor by earth, for it is his footstool—nor by the creatures whom he hath made, for they are but earth and clay as we are. If thy yea be yea, and thy nay nay. Tell me in a word, why and for what purpose thou hast feigned a tale, to lead a bewildered traveller yet farther astray?"

"As I am a Christian man," said Glendinning, "I left him here bleeding to death—and now I no where spy him, and much I doubt that the tomb that thou seest has closed on his mortal remains!"

"And who is he for whose fate thou art so anxious?" said the stranger; "or how is it possible that this wounded man could have been either removed from, or interred in, a place so solitary?"

"His name," said Halbert, after a moment's pause, "is Pierce Shafton—there, on that very spot, I left him bleeding; and what power has conveyed him hence, I know no more than thou dost."

"Pierce Shafton!" said the stranger; "Sir Pierce Shafton of Wilverton, a kinsman, as it is said, of the great Pierce of Northumberland! If thou hast slain him, to return to the territories of the proud Abbot is to give thy neck to the gallows. He is well known that Pierce Shafton; the meddling tool of wiser plotters—a harebrained trafficker in treason—a champion of the Pope, employed as a forlorn hope by those more politic heads, who have more will to work mischief, than valour to encounter danger.—Come with me, youth, and save thyself from the evil consequences of this deed—Guide me to the Castle of Avenel, and thy reward shall be protection and safety."

Again Halbert paused, and summoned his mind to a hasty council. The vengeance with which the Abbot was likely to visit the slaughter of Shafton, his friend, and in some measure his guest, was likely to be severe; yet, in the various contingencies which he had considered previous to their duel, he had unaccountably omitted to reflect what was to be his line of conduct in case of Sir Pierce falling by his hand. If he returned to Glendearg, he was sure to draw on his whole family, including Mary Avenel, the resentment of the Abbot and community, whereas it was possible that flight might make him be regarded as the sole author of the deed, and might avert the indignation of the monks from the rest of the inhabitants of his paternal tower. Halbert recollected also the favour expressed for the household, and especially for Edward, by the Sub-Prior; and he conceived that he could, by communicating his own guilt to that worthy ecclesiastic, when at a distance from Glendearg, secure his powerful interposition in favour of his family. These thoughts rapidly passed through his mind, and he determined on flight. The stranger's company and his promised protection came in aid of that resolution; but he was unable to reconcile the invitation which the old man gave him to accompany him for safety to the Castle of Avenel, with the connections of Julian, the present usurper of that inheritance. "Good Heaven," he said, "I fear that you mistake the man with whom you wish me to harbour: Avenel guided Pierce Shafton into Scotland, and his henchman, Christie of the Clinthill, brought the Southron hither."

"Of that," said the old man, "I am well aware. Yet if thou wilt trust to me, as I have shewn no reluctance to confide in thee, thou shalt find with Julian Avenel welcome, or at least safety."

"Father," replied Halbert, "though I can ill reconcile what thou sayest with what Julian Avenel hath done, yet caring little about the safety of a creature so lost as myself, and as thy words seem those of truth and honesty, and finally, as thou didst render thyself frankly up to my conduct I will return the confidence thou hast shewn, and accompany thee to the Castle of Avenel by a road which thou thyself couldst never have discovered." He led the way, and the old man followed for some time in silence.

CHAPTER XXIII.

'Tis when the wound is stiffening with the cold,
The warrior feels his pain—'tis when the heat
And fiery fever of his soul is pass'd,
The sinner feels remorse.

Old Play.

THE feelings of compunction with which Halbert Glendinning was visited upon this painful occasion, were deeper than belonged to an age and country in which human life was held so cheap. They fell far short certainly of those which might have afflicted a mind regulated by better religious precepts, and more strictly trained under social laws; but still they were deep and severely felt, and divided in Halbert's heart even the regret with which he parted from Mary Avenel and the tower of his fathers.

The old traveller walked silently by his side for some time, and then addressed him.—"My son, it has been said that sorrow must speak or die—Why art thou so much cast down?—Tell me thy unhappy tale, and it may be that my gray head may devise counsel and aid for your young life."

"Alas!" said Halbert Glendinning, "can you wonder why I am cast down?—I am at this instant, a fugitive from my father's house, from my mother, and from my friends, and I bear on my head the blood of a man who injured me but in idle words, which I have thus bloodily requited. My heart now tells me I have done evil—it was harder than these rocks if it could bear unmoved the thought, that I have sent this man to a long account, unhoused and unshriven!"

"Pause there, my son," said the traveller. "That thou hast defaced God's image in thy neighbour's person—that thou hast sent dust to dust in the wrath or idler pride, is indeed a sin of the deepest dye—that thou hast cut short the space which Heaven might have allowed him for repentance, makes it yet more deadly—but for all this there is balm in Gilead."

"I understand you not, Father," said Halbert, struck by the solemn tone, which was assumed by his companion.

The old man proceeded.—"Thou hast slain thine enemy—it was a cruel deed; thou hast cut him off purchase in his sin—it is a fearful aggravation,

Do yet by my counsel, and in lieu of him whom thou hast perchance consigned to the kingdom of Satan, let thine efforts wrest another subject from the reign of the Evil One."

"I understand you, father," said Halbert; "thou wouldst have me atone for my rashness by doing service to the soul of my adversary—But how may this be? I have no money to purchase masses, and gladly would I go barefoot to the Holy Land to free his spirit from purgatory, only that——"

"My son," said the old man, interrupting him, "the sinner for whose redemption I entreat you to labour, is not the dead, but the living. It is not for the soul of thine enemy I would exhort thee to pray—that has already had its final doom from a Judge as merciful as he is just; nor, wert thou to coin that rock into ducats, and obtain a mass for each one, would it avail the departed spirit. Where the tree hath fallen, it must lie. But the sapling, which hath in it yet the vigour and juice of life, may be bended to the point to which it ought to incline."

"Art thou a priest, father?" said the young man, "or by what commission dost thou talk of such high matters?"

"By that of my Almighty Master," said the traveller, "under whose banner I am an enlisted soldier."

Halbert's acquaintance with religious matters was no deeper than could be derived from the Archbishop of Saint Andrew's Catechism, and the pamphlet called the Two-pennie Faith, both which were industriously circulated and recommended by the monks of Saint Mary's. Yet, however indifferent and superficial a theologian, he began to suspect that he was now in company with one of the gossellers, or heretics, before whose influence the ancient system of religion now tottered to the very foundation. Bred up, as may well be presumed, in a holy horror against these formidable sectaries, the youth's first feelings were those of a loyal and devoted church vassal. "Old man," he said, "wert thou able to make good with thy hand the words that thy tongue hath spoken against our Holy Mother Church, we should have tried upon this moor which of our creeds hath the better champion."

"Nay," said the stranger, "if thou art a true soldier of Rome, thou wilt not pause from thy purpose because thou hast the odds of years and of strength on thy side. Hearken to me, my son. I have shewed thee how to make thy peace with Heaven, and thou hast rejected my proffer. I will now shew thee how thou shalt make thy reconciliation with the powers of this world. Take this gray hair from the frail body which supports it, and carry it to the chair of proud Abbot Boniface; and when thou talkest him thou hast slain Percie Shafton, and he is as dead as the dead, lay the head of Henry Warden at his feet, and thou shalt have praise instead of censure."

Halbert Glendinning stepped back in surprise. "What! are you that Henry Warden so famous among the heretics, that even Knox's name is scarce more frequently in their mouths? Art thou he, and darest thou to approach the Hall-dome of Saint Mary's?"

"I am Henry Warden of a surety," said the old man, "but unworthy to be named in the same breath with Knox, but yet willing to venture on whatever dangers my master's service may call me to."

"Hearken to me, then," said Halbert; "to slay thee, I have no heart—to make thee prisoner, were equally to bring thy blood on my head—to leave thee in this wild without a guide, were little better. I will conduct thee, as I promised, in safety to the Castle of Avenel; but breathe not, while we are on the journey, a word against the doctrines of the holy church of which I am an unworthy—but though an ignorant, a zealous member.—When thou art there arrived, beware of thyself—there is a high price upon thy head, and Julian Avenel loves the glance of gold better than pieces."

"Yet thou sayest not," answered the Protestant preacher, for such he was, "that for lucre he would sell the blood of his guest?"

"Not if thou comest an invited stranger, relying on his faith," said the youth; "evil as Julian may be, he dare not break the rites of hospitality; for, loose as we on these marches may be in all other ties, these are respected amongst us even to idolatry, and his nearest relations would think it incumbent on them to spill his blood themselves, to efface the disgrace such treason would bring upon their name and lineage. But if thou goest self-invited, and without assurance of safety, I promise thee thy risk is great."

"I am in God's hand," answered the preacher; "it is on His errand that I traverse these wilds amidst dangers of every kind; while I am useful for my master's service, they shall not prevail against me, and when, like the barren fig-tree, I can no longer produce fruit, what imports it when or by whom the axe is laid to the root?"

"Your courage and devotion," said Glendinning, "are worthy of a better cause."

"That," said Warden, "cannot be—guine is the very best."

They continued their journey in silence, Halbert Glendinning tracing with the utmost accuracy the mazes of the dangerous and intricate morasses and hills which divided the Halldome from the barony of Avenel. From time to time he was obliged to stop, in order to assist his companion to cross the black intervals of quaking bog, called in the Scottish dialect aga, by which the firmer parts of the morass were intersected.

"Courage, old man," said Halbert, as he saw his companion almost exhausted with fatigue, "we shall soon be upon hard ground. And yet soft as this moss is, I have seen the merry falconers go through it as light as deer when the quarry was upon the flight."

"True, my son," answered Warden, "for so I will still call you, though you term me no longer father; and even so doth headlong youth pursue its pleasures, without regard to the mire and the peril of the paths through which they are hurried."

"I have already told thee," answered Halbert Glendinning, sternly, "that I will hear nothing from thee that savours of doctrine."

"Nay, but, my son," answered Warden, "thy spiritual father himself would surely not dispute the truth of what I have now spoken for your edification!"

Glendinning stoutly replied, "I know not how that may be—but I wot well it is the fashion of your brotherhood to bait your hook with fair discourse, and to hold yourselves up as angels of light, that you may the better extend the kingdom of darkness."

"May God," replied the preacher, "pardon those who have thus reported of his servants! I will not offend thee, my son, by being instant out of season—thou speakest but as thou art taught—yet sure I trust that so goodly a youth will be still rescued, like a brand from the burning."

While he thus spoke, the verge of the moraines was attained, and their path lay on the declivity. Green-sward it was, and, viewed from a distance, chequered with its narrow and verdant line the dark-brown heath, which it traversed, though the distinction was not so easily traced when they were walking on it. The old man pursued his journey with comparative ease; and, unwilling again to awaken the jealous zeal of his young companion for the Roman faith, he discoursed on other matters. The tone of his conversation was still grave, moral, and instructive. He had travelled much, and knew both the language and manners of other countries, concerning which Halbert Glendinning, already anticipating the possibility of being obliged to quit Scotland for the deed he had done, was naturally and anxiously desirous of information. By degrees he was more attracted by the charms of the stranger's conversation than repelled by the dread of his dangerous character as a heretic, and Halbert had called him father more than once, ere the turrets of Avenel Castle came in view.

The situation of this ancient fortress was remarkable. It occupied a small rocky islet in a mountain lake, or loch, as such a piece of water is called in Westmoreland. The lake might be about a mile in circumference, surrounded by hills of considerable height, which, except where old trees and brushwood occupied the ravines that divided them from each other, were bare and heathy. The surprise of the spectator was chiefly excited by finding a piece of water situated in that high and mountainous region, and the landscape around had features which might rather be termed wild, than either romantic or sublime; yet the scene was not without its charms. Under the burning sun of summer, the clear azure of the deep unuffled lake refreshed the eye, and impressed the mind with a pleasing feeling of deep solitude. In winter, when the snow lay on the mountains around, these dazzling masses appeared to ascend far beyond their wonted and natural height, while the lake, which stretched beneath, and filled their bosom with all its frozen waves, lay like the surface of a darkened and broken mirror around the black and rocky islet, and the walls of the gray castle with which it was crowned.

As the castle occupied, either with its principal buildings, or with its flanking and outward walls, every projecting point of rock, which served as its site, it seemed as completely surrounded by water as the nest of a wild swan, save where a narrow causeway extended betwixt the islet and the shore. But the fortress was larger in appearance than in reality; and of the buildings which it actually contained, many had become ruinous and uninhabitable. In the times of the grandeur of the Avenel family, these had been occupied by a considerable garrison of followers and retainers; but they were now in a great measure deserted; and Julian Avenel would probably have fixed his habitation in a residence better suited to his diminished fortunes, had it not been for the great security which the situation of the old castle afforded to a man of his precarious and perilous mode of life. Indeed, in this respect, the spot could scarce have been more happily chosen, for it could be rendered almost completely inaccessible at the pleasure of the inhabitant. The distance betwixt the nearest shore and the islet was not indeed above an hundred yards; but then the causeway which connected them was extremely narrow, and completely divided by two cuts, one in the mid-way between the islet and shore, and another close under the outward gate of the castle. These formed a formidable, and almost insurmountable interruption to any facile approach. Each was defended by a drawbridge, one of which, being that nearest to the castle, was regularly raised at all times during the day, and both were lifted at night.

The situation of Julian Avenel, engaged in a variety of feuds, and a party to almost every dark and mysterious transaction which was on foot in that wild and military frontier, required all these precautions for his security. His own ambiguous and doubtful course of policy had increased these dangers; for as he made professions to both parties in the state, and occasionally united more actively with either the one or the other, as chance best to serve his immediate purpose, he could not be said to have either firm allies and protectors, or determined enemies. His life was a life of expedients and of peril; and while, in pursuit of his interest, he made all the doubles which he thought necessary to attain his object, he often overran his prey, and missed that which he might have gained by observing a straighter course.

CHAPTER XXIV.

"I'll walk on tiptoe; and my eye with caution,
My heart with courage, and my hand with weapon,
Like him who ventures on a lion's den."

Old Play.

WHEN, issuing from the gorge of a pass which terminated upon the lake, the travellers came in sight of the ancient castle of Avenel, the old man paused, and, resting upon his pilgrim staff, looked with earnest attention upon the scene before him. The castle was, as we have said, in many places ruinous, as was evident, even at this distance, by the broken, rugged, and irregular outline of the walls and of the towers. In others it seemed more entire, and a pillar of dark smoke, which ascended from the chimneys of the donjon, and spread in long dusky pendants through the clear ether, indicated that it was inhabited. But as corn-fields or enclosed pasture-grounds on the side of the lake showed that provident attention to comfort and subsistence which usually appeared near the houses of the greater, and even of the lesser barons. There were no cottages with their patches of infield, and their crofts and gardens, surrounded by rows of massive sycamores; no church with its simple tower in the valley; no herds of sheep among the hills; no cattle on the lower ground; nothing which intimated the occasional prosecution of the arts of peace and of industry. It was plain that the inhabitants, whether few or numerous, must be considered as the garrison of the castle, living within its defended precincts, and subsisting by means which were other than peaceful.

Probably it was with this conviction that the old man, gazing on the castle, muttered to himself, "Lapis offensivus et petra scandali!" and then, turning to Halbert Glendinning, he added, "We may say of yonder fort as King James did of another fastness in this province, that he who built it was a thief in his heart."

"But it was not so," answered Glendinning; "yonder castle was built by the old lords of Avenel, men as much beloved in peace as they were respected in war. They were the bulwark of the frontiers against foreigners, and the protectors of the natives from domestic oppression. The present usurper of their inheritance no more resembles them, than the night-prowling owl resembles a falcon, because she builds on the same rock."

"This Julian Avenel, then, holds no high place in the love and regard of his neighbours?" said Warden.

"So little," answered Halbert, "that besides the jack-men and riders with whom he has associated himself, and of whom he has many at his disposal, I know of few who voluntarily associate with him. He has been more than once outlawed both by England and Scotland, his lands declared forfeited, and his head set at a price. But in these unquiet times, a man so daring as Julian Avenel has ever found some friends willing to protect him against the penalties of the law, on condition of his secret services."

"You describe a dangerous man," replied Warden.

"You may have experience of that," replied the youth, "if you deal not the more warily;—though it may be that he also has forsaken the community of the church, and gone astray in the path of heresy."

"What your blindness terms the path of heresy," answered the reformer, "is indeed the strait and narrow way, wherein he who walks turns not aside, whether for worldly wealth or for worldly passions. Would to God this man were moved by no other and no worse spirit than that which prompts my poor endeavours to extend the kingdom of Heaven! This Baron of Avenel is personally unknown to me, is not of our congregation or of our council; yet I hear so him charges touching my safety, from those whom he must fear if he does not respect them, and upon that assurance I will venture upon his hold.—I am now sufficiently refreshed by these few minutes of repose."

"Take then this advice for your safety," said

Halbert, "and believe that it is founded upon the usage of this country and its inhabitants. If you can better shift for yourself, go not to the Castle of Avenel—if you do risk going thither, obtain from him, if possible, his safe-conduct, and beware that he swears it by the Black Rood.—And lastly, observe whether he eats with you at the board, or pledges you in the cup; for if he gives you not these signs of welcome, his thoughts are evil towards you."

"Alas!" said the preacher, "I have no better earthly refuge for the present than these frowning towers, but I go thither trusting to aid which is not of this earth.—But thou, good youth; needest thou trust thyself in this dangerous den?"

"I," answered Halbert, "am in no danger. I am well known to Christie of the Clinthill, the henchman of this Julian Avenel; and, what is a yet better protection, I have nothing either to provoke malice or to tempt plunder."

The tramp of a steed, which clattered along the shingly banks of the loch, was now heard behind them; and, when they looked back, a rider was visible, his steel cap and the point of his long lance glancing in the setting sun, as he rode rapidly towards them.

Halbert Glendinning soon recognized Christie of the Clinthill, and made his companion aware that the henchman of Julian Avenel was approaching.

"Ha, youngling!" said Christie to Halbert; as he came up to them, "thou hast made good my word at last, and come to take service with my noble master, hast thou not? Thou shalt find a good friend and a true; and ere Saint Barnaby come round again, thou shalt know every pass betwixt Millburn Plain and Notherby, as if thou hadst been born with a jack on thy back, and a lance in thy hand.—What old carle hast thou with thee?—He is not of the brotherhood of Saint Mary's—at least he has not the braid* of these black cattle."

"He is a wayfaring man," said Halbert, "who has concerns with Julian of Avenel. For myself, I intend to go to Edinburgh to see the court and the Queen, and when I return hither we will talk of your proffer. Meantime, as thou hast often invited me to the castle, I crave hospitality there to-night for myself and my companion."

"For thyself and welcome, young comrade," replied Christie; "but we harbour no pilgrims, nor aught that looks like a pilgrim."

"So please you," said Warden, "I have letters of commendation to thy master from a sure friend, whom he will right willingly oblige in higher matters than in affording you a brief protection.—And I am no pilgrim, but renounces the same, with all its superstitious observances."

He offered his letters to the horseman, who shook his head.

"These," he said, "are matters for my master, and it will be well, if he can read them himself for me, sword and lance are my stock and pander, and have been since I was twelve years old. But I will guide you to the castle, and the Baron of Avenel will himself judge of your errand."

By this time the party had reached the caseway, along which Christie advanced at a trot, intimating,

* It was of Lochwood, the hereditary fortress of the Johnstones of Annandale, a strong castle situated in the centre of a wooded bog, that James VI. made this remark.

* Braid.—The head, or mane, set upon sheep or cattle by their owners.

his presence to the warders within the castle by a shrill and peculiar whistle. At this signal the farther drawbridge was lowered. The horseman passed it, and disappeared under the gloomy portal which was beyond it.

Glendinning and his companion advancing more leisurely along the rugged causeway, stood at length under the same gateway, over which frowned, in dark red freestone, the ancient armorial bearings of the house of Avenel, which represented a female figure shrouded and muffled, which occupied the whole field. The cause of their assuming so singular a device was uncertain, but the figure was generally supposed to represent the mysterious being called the White Lady of Avenel. The sight of this mouldering shield awakened in the mind of Halbert the strange circumstances which had connected his fate with that of Mary Avenel, and with the doings of the spiritual being who was attached to her house, and whom he saw here represented in stone, as he had before seen her effigy upon the seal ring of Walter Avenel, which, with other trinkets formerly mentioned, had been saved from pillage, and brought to Glendearg, when Mary's mother was driven from her habitation.

"You sigh, my son," said the old man, observing the impression made on his youthful companion's countenance, but mistaking the cause; "if you fear to enter, we may yet return."

"That can ye not," said Christie of the Clinthill, who emerged at that instant from the side-door under the archway. "Look yonder, and choose whether you will return: skimming the water like a wild-duck, or winging the air like a plover."

They looked, and saw that the drawbridge which they had just crossed was again raised, and now interposed its planks betwixt the setting sun and the portal of the castle, deepening the gloom of the arch under which they stood. Christie laughed and bid them follow him, saying, by way of encouragement, in Halbert's ear, "Answer boldly and readily to whatever the Baron asks you. Never stop to pick your words, and above all shew no fear of him—the devil is not so black as he is painted."

As he spoke thus, he introduced them into the large stone hall, at the upper end of which blazed a huge fire of wood. The long oaken table, which, as usual, occupied the midst of the apartment, was covered with rude preparations for the evening meal of the Baron and his chief domestics, five or six of whom, strong, athletic, savage-looking men, paced up and down the lower end of the hall, which rang to the jarring clang of their long swords that clashed as they moved, and to the heavy tramp of their high-heeled jack-boots. Iron jacks, or coats of buff, formed the principal part of their dress, and steel-bonnets, or large slouched hats with Spanish plumes drooping backwards, were their head attire.

The Baron of Avenel was one of those tall, muscular, martial figures, which are the favourite subjects of Salvator Rosa. He wore a cloak which had been once gaily trimmed, but which, by long wear and frequent exposure to the weather, was now faded in its colours. Thrown negligently about his tall person, it partly hid, and partly showed, a short doublet of buff, under which was in some places visible that light shirt of mail which was called a surcoat, because worn instead of more ostensible armour, to protect against private assassination. A leathern belt sustained a large and heavy sword on one side, and on the other that gay poniard which had once called Sir Piercie Shaston master, of which the hatchments and gildings were already much defaced, either by rough usage or neglect.

Notwithstanding the rudeness of his apparel, Julian Avenel's manner and countenance had far more elevation than those of the attendants who surrounded him. He might be fifty or upwards, for his dark hair was mingled with gray, but age had neither tamed the fire of his eye nor the enterprise of his disposition. His countenance had been handsome, for beauty was an attribute of the family; but the lines were roughened by fatigue and exposure to the weather, and rendered coarser by the habitual indulgence of violent passions.

He seemed in deep and moody reflection, and was pacing at a distance from his dependents along the upper end of the hall, sometimes stopping from time to time to caress and feed a gos-hawk, which sat upon his wrist, with its jesses (i.e. the leathern straps fixed to its legs) wrapt around his hand. The bird, which seemed not insensible to its master's attention, answered his caresses by ruffling forward its feathers, and pecking playfully at his finger. At such intervals the Baron smiled, but instantly resumed the darksome air of sullen meditation. He did not even deign to look upon an object, which few could have passed and repassed so often without bestowing on it a transient glance.

This was a woman of exceeding beauty, rather gaily than richly attired, who sat on a low seat close by the large hall chimney. The gold chains round her neck and arms,—the gay gown of green which swept the floor,—the silver-embroidered girdle, with its bunch of keys, depending in house wifely pride by a silver chain,—the yellow silken cowrecker (Scottish, curck) which was disposed around her head, and partly concealed her dark profusion of hair,—above all, the circumstance so delicately touched in the old ballad, that "the girdle was too short," the "gown of green all too strait," for the wearer's present shape, would have intimidated the Baron's Lady. But then the lowly seat,—the expression of deep melancholy, which was unguessed into a timid smile whenever she saw the least chance of catching the eye of Julian Avenel,—the subdued look of grief, and the starting tear for which that constrained smile was again exchanged when she saw herself entirely disregarded,—these were not the attributes of a wife or they were those of a dejected and afflicted female, who had yielded her love in less than legitimate terms.

Julian Avenel, as we have said, continued to pace the hall without paying any of that mute attention which is rendered to almost every female either by affection or courtesy. He seemed totally unconscious of her presence, or of that of his attendants, and was only roused from his own dark reflections by the notice he paid to the falcon, to which, however, the lady seemed to attend, as if studying to find either an opportunity of speaking to the Baron, or of finding something significant in the expressions which he used to the bird. All this the strangers had time enough to remark; for no sooner had they entered the apartment than their usher, Christie of the Clinchill, after exchanging a significant glance with the menials or troopers at the lower end of the apartment, signed to Halbert Glendinning and to his companion to stand still near the door, while he himself, advancing nearer the table, placed himself in such a situation as to catch the Baron's observation when he should be disposed to look around, but without presuming to intrude himself on his master's notice. Indeed, the look of this man, naturally bold, hardy, and audacious, seemed totally changed when he was in presence of his master, and resembled the dejected and cowering manner of a quarrelsome dog when rebuked by his owner, or when he finds himself obliged to deprecate the violence of a superior adversary of his own species.

There is an ancient English family, I believe, which bears, as the lion, a shield or shield passant sable in a field argent. It is said to have been a device of a puning or coining knight.

In spite of the novelty of his own situation, and every painful feeling connected with it, Halbert felt his curiosity interested in the female, who sat by the chimney unnoticed and unregarded. He marked with what keen and trembling solicitude she watched the broken words of Julian, and how her glance stole towards him, ready to be averted upon the slightest chance of his perceiving himself to be watched.

Meantime he went on with his dalliance with his feathered favourite, now giving, now withholding, the morsel with which he was about to feed the bird, and so exciting its appetite and gratifying it by turns. "What! more yet!—thou foul kite, thou wouldst never have done—give thee part thou wilt have all—Ay, prune thy feathers, and prink thyself gay—much thou wilt make of it now—dost think I know thee not!—dost think I see not that all that ruffling and pluming of wing and feathers is not for thy master, but to try what thou canst make of him, thou greedy gled!—well—there—take it then, and rejoice thyself—little thou goes far with thee, and with all thy sex—and so it should."

He ceased to look on the bird, and again traversed the apartment. Then taking another small piece of raw meat from the trencher, on which it was placed ready cut for his use, he began once again to tempt and tease the bird, by offering and withdrawing it, until he awakened its wild and bold disposition. "What! struggling, fluttering, aiming at me with beak and single!—So! So! I wouldst mount! wouldst fly! the jesses are found thy clutches, fool—thou canst neither stir nor soar, but by my will—Beware thou come to reclaim, wench, else I will wring thy head off one of these days—Well, have it then, and well fare thou with it.—So ho, Jenkin!" One of the attendants stepped forward—"Take the foul gled hence to the mew—or, stay; leave her, but look well to her casting and to her bathing—we will see her fly to-morrow.—How now, Christie, so soon returned?"

Christie advanced to his master, and gave an account of himself and his journey, in the way in which a police-officer holds communication with his magistrate, that is, as much by signs as by words.
